

American POLITICAL SCIENCE Review

Vol. LVI

March, 1962

No. 1

Deviation Control .....	Zbigniew Brzezinski .....	5
Politics and Strategy
The Market for Strategic Ideas in Britain .....	Laurence W. Martin .....	23
Congressional Innovation and Intervention .....	Raymond H. Dawson .....	42
Stability of Coalitions on Roll Calls in the House of Representatives .....	William H. Riker and Donald Niemi .....	58
Religious Influence on Wisconsin Voting, 1928-1960 ...	Andrew R. Baggeley .....	66
Two Views of the Supreme Court
Deeds Without Doctrines: Civil Rights in the 1960 Term of the Supreme Court .....	Robert G. McCloskey .....	71
The 1960 Term: A Psychological Analysis .....	Glendon Schubert .....	90
Two Theorems on Ceteris Paribus .....	Franklin M. Fisher and Albert Ando .....	108
Positive Liberty, 1880-1914 .....	David Nicholls .....	114
Editorial Notes
Toward a Definition of Editorial Policy for the Review ..	Harvey C. Mansfield .....	129
Toward a Definition of Book Review Policy .....	Avery Leiserson .....	139
Communications to the Editor .....		141
Book Reviews, Notes and Bibliography .....	Thomas H. Eliot (ed.) ...	143
News and Notes .....	Ralph A. Straetz (ed.) ...	233

(For list of book reviews, see page 143)

Published quarterly by

THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE ASSOCIATION

IV

MAJOR GOVERNMENTS OF MODERN EUROPE

Herman Finer, University of Chicago. "... an admirable text for courses in Comparative Government. It is surely the most readable and the most up-to-date of textbooks in this area ... it is always refreshing to see so able a writer and scholar as Herman Finer making completely clear what his judgments are instead of hiding them under a bushel in the name of 'objectivity'." Frederick L. Schuman, Williams College, 1960; Second Printing, 1962. 736 pp. $8.25

AMERICAN FOREIGN POLICY IN THE NUCLEAR AGE

Cecil V. Crabb, Jr., Vassar College. "... a sound and lucidly written text which can be strongly recommended ... full of excellent and important up-to-date empirical material ... Crabb is generally clear and organizes his material well, and the reader has something to get his teeth into."—H. S. Wolfsohn, The Austrian Journal of Politics and History, May, 1961. 1960. 544 pp. $6.90.

---

Other books of interest

HISTORY OF THE UNITED STATES CIVIL SERVICE

Paul P. Van Riper, Cornell University. The standard reference work; belongs in every professional library. 588 pp. $7.50

LEADERSHIP IN ADMINISTRATION: A Sociological Interpretation

Philip Selznick, University of California, Berkeley. Valuable as a corollary text for public administration and business administration courses. 162 pp. $4.00

HANDBOOK OF PRACTICAL POLITICS

Paul P. Van Riper, Cornell University. For courses in political parties, American government, political behavior, or local and state government. 356 pp. Paper, $4.00

---

Row-Peterson also published the text materials for Continental Classroom:

*AMERICAN GOVERNMENT: Structure, Problems, and Policies. By Peter H. Odegard, Hans H. Baerwald, et al. $4.00

*AMERICAN GOVERNMENT: Readings and Documents. Peter H. Odegard and Victor G. Rosenblum, editors. $2.50

*AMERICAN GOVERNMENT: Second Semester Study Guide. By Peter H. Odegard. $1.00

Examination copies available upon request to teachers of the appropriate courses.

ROW, PETERSON AND COMPANY

Publishers of Good Books in Evanston, Illinois, and Elmsford, New York

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

THE NEW COMMUNIST MANIFESTO and Related Documents

40

Dan N. Jacobs, Miami University, Editor. In the Second Edition, Professor Jacobs has added the Program of CPSU, first published in draft form on July 30, 1961, and here included in final form as ratified by the Party Congress XXII on October 31, 1961.

The documents in the original edition, all of which are still included, are: The New Communist Manifesto of 1960, Khrushchev's "secret" address to the Party Congress XX, Lenin's Testament with the codicil, the original Communist Manifesto, The 1957 Declaration of the Communist and workers' parties delegates, Mao's "Let a Hundred Flowers Blossom" speech, and extracts from Edvard Kardelj's "Socialism and War." Second Edition, 256 pp. Paper, $1.90

---

POLITICS, THE CONSTITUTION, AND THE SUPREME COURT

Loren P. Beth, University of Massachusetts. An introduction to the study of constitutional law, this book emphasizes the things that political science students should know about our judiciary: the role it plays in our political system, the reasons why it has been given such a role, and how it performs. Primarily useful as a supplement to the usual case or text materials used in the constitutional law course, and may also be used as supplementary reading in other courses. About 192 pp. Probably $2.00. Ready in March, 1962.

---

THE SUPREME COURT AND AMERICAN ECONOMIC LIFE

Benjamin Munn Ziegler, Amherst College. A collection of thirty-seven land-mark decisions of the Supreme Court, touching all phases of the relationships between government and business. Concisely excised opinions, clearly introduced. About 288 pp. Probably $2.40.

---

Examination copies available upon request to teachers of the appropriate courses.
Write for a copy of Row-Peterson's current College Catalog.

---

ROW, PETERSON AND COMPANY
Publishers of Good Books in Evanston, Illinois, and Elmsford, New York

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW

Published quarterly by The American Political Science Association

EDITORIAL BOARD

- HARVEY C. MANSFIELD, Managing Editor, Ohio State University
WALLACE S. SAYRE, Associate Editor, Columbia University (on leave) DWIGHT WALDO, University of California Berkeley (at Bologna, Italy)
SAMUEL H. BEER, Associate Editor, Harvard University HAROLD STEIN, University of Michigan
ALEXANDER HEARD, University of North Carolina
OTTO KIRCHHEIMER, Columbia University JOHN D. LEWIS, Oberlin College

EDITORIAL ASSOCIATES

- THOMAS H. ELIOT, Book Review Editor, Washington University (St. Louis) WILLIAM H. ROBERTS, Catholic University
CECELIA M. KENYON, Smith College
RALPH A. STRAETZ, News and Notes Editor, New York University JULIAN FELDMAN, University of California (Berkeley)
FRANKLIN L. BURDETTE, University of Maryland
HIRAM M. STOUT, Washington, D.C.

EDITORIAL OFFICE

Managing Editor, APSR
100 University Hall, Ohio State University, 216 N. Oval Dr., Columbus 10, Ohio

EXECUTIVE OFFICE

Executive Director, APSA
1726 Massachusetts Avenue, N.W. Washington 6, D.C.

THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW, published quarterly during the months of March, July, September, and December, is supplied to all APSA members. Individual and institutional memberships are $15.00 a year ($6.00 for graduate and undergraduate students). Foreign currency at official exchange rate will be accepted for foreign subscriptions and foreign membership fees. Equivalent of $1 for additional postage should be added for foreign subscriptions.

Current issues are priced at $3.75 per copy. Prices of other issues are furnished on request.

Applications for membership, orders for the REVIEW, and remittances should be addressed to Executive Director, The American Political Science Association, 1726 Massachusetts Avenue, Washington 6, D.C. Notices of change of address should be received in the Washington office by 5th day of the month of publication.

Address correspondence about contributions to the REVIEW to Harvey C. Mansfield, 100 University Hall, 216 N. Oval Dr., Ohio State University, Columbus 10, Ohio; books intended for review to Thomas H. Eliot, Washington University, St. Louis, Mo.; News and Notes items, to Ralph Straetz, Department of Political Science, New York University, University Heights, New York N.Y.; advertising correspondence, to the Executive Director at the Washington office.

Articles and notes appearing in the REVIEW before the June, 1953 issue were indexed in The Reader's Guide to Periodical Literature. The International Index to Periodicals indexes current issues. Microfilm of the REVIEW, beginning with Volume 46, may be obtained from University Microfilms, North First Street, Ann Arbor, Michigan.

Office of publication: Curtis Reed Plaza, Menasha, Wisconsin.

Foreign Agent: P. S. King and Staples, Ltd., Great Smith Street, Westminster, London.

Second class postage paid at Menasha, Wisconsin. Acceptance for mailing at special rate of postage provided for in Section 1103, Act of October 3, 1917, authorized May 12, 1926.

Printed in the United States of America by George Banta Company, Inc., Menasha, Wisconsin.

Copyright, 1962, by The American Political Science Association.

A new guide to useful field work at the local level

LOCAL POLITICAL SURVEYS

E. E. Schattschneider, Wesleyan Univ.; Victor Jones, Univ. of California, Berkeley

This unique book shows the student how to acquire the practical experience that will enable him to test—in the field—hypotheses advanced in classrooms and texts. The procedures of data-gathering and analysis are described in detail along with information on the sources of necessary data.

CONTENTS: Introduction; Organization and Functions of Local Government; Local Politics; Election Statistics; Political Significance of Demographic, Social, and Economic Data; Areas and Boundaries; Use of Census Data in the Study of Congressional and Legislative Districts in Metropolitan Areas; Population of the Local Community; Political Economy of the Local Community. March 1962, 256 pp., $4.50 paper, tentative

What, if any, are the rational justifications for Democracy?

THE LOGIC OF DEMOCRACY

Thomas Landon Thorson, Univ. of Wisconsin

In this new, exciting essay the technique of modern logical analysis is applied to finding out why "democratic principles are to be preferred over authoritarian ones." The more traditional justifications of democracy are examined and found wanting. The ideologies that form the core of political democracy are explored and clarified in a direct, succinct, and stimulating style. You will be especially pleased with this book for use in any course in political theory, modern political thought, or political philosophy. Jan. 1962, 176 pp., $2.25 paper

Why do metropolitan reorganization battles usually end in failure?

METROPOLITAN REFORM IN ST. LOUIS: A CASE STUDY

Henry J. Schmandt, Univ. of Wisconsin (Milwaukee); Paul G. Steinbicker and George D. Wendel, both of St. Louis Univ.

This unique and systematic case study of an urban action program provides some of the answers to this important problem. 1961, 84 pp., $1.00 paper

HOLT, RINEHART AND WINSTON, INC.

383 Madison Ave., N.Y. 17

New Books of Exceptional Interest

GOVERNMENTS AND POLITICS OF THE MIDDLE EAST in the Twentieth Century

by H. B. SHARABI, Associate Professor of History and Government, Georgetown University. This important new text clearly describes the structure, functioning, and politics of contemporary Middle Eastern governments. One pre-publication reviewer comments: "This is an excellent piece of work and would make a first-rate textbook . . . the volume is better designed for political science courses on the Middle East than any book on the market at the present time. . . . Sharabi handles the English language with deftness and precision. His style is clear, economical, and eminently readable. . . ." March 1962.

THE IMPERIALISM READER

Documents and Readings on Modern Expansionism

by LOUIS L. SNYDER, Professor of History, The City College of New York. The many-faceted problems relating to imperialism are explored in this comprehensive collection of 178 readings and documents. In an extensive introductory essay Professor Snyder authoritatively discusses each phase of modern expansionism. Brief introductory notes before each selection place the wide variety of official documents, eye-witness reports, essay and arguments in proper perspective. Of special interest is the timely and balanced section on Communist imperialism. March 1962.

D. VAN NOSTRAND COMPANY, INC.

120 Alexander St.

Princeton, N.J.

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

240077

7

The American Political Science Review

VOL. LVI

MARCH, 1962

NO. 1

DEVIATION CONTROL: A STUDY IN THE DYNAMICS OF DOCTRINAL CONFLICT

ZBIGNIEW BRZEZINSKI
Columbia University

This essay is a comparative study in the dynamics of doctrinal conflicts. It deals with organized international movements overtly committed to spreading and carrying out a doctrinal program of action, theological or political, on the basis of both the individual commitment of their respective members and their collective goals as organized bodies. Its purpose is to generalize from the experience of these organizations in handling deviations involving a unit of the movement differing or clashing either with the acknowledged center, with another unit of the movement—in both cases over theological or ideological issues, but within the common doctrine, and accompanied by mutual doctrinal recriminations. A brief and selective analysis of the historical experience of one such movement, Catholicism, might contribute to a more sophisticated understanding of some recent developments within a contemporary international movement, Communism.

More specifically, this study will seek some implications from the doctrinal clashes between Rome and the Jansenists and from the Jesuit missionaries' disputes with their Franciscan and Dominican critics in the 17th century for the problems of unity and diversity which international communism has recently encountered.<sup>1</sup>

Among the growing literature on the Sino-Soviet relationship the following books may be suggested: A. Doak Barnett, Communist China and Asia (New York, 1960), especially ch. 12; F. Hudson, R. Lowenthal and R. MacFarlane, The Sino-Soviet Dispute (London, 1961); London, Unity and Contradiction (New York, 1962); D. Zagoria, The Sino-Soviet Conflict, 1956-1961 (Princeton, 1962). On eastern European affairs see P. Zinner, ed., National Communism and Popular Revolt in Eastern Europe (New York,

Since the issue of Jansenism involved the relations between the French kingdom, with its strong emphasis on the Gallicanism of the French Church, and Rome, the first case has elements of a conflict between a nationally based doctrinal deviation and the center. The second instance pertains to doctrinal-strategic conflicts between component units of the international movement.

I

In both cases we are dealing with theological or ideological movements which are action-oriented; thus a theological or ideological dispute among their respective units is more than just a discussion of philosophical abstractions. Factors of political power and control inevitably become involved. Also, since in any doctrinal bargaining there is no firm, "objective" way of determining the correctness of conflicting positions, a doctrinal dispute has a dynamic quality to it. Once it breaks out, a doctrinal compromise is extremely difficult to arrange. Splitting the difference as in financial transactions, selecting a river or a mountain range as in border disputes, accepting the line held when firing ceased as in armistices: all 1957); J. H. Hallowell, ed., Soviet Satellite Nations (Gainesville, 1958); R. Bass and E. Marbury, eds., The Soviet-Yugoslav Controversy, 1948-1958 (New York, 1959); F. Vali, Rift and Revolt in Hungary (Cambridge, Mass. 1961). On the general problem of Communist bloc relations, see Z. Brzezinski, The Soviet Bloc: Unity and Conflict (rev. ed., New York, 1961).

<sup>2</sup> For the purpose of brevity henceforth the word "doctrinal" will be used to cover both theological and ideological disputes, even though there are obvious differences between doctrine, theology and ideology.

these devices are simply not applicable. Barring an outright split, the usual solutions tend to be more extreme: the agreement of one protagonist to become doctrinally silent, although not necessarily retracting his original views; or the doctrinal subordination of one to the other. A third solution, a mutual agreement to become silent, is not stable if one of the parties involved is the center, since a doctrinally oriented movement cannot remain doctrinally silent in the face of continually changing reality.

The same consideration makes the commitment to silence on the part of a deviation-inclined unit also difficult to sustain. In time the unit involved must make doctrinal judgments, for the same reason that the movement as a whole cannot become silent, since doctrine rationalizes and justifies its program. When that happens, the unit is faced with the choice of either saying that which it was earlier unwilling to say—in effect, thereby capitulating—or reopening the dispute. By way of example, Gomulka's 1956 implicit agreement to remain doctrinally silent was gradually translated into doctrinal capitulation. Tito and Khrushchev, after attempting in 1955–1956 to effect something amounting to an agreement of mutual silence, both soon discovered that they were compelled to speak up, and so they clashed again. The Jansenists during the 17th century faced the same dilemma, since they also were attempting to wage a doctrinal conflict within the framework of a common doctrine and a common international organization.

Power is heavily involved in these disputes. A concession on a doctrinal issue automatically magnifies the power and strengthens the prestige and even authority of one protagonist at the expense of the other. Furthermore a doctrinal dispute very frequently generates related conflicts. These may stir up, for instance, jurisdictional or organizational or personal issues, which then also intensify the doctrinal conflict. Indeed, in doctrinally oriented organizations the latter-type conflicts in themselves usually stimulate doctrinal differences, since there is a strong temptation among doctrinally sensitive organizations to use the charge of doctrinal laxity (or some other imperfection) as a means of scoring a point in any disagreement. The term doctrinal deviation or conflict is used here whenever such doctrinal recriminations are exchanged, irrespective of their cause, within the common doctrinal and organizational context.

In spite of this inherent dynamism of doctrinal conflict, there are also certain elements of stability to it. Usually until quite some time after a deviation has become a defection or defiance, the conflict tends to be limited by mutual acceptance of a common value-system inherent in the doctrine, which tends to contain that conflict within the organization and excludes alliances outside of it. For instance, sharing of mutual animosity towards the "believers" is a persisting characteristic of doctrinal conflict. Furthermore, the common doctrine facilitates communication between protagonists, communication both of the explicit and implicit kinds. Certain moves are not only understandable but easily deciphered, hence the ambiguity inherent in conflicts between doctrinally antithetic protagonists (e.g., "the enigma" of Communism in the eyes of the West) is limited.<sup>3</sup> Doctrinal conflict thus involves agreement and disagreement at the same time.

II

With the foregoing setting the general framework, it may now be appropriate to outline those aspects of the Church's history of the 16th and 17th centuries<sup>4</sup> and of today's Communism which provide the point of contact for this comparative treatment of deviation control. The analogies that will be suggested are not meant to establish a rigid identity in behaviour but rather to unfold certain parallel trends given the structural-functional similarities of the two movements. Perhaps it need not be added that the pace of events in our age is so rapid that changes involving mere decades must be equated with processes which in the past took several centuries to mature.

No general equivalence between Catholicism and Communism can be implied by this study. Indeed, a most vital and distinctive aspect of the activity of the Catholic Church, the spiritual, which defines the unique character of the Church as both a spiritual and a temporal institution, is altogether excluded from consideration. However, certain aspects of the social-political functions of the two movements are both sufficiently similar and unique to them to justify a joint analysis. Both movements see themselves as the exclusive standard bearers of an absolutely correct and normatively all-embracing vision of reality; both have been frequently tested in the defense of it.

<sup>3</sup> It could be argued that the failure of the West to appraise Communism in terms other than the traditional to the West helped Communism in the phase of its weakness. Cf. George Kennan, Russia and the West (New York, 1961).

<sup>4</sup> I have largely relied on L. Pastor, History of the Popes (32 vols., London, 1928–40).

purity of their doctrine; and, since almost nothing that occurs on this earth is seen as irrelevant to the doctrines of these organizations (although Catholicism recognizes the realm of the morally neutral), both have been faced by the difficult task of developing their doctrinal store house to take into account changing social conditions. Both are inherently committed to proselytization and are expansion-oriented: a static or defensive outlook is contrary to their internal nature, while their value-systems make the success of any one unit of the movement the source of satisfaction to the entire membership. This membership is exclusive, and both movements have jealously protected themselves against the free influx of groups claiming alleged identity of views.<sup>5</sup> Both are international, yet both have been frequently faced by the challenge of having to reconcile their claim to universality with the often intense impact of nationalism on their various memberships. Finally, both movements have a highly developed hierarchical power structure, they stress internal discipline, and possess a sophisticated bureaucratic apparatus which in itself generates an organizational compulsion towards application of the doctrine in practice. At the same time, it would be incorrect to think of them simply as homogeneous, single units. Precisely because of their universal scale, their internal organization has to reflect the complexity of the human condition, and they must take into account various national and functional needs. Hence these movements possess only relatively homogeneous international organizations,<sup>6</sup> composed of usually more homogeneous units.

Deviation involving the relations among some of these units, and not deviation within any one of them, is the object of this study. In the case of Catholicism in the 16th and 17th centuries (the choice of this period is justified below), the principal units were, first of all, the center of the organization, the Papacy, with its highly developed bureaucratic apparatus and far-flung Papal Nuncios; the various Catholic kingdoms which in general accepted the principle of universal Catholic unity but with varying degrees of actual Papal intervention in their church matters;<sup>7</sup> the established Catholic universities, such as Louvain or the Sorbonne, which were very active in doctrinal discussions and which operated as corporate entities; the dioceses, particularly those ruled by strong-willed bishops anxious to assert the principle of internal episcopal independence from Rome; the various orders of the Church, such as the Jesuits, the Dominicans, the Franciscans, etc. A systematic classification of the component units of international Communism would presumably include the various Communist-governed nation-states, and also the national Communist parties, as well as the center of the movement, the CPSU.<sup>8</sup> These states differ in national power and are in various stages of doctrine-fulfillment (i.e., some are still building "socialism" while others are more or less ahead); some are truncated states, hence the expansion-orientation of their Communist elites is more intense; some are indigenous Communist regimes while some are entirely dependent on Soviet support.<sup>9</sup> Within the various ruling parties different shades of ideological orientation have developed in recent years, the extremes of which are generally described under the terms revisionist and dogmatist. There are also strictly international functional Communist undertakings, such as the WFTU, etc. Thus both international movements are composed of various political entities of asymmetrical strength, interacting and sometimes clashing within a common organizational-doctrinal framework.

<sup>7</sup> For instance, the French king and the French church always stressed the traditions of Gallicanism as a justified restraint on Papal power. See the lengthy treatment in L. Pastor, op. cit., esp. vol. 32, pp. 246-325.

<sup>8</sup> For different definitions of its special position of primacy see the November 1957 Twelve-Party Declaration and the December 1960 Eighty-One Party Declaration.

<sup>9</sup> A fuller classification of Communist states might have the following categories: stages of doctrine-fulfillment; stages of social-economic development; unified or truncated states; indigenous or imposed Communist regimes; stable popular regimes; stable, unpopular regimes; unstable, unpopular regimes. It would be interesting to see whether there is any relationship between the above and the doctrinal attitudes of the ruling elites. However, that is a subject matter for a separate study.

<sup>5</sup> For this reason, both organizations have established exclusive standards for membership. Cf. Lenin's "Twenty-one Conditions" and, for example, the difficulties faced by the Chaldean monks in the 17th century.

<sup>6</sup> Relatively, as compared to some others, less doctrinal, less disciplined, etc. Another way of looking at them would be to see them as international systems, but this tends to underestimate the internally binding factor of ideological commitment. See G. Modelski, The International Communist System, mimeo., Princeton, 1960, for a definition of "international system."

Perhaps it is not entirely accidental that these organizational-functional analogies are also matched by certain parallels in historical experience. By the late 16th and early 17th centuries the Church, and particularly the Papacy, was seeking new formulae for doctrinal and organizational unity. Badly shaken by the Reformation which had split Christian unity, the Church was exposed to various cross-currents of reform, some seeking salvation in new forms of organization and behavior, others turning to a fundamentalist, literalist reaffirmation of the doctrine. The emergence of absolutism, furthermore, meant that the Catholic world was increasingly becoming a composite of units each claiming domestic sovereignty. The universal Church in effect had become an international one, i.e., composed of national units. The direct physical scope of Papal power became much more limited, and the problem of defining its limits and of somehow translating it into authority was a source not only of concern but also of tension within the Catholic world.

Communism has faced similar problems in the course of the last decade. Communism in one country expanded to twelve countries, thus becoming international. But the split with Tito, then Stalin's death, the crisis of 1956 and the self-assertion of China have limited the direct scope of Soviet power,<sup>10</sup> despite nuclear weapons. The problem of defining the role of the CPSU within the changing bloc, and of coping with the revisionist and the dogmatist remedies for some of its ills, has been preoccupying Communist leaders over the last few years. In both cases, perhaps the two most important antecedent developments, which subsequently shaped the histories of the respective movements in the above periods were (1) the emergence of highly centralized power within each, and (2) the crisis of unity, prompted in part by the internal deformations generated by the arbitrary and increasingly corrupt practices employed in the exercise of that power.

Papal power, including its use of physical coercion, grew rapidly in the late Middle Ages. Many factors contributed to its growth. The doctrine itself generated pressures, with the Petrine Texts of the Gospel of St. Matthew, chapter 23, providing the authoritative source for Papal supremacy over the other bishops.<sup>11</sup>

<sup>10</sup> See Brzezinski, The Soviet Bloc, op. cit., and "The Challenge of Change in the Soviet Bloc." Foreign Affairs, April 1961.

<sup>11</sup> Opposition to the Papacy was based on the argument that the earlier organization of the

The Crusades, with their mobilization of doctrinal zeal, reinforced the special position of the Papacy, while the diplomatic initiatives of the Popes in gaining the support of European monarchs and in raising the necessary financial backing through indulgences and other means enhanced their special status. The appearance of military orders, independent of local parishes and dioceses, acknowledging only the sovereignty of the Pope, likewise contributed to Papal power. These were followed, on a larger and more enduring scale, by various mendicant orders, whose ordained members, circulating over Europe, gradually undermined the autonomy of the local bishops. Two great Catholic universities, Bologna and Paris, helped to develop the intellectual underpinnings of the Papal system.<sup>12</sup> Under Pope Gregory IX, the principles of Papal supremacy were fully developed while in the Roman Curia the nucleus of an efficient and centralized bureaucracy was established. More generally perhaps, these developments can be viewed as a centralizing drive inherent in any action-oriented organization committed to an absolutist value-system.

Doubtless, the Inquisition also contributed to the consolidation and expansion of Papal power. The use of physical violence, frequently wielded by members of one of the mendicant orders, delegated by Rome directly, was vigorously applied against those accused of doctrinal error, defined in practice as devia-

Church involved equality of all bishops: "Without prejudice to its agreement with the Church Universal in all essential points, every church manages its own affairs with perfect freedom and independence, and maintains its own traditional usages and discipline, all questions not concerning the whole Church, or of primary importance, being settled on the spot . . . Laws and Articles of faith, of universal obligation, are issued only by the full church, concentrated and represented at an Oecumenical Council." Janus, The Pope and the Council (London, 1869), pp. 85-86. (Janus, a 19th century writer, was bitterly opposed to the doctrine of Papal infallibility. A less one-sided source is the Cambridge Medieval History (Cambridge 1957), Vols. IV, V; see also P. Sigmund, Jr., Hierarchy and Consent: The Political Theory of Nicholas of Cusa, Harvard Ph.D. thesis, 1959. I am much indebted to Dr. Sigmund for his critical but constructive comments.

<sup>12</sup> Although both institutions also contributed to the development of the intellectual underpinnings of Averroism and Gallicanism, respectively. See Janus, op. cit., pp. 151-181; also Pastor and Sigmund, op. cit., for fuller and less hostile accounts.

tion from the principles of faith laid down by the center.<sup>13</sup> Much of the Inquisition was directed at the members of the movement itself. In spite of the opposition of some bishops, who warned that its practices would harm the Church,<sup>14</sup> in time the Inquisition, especially the Spanish, mounted in intensity, employing tortures, requiring confessions, rendering judgment by administrative trials without defense for the accused, and applying sanctions against families of the accused.

In the Communist case, too, an inherent tendency towards centralization was operating, given the doctrines and the early organizational inclinations of the ruling groups.<sup>15</sup> The launching of the internal revolution in 1928-1929, much like the Crusades, intensified internal zeal, while the gradual absorption of the Comintern, and the purges of foreign Communists made the universally oriented movement a Soviet-centralized one. In both cases, the centralization and the application of physical violence led to corruption and internal decay.

Indeed, there are striking parallels between the processes and the effects of the Inquisition and of the Soviet purges of the '30s. Some Communist leaders, like Kirov, warned against the use of physical violence within the movement, but were overruled. The purges which followed swept the Communist party, using techniques similar to those cited above.<sup>16</sup> And just as the Inquisitors made ample use of the charge of witchcraft to mobilize popular ignorance and suspicion, and particularly to take advantage of the susceptibility of the masses to prejudice, so too the Soviet secret police charged many purge victims with vredivelstvo or wrecking.<sup>17</sup> While it would be interesting to speculate at what stage a doctrinal movement undergoes such internal convulsions (might it be when exhausted patience and growing skepticism prompt in some members a renewed quest for utopian fulfillment?), the effect of the purges was a further concentration of power at the center. The fear of opposition intensified the violence, and the violence in turn intensified the fear.

In the case of the Church, the internal decay led to a challenge to centralized power and subsequently to the fracturing of the unity of the organization. In the case of Communism the two events were telescoped closer together, with the unity fractured while centralized power still existed, but with that centralized power challenged shortly after disunity appeared. The Council of Constance (1414-1418), already reflecting strong national differences, was a major effort to upset the power of the Curia, although its actual purpose was to elect one Pope in place of the three claimants. Its consequence was the doctrine of conciliar supremacy, which shortly afterwards was tested at the Council of Basle (1431). Although Papal power had been badly shaken, in that contest the Pope still prevailed. The split in Christian unity, effected a century later by the Reformation, thus came at a time when the movement was still basically centralized, although underneath the surface secular absolutism was setting the stage for the transformation of the Church from a single homogeneous unit into an international one. The Stalin-Tito break was in that sense remarkably similar, for it took place when Communism outwardly was united but in reality it, too, was becoming international, having absorbed a number of nation-states and having set up nationally-based Communist regimes in them.

Neither organization handled its first major crisis of unity well, but each was to derive valuable lessons from it. At first both apparently thought that past methods would suffice to repel the challenge posed respectively by Luther in 1518 and Tito in 1948. The Pope seems to have expected that branding Luther's views heretical and ordering him to appear in Rome (Papal citation of August 1518) would dispose of the German cleric; Stalin, with the purges presumably still fresh in his memory, Bolsheviks were derailing Soviet trains with the same seriousness with which their 13th and 14th century counterparts accepted the accounts of "nocturnal meetings, where the devil appeared in the form of a toad, a pale spectre, and a black tomcat, [with] wicked abominations . . . practiced." Janus, op. cit., pp. 252-253.

<sup>13</sup> For example, "Savonarola's crime was disobedience to the Pope—and that Pope was Alexander VI. He was not a rebel against the apostolic See; but he was torn between the claims of obedience to God and submission to the orders of an unworthy Pope." W. Nigg, Warriors of God (New York, 1959), p. 278.

<sup>14</sup> Bishop Wazo of Liege, Bishop Hildebert of Le Mans, Rupert of Deutz, and Saint Bernard (see Janus, op. cit., p. 238).

<sup>15</sup> Cf. L. Schapiro, The Origins of the Communist Autocracy (New York, 1956).

<sup>16</sup> Cf. Brzezinski, The Permanent Purge—Politics of Soviet Totalitarianism (Cambridge, Mass., 1956).

<sup>17</sup> Many credulous and semi-literate Soviet citizens, baffled by the dislocations caused by the first impact of the social revolution, probably swallowed the charge that some distinguished old assumed that a mere condemnation of Tito's regime would topple the recalcitrant Yugoslav revolutionary. It is particularly striking that in both cases, the prospective deviants did not wish to deviate, and at first went to considerable pains to reassure the center of their continued loyalty. However, the center's insistence on continuing the dialogue with the deviating member<sup>18</sup> resulted in the further crystallization of the deviant position as well as in increasing the personal stake of the would-be deviant in not becoming physically subject to the center's power.

The open defiance and the split came rather quickly in both cases. An attempted compromise, engineered by von Miltitz, the Papal nuncio, and based in part on Luther's promise to observe silence if his opponent did also, failed in late 1518 for the reasons outlined earlier in this essay. Luther continued his defiance and in June, 1520, a Bull of Condemnation was issued and it was followed six months later by personal excommunication. Allowing for problems of communication, the split was about as rapid as in the 1948 Stalin-Tito case.

Both Luther and Tito found haven for their doctrinal defiance in national power, and in both cases the center, not accurately interpreting the changes that had taken place in their respective international movements, had not foreseen this contingency. Instead of either arranging for a quiet liquidation, then followed by an open condemnation of the improper views, or merely ignoring the alleged deviant, the centers in both cases moved precipitously, personalized the conflicts, thereby making conciliation more difficult, and then found themselves unable to cope with the alerted and properly entrenched defiers. It is likely that greater patience on the part of the centers, and particularly a refusal to engage in open dialogue, might have been more productive, especially since both Luther and Tito viewed themselves as merely attempting to invigorate their respective movements, were in some ways doctrinally more orthodox and more radical than their centers, and would have been unlikely to effect a split on their own. With time, and particularly with their deaths, the centripetal pressures inherent in the combination of absolutist doctrine and action might have sealed whatever breaches Luther's or Tito's excessive zeal could have effected.

The splits, accompanied by the more profound transformation of the two organizations, resulted in a quest for a new balance of unity and diversity and for new bases of central power. With Stalin's death, Communism experienced also a crisis of leadership and it has since been seeking some enduring definition of the center's doctrinal authority. Like the Kremlin until 1956, the Papacy had not needed an explicit and formal affirmation of its infallibility as long as it was enjoying some temporal power. With the decline of its physical power, pressures developed from within the Church, particularly from some of the orders (e.g., the Jesuits), in favor of an explicit doctrinal assertion of Papal authority so as to protect the movement's organizational unity which further doctrinal divergences, like the one with Luther, could rupture. Furthermore, the tactical lessons of the Luther experience were not lost on the Church: in the handling of subsequent deviations it displayed far more sensitivity to the dangers inherent in doctrinal conflict and far greater skill in deviation control.

III

The Church's "deviation consciousness," acquired at the price of deviation transformed into open defiance, became apparent when Jansenism came to threaten Catholic unity and to defy the Pope's leadership throughout most of the 17th century.<sup>19</sup> Jansenism can be seen as a fundamentalist reaction both to the internal decay which had caused the doctrinal split (the Reformation) and to some of the reform movements within the organization, particularly the Jesuit movement, that became active after the split. Thus it bears strong resemblance to the dogmatists active in international Communism after the difficulties prompted by de-

<sup>18</sup> In the case of Luther, see the report of the official Roman Censor Librorum "In praesumptuosas M. Lutheri Conclusiones Dialogus," and Luther's "Responsio ad Silv. Prierietatis Dialogum," in which he, however, still accepted Papal authority; in Tito's case, see the Stalin-Tito correspondence, in Bass and Marbury, op. cit.

<sup>19</sup> My principal sources have been Pastor, op. cit., volumes 29-32; M. Tollemache, French Jansenists (London, 1893); N. Abercrombie, The Origins of Jansenism (Oxford, 1936). Specialists in Church history will perhaps forgive me for this very sketchy treatment. In my analysis I will not attempt a detailed historical summary nor deal with the theological content of Jansenism but only focus on those aspects which are relevant to the purposes of this study. Basically, the Jansenists, not unlike Calvinism, took a rather dim view of man's capacity to resist sin; they urged such intense and demanding standards before partaking of holy communion that many of them abstained from the sacrament for years at a time.

Stalinization, reacting furiously against the remedies suggested by the revisionists,<sup>20</sup> and using their attacks on the revisionists, as a form of criticism of the center.

When Jansenism first appeared in the Lowlands, with the posthumous publication in 1640 of Cornelis Jansen's (Jansenius) major opus "Augustinus, Seu Doctrina . . .,"<sup>21</sup> stirring a lively discussion in the circles associated with the University of Louvain (as well as a prompt Jesuit rejoinder), the official attitude of the center was to discourage any doctrinal debates on the complex subject of Grace and Communion.<sup>22</sup> Thus both the Jansenist publications and the Jesuit attacks on them were criticized by Papal decree without, however, an explicit condemnation or affirmation of either.<sup>23</sup> The center's position was clearly one of avoiding a new doctrinal debate. However, the Jansenists were quick to exploit this restraint—much as the revisionists and the dogmatists did prior to the unity conference of 1957—as proof of the orthodoxy of their position. Citing copiously from Saint Augustine, they argued that their views represented the true principles of Christianity, as contrasted with the alleged doctrinal elasticity of the Jesuits.

Although the Louvain debates were vexing to the Church, Jansenism became a serious problem only when its principles were shortly afterwards adopted by a gifted French theologian, Antoine Arnauld, and popularized by him within the French church and influential French court circles. Sympathetic members of the clergy, including several bishops and at least one convent, in turn found support in the government, always ready to protect the Gallican Church (with its French way to heaven) against the encroachments of the center.<sup>24</sup> Arnauld, in his voluminous writings (he was a brilliant pamphleteer), and his adherents avoided attacking Rome, but concentrated their ire especially on the Jesuits<sup>25</sup> who were said to be gradually undermining the true doctrinal foundations of the movement. Formally proclaiming their obedience to the Pope,<sup>26</sup> the Jansenists thus made use of what we might call the "indirect-dialogue technique" and "the enemy-by-analogy" device to challenge the doctrinal interpretations of the center—again much like some of the recent Chinese and Albanian polemics against Moscow by way of the Yugoslav revisionists. Similarly some of the French bishops, in the course of assuring Rome of their loyalty, and of Arnauld's, hinted that "certain persons" within the movement "instead of applying the true remedies to the decay of manners, had recourse to attenuations and palliations."<sup>27</sup>

As Jansenism spread in France, the doctrinal debate over Grace inevitably led to a challenge to the authority and doctrinal infallibility of the center. Both sides were still anxious to limit their rift. Thus anti-Jansenist critics avoided making explicit charges of heresy. Instead, they pointed to the operational harm of Jansenist views; for instance, Jansenist priests, because of their severity, were accused of having become divorced from the masses.<sup>28</sup> This charge is strikingly similar to that often made <sup>20</sup> It is interesting to note that much of the reform criticism came from the peripheries both in the case of Catholicism and Communism. Jansenism originated, as noted, in the Lowlands. Compare with the criticisms of Communism by the Yugoslav Djilas, or the Hungarian Nagy, etc.

<sup>21</sup> The full title was "Augustinus, seu doctrina Sancti Augustini de Humanae Naturae Sanitate, Aegritudine, Medicina, Adversus Pelagianos et Massilienses" (Louvain, 1640), 3 vols.

<sup>22</sup> Pastor, op. cit., vol. 29, p. 109. The Jansenist principles were: "(1) some of God's commandments are impossible to just men who wish and strive to keep them considering the powers they actually have; the grace by which these precepts may become possible is also wanting; (2) in the state of fallen nature no one ever resists interior grace; (3) to merit, or to demerit in the state of fallen nature we must be free from all external constraint, but not from interior necessity; (4) the Semipelagians admitted the necessity of interior preventing grace for all acts, even for the beginning of faith; but they fell into heresy in pretending this grace is such that man may either follow it or reject it; (5) to say that Christ died or shed his blood for all men is Semipelagianism." Catholic Encyclopedia, vol. 8 (New York, 1913), p. 288.

<sup>23</sup> Pastor, op. cit., vol. 29, p. 114 ff.

<sup>24</sup> After Arnauld published in 1643 his De La Frequent Communion, the French government was prepared to apply sanctions against him but he was protected by the leading Paris circles and by some of the French bishops. Gallicanism resembles domesticism more than national communism; for the distinction see Brzezinski, The Soviet Bloc, op. cit., pp. 52–53. See Pastor, op. cit., vol. 32, ch. iv.

<sup>25</sup> The Jesuits were among the most active proponents of frequent communion. See Pastor, op. cit., vol. 29, p. 136.

<sup>26</sup> Ibid. p. 150.

<sup>27</sup> Ibid., p. 145.

<sup>28</sup> Ibid., p. 155.

against the contemporary dogmatists.<sup>29</sup> Beyond that point, the center was loathe to go. Thus, when in 1654 Pope Alexander VII was urged by some of his advisors to publish a new Bull against Jansenism, he delayed, explaining that as long as the Jansenists did not explicitly defend the errors of Jansenius he "was unwilling . . . to drive them to fresh subterfuges and to a denial of Papal infallibility."<sup>30</sup> The center was not anxious to create a new heresy, which could conceivably prompt rash reactions from the most influential Catholic monarchy in Europe.

Papal restraint gave the Jansenists some margin for maneuver. Enjoying at least the passive support of the French government, which viewed favorably those developments that might limit the Papacy's influence over French life, the Jansenists had no intention of detaching themselves from the Church.<sup>31</sup> A defection on their own initiative would have posed a difficult dilemma for many French Catholics otherwise favorably inclined to them. Jansenism was thus more influential when still part of the organized movement. Its fundamentalist attitude had won over numerous sympathizers who pleaded their cause with the center. Many concerned believers viewed them as dedicated reformers, anxious to restore a zealous church.<sup>32</sup> (Doubtless, the same arguments among others have operated recently in criticizing precipitous Soviet action against their Albanian or Chinese critics). The Jansenists, furthermore, in spite of their doctrinal zeal, did not hesitate to point to the spectre of the Inquisition whenever Papal sanctions threatened, just as the contemporary dogmatists, whenever pressed, are quick to insist that true internationalism must prevail in the internal affairs of the Communist bloc. But above all, their major stress was on denying any novelty to their views; indeed, they frequently used the Dominican Order to prove the orthodoxy of their interpretations,<sup>33</sup> and Arnauld kept reiterating that he was merely expounding the views of Saint Augustine, not of Jansenius.

<sup>29</sup> "Dogmatism and sectarianism . . . lead to the isolation of Communists from the masses. . . ." N. Khrushchev, speech of January 6, 1961.

<sup>30</sup> Pastor, op. cit., vol. 31, p. 198.

<sup>31</sup> Ibid., vol. 29, p. 146.

<sup>32</sup> ". . . the severity of the Jansenist principles, excessive though it was, operated in favor of the party." Ibid. vol. 31, p. 261.

<sup>33</sup> Ibid., pp. 225-227. In this, too, there are contemporary parallels. For instance, the Albanians like to cite the Chinese on the subject of revisionism.

(The dogmatists rarely cite Stalin; they rely primarily on Lenin.) Even when Arnauld took the imprudent step of openly questioning Papal infallibility,<sup>34</sup> and the center's sense of concern for organizational unity led the Pope (in August 1656) to condemn explicitly Arnauld's writings, an outright rupture did not occur. A new spokesman for the Jansenists, Blaise Pascal, eloquently pleaded that there was no real disagreement with the center because the allegedly heretical principles were in fact never uttered by either Jansenius or Arnauld, and that the whole affair was a Jesuit plot. The Jansenists thus simply refused either to submit or to leave the organization.

At this point, the issue, already grown from the purely doctrinal realm to that of discipline, became complicated with the intrusion of the factor of national sensitivity. "Gallicanism became Jansenism's strongest ally,"<sup>35</sup> just as Chinese or Albanian nationalism doubtless buttresses the dogmatists' stand against Moscow. Thus "the Papal decisions were received with docility insofar as they concerned the sphere of faith, but as soon as the Pope attempted to intervene in any other way, Gallican susceptibilities were at once aroused in most alarming fashion."<sup>36</sup> The center's efforts to place before its tribunal four French bishops who had espoused Jansenism were effectively sidetracked by the French insistence that instead they be tried by 12 French bishops, who could be expected to reflect a polycentric organizational orientation.<sup>37</sup> The matter thus dragged for years, until the death of Alexander VII. Bitterness built up on both sides and each hinted that the other had in effect betrayed the true faith.

The change in central leadership (which in Catholicism usually is handled more efficiently than in Communism) created a new situation. The successor, Clement IX, elevated in 1667 with French support, was quickly approached by the deviant churchmen who, while formally apologizing, promptly blamed the rift on the Pope's predecessor. In effect, they seized the opportunity to try to reduce the quarrel to a

<sup>34</sup> But even here he equivocated somewhat. He thus made a distinction between infallibility of dogma and fact. Ibid., vol. 31, pp. 174-175.

<sup>35</sup> Ibid., p. 216.

<sup>36</sup> Ibid., pp. 199-200.

<sup>37</sup> Compare to the Soviet effort to restrict the discussion of Chinese dogmatism only to the bloc, and the Chinese insistence on the participation of 81 parties. See my The Soviet Bloc, the Epilogue, op. cit.

merely posthumous personal issue.<sup>38</sup> Since both Rome and Paris were predisposed to compromise (and the Jansenists, as deviants, could only welcome it since it would keep them within the organization), an arrangement, involving the pro forma submission of the recalcitrant bishops to Rome was hammered out in 1668–1669. However, Rome was advised by its delegate not to publish anything which would make it appear as a total capitulation and to ignore evidence which suggested that the bishops' submission was insincere and very limited.<sup>39</sup> "In the end, Rome had to be content with the subscription of the four and to take its sincerity for granted. 'The Pope only judges of external actions,' Cardinal Rospigliosi observed . . ."<sup>40</sup> Khrushchev might have said the same after obtaining Liu Shao-chi's signature to the December 1960 declaration. The strategy of conciliation thus involved a deliberately staged reciprocal ritual.<sup>41</sup>

<sup>38</sup> This is what Khrushchev did in 1955–56 when he blamed Stalin for the quarrel with Tito; and this the Chinese might do after Khrushchev's death, or the Soviets after Mao's.

<sup>39</sup> Pastor, op. cit., vol. 31, pp. 385–392. This arrangement bears great resemblance to the Tito-Khrushchev compromise whereby the Yugoslavs acted as if the Soviets had repudiated all the Cominform declarations, while the Soviets knew that this was not the case but remained silent. Similarly, when Rome placed on the Index a prayer book written by one of the pro-Jansenist French bishops, the Papal nuncio did not publish the decree in France. Ibid., vol. 31, p. 359.

<sup>40</sup> Ibid., p. 385.

<sup>41</sup> The above decision did not come easily. A vigorous debate took place within the top councils of the organization's center, and sharply conflicting points of view were presented. Some cardinals advised acceptance of the compromise since "the sincerity of the subscription was vouched for by a public document, whereas the opposite rested solely on rumors and unreliable writings", Ibid., vol. 31, p. 395. The opposite point of view warned against accepting the alleged submission when it was well known that it was not genuine. Cardinal Albizzi who handled much of this matter pleaded: "I cannot suffer that an attempt should be made to persuade the world that this heresy had been destroyed, seeing that in spite of its seeming destruction it appears more vigorous than ever" (ibid., p. 396). It may be assumed that Moscow has also faced similar dilemmas. There is evidence that on the Yugoslav issue Molotov pleaded with Khrushchev not to create the impression that Yugoslavia is again

The short-range effect of the "Clementine peace" was to legitimize continued Jansenist activity in France and even to facilitate its growth.<sup>42</sup> The center, however, persevered in its policy of moderation,<sup>43</sup> maintaining silence while still fully encouraging various other units of the organization (in this case, the Spanish and Hungarian clergy) to condemn the French deviation.<sup>44</sup> Skirmishes and occasionally bitter clashes continued, but the Jansenists were fighting a losing battle. With Arnauld's death in 1694 the doctrinal mantle passed to Pasquier Quesnel but even pro-Jansenist writers concede that Jansenism was in its decline.<sup>45</sup> With the doctrinal vigor of the deviation weakened by the death of its most vigorous spokesman and with its influence on the French monarchy waning, more energetic measures of suppression could be applied. Early in the 18th century two Papal bulls condemned Jansenism and the French royal authorities no longer opposed their enforcement. The issue was simply no longer a crucial one and the fundamentalist zeal had expended itself. Isolated pockets of Jansenism persisted but on a socially insignificant scale.

It could be argued perhaps that the center's policy of restraint and covert manipulation had weakened the doctrinal cohesion of the movement's organization, but the alternative which had been avoided was that of a split. It had been skirted because the highly doctrinaire deviant had an inherent inclination not to cast himself out of the common fold, while the center, aware that France might be lost if the deviation became defiance, played the game in such a manner as not to destroy all the binding elements. This meant, of course, that the deviant enjoyed a measure of impunity but at the same time his oft-proclaimed loyalty to the center was bound to become politically operative when the divisive issues ultimately lost their conflict-fed sense of urgency.

Before turning to the general implications of the foregoing, a briefer survey of another aspect of the Church's history in that period is revealing. Catholicism in the 16th–17th centuries, much as Communism today, seemed to have reached its zenith in Europe, and increasingly it saw its fulfillment in what today would be called the underdeveloped lands. Missionary orthodox since it would undermine international Communism. (The Soviet Bloc, pp. 175–177.)

<sup>42</sup> Pastor, op. cit., vol. 31, p. 485 for data.

<sup>43</sup> Ibid., vol. 32, pp. 424, 656 ff. for efforts to kill with kindness.

<sup>44</sup> Ibid., pp. 310–312.

<sup>45</sup> Tollemache, op. cit., p. 250.

work, particularly in the Orient, seemed full of promise. The Chinese Empire offered a particularly appealing target and late in the 16th century the first Jesuit missionaries succeeded in penetrating its hitherto sealed frontiers.<sup>46</sup>

Conscious of the intense Chinese self-esteem and xenophobia, the Jesuits proceeded with utmost caution and discretion. Since foreigners were generally not allowed to settle within the Empire, and since foreign proselytizers were certain to be kept out, the Jesuit fathers carefully avoided any specific identification with Christianity and in their petition to the Chinese authorities, seeking the right to settle in China, they (in the words of Father Ricci) "explained that they were members of a religious order, who had left their native land over distant seas, attracted by the fame of the Chinese Empire . . . that they intended to remain here for the rest of their lives, and that all they wanted was a small plot of ground to build a house, and also a church in honor of the King of Heaven. . . . Neither in this request nor in any other way was any mention made of Christianity. . . ."<sup>47</sup>

The Jesuits were quick to adapt themselves to Chinese customs, applying their founder's injunction that "we may ad bonum approve or agree with someone in regard to some one thing that is good, passing over other bad points, and thus by winning his confidence we further our good object; by going in with him we come out with ourselves."<sup>48</sup> They tolerated Chinese ancestor-worship on the grounds that it merely involved filial veneration, and they praised Confucius as a wise philosopher.<sup>49</sup> After a quick appraisal of the Chinese social-political structure, the Jesuits adopted the dress, the customs and the status of the literati and cultivated the upper classes. In their appeal to them, the Jesuits at first avoided outright proselytization, but instead attempted to impress the Chinese with European science and gadgets. For example, they gained the right to establish residence in the province of Canton by presenting a mechanical clock (a device unknown in China) to the governor.<sup>50</sup> Later, having gained entry into Peking through the presentation of similar gifts to the king, "the esteem which the Jesuits enjoyed at the Imperial Court grew still further when, in 1610, they foretold the date of an eclipse of the moon with greater accuracy than the native astronomers." Father Ricci himself at various stages of his remarkable mission overcame Chinese suspicions by making for them detailed maps and globes of the world (and carefully putting China in the middle so as not to hurt Chinese self-esteem); by presenting their dignitaries with clocks and watches; by installing a large clock on the outside of his mission so that the people could admire it; by teaching advanced astrology and mathematics to the Chinese scholars. In his memoirs, in a chapter entitled "Mathematics and Converts," he states that "whoever may think that ethics, physics and mathematics are not important in the work of the Church, is unacquainted with the tastes of the Chinese, who are slow to take a salutary spiritual potion, unless it be seasoned with intellectual flavoring."<sup>52</sup>

It is evident from the foregoing that the "soft sell" technique of the Soviet technical missions is neither original nor novel. Contemporary Soviet policy towards the underdeveloped lands is clearly premised on a similar sophisticated appreciation of the depth of national sensitivities. The Soviets, by and large have toned down direct ideological propaganda, and they calculate that Communist doctrinal advances will be a function of demonstrated Soviet technical skill. They have been de-emphasizing the revolutionary ethic, and have been concentrating on winning over the "national bourgeoisie," i.e., the intellectual political elite. Not revolutionary peasant armies but rather Soviet-trained intellectuals mesmerized by Soviet technical achievements will lead these nations into socialism. The similarity in the relationship of Father Ricci's clocks and astrology to Catholicism and of the sputniks and cosmonauts to Communism is striking.

<sup>46</sup> For a fascinating account of Jesuit efforts in China, see China in the Sixteenth Century: the Journals of Matthew Ricci, 1583-1610 (New York, 1953). An interesting statement of the tactical problems faced by the Jesuits is in P. Duignan, "Early Jesuit Missionaries: A Suggestion for Further Study," The American Anthropologist, August 1958. This account was prompted by Mr. Duignan's analysis.

<sup>47</sup> Ricci, op. cit., pp. 142, 147.

<sup>48</sup> Quoted by Nigg, op. cit., p. 335.

<sup>49</sup> Ricci, op. cit., pp. 93, 96. See also Duignan, op. cit.

<sup>50</sup> Ricci, op. cit., pp. 137-139.

<sup>51</sup> Pastor, op. cit., vol. 25, p. 355.

<sup>52</sup> Ricci, op. cit., p. 325. Elsewhere he says "The Fathers have made an effort to merit a reputation for learning, not as a matter of vain glory but with a view to the end for which they came here, namely to further the cause of Christianity, which on all occasions they purposely weave into the conversations," p. 201. Similar techniques were employed by the Jesuits, under Roberto de Nobili, in their approach to Indian Brahmins, Pastor, op. cit., vol. 25, pp. 359-361.

The parallel goes further, since these moves provoked severe charges of doctrinal laxity within both international movements. Just as the Chinese Communists have given evidence of their displeasure with the Soviet approach towards the neutralist and underdeveloped lands,<sup>53</sup> so the Franciscan and Dominican missionary orders looked askance at the Jesuit methods in China and India, and, traditionally emphasizing other aspects of the common doctrine, they saw in these methods dangerous signals of heresy. Their suspicions were especially easily aroused since the orders had earlier differed (as the Soviets and Chinese recently have) on matters pertaining to internal reforms within the movement's organization. Thus, for example, the Dominican Alfonso de Avendano had spent 17 years (1577-1594) preaching that the Jesuits were "secret heretics, hypocrites, and pharisees."<sup>54</sup> Some Dominicans, furthermore, had been sympathetic to the Jansenists. The feeling was widespread among many Catholics that the Jesuits "adapted their teachings too freely to the spirit of the world. . . ."<sup>55</sup> Moving into the Orient, the Franciscans, therefore, proceeded to apply their own more direct strategy: "Crucifix in hand they preached in the open streets and public places, condemned to the deepest hell Confucius . . . and proclaimed that every kind of veneration of ancestors was unlawful; the Jesuits' caution with regard to Confucius and the veneration of ancestors they condemned as connivance at idolatry."<sup>56</sup> It may be assumed that the predominance of the Spanish Conquistador tradition among the Franciscans and Dominicans had something to do with their attacks on the predominantly Portuguese and Italian Jesuit missionaries. National differences thus probably intensified the tension.

Although the Franciscan methods quickly backfired by provoking Chinese violence (one is tempted to think of possibly varying Soviet and Chinese communist guidelines to the Iraqi Communists and of the ill-fated Kirkuk uprising)<sup>57</sup> the debate persisted. In effect, the center was faced with the now familiar question of determining the proper balance between the universal and the particular. Wisely, however, no quick decisions were reached. The matter was deliberated; missions travelled to and fro the Orient (consuming years in the process); commissions were appointed. The formal solutions finally adopted by Rome tended towards compromise: in 1645 the Jesuits suffered a setback; in 1651 they recouped some of their losses.<sup>58</sup> However, just as the Jesuits effectively argued after 1645 that the center had not been appraised of all the relevant facts, so after 1651 the other orders similarly felt that the concessions now granted to the Jesuits were based on improper information, and they simply would not take advantage of such doctrinal shortcuts. But with time, they gradually relented as practice showed the advantages of Jesuit efforts.

Several factors helped to contain the dispute, even though some outraged spokesmen at times had already charged heresy. (It is to be remembered that the issues involved were of very great doctrinal import even though superficially they may have seemed only matters of tactics.) The acceptance by the parties involved of the center's judgment as doctrinally authoritative established a certain common frame of reference even if the respective parties tried subsequently to evade surreptitiously the center's decisions. Recognition of Papal authority automatically meant the acceptance of arbitration as the method for resolving doctrinal issues. Secondly, the esprit de corps of the organization and the dedication of its member units to a common value system in which the specific success of one unit reflected glory on the movement as a whole meant that doctrinal <sup>53</sup> Compare "Present-day leftism in the Communist movement is also manifested in both concealed and overt resistance to the Communist parties' policy of establishing collaboration with working people in the ranks of the social-democratic, Catholic and various other bourgeois-radical parties and organizations." (Sovietskaya Rossiya, June, 10 1960); and the warning contained in Kommunist, No. 13, 1960, against those who exaggerate revolutionary feelings and "call for direct revolutionary overthrow," with the following Chinese statements: "History teaches us that people's revolutions in all countries stem from the needs of the people and are the result of the development of class struggle" (Red Flag, No. 20-21, 1960), and "The modern revisionists and certain representatives of the bourgeoisie try to make the people believe that it is possible to achieve socialism without a revolutionary party. . . . This is sheer nonsense and deception" (Red Flag, No. 8, 1960). See Hudson et al, op. cit., for detailed treatment.

<sup>54</sup> Pastor, op. cit., vol. 25, p. 150.

<sup>55</sup> Nigg, op. cit., p. 351.

<sup>56</sup> Pastor, op. cit., vol. 29, p. 250.

<sup>57</sup> The Communist Kirkuk rising took place in July 1959. The World Marxist Review, April 1960, contains a self-criticism by the Iraqi C. P. which reveals that an allegedly dissident group of Communists was responsible for this highly premature action.

<sup>58</sup> See Pastor, op. cit., vol. 31, pp. 165-169 concerning the disputed practices.

issues which could be tested in action (as contrasted to purely abstract ones) were not easily translatable into overt doctrinal ruptures. Thirdly, the center's handling of the problem (in part due to the slowness of communications and bureaucratization) was deliberate, which created a safety-valve and made compromises possible. Lastly, the passage of time demonstrated quietly the superiority of one method over another, thereby also helping to control potential deviationism.

A 17th century outside observer might have expected a different outcome. An imaginary analyst, employed either by an interested non-Catholic power in, for instance, A-CIA (The Anti-Catholic Information Association) or, let us say, by the Constantinople CAND (Catholic Analysis and Development Center) might have quickly dismissed the common doctrine as an irrelevant factor to his analysis, especially since, being external to it, he would find it difficult to grasp the doctrine's special universalizing function of self-identification. The analyst, furthermore, would have been very conscious of the relatively recent split in Catholicism, and might hence have tended to interpret every limited scrap of evidence, culled from Jansenist pamphlets or from discreet Jesuit or Franciscan "leaks," as signalling the likelihood of a new rupture. Internal doctrinal deviation coupled with evidences of internal strategic differences, based in part on nationalism, would have seemed to augur a dark future for the international movement's organizational unity.

IV

Perhaps certain lessons relevant to analysis of developments within contemporary Communism are to be learned from this very brief survey, and they may even serve as a modest point of departure towards a "doctrinal conflict and deviation-control manual." International Communism, a doctrinally oriented movement of various nationally based Communist parties, is inevitably involved in perpetual internal bargaining designed to establish common doctrines, common strategies, and to resolve conflicting interests or views. Since the CPSU is still by far the most powerful and authoritative party,<sup>59</sup> it follows that its basic preoccupation is with minimizing doctrinal divisions and with preventing any one unit from assuming the stance of outraged doctrinal self-righteousness. Harmonious unity avoids situations which could lead to a challenge to that primacy. On the other hand, the various other units, and particularly those which have some claim to speak authoritatively, especially the CCP, by adopting doctrinally deviant positions and arguing about them with the center, indicate clearly that their purpose is to persuade the center to change its position even while preserving internal organizational unity. The very fact of argument indicates absence of a desire to defect but also signals the possibility of a challenge to unity. However, the dynamic of argument can subsequently generate sufficient heat to cause defiance, or defection or condemnation, i.e. the process of escalation.

The weaker but skillful deviant, therefore, especially in the beginning, acts as if there were no distinction between his and the center's doctrinal position, even if he should suspect that the center has strayed from the "truth." On the contrary, he studiously and monotonously reiterates his allegiance to the movement, while appealing to some earlier and mutually respected source of its doctrine. This forces the center either to tolerate the deviation, allowing it perhaps to spread, or to take the first step in joining the issue, in effect launching a process of argument which it naturally would prefer to avoid. The skillful deviant makes the choice difficult by his strategy of ambiguity—always implying the possibility of his returning to the position of doctrinal subordination while gradually consolidating his position and probing the international movement for other sources of support. This prevents the center from issuing public threats since the issuance in itself implies conflict and, with the center presumably wishing not to precipitate conflict, forces the center into silence. Informal threats, on the other hand, can be deflected by the deviant through equivocation, requests for further explanation, etc.

The deviant, furthermore, may protect himself against the center by using his assets of weakness or of fanaticism or both. "The asset of weakness" involves pleading sympathy with the center's doctrinal position but inability to enforce it. Thus the center is faced with a situation in which the alleged deviant pleads doctrinal orthodoxy in principle but deviates doctrinally in practice. The choice then is

<sup>59</sup> There is an inclination in some quarters to exaggerate the present power of the CCP. It is to be remembered that China's general backwardness, overpopulation, economic difficulties, etc. all place it in a position vis-a-vis the USSR analogous in many respects to that of India vis-a-vis the United States in the non-Communist world. It is curious that when India is discussed its overpopulation is normally mentioned as a factor of weakness. When talk shifts to China, then the same factor is normally mentioned as proof of China's power.

whether to punish the deviant for a situation which he, indeed, perhaps truly may not be able to control. For instance, the University of Louvain pleaded lack of competence to enforce a Papal Bull against the Jansenists while not questioning the validity of the Bull.<sup>60</sup> Similarly, Gomulka accepted in principle socialism in agriculture but pleaded that he could not enforce collectivization.<sup>61</sup>

"The asset of fanaticism," i.e., being more doctrinally extreme than the center, restrains the center by implying to it that the deviant "has his heart in the right place but is a little extreme." The effect is similar to that achieved by the advantage of ignorance in a mixed-motive game "if it is recognized and taken into account by an opponent."<sup>62</sup> Furthermore, within a doctrinally oriented movement the fanatic usually can protect himself by "literalism," i.e., by citing texts, thereby forcing the center into the more difficult position of having to prove that its own novel interpretations, often necessitated by changing social conditions, are still in "the proper spirit" of the doctrine.<sup>63</sup> The fanaticism, furthermore, carries with it a degree of commitment which may inhibit the center's reaction out of fear of prompting an irrational defiance by the deviant.<sup>64</sup> Indeed, under certain circumstances, it may even be advantageous for one of the protagonists, usually the weaker, to acquire some uncertainty about himself in order to minimize predictability: e.g., the alleged Jesuit reputation for "duplicity" or the inscrutability and vagueness of the Chinese Communists. (Apparently the Soviets have complained that the Chinese use of aphorisms is complicating "comradely" discussions.)

Lastly, the deviant in order to support his position can mobilize non-doctrinal commitments which then are cloaked in the doctrinal mantle. It is noteworthy that Luther, Arnauld, Tito, Mao and Hoxha, all of whom would consider themselves as strict exponents of the doctrine, used nationalism as a source of power to buttress their doctrinally deviant positions.

In responding skillfully, the center must be careful to take advantage of those factors in the posture of the deviant which inhibit the potentially dynamic escalation of deviation into defiance or defection.<sup>65</sup> As long as the deviant

<sup>60</sup> This tactic was used by the University of Louvain when confronted by instructions from Rome. See Pastor, op. cit., vol. 31, p. 263.

<sup>61</sup> The center can also use this dodge to protect itself against claims. For instance, the public Soviet emphasis on achieving a higher standard of living can be seen as a form of commitment to a third party (i.e., its own people) which makes it difficult for the Soviet Union to respond fully to the demands of its allies for economic aid. E.g., when China demands greater aid, the Soviet leadership can point to its public commitment as an excuse for not giving it.

<sup>62</sup> T. Schelling, The Strategy of Conflict (Cambridge, Mass., 1960), p. 161.

<sup>63</sup> Khrushchev had to face this difficulty in 1960 when criticized by the Chinese. He responded that "If we act like children who, studying the alphabet, compile words from letters, we shall not go very far. Marx, Engels and Lenin created their immortal works which will not fade away in centuries. . . . On the basis of the teaching of Marxism-Leninism we must think ourselves, profoundly study life, analyze the present situation and draw the conclusions which benefit the common cause of communism." (Speech of June 21, 1960). The more "revisionist" the position, the more difficult it is to resist "literalist" criticisms. The Chinese warned that "as pupils of Lenin and as Leninists, we must utterly smash all attempts of the modern revisionists to distort and carve up the teachings of Lenin." (Red Flag, No. 8, 1960.)

<sup>64</sup> This gives the physically weaker but more extreme deviant a bargaining advantage. If, for instance, in the Sino-Soviet dispute the Soviet and Chinese preferences were as follows:

Soviet

- (1) Only Moscow speaks for the movement on doctrinal issues.
- (2) Neither speaks; i.e., agreement to silence.
- (3) Both speak, i.e., open dispute.
- (4) Only Peking speaks, i.e., capitulation.

Chinese

- (1) Only Peking speaks. . . .
- (2) Both speak, i.e., open dispute.
- (3) Neither speaks.
- (4) Only Moscow speaks, i.e., capitulation.

then, using game theory, the advantage would rest with the Chinese. See R. D. Luce and H. Raiffa, Games and Decisions (New York, 1958), pp. 146-149 for alternative mathematical calculations, on the basis of a payoff matrix, of relative scales of advantage. (The above example is adapted from their use of two individuals resolving a problem of conflicting choices.)

<sup>65</sup> The center must watch out against the danger that a precipitous condemnation of the deviant can actually force distantly potential deviants into deviation. For instance, the Dominicans feared that condemnation of Jansenism would reflect on them (Pastor, op. cit., vol. 29, p. 118). Might not some Communist parties object to an explicit condemnation of the dogmatists for fear that this would reflect on them as well?

acknowledges the principle of organizational unity, the organization enjoys a long-range advantage. Deviants die, the organizations go on.<sup>66</sup> But if the center abandons self-restraint, and cuts off the heretical limb before waiting for it to wither, the limb may sprout its own roots and grow into a tree. That was Stalin's mistake with Tito which Khrushchev has so far avoided with Mao. An open condemnation, furthermore, involves an irrevocable doctrinal commitment, creating a gulf which subsequently may be very difficult to bridge without the outright capitulation of one of the parties. Khrushchev discovered this when seeking a reconciliation with Tito.

Restraint, furthermore, is more advisable in the case of fanatical, fundamentalist deviants than in the case of those who wish to moderate and dilute the doctrine. The former, in the final analysis, can still be counted as adherents to the common doctrine in terms of still being against (and even more so) the common enemy. In the latter case, the shift is toward the camp of the enemy. But even in the latter case, the deviant is normally very careful to avoid any identification with the enemy and, as long as this is the case, the internally unifying doctrinal self-identification still exercises pressures for unity.<sup>67</sup>

An open condemnation of doctrinal heresy should either accompany or follow the physical liquidation of the deviant. Issuing it in the expectation that it will cause his liquidation or submission is not likely to be effective if the deviant enjoys local, nationally based organizational backing and is given no choice but to mobilize it for the defense of his position and life.<sup>67a</sup> Rather, since early in the game the deviant normally wishes to avoid a schism<sup>68</sup> but is also concerned with proving to his own local organization that it must swim or sink with him, and since furthermore there are normally groups within his organization which would like to displace him and can take advantage of the friction with the center to attempt to do so, it is to the center's advantage to pose as the moderate party seeking reconciliation. Doctrinal arguments, even if covert, lead to the doctrinal crystallization of the deviant's position, which tends to be quite rigid once it has taken shape. Restraint gives opposition elements within the deviating local unit an opportunity to argue that their deviant leadership is recklessly and unnecessarily rupturing the international organization's unity. A useful device here might be to invite the deviating leader for conversations with the center: this puts the option up to him—to refuse to go is to take the initiative in splitting; to go is to take a certain personal risk.<sup>69</sup> The desirable quality of ambivalence in this invitation would be increased if the past record could not provide the deviant with much certainty of either a safe return home or an untimely demise.<sup>70</sup>

As long as the deviant still sees himself as part of a doctrinally bound family, fear of isolation is a powerful restraining factor available to the center. Just as Rome took advantage of the loyalty of the peripheries to subtly restrain the French, so Moscow in 1960 attempted to isolate the Chinese and the Albanians. Here the fanatics are more vulnerable than the moderates since they have nowhere else to go. For this reason an outright condemnation should be delayed, while the fear of it, to which even a deviant is susceptible since he still sees himself as sharing in the common undertaking, should not be diluted by threats. Besides, partial direct reactions (e.g., <sup>66</sup> For this reason, posthumous personalization of deviation has some merit since it allows room for hope that unity ultimately will be restored. However, premature personalization runs the risk that emotion may obscure reason. We might thus distinguish between spontaneous, personal conflict—one involving the role of personal antipathy or of personality which tends to become emotional, direct, and all-out; and protracted, institutional conflict, which leaves greater room for skilled management and more tacit bargaining (cf. Schelling, op. cit., p. 21).

<sup>67</sup> See Modelski, op. cit., p. 67, for in-system conflict resolution. It is revealing to observe that after the Suez crisis, the British Conservative and Labour Parties were also much more lenient with their respective "fundamentalist" deviants than with their "moderates." See L. D. Epstein, "British M.P.s and their Local Parties: the Suez Cases," this REVIEW, June, 1960, esp. pp. 381-385.

<sup>67a</sup> Alternatively, it might be issued when the opponent is already in the process of being defeated. Presumably this was why Abraham Lincoln, who had insisted earlier that preservation of the Union, not slavery, was the issue in the Civil War, delayed the Emancipation Proclamation until after he had significant victory on the battle field to give it weight. (I am indebted to Professor Mansfield for this observation.)

<sup>68</sup> Luther, Arnault, Tito, Hoxha, all apparently started off with no desire to split.

<sup>69</sup> Arnault, Luther, Tito refused; Gomulka went in 1956; Hoxha apparently hesitated. Many of Gomulka's friends urged him not to go.

<sup>70</sup> This might be called the center's asset of inconsistently uncivilized behavior.

counter-arguments) on the center's part have the double disadvantage of suggesting weakness and of stimulating further disagreement; thus, the suspended and undiluted fear of condemnation is a better deterrent in a situation which has no easy way out. This may be true even if the deviant, aware of his importance (e.g., China), doubts that the center would take such an extreme step: he may doubt it but he cannot be certain.<sup>71</sup> Dilution increases his security and hence impunity.

Indirect and ostensibly irrelevant reactions are another weapon of doctrinal conflict, in addition to the techniques of "indirect-type dialogue" and "enemy-by-analogy" already mentioned. Avoiding any direct relevance to the issues at stake and formally maintaining the position that no disagreement is involved, such reactions can convey the center's displeasure without permitting the deviant to assume the pose of the aggrieved party and to mobilize local support which becomes convinced that it has no choice but to resist the center. Slowing down economic aid, granting fewer honors (but still granting some), addressing anniversary greetings to the unit but failing to mention its leaders, downgrading the deviant's doctrinal standing—these are insufficient to provoke a rupture but can weaken the internal position of the deviant and provoke factional struggle within his realm.<sup>72</sup> Furthermore, if the issue is sufficiently acute, it may be advisable to select some insignificant section of the international movement for forceful condemnation and destruction as a lesson to others. Failure to liquidate rapidly and physically the moderate Gomulka in 1956 (which presumably could have been done, although at unpredictable risks) gave the fanatical Hoxha a certain amount of security in 1961.<sup>73</sup> And Hoxha's condemnation in 1961 or 1962, while creating a new split, would at least have the effect of increasing credibility for Soviet seriousness while putting before the Chinese the difficult option of responding, or not, to an accomplished fact which ostensibly does not concern them.<sup>73a</sup>

But even if the center decides to take such an indirect, but extreme, step as condemning Hoxha to influence the behaviour of the more important Mao, it is still desirable to find means of giving Mao some advance warning, sufficiently ambiguous to prevent a counter-warning but clear enough so that the step itself cannot be subsequently interpreted as an effort to take Mao by surprise. Irrevocable, surprise moves, such as a sudden condemnation, intensify the conflict by eliminating the stabilizing factor of mutual anticipation. They are only desirable in a post-defiance or defection situation, i.e., in a case of outright conflict.<sup>74</sup>

The foregoing "praxeology"<sup>75</sup> of deviation control is derived from the mixed-motives character of doctrinal conflict. Significantly, in such conflict the opponents have generally tried to keep their disagreements confidential; and sometimes even after a doctrinal rupture they have cooperated in protecting the internal secrets of the movement from "outsiders."<sup>76</sup> Secrecy not only gives them a certain flexibility and allows them room for maneuver; its cause is more deep seated than that. It is rooted in their mutually shared sense of distinctiveness as compared to the rest of the world and in the self-restraint imposed on them also by the very existence of that world. Both China and the USSR think of the United States every time they exchange mutual accusations, and the United States cannot help but restrain deviationist tendencies within Communism. Furthermore, if the movement as a whole is experiencing the self-invigorating sense of fulfillment in its mission of world expansion,<sup>77</sup> the divisive

<sup>71</sup> See Schelling, op. cit., p. 115, for a discussion of the role of "inherently unknowable factors."

<sup>72</sup> Thus, for example, the general theme that no country can build socialism alone (with its implied threat of isolation of China) was certainly more credible when quietly accompanied by illustrative steps—gradual shutting off of her supplies, etc.

<sup>73</sup> This has resulted in a paradoxical situation whereby Tito, who is outside the Communist orbit, is closer to Khrushchev than Hoxha, who is within it. See the excellent discussion in W. E. Griffith, "Peiping, Tirana and Moscow," East Europe, July 1961.

<sup>73a</sup> This paper was submitted for publication prior to the open Soviet attack on Albania in October 1961, and not revised in the light of subsequent events.

<sup>74</sup> The sudden Soviet move against the Chinese in Bucharest in the summer of 1960 did much to intensify the bitterness.

<sup>75</sup> The fullest and most systematic treatment of the nature of praxeology (principles of correct, rational decisions) is in T. Kotarbinski, Traktat o dobrej robocie (Warsaw, 1955).

<sup>76</sup> The Yugoslavs are a good example.

<sup>77</sup> See Modelski, op. cit., p. 23 for a discussion of system-orientation towards expansion. The analogy here is between the attitude of a given Communist state, even a deviant one, toward a general Communist expansion, and the attitude of a Christian state toward the crusades.

tendencies within tend to be submerged by the political momentum of its forward thrust and by the emotional satisfaction of personal triumph on the part of the individual members.

The stabilizing effects inherent in the common doctrine, which provides a mutually understood framework for communication,<sup>78</sup> and of the conflict-limiting factor of distinctiveness, which makes alliances outside the doctrine very difficult, are at their greatest if the international organization possesses an acknowledged doctrinal arbiter. An organization built around an absolute dogma requires this arbiter to avoid splits. The church as an organization sought him by rooting Papal authority in the dogma of infallibility. Indeed Catholicism probably preserved itself as a major unified force by taking that step. Otherwise, it might have become a loose federation of various national units, with very differing doctrinal commitments. Stalin's infallibility derived only from an authority which rested primarily on power, and the remaining vestiges of both were destroyed by Khrushchev in 1956. One may justifiably speculate (leaving Soviet domestic considerations apart) whether Khrushchev's position with international Communism would not have been stronger today if he had not destroyed the element of legitimacy inherent in his own past Stalinism and in his successorship to Stalin.

As it is, the recent divisions between the Chinese and the Soviets, while still restrained by the factors mentioned above, necessarily become contests for doctrinal primacy. The relationship is thus different from the Franciscan-Jesuit conflict which could ultimately be resolved through their mutual recognition of Papal authority, just as the 1957 tensions of the East Germans and the Czechs with the Poles could be arbitrated by Moscow, especially after the November 1957 reaffirmation of Soviet leadership. The ability of the Chinese to act in spite of Soviet guidance, and the eventual proclamation in December 1960 of the CPSU's non-leadership<sup>79</sup> mean that doctrinal divisions can no longer be effectively arbitrated, but only negotiated, within the organization. This is a politically grave liability, inhibiting expeditious deviation control.

This liability, however, is balanced by two factors. First, the Communist doctrine is so

<sup>78</sup> This was well illustrated by the difficulties encountered by Westerners in deciphering the various moves by Tito in 1955-1957 and by the Chinese more recently.

<sup>79</sup> Brzezinski, "The Challenge of Change in the Soviet Bloc," op. cit., for a discussion.

action-oriented that pure, abstract issues (such as those raised by the Jansenists) do not become the fulcrum of disputes. True, to western pragmatists even the discussion of the nature of imperialism or of the transition to Communism, or of the nature of our era, may already appear to involve relatively abstract, unreal issues, and the tendency to discuss them as matters of general principle seems entirely alien to a western observer. Nevertheless, these issues are far more closely related to material reality than some of the issues raised by the Jansenists, and they furthermore do serve as points of departure for action.<sup>80</sup> Thus while the absence of a recognized arbiter doubtless stimulates acute tensions,<sup>81</sup> at the same time the rapid pace of events in our age permits a much more rapid testing in action of the alternative doctrinal approaches, thereby establishing a somewhat more objective standard of judgment. This seems already to have happened in the Sino-Soviet dispute.<sup>82</sup>

Second, the absence of an arbiter is at least partially offset by the CPSU's constant efforts to establish itself, again through practice, as the unit of the international movement closest to the stage of doctrine-fulfillment. Its emphasis on "objective" material demonstration of this proximity is designed to ward off possible challenges based on such "subjective" factors as mass zeal and revolutionary will. At the same time, space achievements help to underline the Soviet Union's primacy by underscoring its technical leadership in an age of technology and science. Both of the foregoing factors tend to compensate for the absence of a formally recognized doctrinal arbiter, and give the USSR a privileged position.

Another difficulty which both international movements have experienced involves the tendency already noted in this paper, for doctrinal deviations to support themselves on a national base. Since nationalism is still intense, and since international Communism is composed of nation-states and nationally based parties, Communism is particularly exposed to its challenge. Stalin's solution, to put it most simply, was to suppress it. The violent and divisive reaction which this prompted has resulted in a far more sophisticated approach, which aims at providing such close underlying economic and social ties that eventually national interdependence will make national-based deviation much more difficult to sustain. At the same time, all the elites make a great effort to educate their future successors in the common doctrine and strive to develop in them a sense of common identification.

<sup>80</sup> R. S. Tarn, "Continuity in Russian Foreign Policy," International Journal, Autumn, 1950; Brzezinski, Ideology and Power in Soviet Politics (New York, 1962), ch. 4. See also the symposium on ideology in A. Dallin, ed., Soviet Conduct in World Affairs (New York, 1960).

<sup>81</sup> A good discussion is in R. Lowenthal's contribution to his volume with Hudson, et al., op. cit.

<sup>82</sup> See A. Halpern, "The Chinese Communist Line on Neutralism," RAND Mimeograph Study 2026, July 1960; D. Zagoria, "Sino-Soviet Friction in Underdeveloped Areas," Problems of Communism, March-April, 1961; T. Thornton, "Peking, Moscow and the Underdeveloped Areas," World Politics, July 1961; A. Whiting, "Moscow and Peking: Suspended Dialogue?", Current Scene, June 21, 1961.

Looking into the future it may be worth remembering that deviation is the rule in doctrinally oriented international movements. It is difficult to conceive of circumstances in which such an international movement, action-oriented and composed of a variety of homogeneous units, each with a special interest, national perspective and power, could avoid internal doctrinal conflicts, with some units deviating one way or another. The ebb and flow of this persisting condition can be described as a dynamic state of divergent unity. This condition arises because the movement cannot avoid the process of differentiation, which is a function both of scale and of its having become an international organization. A triumphantly expanding doctrinal movement, with an allegedly universally valid program, can be said to go successively through a stage of universalization, with its principles accepted or imposed almost in toto on other societies; and then, when these societies develop their own doctrinal elites, a stage of particularization. The clash of the two, with its occasionally painful adjustments, may result in the retention of the universal doctrine and of unity, but with a far greater degree of diversity permitted within the international movement. Otherwise, the alternative is an open split. The common but originally absolutist doctrine thus gradually becomes relativized.

This relativization slowly dissipates doctrinal vitality. It vitiates the dichotomic sense of distinctiveness from non-members, and weakens the concomitant fanaticism. More than this, it can in turn cause within some units of the international organization a process of erosion of the doctrine to the point where the doctrine gradually becomes an empty, formal vessel, even if currency is still given to some time-honored slogans. At the same time, in others, by a process of reaction, it may then prompt outraged doctrinal revivalisms and, depending on the nature of the general world context, cause more or less intense clashes.

Focusing more specifically on international Communism, it is hence most unlikely that the international scene will soon see a realignment of forces which pits, as some seem to expect, a Soviet-American coalition against the Chinese Communists. For this to happen a major domestic transformation of the Soviet system would be necessary, with its Communist elite losing all hope of Communist victory, in effect moving over into the doctrinal position of its erstwhile enemies, and consequently giving up its doctrinal claim to domestic power. This transformation could only occur in conditions of prolonged international stability. A lengthy international stalemate, with its dangerous implications of doctrinal boredom, is the condition most likely to lead to major internal stresses in international Communism, with potentially excessive reactions on the part of the more impatient units. However, such an impasse is very unlikely since it would have to include not only the so-called western world but also the underdeveloped areas which at the moment seem to offer the best revolutionary prospects.

In the more likely condition of dynamic international change, either involving developments increasing the sense of Communist momentum or events which seem to them to imply a turning of the tide against Communism, the pressures for unity may be fed by optimistic feelings of doctrine-fulfillment or by the quest for mutual security. Admittedly, the forward thrust of expansion can produce its own divisive reactions: for instance, the more radical members may begin to urge even more energetic steps to accelerate the process. But it appears highly unlikely that the division would be deep enough to make one of the units take the ultimate initiative of splitting or eventually even siding with the "historically doomed" enemies. More acute difficulties could occur in the event of sustained defeats, with mutual accusations of ineptness, lack of commitment, etc. generated by them. However, it is likely that the very conflict with the outside enemy which led to such defeats would have intensified the hostility of the members of the movement for their enemies, thus helping to contain the divisive pressures.

Of course, unforeseen factors can intervene in any of these hypothetical projections. Clumsy responses by either side can promote splits since they contribute to the escalation of conflict. The succession problem is also an unpredictable factor.

240077

A sudden change in Moscow or in Peking could intensify the conflict by getting it involved in the succession-struggle. On the other hand, to the extent that the existing deviation may be a function of personal animosity among the leaders, the divergence could actually narrow. To predict this one would have to know much more about the personal relations prevailing among the Communist leaders.<sup>83</sup> On the whole, however, it may be said that the inherent and normal deviations are (1) least likely to generate acute conflicts when the movement is engaged offensively and is successful; (2) more so when the movement is on the defensive; (3) most likely in conditions of frustrating stalemate. Furthermore, till now, the relatively rare cases of major defection or expulsion have not only occurred in conditions of relative stalemate, but they probably could have been avoided if the parties involved especially the center, had been less inept and more flexible. Finally, both parties have usually regretted the split, especially since an expansion-oriented doctrinal movement cherishes its dynamic sense of statistical or territorial growth. A break inescapably involves a doctrinally embarrassing retrogression, and experience has shown that it is very hard to repair.

Provided the leaders exercise a minimum of skill in deviation-control, along the lines sketched above, splits can be avoided. At the same time, the very appearance of divergent unity, with its reliance on deviation control to prevent splits, is a reflection of the very gradual underlying process of differentiation relativization and erosion. Each successful case of deviation control involves perhaps only a small measure of further doctrinal relativization, but it still always involves some. Through this relativization the doctrinal movement as a whole eventually may lose some of its overt militancy. Hence it appears that deviations contained but not crushed, are the handmaidens of history, stimulating the inevitable internal evolution of doctrinal movements.

<sup>83</sup> An obvious rule-of-thumb runs as follows: the death of friendly leaders always makes relations worse; the death of unfriendly leaders can improve them if the conflict has not become institutionalized by organizational clashes. For some recent discussions of the problem of succession, see: R. Conquest, Power and Policy—USSR (New York, 1960); H. Hinton, "The Succession Problem in Communist China," Current Scene, July 19, 1961; M. Rush, The Khrushchev Succession Problem, RAND Mimeograph Study 2283, 1961.

THE MARKET FOR STRATEGIC IDEAS IN BRITAIN: THE "SANDYS ERA"

LAURENCE W. MARTIN
School for Advanced International Studies, The Johns Hopkins University

Britain and the United States have long taken an intense mutual interest in the methods by which they arrive at a defense policy and the two countries have frequently borrowed from each other's experience. In the last few years the British scene has been worthy of special attention because Britain has faced, in a peculiarly acute form, the universal military problem of limited resources and extensive commitments. Recently Conservative governments have tried to resolve this dilemma by plunging heavily for certain strategies and weapons: as a Minister of Defence told the Commons, "We have to pick the winners out of the stable."<sup>1</sup>

To set a crude financial ceiling and leave the selection of strategy and design of forces wholly to bargaining among the services is frequently regarded as an invitation to aimlessness. An obvious and tempting remedy is to compel the services to conform to a single, coherent and supposedly economical strategic doctrine. This solution carries its own risks of neglecting important aspects of the total problem and of discouraging flexible response to experience. Such a risk is especially serious in a field, such as military policy in peacetime, where there can rarely be conclusive practical tests of policy. Thus the more one searches for comprehensive strategic answers, the more important it is to enquire whether strategic ideas are debated in a market wide and open enough to offer every possible assurance of conceiving and evaluating alternatives. The recent course of British policy is of interest in this respect.

I. DEFENSE BY BARGAINING: THE PATTERN BEFORE SUEZ

The history of British defense organization at the top since establishment of the Committee of Imperial Defence in 1902-4 has largely been one of proliferating committees deriving authority from a central fount of power in the Prime Minister and Cabinet, and always claiming to preserve the principle that planning must lie with those responsible for execution. Putting the wartime expedient of a Minister of Defence on a permanent footing in 1945 followed precedent, for the new official<sup>2</sup> was essentially a deputy to the Prime Minister for coordinating the Services. His Ministry was a small secretariat chiefly engaged in assisting the network of committees which now supported the new Defence Committee of the Cabinet. This Committee was itself served by a reduced military section of the Cabinet Office.<sup>3</sup> The most important of the subcommittees, the Chiefs of Staff Committee (CSC) retained its primary responsibility to the Cabinet rather than to the new Minister. Among the other committees were and are a Joint Intelligence Committee (JIC) under a Foreign Office chairman, a Defence Research Policy Committee under the Chief Scientist to the Ministry, and the Joint Planning Committee, composed of the Service Directors of Plans, under which worked the Joint Staff. This Staff reported to the CSC but preserved the

<sup>2</sup> Throughout this paper the term "official" is used to refer to those connected with Government, not in the special British sense of a civil servant as distinguished from a politician.

<sup>3</sup> Many members of the Ministry of Defence are seconded temporarily from the Service Ministries; the Cabinet Office in turn draws on the Service Ministries and on the Ministry of Defence.

<sup>1</sup> H. C. Debs., Feb. 29, 1960, col. 861.

The sources are never adequate in dealing with a period so recent and a system so addicted to secrecy. While most of the facts that follow can be found in the public record, I have had to rely on many conversations with well informed participants for guidance as to which parts of the record are reliable. I cannot cite most of the individuals because they still hold official posts. They included a diverse collection of experts, such as ministers, leaders of Opposition, back-benchers, official scientists, staff officers, senior civil servants, defense correspondents and others. I can express my thanks to the Hon. Alastair Buchan and the staff of the Institute of Strategic Studies, Rear Admiral Sir Anthony Buzzard, Bt., Mr. Richard Crossman, M.P., Admiral Sir Richard Denny, Mr. John Grant, Mr. Michael Howard, Captain B. H. Liddell Hart, and Marshal of the Royal Air Force Sir John Slessor. The original work on this subject was made possible by a grant from the Social Science Research Council. None who helped me is at all responsible for any particular statement of mine.

service identity of its members and, with the exception of a minute secretariat, worked in the respective service ministries.<sup>4</sup>

It is a feature of the British system, sometimes envied by others, to conceal both its methods and its achievements. But results cannot be hidden forever and the performance of the postwar machinery was disappointing. As a result a number of modifications were in the making even before the Suez crisis of 1956 precipitated some far-reaching changes.

The chief failing of the system appears to have been the typical tendency of committees to decide by compromise rather than reason. Though the postwar years saw an understandable shift of resources to the air arm, the allocation of money year by year seems to have proceeded more on the basis of "fair shares" than a coherent overall strategic plan. The CSC was, in fact, unable to agree on such a plan. During Field Marshal Montgomery's tenure as Chief of the Imperial General Staff (CIGS), apparently almost the only subject on which the CSC reached agreement easily was their common distaste for the Minister of Defence. Even then they quarrelled over an effort to oust him.

Making allowances for the author's contentious nature, Montgomery's Memoirs present a convincing picture of indecision and service jealousy. An acute shortage of funds aggravated competition by each service to maintain its appropriation, minimize the importance of other service contributions, and seize—and then frequently neglect—weapon systems which fell between the defined roles of services. A constant disagreement existed between the Army, which was anxious to secure adequate airlift, and the R.A.F. which preferred to spend its money on fighting aircraft. The Navy made repeated efforts, especially in 1954, to take over Coastal Command. Both Army and R.A.F. were sceptical of the Navy's expenditure on carriers, and a bitterly fought battle was waged between the R.A.F. and the Army as to control of certain classes of ground-to-air missiles.

Such competition for funds particularly discouraged innovation or production of "hardware", for the contest naturally took place at the margins and consequently turned in concrete fact on the survival of the least deeply rooted programs, the more so as a result of the very high "house-keeping" expenses imposed by universal military service.<sup>5</sup> Shortage of money was also a temptation to defer development for fear of precluding later possibilities. Thus the vice of preparing for the last war was joined by that of getting ready for the next but one. There was in fact very little weapon development other than that of the atomic bomb during the 'forties, and this is particularly true for the Army.<sup>6</sup>

During his years as CIGS, from 1946 to 1948, Montgomery made a number of efforts to persuade the CSC to reach agreement on a coherent strategic plan. In particular he wanted the CSC to lay down guidelines, give more positive instructions to the joint planners and abandon their tendency merely to rule on the planners' proposals. His decisive failure led him to recommend a further centralization of planning very similar to that later adopted. "We need a unified defence policy," he wrote in 1948. "We have not got one and we have no hope of getting one with our present system."<sup>7</sup>

If the CSC was rarely successful in arriving at a comprehensive view of national security policy in the early postwar years, its political masters did little to extract a decision from the Committee or impose one on it. Most members of the Labour Governments were not greatly interested and the Prime Minister, while personally much attracted by military affairs, was heavily engaged by economic and diplomatic crises. When Churchill returned to be his own Minister of Defence once more, he found it difficult to adjust to the peacetime necessities of management. After him, Conservative ministers of defense suffered rapid obsolescence, so that there were eight in as many years.<sup>8</sup>

For many postwar years governments were apparently content to set an overall financial ceiling on defense, to lay down policy on certain matters of great domestic political significance such as National Service, to rule on possible applications of force, as at Abadan and Buraimi, but to leave the allocation of the <sup>4</sup> The most recent and by far the most comprehensive history of the formal system is Franklyn A. Johnson, Defence by Committee, The British Committee of Imperial Defence, 1885-1959, London, 1960. This excellent informative history does not deal in any detail with developments after 1956.

<sup>5</sup> Some critics also believe the system of handling research and development through a separate Ministry of Supply (MOS) also hindered provision of equipment, by encouraging overspecification by the services and inflation of research and development costs by the MOS, which had no interest in output.

<sup>6</sup> On this see the account of Christopher Soames, H. C. Debs., March 1, 1960, cols. 1050 ff.

<sup>7</sup> The Memoirs of F.M. The Viscount Montgomery (London, 1958), p. 495.

<sup>8</sup> Churchill, Alexander, Macmillan, Selwyn Lloyd, Monckton, Head, Sandys, Watkinson.

available funds to the bargaining of the CSC. The overall ceiling itself was reached by annual negotiation between the services, the Minister of Defence and the Treasury, but one gathers the result was very largely predetermined by the economic plan of the Government. When large cuts in service demands were required, this was apparently done by the Ministry of Defence in a relatively crude, across-the-board fashion.<sup>9</sup> Each service strove with inadequate resources to fulfill its image of a Second World War force and the disputes in the CSC offered the government a series of unconnected disputes over allocation rather than a choice of strategies.

The opening of the 1950s brought several challenges to this system. A practical test came with the Korean War, on the outset of which, according to the admission of the Minister of Defence at the time, a 400,000-man Army had grave difficulty in putting together one combat brigade, even though the logistical "tail" was provided by America.<sup>10</sup> The program of rearmament which the Labour Government undertook at American urging brought home the costs of defense in an exacerbated form, entailing sacrifices of men and money that soon came to be regarded as politically unbearable and economically dangerous. At the same juncture the accession of a new Party to office facilitated consideration of change. Moreover a fortuitous collection of mutually tolerable personalities on the CSC, including Sir John Slessor as Chief of the Air Staff (CAS), a vigorous individual with a taste for broad strategic speculation, encouraged a departure from recent practice in devising recommendations to the government. The CSC set themselves aside for a few weeks and drew up an overall review of defense resulting in a policy centered on nuclear deterrence;<sup>11</sup> a proposal stimulated by the burden of the goals envisaged in NATO's program of conventional rearmament, and by the long-awaited fruition of Britain's nuclear effort. These decisions were accepted by the Cabinet and reflected later in the White Papers of 1953 and 1954.<sup>12</sup>

This departure was also accompanied by some improvement in liaison with the Foreign Office, whose representative on the CSC at the time was a personal friend of Slessor's. Also, contrary to practice, the review of defense had apparently received formal Foreign Office approval before reaching the Cabinet. Although working relations on day-to-day concerns are uniformly agreed to be excellent between the Foreign Office and the services, with intelligence handled by the JIC under Foreign Office leadership, it was widely felt that forward planning left something to be desired. An improvement was made here when, in 1950, a committee to coordinate British policy within NATO was set up under the chairmanship of the Secretary of the Cabinet, with representatives from the Foreign Office, the CSC, the Treasury and the Ministry of Defence.<sup>13</sup>

This achievement made Slessor as firm a champion of the CSC system as Montgomery was a critic.<sup>14</sup> But, leaving to one side the merits of the policy of deterrence adopted, its design owed much to fortuitous circumstances. Nor were the decisions as thoroughgoing as might appear, for, because the task of building the bombs and bombers had only begun, the bills were not yet coming in and their size was unsuspected. Thus while the positive decisions had perhaps been made, the more difficult task of pruning elsewhere had not yet begun in earnest. The role of the Army and Navy was not yet under full assault and they were left undefined scope in the notion of "broken-backed" warfare which emerged in the same White Papers.

<sup>9</sup> See Emanuel Shinwell's account of the 1951 budgetary process in H. C. Debs., July 28, 1958, col. 1002. The Permanent Secretary and his staff, and particularly the Chief Scientist, were frequently the actual decision makers at the margin. Even those who claim a united recommendation by the CSC to be virtually irresistible—and such recommendations were not too common—make an exception for cases where the military view calls for overall increases in defense expenditure and where Treasury restraint is powerfully backed in the Cabinet by a natural reluctance of all other departments to see a larger slice of revenue for the military accommodated by a cut in their own budgets. Aneurin Bevan's resignation during the Korean War is an exception to prove this rule.

<sup>10</sup> H. C. Debs., Feb. 28, 1961, col. 1458.

<sup>11</sup> This is the paper which, as advocated by Slessor in the U.S. is said to have been rejected by the Truman Chiefs, but resuscitated under Eisenhower as the germ of the "New Look." See inter alia, B. H. Liddell Hart, Defence or Deterrence (London, 1960), pp. 18–20, and Alastair Buchan, "Their Bomb and Ours," Encounter, October, 1958.

<sup>12</sup> Cmd. 8768, 9075.

<sup>13</sup> Max Beloff, New Dimensions in Foreign Policy (New York, 1961), p. 54. This book is an excellent source of information on many aspects of British administration.

<sup>14</sup> See his memoirs, The Central Blue (New York, 1957), pp. 450–63.

It therefore should not have been surprising that the allocation of resources still presented an increasingly severe problem when Sir Anthony Eden became Prime Minister in 1955. In July, after Eden took over, Selwyn Lloyd, then Minister of Defence, projected the expense of armed forces of 700,000 men—100,000 less than existing numbers—for five years as a basis for long range planning. The resulting estimate of a 30 per cent rise in costs indicated the need for major changes and in 1956 Eden inaugurated an elaborate review of defense policy by a small Cabinet sub-committee.<sup>15</sup> While motivated by the need for economy, Eden hoped the review would help to put planning on a basis more satisfactory than the "annual exchanges between the Treasury and the fighting Services," which clearly were in his opinion the primary determinant of the national military posture. Eden also appreciated the weakness which ministers of defense had shown in the determination of policy and attempted to remedy this by announcing, in October, 1955, an expanded interpretation of the minister's role, to include ensuring that the "composition and balance" of each service conformed to the government's policy. At the same time he created the office of chairman of the CSC. This officer (the first incumbent was the senior chief, Marshal of the R.A.F. Sir William Dickson) was to report the views of the CSC to the Minister, but the chief public justification for his creation was the expanding demands upon the CSC for representation on international bodies.<sup>16</sup> As an immediate start on revising the substance of military policy the Government announced reduction of the forces from 800,000 to 700,000 men. Privately, the review of 1956 led Eden to plan for reduction to about 450,000 by 1960 or 1961, accompanied by the abolition of conscription. This was to be made possible by more wholehearted commitment to nuclear deterrence.<sup>17</sup>

The motive of Eden's activity was immediately economic, but it had occasioned a much more than usually intense interference with the characteristics rather than just the overall cost of the services. Thus the indecision of the military seemed to be inviting initiative from above. Already in the early 'fifties, senior civil servants in the Ministry of Defence had been playing a more positive role as the arbitrator of interservice disputes. The Chief Scientist proved particularly useful for settling issues ostensibly on technical grounds but frequently merely to secure a decision. The DRPC became an agency where, in an effort to economize in technical manpower and research facilities, decisions were being taken that in effect governed the balance of forces.<sup>18</sup>

The measures Eden set on foot in response to these problems had had no chance to take effect when the Suez crisis erupted. Justifiable or not, the performance of the services in that operation was widely regarded as conclusive evidence of the dangers of "trying to get something of everything and succeeding in getting enough of nothing."<sup>19</sup> This disillusionment coupled with a new economic crisis and another new Prime Minister having an urgent need to refurbish his party's reputation, made understandable that a new look should be sought in defense policy.

II. DEFENSE BY DOCTRINE: THE FORMULATION OF THE SANDYS' POLICY

Even after the tentative movement toward a policy of nuclear deterrence in White Paper since 1953, the Outline of Future Policy issued in April 1957 by Duncan Sandys, Minister of Defence in Harold Macmillan's new Cabinet, created the impression of being a new departure. In this respect it was accorded

<sup>15</sup> Anthony Eden, Full Circle (Boston, 1960), pp. 415 ff.

<sup>16</sup> It should not go unremarked that the CSC was scarcely consulted about this innovation, which a number of officers suspected to be based more on a political desire to appear active with regard to defense than any well thought out theory of organization. The announcement was made to the Conservative Party conference. Sir John Slessor's critical view can be seen in The Central Blue, pp. 450 ff. Slessor believes a solemn commission should have been set up to review the whole system—such as preceded inauguration of the CSC in 1923—before tampering with existing methods.

<sup>17</sup> See in particular Eden's letter to Eisenhower, July 18, 1956, Full Circle, p. 417. Eden had been particularly impressed by the nuclear-mindedness of Khrushchev and Bulganin during their visit to London in 1955.

<sup>18</sup> An ad hoc Air Defence Committee under Sir Frederick Brundrett, then Deputy Chief Scientist, settled the ground-to-air missile controversy mentioned above.

<sup>19</sup> The phrase is John Strachey's from the 1955 defense debate. A senior British official describes the operation in a paraphrase of the R.A.F. motto, as "per ardua ad hoc."

<sup>20</sup> Cmnd. 124, accompanied by Defence Statistics, Cmnd. 130.

a general welcome, for the Suez affair had induced wide agreement among military commentators at least upon the need for a close scrutiny of existing programs.

The contents of Sandys' paper have become well known. Doctrinally it was characterized chiefly by frank recognition that active and passive protection of Britain against nuclear attack was impossible and that defense must therefore be by deterrence, with active defense limited to safeguarding retaliatory forces. Manned aircraft, both bombers and fighters, were to be replaced after existing generations by missiles. The "strike" part of this program rested heavily on hopes for the coming British intermediate range ballistic missile Blue Streak. This liquid-fueled rocket was to be entrenched in underground emplacements and to perform the "equalizing" function on Britain's behalf anticipated of thermonuclear weapons by Winston Churchill several years earlier. Ground forces were to be small, but this, it was alleged, would be offset by greater mobility and by nuclear weapons. An Army Strategic Reserve would be set up in Britain. National Service was to go and the armed forces were to be reduced to 375,000 men by 1962. The plan was presented as one for five years, which, it was claimed, perhaps paradoxically, would provide stability for planning and also flexibility for meeting changing circumstances.

All of this has attracted a great deal of notice. Less adequately recognized have been the distinctive manner in which Sandys created his policy and the changes which this and the subsequent process of implementation wrought in the defense machinery. Before examining how the Government came to select its course of action, however, it may be well to consider what alternatives were available to it.

It should already be clear that the new policy was no complete break with previous trends; commitment to a nuclear force was long established and the Eden Government had earlier decided in principle upon a reduction of forces to 450,000 and the ending of National Service. (The last two intentions, of course, had not been announced so that the public saw a dramatic cut from 700,000 to 375,000.) Nonetheless the policy was truly a bold one, for the fresh cuts carried some force levels below the very minimum which the professional military advisers would recommend, even with nuclear weapons, and thus finally accepted consequences which previous trends had only foreshadowed. Given the need for economy of national resources, the Government could presumably have selected two different courses.

It could have expanded military expenditures and cut consumption.<sup>21</sup> This would, however, have carried grave political risks for an already unstable regime and would not in itself have done anything to impose greater rationality on military planning. Nor would it have released certain scarce material and human resources needed for the export effort. Defense competed with exports as well as with domestic consumption and the Treasury's anxiety as to the health of the economy had been reflected in the Suez crisis, first as eagerness to regain control of the Canal and then, with the pound under pressure, as importunity to cease the operation. It was therefore not irrelevant that the former Chancellor was now Prime Minister.

Alternatively the Government could have abandoned the strategic nuclear effort and concentrated upon its conventional contribution to the Western alliance. But the nuclear force was firmly believed by ministers—and, indeed, by the CSC—to enhance national prestige and preserve an independence of action regarded as particularly desirable in view of what many regarded as America's treacherous abandonment of her allies during the Suez affair. Nuclear forces were also thought to increase positive British influence over the United States by undertaking a share in the task of deterrence and demonstrating technological skill. Moreover the strategic nuclear option was a policy for which both the weapons and a doctrine existed. The Chief Scientist, to whom recourse was had as the representative of professionalism untainted by service prejudice, greatly favored this doctrine which was, incidentally, the kind of "macro-strategy" appealing to and easily grasped by political leaders who are not specialists in military affairs. None of the Services was ready with an immediate alternative proposal of equal clarity or sweeping promise, while the technical obstacles to the policy were shrouded in the future.<sup>22</sup>

Yet another discouragement to emphasis on conventional force was the pressing anxiety to end conscription—felt both by the Government for political reasons, and by the Army in order to end the constant wastage of training and personnel movements. The influence of this incentive would be hard to exaggerate. While the extra men denied to the Army in 1957 could statistically have been bled from a deemphasized R.A.F. or Navy, it was unlikely that in real life this could be done by voluntary recruitment.

<sup>21</sup> For the reality of this alternative, see A. C. L. Day, "The Economics of Defence," Political Quarterly, Jan.-March, 1960, pp. 57 ff. With a rising national product, of course, the decision to hold defense expenditure steady was to reduce the proportion spent on military affairs.

<sup>22</sup> This was the period in which Admiral Radford pressed the nuclear view in the U.S. and Franz Joseph Strauss cut back the proposed Bundeswehr.

If these were some of the considerations which appear to have weighed with the Government, the process by which the decision was taken displays an interesting interaction of personal, political and organizational influences.

Although the White Paper was discussed in a series of highly acrimonious meetings between the Minister and the Chiefs of Staff, it was very much the personal achievement of the Minister, who, on good account, paid scant regard to protests and on occasion refused even to consider dissenting papers. Such advice as the Minister did employ in his remarkable tour de force, which entailed some dozen drafts, came largely from senior civil officials of his Ministry, particularly the Chief Scientist, and—allegedly—from one Colonel Post, a personal confidant. Inspiration for the line taken came also from the Prime Minister, who had himself served a brief and unprofitable period as Minister of Defence and who had endowed his deputy with the more generously defined authority he would himself have liked. In an announcement to the House of Commons on January 24, 1957, the Prime Minister authorized the Minister of Defence to decide matters of general defense policy affecting the "size, shape, organization and disposal of the armed forces and their equipment and supply including defence research and development," and to interfere in matters of particular importance within each Service, all with a view to "a substantial reduction in expenditure and manpower." At the same time the Chairman of the CSC was given the parallel office of Chief of Staff to the Minister.

Each of the Service chiefs was unhappy with Sandys' policy. None questioned the principle of a British deterrent, but each, including the Chief of Air Staff, in whose hands the deterrent was primarily placed, deplored the effect of economy on his own Service. R.A.F. sentiment was by no means enamored of missiles, which spelt the end of pilots and aircraft, and the CAS, Sir Dermot Boyle, represented that "cavalry school" of air officer most attached to the traditional appearance of an air force. The Royal Navy came in for its share of cuts, but was less dissatisfied than might have been expected, for it retained big ships and a strategic capability in its carriers, together with an anti-submarine mission. If the White Paper left the Navy's role somewhat obscure, this may not have been unwelcome to a Service which was not at the time provided with a strategic concept on which to build its future or with a better weapon than the carrier.<sup>23</sup> In contrast to the Navy, the Army was unreservedly distressed by the severe cuts proposed especially those in manpower, which would reduce numbers well below what it regarded as a minimum. As a result the CIGS was the unhappiest chief of all, engaged in sharp disputes with the Minister and reportedly only dissuaded from resignation by the reflection that his fellow chiefs would not join him and that an isolated demonstration would not prevail against the determination of ministers and the general enthusiasm for economy.

The disposition of the Army's case serves to illustrate the extent to which economic and political guidelines took precedence over military opinion in 1957. The new, all-regular, "streamlined" Army was to be 165,000 strong.<sup>24</sup> Under Antony Head, who became Minister of Defence in October, 1956, and had previously been Secretary of State for War, various studies and ministerial urgings had reconciled the Army to a strength of 200,000, the ultimate figure embodied in Eden's plans. This acceptance was based on use of Gurkhas in Asia, reductions of garrisons, severe weakness east of Suez and, in general, upon a number of optimistic assumptions as to capabilities and commitments. It also rested on promises of the very best equipment, tactical nuclear weapons and provision for air mobility. Even so, when actuaries of the Central Statistical Office were called upon to estimate the highest possible voluntary recruitment for the Army, their answer of 165,000 left a gap which, if small enough to make all-regular forces enticing, was large enough to be of critical military consequence. As a result, after Suez made economy urgent, a sharp dispute developed between Head and the Chancellor of the Exchequer

<sup>23</sup> The Polaris was not seriously taken up at this time. For this two American influences were partly responsible: that of the USAF in providing both the R.A.F. and the Ministry of Defence with skeptical assessments, and that of Admiral Rickover and associates in advising the British missile chiefs to avoid the Polaris until more development problems—then expected to be greater than was the case—had been solved.

<sup>24</sup> The exact figures for individual services were not in Cmnd. 127. See George Wigg's analysis of the arithmetic, H. C. Debs., Feb. 29, 1960, col. 909

Harold Macmillan. Neither a Cabinet meeting nor a conference between the two Ministers could resolve the difference, and, before further debate was possible, Macmillan became Prime Minister.

Head's refusal to retain office under Macmillan thus represented his unwillingness to be the Prime Minister's agent in reducing the Army against military advice. The new force level, based on the estimate of recruitment, was naturally declared to be militarily adequate by the Government. Of course the CSC strongly disagreed but no appeals were successful in face of the determination of the Prime Minister and Minister of Defence. The CSC had also been persuaded, unwisely as some thought, to prepare a plan for the deployment of a hypothetical army of 165,000 and presentation of this as a workable professional proposal, it has been said, enabled the Minister to conceal the full extent of service anxiety even from some members of the Cabinet.<sup>25</sup>

It seems reasonable to say that this represented a distinct departure from precedent in method as well as doctrine. There was a marked change in the tone of policy making and in the character of political direction. Fears voiced in the press that the economy would come across-the-board, in the old percentage style, proved wrong. On the contrary, the Minister came down heavily for a particular doctrine and imposed a number of very far reaching consequent changes upon the military posture of the nation. The question remained, however, as to whether this decisiveness had been wisely exercised. It is not surprising that these formative months proved to be but the beginning of a prolonged public and private debate.

III. THE REORGANIZATION OF 1958

The dispute between the Services and Mr.

<sup>25</sup> This must rest in part on private information, but Head's later speech of July 28, 1958, H. C. Debs., col. 988 ff. goes a long way. Suspicion that 165,000 was actuarial rather than military is born out by the Government's raising the figure to 180,000 when recruiting went well, on the ground of providing a cushion for fluctuation in recruitment (presumably as desirable in 1957 as later) and by the Minister of Defence's frank admission in 1960 that a cut to 165,000 again, made necessary on financial grounds, was felt undesirable by the Army, Times, Nov. 7, 1960. The leadership of the Labour Party was equally committed to ending conscription for electoral reasons and tried to discourage those Labour Members who advocated a bigger Army.

Sandys as to both the content of his policy and his method of making decisions continued during the months when the bare bones of his outline were being fleshed in detail. In this running dispute the two elements of content and method were inextricably entwined. Anxiety about Sandys' plans for reshaping the formal machinery of making defense policy was given point by dislike for the use he could be expected to make of it. Protests against the detailed applications of his policy and the manner in which these were made, implicitly criticized the way the machinery was working.<sup>26</sup>

The nature of British defense machinery being what it is, particulars of the heated, high-level controversy which continued after publication of Sandys' White Paper are hard to acquire. This observation, indeed, touches directly on a main service grievance. For the CSC were now made painfully aware that the traditional reticence which preserved them from close public scrutiny of their achievements could cut two ways. They now felt that the pattern of closed debate and service reticence was being exploited to impose unsound policies while concealing from the public and Parliament and even from the full view of the Cabinet, risks which were being taken and the extent to which professional military opinion was united in misgiving if in little else. The Minister, they felt, was refusing his military advisers the justice of a fair hearing and was reaching firm agreement with the Prime Minister before going through the semblance of debate in the Defence Committee. It was also suggested that Sandys encouraged service rivalries so as to prevent formation of a solid front against him. Admittedly it would be difficult to distinguish precisely between making use of divisions amongst advisers to railroad home a plan condemned by all, and being compelled to devise and insist upon a scheme because the advisers could not themselves hit upon an agreed policy. Yet many apparently felt they could distinguish the difference, which in itself indicated a grave absence of mutual trust in military affairs. Perhaps the Economist best expressed what was felt to be at stake when it declared that there must be authority, and that the authority must be the Minister's, but that authority should be used to extract agreement from the military leaders, not merely to squash them and ride roughshod over their views.<sup>27</sup> The danger of authoritarianism was also well put during a later parliamentary debate by Sandys' immediate predecessor: "My right honorable Friend has great qualities of strength of character and determination. He is known for it inside and outside the House. They are fine qualities in a Minister provided he is right. If, however, he introduces a policy which may lead the country into danger, such qualities can be calamitous."<sup>28</sup> Thus while there was no question of the Government's right to lay down the law, considerable uneasiness arose from the feeling that this was being done without a full and free flow of ideas within the official machine. A further question also existed as to whether a wider public had no right to learn the broad lines upon which professional debate was proceeding on a matter of such moment.

<sup>26</sup> The difficulties raised by economies already envisaged in the White Paper were sharpened for some months by the anxiety of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to secure still further reduction of expenditure. This ultimately terminated in the resignation of the Chancellor, Peter Thorneycroft, in January, 1958.

As to formal organization of defense policy, the amplified powers of the Minister of Defence, defined by Macmillan in January, 1957, were confirmed in a major restatement of Central Organisation for Defence in a White Paper of July, 1958.<sup>29</sup> This paper apparently represented a compromise between the Minister's inclination to carry the centralization of authority further and the desire of the services and the service ministers to maintain their autonomy. The arrangement was worked out in a hotly contested debate of many months some rumors of which reached the press.<sup>30</sup> Once more the overall authority of the Minister was asserted, though with the omission of his right to interfere with matters internal to the services which he considered important.<sup>31</sup> He secured a right of review over senior appointments and the power to transfer functions to his own Ministry. Moreover the Minister was made the fount of operational orders, for which purpose he was given a Chief of Defence Staff (CDS) to replace the jointly held offices of Chairman of the CSC and the Chief of Staff to the Minister. This perpetuated the ad hoc arrangement whereby the Suez operation had been directly controlled by Eden by way of the Chairman of the CSC. Appointment of the CDS was also intended to provide a head for the CSC equipped to give independent advice to the Minister. For this purpose the new Chief was authorized to call on the Joint Staff for assistance.<sup>32</sup> The collective responsibility of the CSC to the Government for professional advice and the individual right of each Chief to have access to the Minister and Prime Minister, were however, reaffirmed.

The second major change made in the White Paper was the announcement that the membership of the Defence Committee would be regarded as a floating one, with attendance at particular meetings being decided ad hoc by the Prime Minister.<sup>33</sup> At the same time a lower level Defence Board was created to contain, under the Minister of Defence, both the service ministers and the CSC, together with the Permanent Secretary and Chief Scientists of the Ministry. This Board was to deal with all purely military affairs while the Defence Committee would normally confine itself to problems related to financial, foreign, colonial and commonwealth affairs.<sup>34</sup> According to well informed sources, Sandys' original plan had been to confine the service ministers to the Board, excluding them from the cabinet committee. This the Cabinet overruled, leaving their attendance subject to discretion, and it was made clear that minutes of the Defence Committee would always be circulated to all the nominal members.<sup>35</sup> The service ministers also retained their right to "make submissions to the Cabinet." The actual effect of this reorganization on the relationship between Minister of Defence and the services thus remained to be seen. In general the increase in power received by the Minister in 1957 seemed to be confirmed, and the service ministers further reduced in status. The exact effect of the changes in staff organization was also uncertain. Would the CDS be the ally or the rival of the Minister?

<sup>27</sup> For explanation of all this see Sandys' contribution to the debate on the White Paper, July 28, 1958, H. C. Debs., col. 954 ff.

<sup>28</sup> The Chiefs of Staff would apparently attend as of right. See Para. 4 of Cmnd. 476.

<sup>29</sup> In this respect it partly replaced an informal Service Ministers Committee in which the Minister of Defence had periodically met the service heads.

<sup>30</sup> I.e., Prime Minister, Home Secretary, Foreign Secretary, Chancellor, Commonwealth Secretary, Minister of Defence, Minister of Labour, the Service Ministers, and the Minister of Supply. The Minister of Supply survived this reorganization but disappeared the following year, to be replaced by a Ministry of Aviation, for development of aircraft and missiles, and by distribution of other supply functions to the Services.

<sup>27</sup> Dec. 7, 1957.

<sup>28</sup> July 28, 1958, H. C. Debs., col. 994.

<sup>29</sup> Cmnd. 476.

<sup>30</sup> Cf. Daily Telegraph, Feb. 28, April 25, July 10, 1958; Times, June 26, 1958; Observer, June 29, July 6, 1958.

<sup>31</sup> In April, 1957, Sandys had announced a Defence Administration Committee to consider service unification but little more was heard of it.

Some believed the whole reform to be an unsatisfactory hybrid, as a result of the deadlock between the ambitions of the Minister and the services, and that such features as increasing the responsibility of the CSC to the Minister while at the same time affirming the right of the services to appeal over his head, might confuse rather than clarify matters.

IV. THE SERVICE APPEAL AGAINST SANDYS

While the services thus continued to put their case through formal channels they did not confine themselves to these when they felt the results to be unsatisfactory. In Britain, the ultimate objective of an attempt to revise a matter of broad policy must be to change the mind of the cabinet. This has increasingly come to mean the mind of the Prime Minister and his closest advisers, who may be senior civil servants as well as ministers. For this the obvious recourse of the services is to the formal processes of the governmental machinery. But they are not without further resources if these processes fail to serve their ends. There are devious methods to change the government's mind: by efforts to bypass unreceptive superiors to ensure that they have not left ministerial colleagues in ignorance of the service case, for example, or by representations to influential unofficial circles within the ruling party. Failing success in this way there is the possible expedient of attempting to change the climate of opinion within which the inevitable adjustments of policy will be made, by appeals to the attentive public.

For all the legendary service abhorrence of such unorthodox methods in Britain there are numerous well known historical instances of such campaigns.<sup>36</sup> And, in fact during the Sandys' era, when the services felt they were not receiving a fair hearing, there was a marked increase in behavior so frequently thought of as peculiar to Americans.

<sup>36</sup> The "Fisher era" before World War I, and that war itself, are renowned cases. Liddell Hart's writings abound in examples from the interwar years. In his valuable article on "Civil-Military Relations in Great Britain and the United States, 1945-1958," Political Science Quarterly, March, 1960, p. 40, Michael Howard undoubtedly expresses the tendency of the British system as compared to the American when he writes that "defeated or disgruntled parties are prevented from reopening a chose jugée and throwing everything once more into confusion." But it is not absolutely so and the later 1950s would seem to have been a period of strenuous efforts to reopen issues publicly. It is perhaps worth recalling that as a Territorial Army officer before the war, Duncan Sandys caused a furor by denouncing deficiencies in anti-aircraft preparations.

There is a wide impression among British politicians particularly concerned with defense that during the Sandys' era there was an appreciable increase in the number of "leaks" of information both as to planned developments and as to interservice disputes.<sup>37</sup> Not all of this came from the military; indeed some suggest that civil servants were an especially prolific source.<sup>38</sup> Nor can all leaks be regarded as intended to obstruct the Minister's policy. Some are doubtless accidental, some made for personal reasons, and others may be intentional trial balloons and maneuvers by the Government. Nor, of course, were leaks intended to influence interservice disputes unprecedented. Nevertheless, with all these reservations, there appears to have been a marked increase in the willingness of serving officers to talk in confidence with the press, with backbenchers and even with individual leaders of the Opposition.<sup>39</sup>

It is not necessary, however, to confine oneself to this elusive phenomenon, for there was also a remarkable number of more overt and dramatic "demonstrations" in the years following 1957. Each of the services was associated with one or other of these. The most noted and sensational were Conference and Exercise Prospect, mounted by the R.A.F. in the spring of 1958 and organized by the Director of Plans. This was a three-day briefing session for a selected group of R.A.F. officers and Air Ministry civil servants, later followed by a one-day performance held in the Royal Empire Society Hall on May 6, 1958 for selected correspondents and others.<sup>40</sup> At these affairs the emphasis upon deterrence, wielded by the R.A.F., was upheld as the only practicable policy. The press directed its attention, however, chiefly to the degree to which the R.A.F. of the future was depicted in a fashion which differed in several prominent respects from that implied in the White Papers, especially in the matter of manned aircraft. A second generation of strategic bombers, of tactical bombers and of fighters were all held essential. A call was also issued for an airborne missile,<sup>41</sup> reflecting reluctance to depend entirely on fixed bases. "Prospect" aroused a public sensation, though the results were apparently mixed. The discussions then going on as to procurement of a new medium-range nuclear strike aircraft, the TSR2,<sup>42</sup> and a fighter, the Lightning, were shortly settled in favor of the R.A.F. But the press sharply criticized such demonstrations and it is said that the incident strengthened the Minister of Defence in the strenuous Cabinet discussions then proceeding on his plans for reorganisation.<sup>43</sup>

<sup>37</sup> For one public reference to this see George Brown's—Labour's chief spokesman on defense—observation, "We . . . have had almost every member of the Services' team . . . making quite sure that their particular angle on what was happening was well known and well publicized." H. C. Debs., July 28, 1958, col. 971.

<sup>38</sup> A onetime minister has suggested to me that leaks are particularly prevalent in areas where private contractors have an interest in boosting or detracting from a particular weapon, e.g., in the missile and aircraft field, as compared to programs handled by national arsenals, etc. SHAPE, ever since the incumbency of F. M. Montgomery, has afforded a somewhat privileged sanctuary for a greater outspokenness than is common at home: cf. The Economist, November 14, 1959, discussion of the case of Sir John Eccles.

<sup>39</sup> Again note George Brown's allegation: "The Service Chiefs spoke in public, against all traditions, taking that risk in order to get round the Ministers whom they could not persuade in private. There was virtually nobody in the Service Departments at that time who was not taking the trouble to tell anybody about it who would listen. I have minuted notes of receptions and of conversations in which leading Service men made only the reservation, 'Do not quote me' . . . other Service advisers had articles written in leading journals with only the thinnest of pseudonyms hiding the authority behind them . . ." H. C. Debs., April 27, 1960, col. 221.

Naval efforts were more discreet, as by repute they have always been. Throughout these years senior naval officers continued to maintain particularly close liaison with certain newspapers, such as the Observer. Early efforts to enhance the Navy's role under the Sandys regime were directed toward anti-submarine warfare.<sup>44</sup> To the extent naval opinion contemplated a part in deterrence, it was in terms of the carrier, for which were being developed ship-to-air missiles and a low-level strike aircraft, which was regarded as a rival to the R.A.F.'s TSR2. The carrier was under heavy criticism on grounds of vulnerability, but the Navy was slow to develop an alternative interest in the Polaris. A number of considerations reportedly still underlay this caution: doubt as to the availability of nuclear propulsion, a "cavalry" traditionalism in which submarines were not a suitable backbone for a fleet; and, perhaps most of all, fear of being compelled to undertake development within existing limits of the naval budget. Nevertheless, during 1958, especially after amendment of the MacMahon Act, interest in a naval deterrent grew and senior naval officers provided information for certain newspaper articles extolling the merits of seaborne deterrence and casting doubt upon the efficacy of the R.A.F.'s striking force.<sup>45</sup>

The most dramatic instance of the Army speaking up was the lecture that Lieutenant General Sir John Cowley delivered to the Royal United Service Institution on November 4, 1959. In this highly publicised pronouncement the General, while admitting the danger of service parochialism, criticised reliance on deterrence on both moral and practical grounds, and outspokenly deplored neglect of the conventional forces, drawing a critical comparison between the proportion of expenditure devoted to the deterrent and that to the Army. Cowley wrote a little verse on this theme:

"I also have a plan to spend a thousand million pounds
To buy some guided missiles and to hide them in the ground,
And then to clearly paint on each 'these things must not be used,'
No wonder that our citizens are getting so confused."

This was one man, but a man who spoke as Controller of Munitions in the Ministry of Supply, who drew attention to the fact that he was on active service, and whose remarks had been cleared by the Secretary of State for War. Press comment and correspondence in the Journal of the RUSI were noticeably more favorable than in the Prospect case; perhaps a reflection of the headway made by Sandys critics. The Prime Minister himself was re-

<sup>40</sup> See Air Power, Summer 1958, pp. 283 ff.

<sup>41</sup> As far as I can discover, this was not, as is now sometimes said, an anticipation of the Skybolt airborne ballistic missile later made the mainstay of British policy, but a cruise missile for low-level radar penetration.

<sup>42</sup> For the history of this aircraft, see the Observer, Jan. 4, 1959.

<sup>43</sup> The Economist once more provided the most incisive comment, "Whose Hand on the Tiller?", May 10, 1958.

<sup>44</sup> See Admiral Sir John Eccles' outburst, "repudiating" the White Paper and reverting to the concept of "broken-backed" war. Economist, Oct. 5, 1957.

<sup>45</sup> A telling broadside under the nom de plum of Nucleus, in the Observer, was said, by those in a position to know, to be the direct contribution of a just retired, very senior naval staff officer see Observer, Dec. 7, 28, 1958.

portedly much annoyed by this incident and it was announced that henceforth such utterances would require clearance not merely by the services but also by the Minister of Defence.<sup>46</sup>

Public complaints of this kind might be expected to attract more attention in a period of doctrinal change but such a number of incidents in so short a period tends to confirm the belief that unaccustomed constraints on the interplay of views within the official machine encouraged dissent to seek other channels. Certainly the demonstrations were successful in communicating professional misgivings to a wider circle of attentive opinion, and thereby placed the Government under the necessity of justifying its policy before a critical audience.

V. THE WIDER MARKET FOR STRATEGIC IDEAS

Service leaders were, of course, only one of many sources of attempts to manipulate the wider market and through it, the Government. This market ranges in a complex fashion from the narrower influential circles, a twilight zone between direct influence and the creation of generally favorable opinion, to the broadest forms of public advocacy. In Parliament the various kinds of influence are inextricably entwined, and the service leaders are the targets as well as sources of attempts at influence.

The nature of the market for strategic ideas in Britain and its relation to official processes is ill understood, but the higher temperature of military affairs under Sandys made it somewhat easier than usual to discern the cruder patterns.<sup>47</sup> By their very character the points at issue were conducive to public debate. The basic question of nuclear deterrence, and the shortage of manpower, had a deceptive simplicity which encouraged lay discussion; and the simplicity of doctrine which permitted Sandys to seize the reins also gave scope to his critics. Quite apart from service grievances, the White Papers of 1957 and 1958 and particularly the latter's willingness to contemplate the initial use of strategic nuclear weapons, aroused considerable public misgiving. Some public fears paralleled those of the services—fears of overspending on deterrence, duplication of American efforts, failure to provide tactical nuclear weapons, neglect of conventional forces in size, equipment and airlift—while others, such as those of the effect of policy on prospects for disarmament or the ill-defined state of doctrine for the use of tactical nuclear weapons, were less frequently heard on service lips. There was also considerable criticism of a tendency to hold on to widely scattered bases, the role of which was not clear in the light of the reliance on mobile reserves and of diminishing imperial responsibilities. Thus The Economist spoke sarcastically of "the dogged construction of NAAFI clubs and married families quarters at distant staging posts that are summarily discarded . . ."<sup>48</sup> But this was not particularly felt to be characteristic of Sandys' influence, perhaps the contrary.

Service demonstrations of dissent reinforced unofficial anxiety by providing evidence of specific grievances and, perhaps even more, simply by revealing the existence of general professional unrest, of which these partial glimpses may even have given an exaggerated notion. The Times commented eloquently on the dangers of this at the time of General Cowley's outburst. Admitting the undesirability of every senior officer repeatedly holding forth in public, the Times continued:

It would be equally dangerous on the other hand, if none of them was ever allowed to express an honest criticism publicly. But we have come perilously close to this in recent years. There has been no way for the public to know whether or not crucial defense decisions were being taken against the advice of the Government's professional military advisers. Strategy has had to be accepted in a vacuum. Public opinion has been denied its tensity of feeling may have distorted as well as intensified the normal pattern.

<sup>48</sup> March 7, 1959. On the subject of bases there is an exhaustive Princeton doctoral dissertation by Lt. Col. C. Dewitt Armstrong, U.S.A., "British Policy Toward Strategic Bases," 1959.

<sup>46</sup> A text of the Cowley lecture is in the RUSI Journal, February, 1960. An exchange in the House of Commons, in which the new rules on clearance were stated, is in H.C. Debs., Nov. 11, 1959, cols. 378 ff. While the Cowley lecture was the most sensational single Army effort, the most solid presentation of the Army case was the Army League report, The British Army in the Nuclear Age (London, 1959), edited by Richard Goold Adams. Another Army officer's complaint was that of Brigadier Fernyhough, Director of Ammunition Stores, who made a report referring to the absence of a practical war plan and to the alleged fact that "in relation to its small size and large commitments, the British Army must be one of the worst equipped in the world. Yet the Treasury continues to urge us, with loud cries, to avoid overinsurance." See H. C. Debs., Feb. 29, 1960, cols. 915-17.

<sup>47</sup> It should be observed that the unusual in-proper part because there has been no access to the views of the senior officers of the three services.<sup>49</sup>

Press comment on defense matters in general was frequent and lively, though spasmodic during these years. The so-called quality press<sup>50</sup> paid particular attention to defense. Certain individuals, the defense correspondent of the Times, Alastair Buchan<sup>51</sup> of the Observer and the defense writers of the Guardian and Economist, became especially prominent in maintaining a drumfire of sceptical comments on official doctrine and in drawing attention to military unrest. Certain of the more popular papers were perhaps the most fertile in publication of the various leaks. Press comment was not, of course, uniformly opposed to the Government. The Daily Telegraph and Sunday Times fairly staunchly defended official policy, the Times chiefly criticised overemphasis on deterrence, while the Observer and Guardian went much further and appeared ready to abandon the deterrent should that be the only way to refurbish conventional forces. By late 1958 the press comment was overwhelmingly critical in one way or another. The prestige papers, above all the Times, were also the vehicles for correspondence on military affairs, which a number of well qualified students of British affairs believe to have perhaps even greater influence in sowing doubt in official minds than editorial comment.<sup>52</sup>

The press embodies a considerable number of that small group of professional and semi-professional students of defense who are perhaps best described as commentators. There has in point of fact been a small discussion group called the Commentator's Circle, with Liddell Hart as head, which is credited with no little influence in developing informed opinion and coloring the tone of the mass media. The notion of commentator embraces the leading defense correspondents, such eminent military historians as Liddell Hart, and articulate retired officers such as Sir John Slessor and Sir Anthony Buzzard, together with such politicians as Richard Crossman, George Wigg and John Strachey who write and engage in journalistic debate. These would also rank high among the contributors to such specialized journals as that of RUSI, International Affairs and Air Power, or to general periodicals like Encounter, in which an extended series on the theme of "Their Bomb and Ours" attracted much attention in 1958.

In some respects a broader extension of the concept of a commentator's circle is the Institute for Strategic Studies set up in 1958, and intended both to further study of military affairs and to bring together people concerned with military affairs from varying points of view. The Council of the I.S.S. contains several of the most influential commentators. The I.S.S. has apparently won greater countenance from those officially engaged in military and foreign affairs than is common for private bodies in England; it includes a number of senior officials among its members and enjoys the favor of the present Chief of the Defence Staff. From time to time the I.S.S. is used for briefing sessions in which official information is confidentially conveyed. This is thought to serve the dual purpose of broadening support for policies which are based on information not suitable for general dissemination—the "scrambling" performance of the V-bomber force being an example. In return the audience receives more substance for its unofficial assessments and may presumably hope that its own views may not be without influence on the officials.

This kind of activity is a particularly clear illustration of the way in which the roles of publicist and confidential adviser may blend. Even the press may have its direct influence on the important officials as well as its general effect on the tone of public opinion. Thus there may be combined in a single person or organisation types of influence ranging all the way from the undoubted achievement of the Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament in raising the level of public attention to military questions by the most overt possible activities to the contribution that confidential representations by the Society of British Aircraft Constructors are said to make to resisting the elimination of aircraft.<sup>53</sup> Parliament itself, the single most im-

<sup>49</sup> Times, November 12, 1959. On the effect of secrecy on trust in the Government, see the exchange between Sandys and Brown, H.C. Debs., Feb. 11, 1957, cols. 1155 ff.

<sup>50</sup> Which might be said to comprise the Times, Daily Telegraph, Guardian, Financial Times, Observer and Sunday Times, together with the weekly Economist, New Statesman, Spectator, Time and Tide, Tribune, and the New Scientist.

<sup>51</sup> Since 1958 Director of the Institute for Strategic Studies.

<sup>52</sup> Captain Liddell Hart, for example, firmly maintains that a well written critical letter to the Times does more to influence leading civil servants than a wealth of books or articles.

<sup>53</sup> The general mode of operation of such interest groups in Britain has been much clarified in recent years by the works of Ivor Jennings, S. E. Finer, Sam Beer, and J. D. Stewart. The effect of the arms industry is still an obscure issue much beclouded by old emotions. Equally hard to evaluate is the coincidence between strategic views portant sounding board for opinion on military affairs, is at the same time the scene of much confidential interchange.

Because the formal legislative and financial powers of Parliament are under the effective control of the government these days, Parliament's influence on defense policy depends chiefly on the quality of the arguments it can generate and the attention it can secure for them. The difference between Parliament and Congress in this respect is perhaps not as large as one might think, for we have recently become aware of how rarely Congress directly enforces a change in American military policy.<sup>54</sup> It is rather in Parliament's lack of Congressional resources for securing information that its chief disadvantage lies. George Brown, then defense spokesman for the Labour Party, has gone so far as to declare that "in this area, we are given so little information in the House, less I rather think, than anywhere in any democratic country in the world . . ."<sup>55</sup> This difficulty has repeatedly drawn comment and has led to proposals for a specialized committee on the American pattern, or at least for examination of the service Estimates before a select committee.<sup>56</sup> Such a device would not only provide information but also enable Members to make use of what they know without fear of damaging the national security.<sup>57</sup>

The expedient of secret briefings for leaders of the opposition, tried under the Labour Government, was soon abandoned by Churchill on the ground that it unduly hampered criticism, and an offer of similar consultations made during the reorganizations of 1958 was immediately rejected by Gaitskell for the same reason. The prejudice on all sides against private communication of official information seems reinforced by distaste for characteristics of the American system associated with Congressional independence, as well as by the desire of all parties to enjoy the fruits of executive privacy in power.<sup>58</sup> Such information as is received other than openly from government pronouncements therefore comes from the public media and from the leaks and private channels mentioned earlier. Occasionally Ministers informally give a courtesy briefing to their opposite numbers in the shadow cabinet, but this, by all accounts, is usually advance notice of an imminent public announcement and never in the nature of prior consultation. The White Papers on defense, particularly the routine annual issues, are frequently envied in the United States<sup>59</sup> but though they do offer the advantage advocated by certain leading, articulate, retired officers, and the kinds of equipment manufactured by firms of which they are directors. The fact that many of the retired officers most respected as commentators are connected with armaments firms is sometimes said to be due to their advantage in keeping up with technical developments, but it seems at least equally probable that it is their articulateness or reputation as publicists which secures them the favor of manufacturers. Most of these pundits, one notices, are drawn from the R.A.F. or the Navy, the "weapons services." For a reference to this at the highest level see Sir Frederick Brundrett's speech to the R.U.S.I., March 16, 1961. Sir Frederick was Chief Scientist to the Ministry of Defence until December, 1959 and closely associated with the Blue Streak. Quite apart from vested interests there are of course powerful arguments for the preservation of an aircraft industry on grounds of employment and the export trade.

<sup>54</sup> See for instance Roger Hilsman, "Congressional-Executive Relations and the Foreign Policy Consensus," this REVIEW, Sept., 1958, and, since completion of this paper, S. P. Huntington, The Common Defense (New York, 1961).

<sup>55</sup> H.C. Debs., Dec. 13, 1960, col. 226.

<sup>56</sup> See F. J. Bellenger's suggestion, H.C. Debs., Feb. 26, 1958, col. 427, that of W. Wyatt on April 27, 1960, H.C. Debs., col. 288, and Gaitskell's complaint, H.C. Debs., March 1, 1960, col. 1140. Wyatt was concerned that "We are handicapped at present in this country because we have no adequate machinery for going into these highly important but complex and technical matters in any satisfactory way."

<sup>57</sup> When, in their intermittent checks, the committees on Estimates and Public Accounts have examined military affairs, they have several times recently revealed inefficiencies in the handling of research and development and in the organization of administration.

<sup>58</sup> In contrast to which the CID had a certain amount of bipartisan representation in early days.

<sup>59</sup> E.g., "all the relevant details in ten pages or less." Laurence Levine, Appendix, p. 144, in T. Stanley, American Defense and National Security (Washington, 1956).

It is interesting to notice that during the period of fullest commitment to the Sandys policy, the White Papers of 1957, and particularly 1958, contained long theoretical expositions of the relation between force and foreign policy. As promotion of the pure form of the doctrine has weakened, so the Papers have reverted to factual descriptions of the defense measures taken. On the other hand, as a dubious tribute to increased public attention to defense, the 1961 White Paper contains a large number of pictorial graphs to emphasize the logic of the Government's policy.

of a single focus for debate, informed British observers believe they are as much a vehicle for deception as for enlightenment, and at best a partisan brief. Scepticism has gone to the length of a proposal for issuing White Papers only quinquennially or at important departures, for some critics feel that the need to produce an annual report encourages over-dramatization and a search for illusory achievements.<sup>60</sup>

The unofficial contacts of politicians outside the government with officers and civil servants are reportedly more numerous and intimate with Conservatives than Labour, and, consequently, a Conservative opposition may be better informed than a Labour one. The chief alternative sources of the opposition are the press, certain recently retired officials, authors, private commentators and a small number of Members especially interested in and informed about Defence. George Wigg, a veritable mine of information, is a preeminent Labour example of the last. A considerable number of references in debate to expert writings are to American commentators, reflecting the paucity of English equivalents,<sup>61</sup> while the flow of information about United States policy provides facts about matters of allied concern and technological information which can be applied to British circumstances.

Lack of information is undoubtedly a handicap to the opposition, though it probably does not undermine their arguments to the extent that governments not unnaturally suggest. Some would say that a more serious limitation on the effectiveness of Parliament as a forum is the surprisingly small number of Members who show much really sustained interest in military affairs.<sup>62</sup> Despite the common idea that the House of Lords is a superior senate of experience, very few indeed of the myriad ex-service peers use their right to debate, to an extent which has drawn direct reproachful comment in the Lords itself.<sup>63</sup> Moreover, parliamentary attention to defense is heavily concentrated in the first half of the year under influence of the schedule for the White Paper and budget, and many feel that Government frequently escapes sustained attack as a result of this, of adjournments, and of the pressure of other issues on parliamentary time. It is revealing to note that when forming his governments, Sir Anthony Eden regarded the parliamentary duties of the Minister of Defence as exceptionally light.<sup>64</sup>

In the workings of the present Labour Opposition the formal committees of the Parliamentary Party, though much used to register differences, are apparently not the forums for a great deal of debate, still less for the formulation of the leader's policy or sifting of information. There is a committee of members of the Shadow Cabinet holding the ghostly defense and foreign affairs portfolios, and at Transport House a defense adviser, serves the whole Party. But far and away the most influential body would seem to be a confidential committee gathered by the shadow defense minister, comprising two or three congenial Members of Parliament, with a small entourage of commentators and informants, supplemented from time to time by special working parties. This device is useful not only to inform and advise the leaders but also to avoid the pressures of internal party differences.

This recalls that there are centers of dissenting opinion in Parliament other than the Opposition front bench. In the Labour party the nuclear disarmers have been an obvious influence on the climate of debate. George Wigg and Richard Crossman have formed the nucleus of another line of criticism both of Government and official Opposition policy, standing out for greater emphasis on conventional forces and maintaining the impracticability of both the strategic and tactical nuclear elements of existing policies.<sup>65</sup> Critics of this kind are inclined to say that the official Labour leaders have tried to maintain a monolithic allegiance to front bench views akin to that sought by Sandys himself. Certainly Gaitskell made several efforts to suppress Wigg's criticism of official Opposition policy, especially as enunciated by John Strachey, and Crossman was ousted from the Shadow Cabinet, partly for his failure to support an Opposition amendment in the defense debate of 1960. The damage such dissidence may do to the effectiveness

<sup>60</sup> The Paper of 1959 was dubbed by The Economist "Blank White Paper"; cf. Daily Telegraph, Feb. 7, 1958, and H. C. Debs., Feb. 26, 1958, cols. 561-4; Feb. 29, 1960, col. 903.

<sup>61</sup> The debate in the Lords on March 5, 1958, is full of examples of this, H. L. Debs., cols. 1095 ff.

<sup>62</sup> The Bow Group, a collection of young Conservative thinkers, is said to have found it difficult to recruit a working party to prepare a study on defense to match their publications on other topics.

<sup>63</sup> H. L. Debs., March 5, 1958, col. 1248.

<sup>64</sup> Full Circle, p. 354. The intensification of interest in defense matters in the last few years, however, might lead him to modify that assessment.

<sup>65</sup> See especially their joint articles in the New Statesman, May 14, June 11, 1960.

of an opposition is hard to assess, but there seems little doubt that the present Conservative Government has been greatly relieved of need to reexamine and justify its policy by the conflict of views among its critics, which prevents the emergence of an image of a clear-cut alternative policy.<sup>66</sup>

As it happened, the leaders of the Labour Party did not seem to want to advance a policy much different from the Conservatives. While they joined in criticism that the Government placed excessive faith in deterrence and opposed the prospect of initiating the use of nuclear weapons, the Labour front bench was unwilling to accept the onus of continued conscription or higher expenditure.

The degree of agreement which existed between the two front benches was paralleled by a similarly cross-bench alliance of critics who particularly deplored the neglect of conventional forces. This alliance produced harmonious mutual support in debate between such otherwise dissimilar individuals as George Wigg and Antony Head, Sandys' predecessor. Indeed, disgruntled Conservative back-benchers have as good a claim as the Opposition to have resisted the Government in recent years. Supposedly, dissent within the governing party often does more to give a British government pause than the attacks of the official opposition, for such criticism comes from relatively trusted sources and raises a threat to the effectiveness and enthusiasm of the party. When such dissent becomes public, it weakens the impression of confident official policy based on inside information that is so discouraging to the opposition. A number of Conservative back-benchers have enjoyed a special reputation for wisdom on defense matters during the Sandys era, among them Fitzroy Maclean, Viscount Lambton, Nigel Birch and Antony Head. These offered a natural focus for criticism among those, probably more numerous among Conservatives than Labour, who normally took an interest in military affairs and maintained an association with one or other of the services.<sup>67</sup> Head's disagreement with official policy was well known as a result of his resignation, but, in the Tory tradition, he behaved with great discretion and for some time limited himself to private remonstrances and to remarks in party committees. In 1958, however, something of an open Conservative revolt began against the trend of official policy and, in the debate on reorganization, Head partially unfolded the story of his resignation. While the facts had long been suspected, this explicit and undeniably well informed account came with all the more telling effect against the normal fog of secrecy penetrated only by hearsay. By 1961 unrest had gone far enough for a Young Conservative convention deliberately to avoid giving a vote of confidence in Government policy.<sup>68</sup>

VI. THE RETREAT FROM SANDYS

By the beginning of 1959, when the critics were in full cry, a number of practical challenges to British policy had arisen to encourage second thoughts. The expedition to Jordan the previous summer had emphasized deficiencies in the conventional forces needed for such operations. Technologically, developments made the Government reconsider both its emphasis on deterrence and the means for implementing it. Estimates for the Blue Streak proved grossly inadequate, the cost of putting it underground alone having almost doubled, while demonstrations of Soviet accuracy with missiles cast doubt on the whole idea of fixed bases. Amendment of the MacMahon Act in 1958 also provided information about the alarming array of expensive devices being developed as countermeasures and aids to penetration. More encouraging news of Polaris now become available, along with progress on the projected Skybolt airborne missile. The personal stake of the officials intimately associated with Blue Streak, the money already invested, the space research possibilities of the missile and the residual lack of naval enthusiasm for Polaris all precluded a rapid change of policy. Nor was the technical situation absolutely clear. But at the beginning of 1959 a reassess-

<sup>66</sup> Unfortunately for the Labour Party, of course, its constitution and its ideological bent tend to compel it to try to draw up a coherent policy despite frequent pleas that an opposition is only obliged to criticize.

<sup>67</sup> Retired officers, particularly from the Army, are numerous in the Commons and were especially alarmed by reductions in manpower. On the subject of retired officers, mention should be made of such service-related interest groups as the Navy and Army Leagues. With the exception of such special efforts as the Army League's occasional study reports—and the unique but elusive influence of the service clubs—these organizations would not seem to be sufficiently up to date in their thinking to contribute much to the supply of ideas, though they may have some restraining influence on the desire to eliminate established formations. See Armstrong, op. cit., pp. 101-2.

<sup>68</sup> Sunday Times, February 26, 1961; and see Viscount Lambton's privately printed pamphlet, Inadequacy, 1961.

ment commenced, the Blue Streak was cut back to ten emplacements, and a committee under Sir Richard Powell, Permanent Secretary to the Ministry of Defence, undertook a review of the deterrent program.

The tendency of British military planners and civil servants is to deny that public criticism has much effect on their recommendations. By the time events have stimulated such comment, it is said, the same stimulus has set on foot official studies which are more prompt and better informed. But even the proudest claimants for professional imperviousness agree that public sources and debate influence their political chiefs. Certainly it seems beyond question that press and Parliamentary criticism reinforced the case for reassessment at this time. The course of debate in Parliament supports this judgment by the frequency of references to well known commentators and the energy devoted to arguing as to whose side of the question particular pundits supported. One can often trace a notion from a commentator in one year, to the lips of a Parliamentary critic in the next, and to the White Paper or ministerial speech in the third. One of the clearest, though perhaps unintentional, tributes to the role of public debate was paid by Watkinson when, in defending the time taken to decide on abandonment of Blue Streak, he explained that, "Of course the decision was a narrowly balanced one. All big decisions are. Among the surrounding experts, the advisers, the newspaper correspondents, and so on, there are conflicting views."<sup>69</sup>

The abandonment of Blue Streak for military purposes, announced on April 13, 1960, had been foreshadowed by the annual White Paper earlier in the year.<sup>70</sup> The Government still clung to the principle of a national deterrent and both the prospective American airborne ballistic missile Skybolt and, for a later stage, the Polaris, were spoken of as the means to preserve British nuclear power after the Mk. II V-bomber armed with the free-falling missile, Blue Steel, had had its day. But official language adopted the phrase "independent contribution to the Western deterrent" and some observers believed the Government was resigned to the ultimate abandonment of a national deterrent, a policy already formally adopted by the Labour leadership. Certainly the trend was in the direction advocated by the Government's long-time critics, and official spokesmen now spoke more warmly of conventional forces as an essential component in the deterrent role played by the armed forces as a whole.<sup>71</sup>

This did not serve to scotch criticism, however, that now turned increasingly from the delusiveness of the deterrent to the inadequacies of conventional forces both in numbers and arms. The Government met these charges in part by some fairly blatant juggling of the figures, but once more a number of practical tests arose to lend credence to the criticisms. Unrest in Central Africa in 1960, the Kuwait expedition, and, above all, the Berlin crisis of August 1961, all drew attention to shortages of men and munitions. The Berlin crisis revealed that to prepare for the possible need for substantially reinforcing the Rhine Army, already reduced to a nominal 55,000, and actually well below strength, the Government had to seek legislation to retain the remaining conscripts and prepare to recall those recently discharged. Moreover, the Government admitted that the 165,000-man Army, when achieved, would not be "balanced", thus confirming charges that the CSC had not succeeded in creating an order of battle below the figures for which they had originally fought with Sandys. This a Conservative Member described as "the collapse of the Government's five year defence plan, six months before it was due to end."<sup>72</sup>

Despite the triumphal cries of the advocates of conscription, the Government resisted this solution and, while showing some interest in selective service, pinned its faith initially on a renewed drive for recruits—linked to a scheme for technical education—and on an attempt to raise a small, well-paid reserve of some 30,000, that was to make possible "expanding and contracting the Army in conformity with changing demands upon it."<sup>73</sup> A special study had already been set up under the CDS during the summer, to review military commitments and this was now supplemented by a group under the retiring CIGS, instructed to take a fresh look at prospects for further integration of the services.<sup>74</sup>

Along with these modifications of the substance of policy, beginning in 1959, there has also been a distinct effort to meet the com-

<sup>71</sup> See the defense debate, Feb. 29, March 1, 1960, H. C. Debs., cols., 846-1168.

<sup>72</sup> Fitzroy Maclean, H. C. Debs., Nov. 1, 1961, col. 218.

<sup>73</sup> H. C. Debs., Nov. 1, 1961, col. 203 ff.

<sup>74</sup> The 1961 White Paper, Cmnd. 1288, had made a gesture toward integration by abandoning the classifications of land, sea and air, and adopting those of "the nuclear force" and "the conventional force."

<sup>69</sup> H. C. Debs., April 27, 1960, col. 237.

<sup>70</sup> Cmnd. 952.

plaints of undue authoritarianism and to improve the tone of official dealings. Duncan Sandys' forceful personality was always an important element in events during his tenure and his translation to the new Ministry of Aviation after the election of 1959 (where he was to knock together the heads of the aircraft industry rather than the CSC) did much to change the atmosphere. His successor, Harold Watkinson, seemed anxious for more amicable relationships and opened the 1960 defense debate with a general tribute to the CSC. Not much less important was the entry as CDS of Admiral of the Fleet Viscount Mountbatten who, by no means dedicated to the R.A.F. and certainly not to Duncan Sandys, apparently began a rapid and adept campaign to soothe ruffled feelings all around.

At about the same time as Sandys' departure there occurred another important but very little noticed development: the appointment in September 1959 of an officer of equal rank to the Service Directors of Plans as Director of Plans to the CDS and as Chairman of the Joint Planning Committee.<sup>75</sup> This continued the process of fully equipping the CDS to take an independent initiative in planning and, by creating the machinery for giving the joint planning teams coherent terms of reference based on an interservice viewpoint, went far toward the method advocated years earlier by Montgomery.<sup>76</sup>

With the new Director as independent chairman, the DPC thus formed a microcosm of the new form of the CSC. There was some question as to whether this development would strengthen or weaken the Minister of Defence in relation to the professional military, and the answer would depend on how the undoubtedly reinforced CDS employed his new instrument. Within the service ministries there were also some misgivings as to whether the new office would not be used to prejudice the work of the joint planning teams in directions favored by the CDS. In practice, however, Mountbatten has apparently taken great pains to see that all sources of ideas are tapped and are known to be tapped. Before meetings of the Plans Committee to consider the drafts which planning teams have produced in consultation with the services and the Foreign, Colonial and Commonwealth

Relations Offices, the independent Chairman secures other neutral views from the military, scientific and civil staffs in the Ministry of Defence. Similarly, before meetings of the CSC, the CDS receives not only the recommendations of the JPS but also his Director's own view and his preview of the services' positions. In addition, the CDS is briefed by his personal staff, which contains representatives of each service,<sup>77</sup> and by the Permanent Secretary and Chief Scientist or their representatives. Moreover the CDS has the habit of very freely bringing interested parties, particularly from the civil service, into the CSC to avoid any appearance of a closed military shop. The presence of the Director of Plans to CDS in the Ministry is said to have improved relations between the civil and military components of the defense establishment, whilst his attendance at all meetings of the CSC has ensured a more direct and healthier relationship between the CSC and the JPS.<sup>78</sup>

As a result of all this, those involved in joint planning now feel that there is a freer flow of ideas, a more trustful atmosphere and a better blend of a variety of views and interests than at any time since 1945. It is also said that since the appointment of an independent chairman no "split" papers have been sent forward by the joint planning committee.<sup>79</sup> This is not to say, however, that the problems of planning have been solved. For one thing, now that the failure of the Blue Streak project has cast a blight on the first flush of enthusiasm for deterrence as a panacea, and no service is yet confident that it has its hands on a substitute, the issues of defense policy are momentarily not such as to stimulate a wholehearted contest. Thus the improved lot of the Army can be regarded as symptomatic of more balanced, coherent strategic thought, but it may also be in part a return to the old "fair shares" arrangement—which might well be expected at a period of doctrinal poverty and under the conciliatory successor to a doctrinaire Minister. Should this be the case the next era of innovation or

<sup>77</sup> This is a very small staff indeed. Service representatives double as the CDS's personal briefer on a geographical area.

<sup>78</sup> The service members of the JPC may also be invited to attend certain meetings of the CSC.

<sup>79</sup> Liaison with the Foreign Office on the mutual implications of military and diplomatic policy is said to have improved since the Permanent Under-Secretary's Department, which handles liaison with the CSC and Ministry of Defence, has established, in 1959, a stronger section for long-term planning.

<sup>75</sup> The first officer appointed, Air Commodore F. E. Rosier, had been Director of Plans in the Air Ministry.

<sup>76</sup> The JPC still reports to the CSC. But the CDS can initiate studies, informing the CSC, and the cover note to plans originated by the CDS makes reference to this initiative.

economy may reveal that the new planning system is as subject to disputes and ill feeling as the old. The performance of the new system under such a strain will, indeed, be the only adequate basis on which to judge it.

For the moment, however, it seems reasonable to conclude that the Sandys' era definitely strengthened the tendency toward centralization in British defense policy and left Watkinson, even without his predecessor's vigorous personality, in firmer control of policy than Antony Head had been. At the same time, however, deliberate and apparently successful efforts are being made to reconcile this centralization with a flow of ideas and a freedom of debate much greater than under Sandys.

VII. THE "SANDYS ERA" AND STRATEGIC DEBATE

Whether Fitzroy Maclean was right when he said that Sandys' policy had collapsed will probably always remain open to argument. By 1962 the strategic nuclear force still existed, expenditure was being held down, universal military service had gone and the Army was much reduced. On the other hand, hardly anyone now relied on the nuclear force to perform the prodigies Sandys had forecast, and the small Army now sought after was to derive its efficiency as much from highly mobile conventional strength as from the nuclear capacity envisaged in 1957. Yet it could be argued that it took the shock of Sandys to stimulate the acceptance of the newer concept. As to whether the dogmatism of Sandys' approach made for undue rigidity in reacting to later information and ideas, it could be said that three or four years is not long to prove a policy. Yet undoubtedly the era did give rise to an unpleasant amount of figure-juggling and evasion, creating the unhealthy impression that defense was being made secondary to politics, in the narrower sense of party, and that changes of policy by speech were only occasionally accompanied by action. On balance it seems in retrospect that a less wholehearted plunge into strategic nuclear weapons would have been more consonant with the probable future development of British defense policy.<sup>80</sup>

It would be foolish to venture a prediction of the 1962 White Paper before it is published. Major changes in British defense policy have come about during the last five years when some aspect already under debate has encountered at least a partial practical test or obstacle, as with Suez or the rising costs of the Blue Streak. The Berlin crisis was such an occasion and already has accelerated modification of the Sandys' policy. The indications at the end of 1961 were for further development of the proposals for reserve forces, yet another increase in emphasis on airlift and mobility for conventional forces, and an initial measure of integration in research and development, especially perhaps if new generations of aircraft are to be approved. Two apparently divergent interests, that of the Foreign Office in pursuing further integration of NATO—related to the decision to apply to the Common Market—and a simultaneous ambition to develop Britain's pretension to be a center for military and strategic training for the newer nations—a conference on defense administration at Oxford in 1961 being perhaps the forerunner of a permanent program—might also be reflected in the paper, and it might not be beyond ingenuity to blend the two, integration in Europe releasing energy for the global task.

Within the official British defense establishment it seems probable that there will be further centralization of planning if not of execution, a continuation of the trend represented by "military statesmen" of the Mountbatten type and increased participation of civilian experts such as the Permanent Secretary, the Chief Scientist, and their staffs in matters once regarded as purely the concern of military officers. Following development of the Joint Staff, greater attention to long-range planning may lead to a department for fundamental military research of the kind Liddell Hart has long advocated. In general, recent reforms seem to have been aimed at harnessing the driving force of the political leaders without losing the benefits of professional staff work.

One noteworthy contrast with the United States is the absence in Great Britain of the semi-official research groups, such as the RAND Corporation or the Institute for Defense Analyses, to broaden the range of talent and variety of viewpoints on which the services and government can draw, and to serve as a link between the "insiders" and the wider market for strategic ideas. There is also a relative lack of academic interest in national security policy. One symptom of this is the heavy reliance of British politicians upon American authors for their arguments. Indeed one might wonder whether such Labour leaders as Denis Healey have not overdone this and acquired opinions—favorable observers would say sophistication—which partly accounts for their losing touch with the sentiments of many of their followers.

<sup>80</sup> It should not go unsaid that, as a secondary Power, Britain was handicapped by the need to conform in part to American policy at a time when it was not very clear what this was.

There is undoubtedly a good deal of prejudice in Britain against anything which seems to be a breach in the principle of keeping affairs within the official family. The disadvantages of such openness as is practiced in the United States for security and discipline are obvious enough. Less frequently acknowledged are the liabilities of a closed system which obscures the proper basis of debate, encourages rumor and constrains the exchange of ideas between the professionals and intelligent observers. In practice it is clear that contacts between official and unofficial interested parties do take place, if haphazardly, and journalists do find grist for their mill. A more open acknowledgment of the relationship between the inner and outer sections of the market therefore, might not only make the creative resources of a wider range of talent available to those in charge of policy, but also relieve them of some of the difficulties which arise from criticism which is ill-founded and from the rumor which ostentatious reticence nourishes.

It thus seems possible that, paradoxically, one of the more promising areas in which to look for improving the British defense machinery may lie outside the machine itself, in the encouragement of closer attention to questions of national security both by officially countenanced, specialised consultants, and by a wider attentive public.<sup>81</sup> Education of the wider public in questions of fundamental strategy seems particularly desirable, not only on grounds of democratic theory during an age when technology increasingly demands delegation of fateful decisions, but also because so many of the government's problems revolve around the question of what the public can be induced to support. Even in Great Britain, despite the towering authority of the Prime Minister and his dominance over the legislature, the government needs a high degree of consensus among both services and public if the execution of its policies is to be wholehearted and sustained. The government may be formally unassailable, yet it needs the ultimate approbation of an attentive audience from which it can seldom permanently hide its performance, and from whose stock of ideas it cannot insulate itself. Nor should it try. For here may lie germs of dissent and innovation from which will spring the doctrine of tomorrow. Though there must be decision, it should be decision tempered by the freest possible flow of thought in the widest market compatible with national security: a limit likely to be generous on the more fundamental questions of strategy. Thus if, however unjustifiably, the Blue Streak is coming to be regarded as a monument to the dangers of dogmatism in the conduct of defense policy, the myth may yet prove a salutary one.

the pretentious apparatus with which some American military experts surround themselves may not be justified. But none of the unofficial British commentators I have talked to doubt the need for this kind of activity in principle.

<sup>81</sup> This is not to say that the scepticism of many British military officers and commentators as to

CONGRESSIONAL INNOVATION AND INTERVENTION IN DEFENSE POLICY: LEGISLATIVE AUTHORIZATION OF WEAPONS SYSTEMS*

RAYMOND H. DAWSON

The University of North Carolina

Students of congressional-executive relations have long recognized the weakness of legislative oversight of the Executive, and in few areas of public policy has this weakness been more pronounced than in national defense. A recent and significant change in this relationship was made when the 86th Congress in 1959 imposed upon a reluctant executive and military establishment a major innovation in the established processes of making defense policy. The innovation was deliberately intended to alter the balance in executive-congressional controls over some strategic decisions, and was in the form of a new requirement for legislative authorization of the principal weapons programs of the military services. Designated the Russell amendment, it was incorporated into the Military Construction Authorization Act for Fiscal 1960 as Section 412(b) and directed that No funds may be appropriated after December 31, 1960, to or for the use of any armed force of the United States for the procurement of aircraft, missiles, or naval vessels unless the appropriation of such funds has been authorized by legislation enacted after such date.<sup>1</sup>

This terse stipulation served to break the monopoly long held by the annual Department of Defense Appropriations Act as the single regular confrontation of Congress, as a decision-making participant through its appropriations committees, with the complex of strategic issues and choices contained in defense policy. In adopting the practice that has—notwithstanding objections—governed its foreign aid policy determination since the war, Congress reversed the long-standing custom of generalized authorization on a continuing basis for major procurement by the armed forces. It made a substantial and critical proportion of the defense budget subject to review by the legislative committees, by means of the requirement of a prior legislative authorization intended to operate on an annual basis.<sup>2</sup> Section 412, in effect, represents an attempt by key legislative spokesmen in the defense area to reorder the formal process of policy-making in a manner which, by broadening the span of control and jurisdiction of the Committees on the Armed Services, will enhance the power of Congress.

Students of military affairs have paid relatively little attention to the role of Congress and the legislative functions in defense policy-making.<sup>3</sup> There is a general assumption that Congress must be involved at some level in certain kinds of military decisions, but rarely as a constructive or significant participant. Its negativism, its preoccupation with detail and with marginal concerns, are duly noted,<sup>4</sup> and attention then turns to the executive and the military. Certainly the tendencies toward negativism, and the fixation with incidentals rather than with the major questions of policy choices, are real enough. However, such studies as those of Hilsman and Huntington<sup>5</sup> have pointed the way to a more explicit recognition of the legislative functions in the political processes of defense, and to the fact that the role of Congress, although subordinate, adds an important and distinctive element. An analysis of the origins and initial experience

<sup>2</sup> For fiscal 1962, when it requested $43,794,345,000 in new obligational authority in the Defense Appropriation Bill, the administration was required under Section 412 to seek new legislative authorization for $11,974,800,000 for major weapons procurement.

<sup>3</sup> See the discussion of Richard C. Snyder and James A. Robinson in National and International Decision-Making: A Report to the Committee on Research for Peace (New York: Institute for International Order, 1961), pp. 84-85, 145-148.

<sup>4</sup> Not unusual in this respect is the treatment of Congress vis à vis the military by Morris Janowitz in The Professional Soldier: A Social and Political Portrait (Glencoe, 1960), pp. 354-360, which he entitles "Congressional Negativism."

<sup>5</sup> Roger Hilsman, "Congressional-Executive Relations and the Foreign Policy Consensus," this REVIEW, Vol. 52 (September, 1958), pp. 725ff.; and Samuel P. Huntington, "Strategic Planning and the Political Process," Foreign Affairs, Vol. 38 (January, 1960), pp. 285ff.

* This is a part of a research project begun as a postdoctoral fellow of the Merzhon National Security Program at Ohio State University. The project has also had assistance from The University Research Council, University of North Carolina.

<sup>1</sup> Public Law 86-149. 73 Stat. 322. Italics added.

under Section 412 provides some additional insights into this role, and into the conditions of an active and effective legislative intervention in strategic decisions.<sup>5a</sup>

I. THE ROLE OF CONGRESS IN STRATEGIC DECISIONS: HYPOTHESES SUGGESTED BY THE AUTHORIZATION REQUIREMENT

A significant aspect of this episode was that, contrary to the more usual practice of expanding delegations of authority to the armed forces in a time of military danger and an atmosphere of "preparedness," Section 412 had the effect of rescinding or delimiting their authority simultaneously with a growing anxiety over such a danger. It could be argued from the timing of the move—coming from a Democratic Congress in the late stages of the second term of a Republican President whose judgment in military matters seemed invincibly popular—that Section 412 was the result of a temporary excess of partisanship. But the determined implementation of the device by a Democratic Congress in 1961, in the face of a world crisis and expanding military programs, is evidence of more than a cyclical zeal.

Also, the factor of inter-committee rivalry—the resentment by some Armed Forces Committee members of the preeminence of Appropriations—could be adduced as an important factor behind the adoption of Section 412. But though this element was certainly present, the fact remains that the leadership of what we may call the "412 movement" came from a group of senators who served on both committees in that chamber.

Partisanship and committee competition thus cannot adequately account for this departure from well established methods and procedures. This study will attempt to show that Section 412 is the product, basically, of a sense of restiveness among congressional leaders in the area of defense policy, particularly in the Senate. This restiveness has grown out of their dissatisfaction with the course of events in the military establishment, the evident inability or disinclination of the administration to order matters more to their liking, and their own sense of helplessness in the legislative branch to influence military policy decisions, except by negative restraints that are of little significance in a period of international tension. Dissatisfaction, gradually accumulating over a period of years, created among these leaders a frame of mind receptive to a search for new techniques and devices which could redress in some measure the disparity in executive-congressional powers over military affairs, provide Congress with a more effective means of evaluating executive policy, and supply methods by which correctives sought by Congress might be applied.

Besides this general hypothesis of mood, the series of events leading to the imposition of the weapons authorization requirement also suggests that the likelihood of Congressional intervention in strategic policy questions in any specific instance is maximized under these circumstances:

(1) When technology and doctrine are in flux so that there is no standard orthodoxy, and, as a result, many important decisions must be reached on the basis of political as well as technical criteria;

(2) When the military services advance opposing doctrines, and thereby divulge derogatory information about rival programs, or, in the interests of mutually protective harmony, pursue such evidently duplicating programs that members of Congress are enabled to raise embarrassing questions and gain a foothold for action;

(3) When forceful committee chairmen in Congress, and senior members of these bodies, can match the administration's political executives at the Pentagon in span of experience, familiarity with specific details of policy and program development, and political standing.

These conditions all point to the obvious fact that evidence of executive indecision is an invitation to congressional intervention. In this connection, the origins of Section 412 demonstrate that hard-pressed executive officials will sometimes deliberately create an environment for legislative intervention. Pressed by rival programs or doctrines within their own agencies, and unwilling to assume the penalties of choice themselves, they may allow a "crisis" to bring an issue to a head knowing that Congress will compel some resolution of the conflict, transferring to itself the onus of ensuing deprivations. But Section 412 also demonstrates that the nature of such invited congressional arbitration is neither controllable nor predictable.

<sup>5a</sup> Since the completion of this paper, Bernard K. Gordon has published a study of Section 412: "The Military Budget: Congressional Phase," Journal of Politics, Vol. 23 (November, 1961), pp. 689ff. He ascribes much greater weight to committee rivalries, particularly in the House, as a factor in the origins of Section 412, and is more dubious of its benefits. He observes that Section 412 may have a "salutary effect," but he concludes that the goal of "effective congressional—and civilian—control of the military establishment" is more likely to be achieved through "a single locus of the appropriations power..." (p. 710).

II. OTHER TYPES OF CONGRESSIONAL CONTROL

To put the Russell amendment—Section 412—in perspective, it will be useful to recall that, over the last decade, Congress has resorted to a variety of techniques to exert control over military policy. It has tried to interpose in the deployment and use of forces; it has engaged in direct attacks upon the military leadership; it has worked to structure the defense establishment and component agencies to facilitate its lines of access into the military departments; and it has conducted investigations and inquiries about various phases of military programs. All of this has availed it little, however, in the sense of tangible and direct influence upon policy.

Primarily, Congress has focused its efforts to reshape or modify policy through its control over appropriations. This too has been a disappointing instrumentality. Year after year, the defense budget represents the only consistent, regular, and systematic point of contact between Congress and the substantive policy issues of defense. The task confronting Congress in acting upon this budget is overwhelming. Its members have, and can have, no adequate facilities for formulating alternative programs in any systematic fashion; for this they must rely on military dissent. They must accept in the main what is submitted, grappling with thousands of items and reams of documentary exhibits. They will try to ferret out some evidence of waste and mismanagement, and usually succeed, but this bogs them down in a morass of detail and diverts their attention frequently from underlying strategic issues. In a time of military danger, with the attendant "preparedness" climate, they are naturally inhibited from making any major attack upon the budget proposals or from forcing significant reductions. And they have also been thwarted in attempts to alter policy by providing additional funds over the amounts requested by the President's agents. A legislative majority could not compel President Truman to increase aircraft procurement in 1948, nor could it compel President Eisenhower to accelerate the Nike-Zeus program, by the expedient of voting additional funds. When the President refuses to use the money, when he—in Charles Wilson's phrase—"puts it in the bank," Congress has no practicable recourse. In short, the totals involved in the defense budget have become so great, the lump-sums and carry-overs so large, the discretion to shift funds from one category to another so extensive, that budgetary controls have actually provided Congress with little leverage over policy.

The important positive decisions about defense and strategy have therefore not been made by Congress, though anticipations of congressional opposition have no doubt operated as inhibitions against some policy choices. In a degree not paralleled in any other field of public policy, the position of the executive in this sphere has been definitely ascendant, and Congress has not been able to reverse that fact. It has maintained its lines of access into the defense establishment, and it has rejected such proposals as UMT, which seemed to draft manpower unnecessarily and provoked strong dissent from many influential groups in American society. In the main, however, a degree of "inviolability"—as Samuel P. Huntington has phrased it—has attended the strategic policy proposals embodied in executive requests, an inviolability which stands in sharp contrast to the record of congressional action on presidential programs in domestic policy, or even in foreign policy.<sup>6</sup>

Section 412—the new authorizing requirement—does not mean that this executive primacy has been, or can be, overthrown. As a result of the very nature of defense policy, its substantive problems and issues, and of the qualities inherent in the nature of the legislative and executive branches as political institutions, this primacy will continue. But Congress has now put itself in a position to introduce its voice and its will through another channel of regular and systematic contact with basic strategic programs. Through resurrecting the device of substantive authorizing legislation, adapting it to previous experience and to some salient characteristics of contemporary defense planning, it has provided itself with one more means of leverage.

III. AUTHORIZING LEGISLATION AND THE MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT

Though the primary instrumentality of congressional action on defense policy has been through appropriations, certainly the involvement of Congress in the affairs of the armed forces is much more extensive than the voting of money. Year after year a vast amount of detailed legislation must be acted upon to insure the proper functioning of the military establishment. This legislation encompasses, e.g., reserve affairs, military pay, retirement and other career incentives, contract negotiation, and a wide range of other problems. Legislative activities here are vital to the management and operation of the armed forces and essential to their effective functioning. For the most part, however, such matters as these are not the determinants of basic defense policy. They are, in the main, incidental to or in support of it.

<sup>6</sup> Huntington, op. cit., pp. 286-88.

This points up the extent to which defense affairs have not been closely related to substantive legislation that defines the operating framework of policy and the supporting programs. The authorization legislation for the military departments has characteristically only established ceilings—and these very high ones, so that the same authorizing statutes could support a defense budget of $15 billion, or $40 billion. Hence the unusual degree to which defense policy has been insulated from substantive, authorizing legislation and limited chiefly by budgetary action. The exceptions to this have been military pay, military assistance programs, and military public works. In these three categories the appropriations are determined in a framework of detailed substantive statutes, and the latter two are subject to annual legislative action. Military pay, however, falls into the category of legislation previously referred to, while military assistance is a part of the mutual security program and is within the jurisdiction of the Committee on Foreign Affairs and the Committee on Foreign Relations—not the Armed Services Committees. Of public works more will be said in a moment.<sup>7</sup>

The distinction made by Congress between authorization and appropriation, and their separation in the legislative process, is certainly not one to be overemphasized. The requirement that authorization precede appropriation gives rise to "friction" and is applied with "irregularity."<sup>8</sup> Yet it is a distinction to which Congress usually gives due consideration, and the broadly drawn character of the military authorizing statutes, as contrasted with those affecting most domestic policy undertakings, and the sheer size of the military budget as contrasted with those of most other government agencies, have placed the military in an unusually favorable legislative position. No one, and Congress least of all, seems to know how to go about the task of a long-range, comprehensive revision of permanent force levels in the present fluid environment of international conflict. Confronted with massive military procurement programs each year, however, some members of Congress—and especially several members of the Senate Armed Services Committee—have become increasingly impressed over the last few years with the extent to which basic questions about strategy and policy have tended to form around a nexus of specific programs of the three services for the development and procurement of weapons. This led to a re-examination of the legal warrant held by the services to pursue the programs, a re-examination prompted by policy disputes in the field of missiles development, particularly with reference to continental air defense.

IV. ARMY-AIR FORCE AUTHORIZATION ACT OF 1950

The basic substantive legislation pertaining to the Army and the Air Force in these categories was the Army and Air Force Authorization and Composition Act of 1950. For the Air Force, it authorized "24,000 serviceable aircraft or 225,000 airframe tons aggregate of serviceable aircraft, whichever amount the Secretary of the Air Force may determine is more appropriate to fulfill the requirements of the Air Force. . . ." The Secretary was also empowered to procure "guided missiles" without any specified limitation, and the statute stated that these were not to be included in "the number of aircraft or airframe tons authorized"; and to procure "spares, spare parts, equipment and facilities necessary for the maintenance and operation of the Air Force." The Secretary of the Army, in turn, was authorized to "procure pressed, furthermore, and in many situations there is a wide range for the judgment of presiding officers in applying the rules when points of order are made."

With specific reference to this parallel structure in military affairs, see Elias Huzar, The Purse and the Sword: Control of the Army by Congress through Appropriations, 1933-1950 (Ithaca: Cornell University Press, 1950), pp. 40-46.

<sup>7</sup> See Samuel P. Huntington, The Soldier and the State: The Theory and Politics of Civil-Military Relations (Cambridge, 1957), pp. 407-409.

<sup>8</sup> For a detailed analysis, see Arthur W. Macmahon, "Congressional Oversight of Administration: The Power of the Purse—I," Political Science Quarterly, Vol. 57 (June, 1943), p. 174. Macmahon comments: "The risk of friction is inherent in the existence of two partly parallel sets of committees. Much irregularity attends the fact that the whole distinction rests on provisions in the rules of the chamber, enforced by points of order. Through inattention or comity, points of order that would be sustained are often not made. Sometimes a special rule is adopted at the request of the Committee on Appropriations which gives blanket protection against points of order. Much authorization is implied rather than ex-materials and facilities, including guided missiles, necessary for the maintenance and support of the Army . . . and its divisions and other military organizations, and their installations and supporting and auxiliary elements. . . ." For the Army, Air Force and the Navy, the act also provided that money appropriated for these purposes, and for research and development programs, was to "remain available until expended, unless otherwise provided in the appropriations act concerned."<sup>9</sup>

The mood and the intent of Congress in making these liberal provisions were underscored in a parenthetical observation of the Senate Armed Services Committee when it first reported out the bill in 1949. Remarking on their belief that the House version of the bill permitted an excessive number of commissioned officers for the Regular Army, the senators reasoned:

In the hearings on this bill, and by later investigation, it was found that the Army will not reach its present authorized strength [of 30,600 commissioned officers] for approximately 9 years. The committee feels that the size of the regular Military Establishment is far in excess of that which will be required in the event world conditions are stabilized, and it anticipates that such will be the case before 9 years have passed.<sup>10</sup>

Simultaneously with the final passage of this act, the nation became involved in the Korean war. As a result all personnel ceilings imposed in <sup>9</sup> 64 Stat. 321. For an analysis of the legislation, and the expressed intent of Congress in the authority voted, see Senate Committee on Armed Services, Authorizing the Composition of the Army . . . and the Air Force of the United States, S. Rept. 933, 81st Cong. (August 18, 1949); and House Committee on Armed Services, Personnel and Composition of the Army and Air Force, H. Rept. 64, 81st Cong. (February 10, 1949).

<sup>10</sup> Authorizing the Composition of the Army . . . and the Air Force . . ., S. Rept. 933, p. 2. The Act authorized a troop strength of 837,000 for the Army, plus 110,000 inducted trainees in service at any given time; and the Air Force was authorized 502,000 regulars plus 15,000 trainees. Appropriations then being sought by the National Military Establishment were considerably under these levels. "Obviously," said General Omar Bradley in his testimony, "Congress cannot—and indeed will not—appropriate from year to year sufficient funds for the maintenance of this authorized force." House Committee on Armed Services, Hearings on H. R. 1437 . . . (81st Cong., 1st sess., Committee Paper No. 12), pp. 105–106.

the act, and in the 1946 Navy personnel act, were suspended for four years, and Congress has continued periodically to renew the suspension.<sup>11</sup> Generous provision was meanwhile made for the Navy's air power, in legislation authorizing an active force of up to 15,000 aircraft, with the added admonition that if, "in the judgment of the Secretary of the Navy the number of airplanes authorized is insufficient to meet the needs of the national defense, the Secretary may, with the approval of the President, make such plans for procurement as the situation demands."<sup>12</sup>

The fleet, of course, had been provided for much earlier, in legislation dating back to the 1930s. Chairman Carl Vinson of the House Armed Services Committee in 1959 summarized the status of the Navy in this respect in these words:

In the field of ship procurement, the situation is so broad today that the Armed Services Committees consider only a small fraction of the total shipbuilding program each year.

. . . It [the Vinson-Trammell Act], with its subsequent amendments, provided enough tonnage for the Navy to build ships for an untold number of years without any further authorization. All the Navy has needed, and all it needs today is appropriations.<sup>13</sup>

This same statement could also have been made about the missile programs of all the services, and the aircraft procurement of both the Air Force and the Navy. Necessarily, then, legislative participation in policy decisions was localized around the appropriations function.

V. REAL ESTATE, PUBLIC WORKS, AND CONTINENTAL AIR DEFENSE

A major exception to the exemption of the armed services from the practice of detailed substantive legislation in authorizing their principal programs, as noted already, embraced the area of real estate acquisition and public works construction. Developments in weapons, and especially in missiles, have recently had the effect of imparting a new strategic significance to these public works.

<sup>11</sup> Congressional Record, Vol. 96 (81st Cong., 2d sess.), pp. 10998–11006, and 11083–85. The most recent suspension of the personnel limitations was voted in March, 1959. Ibid., Vol. 105 (86th Cong., 1st sess.), pp. 1663–90, 3402–8.

<sup>12</sup> 10 U.S.C. §7341.

<sup>13</sup> Cong. Rec., Vol. 105 (86th Cong., 1st sess., 1959), p. 13477. A useful history of the Vinson-Trammell Act, and subsequent Navy legislation, related in the context of executive-legislative relations, is in Lawrence H. Chamberlin, The President, Congress and Legislation (New York: Columbia University Press, 1946), pp. 235 ff.

Congress has always had a very pronounced interest in the real estate transactions and public works projects of the military departments, and kept them under close surveillance, although for reasons that historically have had far more to do with constituency politics than with strategy. Emergency legislation suspended the process of annual authorization for military public works after 1940,<sup>14</sup> but this traditional practice, on a detailed line-item basis, was resumed in 1947.<sup>15</sup> Even during the Second World War, however, a watchful eye was maintained over many real estate matters, especially by Chairman Vinson's House Committee on Naval Affairs. When cold war rearmament again led to vast military public works projects throughout the nation, the Congressmen were disposed to expand their supervision of real estate transactions, and in so doing they collided with the Budget Bureau and the President.

A climax was reached in 1951 when a bill was enacted which required the military departments to "come into agreement" with the Armed Services Committees on the great majority of all real estate transactions to which they were a party, as a condition precedent to the necessary legislative approval of such transactions. To the disgust of Chairman Vinson, the author of the bill, President Truman vetoed it, but the resourceful and influential Georgian thereafter attached the identical proviso to the Military Construction Bill that was before his committee. Retained by the Senate, despite administration protests, and made applicable to virtually all real estate transactions in excess of $25,000, the bill passed with the "coming into agreement" proviso securely ensconced in a construction authorization bill that was too pressing to be delayed by another exercise of the veto.<sup>16</sup>

<sup>14</sup> The first suspension was in an act of July 2, 1940, and it was subsequently extended for the "duration plus six months" under the First War Powers Act. 54 Stat. 712 and 56 Stat. 312.

<sup>15</sup> House Committee on Armed Services, Hearings on H.R. 4122, Authorizing Military Construction (80th Cong., 1st sess., 1947).

<sup>16</sup> President Eisenhower asked repeal of the proviso in his budget message in 1959, and in the fiscal 1961 budget message he stated that "the Attorney General has advised me that this section violates fundamental constitutional principles. Accordingly, if it is not repealed by the Congress at its present session, I shall have no

Real Estate Controls and Air Defense Weapons. This "coming into agreement" clause, which was operative throughout the 1950s, and the long-established practice of annually passing legislation authorizing military public works, had the unintended result of involving the Armed Services Committees very deeply in the development of Army and Air Force programs for continental air defense and, more recently, in a variety of other missile site construction projects. Indeed, the involvement was more intensive than in any other strategic policy area, because of the close relationship of substantive legislation to policy development. Air defense was, moreover, throughout the 1950s, characterized by vigorously contested interservice disputes over doctrine and roles and missions, and marked by intense competition for funds in support of particular weapons programs. The experience made a deep and lasting impression upon the Armed Services Committees, particularly in the Senate.

This experience grew out of the fact that the air defense programs of both the Army and the Air Force entailed annual action by the Armed Services Committees on legislation authorizing the hundreds of construction projects required, and their approval of hundreds of separate real estate transactions to provide the sites for the projects. Radar networks had to be authorized, combat control centers approved for construction, and defensive weapons deployed. Some statistics on one Army program alone will illustrate the range of committee action that was entailed. Beginning in the summer of 1953 the Army began deploying its Nike-Ajax surface-to-air missile. The range of the missile was approximately twenty-five miles, and the Army had elaborate plans to site it around urban complexes and defense installations throughout the United States. Obviously the missile sites had to be located in immediate proximity to the point defended. Each Nike battery required, first, an area of about eight acres for radars and computers, a launching area consisting of some forty-three acres, and ten additional acres for equipment and as a safety zone. In each of the launcher areas it was alternative thereafter but to direct the Secretary of Defense to disregard the section unless a court of competent jurisdiction determines otherwise."

As a result of this demand, the proviso was removed and a clause inserted in the Military Construction Authorization Act of 1960, which requires instead that real property transactions be "reported" to the Committees, in most instances thirty days prior to the completion of the transaction. 74 Stat. 186.

necessary to construct three underground magazines with four launchers in each, and the site had also to include a missile assembly and test building, a missile fueling facility, troop housing, mess hall, and troop support facilities.<sup>17</sup> From the start, the committee was necessarily and regularly involved in a detailed analysis and review of the program, approving the real estate acquisition and authorizing the construction of facilities on a line-item basis.

The Nike network was only a minor part of the total continental air defense programs. Including the radar warning systems, the SAGE control centers, the aircraft and bases of the NORAD fighter-interceptor units, the various Army and Air Force missile systems that were deployed, the Secretary of Defense stated in 1958 that the total capital investment made in continental air defense in a period of four and a half years had exceeded $13 billion, and that operating costs were $2 billion annually.<sup>18</sup> A House Appropriations Committee report in 1959 stated that over a ten-year period the nation had spent $29 billion on these programs—warning, control, and weapons—that had been designed to meet the threat of manned-bombers and air-breathing missiles.<sup>19</sup>

The details of the various conflicts over doctrine, roles and missions, or weapons, which have arisen between the services in connection with air defense do not need to be noted here, except to say that they have been subjects of serious dispute. Both the Army and Air Force have questioned the other's proper function and mission, and cast doubts on the effectiveness of the other's weapons. Nor have such disputes been peculiar to the problem of air defense. They have been the common currency of Pentagon politics. What is important here is that members of Congress through the Armed Services Committees have consistently had a different kind of relationship to the developments in air defense than they had in any other strategic program throughout the 1950s, and that these Committees found that by participating at a stage closer to operations than appropriations they were able to state criticisms on the basis of a greater knowledge of problems and issues, knowledge gained from annual and detailed review of legislative programs. As a result, they were able to exert a more effective leverage on policy decisions. The necessity for legislation prior to or complementary with the annual appropriations bills placed Congress in a more advantageous position, when it had a complaint or recommendation to enter.

The Nike-Talos Dispute. This was first brought out in 1956 when the Armed Services Committees were confronted with a request to authorize the Air Force to establish installations for a land-based version of the Talos surface-to-air missile. The Air Force wanted to begin deploying the missile to protect four bases of the Strategic Air Command. The Senate military construction subcommittee had been somewhat skeptical about the Nike program, and it was also concerned with the skyrocketing costs of air defense. It wanted to know why both the Nike and Talos were needed. If the Talos were the better weapon, why was it not used to defend cities? Otherwise, why would the Nike not suffice as the defender of SAC bases as well as cities? In any event, the Senators could see no purpose in having rival missile systems on site for the defense of overlapping areas.<sup>20</sup>

This expression of doubt and concern by the Senators naturally led the two services to fear action adverse to their interests. Each hurriedly came forward to defend its program. Army Chief of Staff General Maxwell Taylor bluntly told the Senate defense appropriations subcommittee that the Air Force decision to install the Talos was "an invasion of the Army anti-aircraft role."<sup>21</sup> Other Army spokesmen asserted that the Air Force proposal was premature, since the Talos was not yet operational and would not be for some time. As for the Nike, the Army never retreated from its "un-

<sup>17</sup> Senate Armed Services Subcommittee, Hearings on S. 1765, Military Public Works Construction (84th Cong., 1st sess.), pp. 273ff.

<sup>18</sup> A detailed analysis of air defense costs was in Senate Committee on Armed Services, Military Construction Authorization, Fiscal Year 1959, S. Rept. 1982, 85th Cong., 2d sess. (July 28, 1958).

<sup>19</sup> House Committee on Appropriations, Department of Defense Appropriation Bill for 1960, H. Rept. 408, 86th Cong., 1st sess. (May 28, 1959), pp. 15-16.

<sup>20</sup> Senator Stennis referred to committee concern about the "effectiveness" of Nike and "its range or lack of range," and to the great expense incurred on air defense. He concluded: "... I certainly have always steered away from the idea that this subcommittee was a policy making committee on missiles for defense installations except we do approve this when we keep recommending these sites and this money. . . ." Senator Jackson maintained that for Congress to agree to finance both Nike and Talos was simply to compromise service rivalries. Hearings on S. 3122, Military Public Works Construction (84th Cong., 2d sess.), pp. 395-96.

<sup>21</sup> Hearings, Department of Defense Appropriations Bill for 1957 (84th Cong., 2d sess.), p. 87.

qualified assurance" that "Nike can be relied on" as a weapon "capable of operating against any known aircraft or any aircraft projected into the future of the next five years or so."<sup>22</sup> The Air Force profoundly disagreed. An air staff analysis was leaked to the press at this juncture, dismissing the Nike as an ineffective weapon incapable of meeting the threat posed by high altitude jet bombers.<sup>23</sup>

The Senate subcommittee, after making some inquiries of its own, reacted to this by striking out the Talos in the military construction authorization bill. It said this was being done until "the relative merits of both systems have been positively tested and roles and missions clarified." While Congress ought not "to be placed in the position of defining roles and missions," or of passing on the merits of weapons, it continued, "unless concise responsibilities are assigned, duplication of weapons systems costing in the multi-billion range might result. . . ."<sup>24</sup> The House Armed Services Committee was reluctant to veto a military program, fearing that this was trespassing in the domain of professional decision. It was therefore agreed in conference that the Talos authorization would be conditionally restored, on the understanding that it would not be utilized until the Secretary of Defense had "come into agreement" with both Armed Services Committees on the subject, following an impartial study of the relative capabilities of both the Nike and Talos.<sup>25</sup> On this ground, and also because of an objectionable provision in the bill relating to military housing construction, the President returned it with a veto. He declared: "If the committees should fail or decline to agree with the plans prepared by the Secretary of Defense, the practical effect of this provision would be to lodge in the committees the authority to nullify congressional authorization."<sup>26</sup> With this, the Senate committee insisted upon striking out again all authorization for Talos installation construction, and both houses then agreed.<sup>27</sup>

Later that year the Secretary of Defense issued a memorandum clarifying roles and missions, in which he assigned to the Army the development and deployment of surface-to-air missiles up to the 100-mile range, removing the previous limit of fifty miles. This automatically put the development of the land-based version of the Talos into the Army's hands. During 1958 the Army announced discontinuance of the Talos program. Chairman John C. Stennis of the Senate military construction subcommittee commented in the upper house that, although enthusiastic claims had been made before this group about the need for the Talos and the important contributions it would make to air defense, since the 1956 action nothing further was ever heard about it until word was received that the Army had cancelled the program. The Senator was personally convinced, and his colleagues agreed, that if the 1956 request had been given legislative approval additional Talos sites would have been installed to cover areas already under the guard of Nike, and that by this action Congress had forestalled a needless and costly duplication that the Defense Department was either unable or unwilling to prevent.<sup>28</sup>

It seems important to note, with reference to the Nike-Talos imbroglio, that the issue was identified and brought to a decision by the deliberations and actions of the Armed Services Committee in the Senate—specifically, by the military construction subcommittee. The Nike program had been before the Appropriations Committees for several years, and annual presentations about its deployment and performance had been made by the Army. Yet, not until the probings of the military construction subcommittee had obviously struck at some vulnerable and sensitive nerve ends in the Pentagon did the appropriations committees join the fray. The strong presumption must be that, immersed as they were in the complexities of the total defense budget, the span of attention of the appropriations committee members was too diffuse to permit the isolation of concrete issues, despite widespread dissatisfaction with missile programs generally.

Little more than a year after the Talos incident, the military construction subcommittee found what it believed to be another and more costly duplication in the air defense programs submitted through the Defense Department.

<sup>22</sup> Lt. Gen. S. R. Mickelsen, in House Appropriations Subcommittee, Hearings, Department of Defense Appropriations for 1956 (84th Cong., 2d sess.), pt. 1, p. 396.

<sup>23</sup> On the air staff analysis "leak," see Anthony Leviero, New York Times, May 21, 1956, p. 1. This was but one of a deluge of leaks from the military departments during that spring and summer.

<sup>24</sup> Authorizing Construction for Military Departments, S. Rept. 2364, 84th Cong., 2d sess. (June 26, 1956), pp. 10-11.

<sup>25</sup> Cong. Rec., Vol. 102 (84th Cong., 2d sess.), pp. 12167-77.

<sup>26</sup> Ibid., p. 12959.

<sup>27</sup> Ibid., pp. 14634, 14884.

<sup>28</sup> Ibid., Vol. 104 (85th Cong., 2d sess.), p. 15543.

The Air Force in 1958 began seeking authorization for installations for its Bomarc A missile, an "area-defense" weapon as distinguished from the Army's point-defense missiles. Neither service had any hesitation in voicing its unbounded confidence in the superiority of its own defensive system, while looking with great skepticism upon that of its rival. Again the subcommittee made a detailed and critical review of what it considered to be duplicating programs, in this instance the Bomarc and the Nike-Hercules, and in the authorization bill made a twenty percent reduction in the total funding sought for the two systems.

In taking this action [explained Senator Stennis], the committee does not attempt to set itself up as military experts. These are decisions that must be made by the Secretary of Defense supported by qualified technicians. The committee took this action as a matter of focusing attention on the problem and in underlining its beliefs that Congress should not be called upon to determine the merits of competing weapons systems.

The reduction, he stated, would still permit the Secretary to proceed with construction of essential missile sites, but it would bring pressure to bear to compel a needed decision upon a well ordered surface-to-air missile program that would eliminate unnecessary overlapping between the two services.<sup>29</sup>

Although legislative intervention of this nature in missile programs was primarily confined to the air defense area, these Senate actions on Talos, Hercules and Bomarc coincided with more general expressions of anxiety and dissatisfaction about all aspects of missile developments. The situation in air defense, congressional sources complained, was not unique but was, in fact, symptomatic of basic defects in the decision-making processes in the Department of Defense that were having an adverse effect in all areas of weapons development. Congressmen found confirmation of their views in the resignation, early in 1956, of Trevor Gardner and his public protest against what he called an "administrative nightmare" and "intolerable rivalry" between the services which were obstructing progress in missile development.<sup>30</sup> The congressional viewpoint was succinctly put in the statement of the House Appropriations Committee on May 21, 1957, pointing to "an apparent lack of timely, effective, and decisive action on the part of the Office of the Secretary of Defense in achieving a well-rounded, coordinated guided missile program at a minimum cost commensurate with an adequate system." Echoing Gardner's allegations, the congressmen criticised "an increasing degree of rivalry among the services for roles and missions," which had reached such proportions as "to jeopardize and delay the rate of build-up of our military power." Each service was "striving to acquire an arsenal of weapons complete in itself to carry out any and all possible missions."<sup>31</sup> Clearly the mood of Congress was one leaning toward further intervention, if it could isolate additional concrete controversies such as the Nike vs. Talos.

VI. REORGANIZATION AND THE GENESIS OF A LEGISLATIVE INNOVATION

At this juncture, the Soviet Union put Sputnik I into orbit, in October of 1957. This event immediately provided a focus for a theretofore unstructured political debate over missiles and U.S. defense posture. It produced a flurry of investigations in Congress and provided a powerful talking point for the legislative critics of administration policy. In this context—with Congress increasingly disposed to intervene in defense policy matters—the President advanced a series of proposals calling for a reorganization of the Department of Defense. In the spring of 1958 his proposals were embodied in specific legislative requests, and the immediate origins of the 1959 authorizing amendment are to be found in the resulting debate on defense organization.

As these debates progressed, Democratic spokesmen especially came to voice the notion that the administration was attaching to defects in organization the major shortcomings in defense policy, and that the onus of these defects was being placed upon the congressional doorstep. Chairman Russell of the Senate Armed Services Committee observed that many statements made in support of the President's proposals carried the implication that "the Secretary of Defense is powerless—that he is a mere figurehead—and that the Congress has made no provision for the unified

<sup>29</sup> Senate Committee on Armed Services, Military Construction Authorization, Fiscal Year 1959, S. Rept. 1982, 85th Cong., 2d sess. (July 28, 1958). See also the military construction subcommittee Hearings on S. 3756, S. 3863, and H.R. 13015, Military Construction Authorization, Fiscal Year 1959.

<sup>30</sup> See his article, "Our Guided Missile Crisis,"

Look, Vol. 20 (May 15, 1956), pp. 46-52. Gardner had been special assistant for research and development to the Secretary of the Air Force.

<sup>31</sup> Department of Defense Appropriations Bill, 1958, H. Rept. 471, 85th Cong., 1st sess., pp. 19-20.

strategic direction of the military services." This, he asserted, was "an impression that is without factual foundation."<sup>32</sup> Thus, there was a contest between the two branches of government to fix responsibility for policy failings, each holding the other accountable for serious organizational defects as a source of the trouble. Armed Services Committee members in both houses repeatedly insisted that many weaknesses in the decision-making structure could specifically be attributed to a failure of officials to use powers already provided, more than to any failure of Congress to endow the executive with needed authority. As evidence they cited the Talos dispute, and the Nike-Bomarc dispute, and the Thor-Jupiter dispute, all of which the Secretary had authority to settle.

In this setting, Senator Ralph Flanders, Vermont Republican and then a member of Armed Services, interrupted his questioning of Secretary McElroy in the reorganization hearings to voice his opinion that the Committee was "not informed," and its judgment was "not asked . . . on overall defense plans. . . ." At the time he became a member of the Committee, he continued, he was "surprised" to discover that most military authorization was of a "perpetual" nature, that "we had no contact with it," despite the fact that the "authorization process exists almost completely, I think, through all the rest of the area of Government operations." The Senator then observed:

My only means of getting any concept of what an overall program is, is due to the fact that you [Chairman Russell] have kindly assigned me as an ex officio member of the Appropriations Committee.

Can they take little bits and pieces of the appropriations, glue them together with some imagination, and arrive at an overall defense program?

. . . I think it [an overall program] ought to be presented to us for our authorization and so that is the main suggestion with regard to this [reorganization] undertaking which I have to make.<sup>33</sup>

<sup>32</sup> Ibid., pp. 7-8. This point came up repeatedly, not only in the reorganization hearings but also in the special investigations launched after Sputnik. See Senate Armed Services Subcommittee, Hearings, Inquiry into Satellite and Missile Programs (85th Cong., 1st and 2d sess., 1957-58); and House, Committee on Armed Services, Hearings, Investigations of National Defense Missiles . . . (85th Cong., 2d sess., 1958).

<sup>33</sup> Hearings, DOD Reorganization Act of 1958, pp. 31-32.

Senator Russell took this criticism under careful consideration, once the reorganization bill was disposed of, and directed the committee staff to make a study of the problem.

The staff recognized, of course, the total impracticability of any complete, periodic authorization of the military budget. It was immediately impressed, however, by the convergence of basic policy and strategy and certain major weapons programs. Recalling also the air defense experience to that date, it concluded that the focus should be upon weapons, and as initially drafted and approved by the Committee early in 1959 the amendment stipulated that annual authorization be required for the "design, development, and procurement" of aircraft and missiles. In this form the proviso was attached to the Military Construction Authorization Bill—for reasons both logical and expedient—when it was reported by the Committee on May 19. The report commented but briefly upon this proposed change, soon designated as the "Russell amendment," and seemed to be at pains, in fact, to say as little about it as possible. It did note that the fiscal 1960 budget contained over $9 billion in proposed appropriations for aircraft and missiles, that in addition to the large expenditures for procurement per se these generated "requirements for expenditures in other major budget categories, such as personnel, construction, and operations and maintenance"; and that the authorizations on which these appropriations were based were noteworthy for a "lack of specificity." Therefore:

The committee has concluded that in the discharge of its legislative responsibilities an annual review of the aircraft and missile procurement programs is needed. A thorough examination of this area of activity may serve to reduce the enormous cost of defense and should assist the Committee on Appropriations in their consideration of the mammoth defense budget.<sup>34</sup>

Immediately the Department of Defense voiced its strong disapproval of such a change. At this juncture, however, the debate on the authorizing amendment became intertwined with another but related action of the Committee, one which precipitated another explosion in the long-standing dispute over air defense involving the Army, the Air Force, the Defense Department, and the Armed Services Committee. The military construction subcommittee deleted over 75 per cent of the Army requests for Nike-Hercules surface-to-air missile installations, and repealed previous authorizations of fifty Nike batteries in the continental United States and eight in Hawaii. The subcommittee asserted that the Nike system was "virtually obsolete," that further expenditure was unwarranted, that the Army was investing too great a proportion of its resources in purely defensive systems, and that greater emphasis should be placed upon "area" defensive systems.<sup>35</sup> It demanded that the Secretary of Defense come forward with a "master plan" for air defense, which would eliminate unnecessary duplications in weapons and facilities, before the adjournment of Congress.

<sup>34</sup> Military Construction Authorization . . . , Fiscal Year 1960, S. Rept. 296, 86th Cong., 1st sess., pp. 15-16.

The immediate circumstance prompting the Armed Services Committee to take this extreme action, virtually a veto of a weapons program and an ultimatum to the Defense Department, was in remarks made by the Secretary of Defense. Perhaps inadvertently, the Secretary in effect invited drastic Senate action. Appearing before the Senate defense appropriations subcommittee on May 4, he remarked that air defense had been a problem "which has been, I suppose, more difficult than any I have touched—to resolve in a way that is at all satisfying." This led to an unusual colloquy:

Senator STENNIS. . . . I am beginning to think that the Department of Defense would welcome a congressional decision on this matter and then you could move on into a more positive program.

Secretary McELROY. You have certainly touched us in a place that I would call vulnerable.

Senator STENNIS. I do not want to embarrass you.

Secretary McELROY. You are not embarrassing us. This is one area where we have not done very well in making a decision.

As far as I am concerned, it would not bother me if you held our feet to the fire and forced us in connection with this budget.

Senator STENNIS. I appreciate your attitude tremendously, because I frankly think that is what has to be done, Mr. Secretary.

Secretary McELROY. I think it is time.<sup>36</sup>

The Defense Department was distressed by these remarks, while the Army was staggered by the resulting blow inflicted by the Committee on its Nike-Hercules program. Each began attempting to undo the damage. The Army resorted to issuing a memorandum to every member of Congress, which defended the Nike against the allegations made in the report and asked that the requested funds be restored and the Committee be overruled.<sup>37</sup> Before the week was out the confusion was compounded by steps taken in the House of Representatives. In reporting out the Department of Defense Appropriation Bill, the Appropriations Committee severely cut back funds for procurement of the Air Force surface-to-air missile system, the Bomarc. Mr. Mahon, chairman of the defense subcommittee, took note of the prolonged dispute over what most congressmen considered competing, not complementary weapons systems, and explained: "We proposed to help bring this controversy to a showdown through the utilization of the power of the purse."<sup>38</sup>

The Defense Department had no choice but to begin preparing at once a revised plan that reprogrammed both the Nike and Bomarc systems, insisting that both were needed.<sup>39</sup> Concurrently it urged the deletion of the authorizing amendment, Section 412, focusing its efforts on the House Armed Services Committee and its chairman. Mr. Vinson was variously reported as opposed, or, at best, lukewarm toward the Senate amendment. Three explanations were advanced: It was said that he feared such an action would violate the principle that "military men should make military decisions," a violation he allegedly believed already made in the Senate action on the Nike-Hercules.<sup>40</sup> Other observers felt that he might have inadvertently committed himself to the Pentagon in advance on the issue; still others believed that he was concerned that the additional work the amendment would demand might cause his then forty-three committee members to become bogged down in a morass of detail. Some significance might also be attached to the fact that the authorizing clause, at that point, did not include ships.

Pentagon chiefs were particularly worried

<sup>37</sup> The memorandum was reported in detail by Mark S. Watson, Baltimore Sun, May 23, 1959, p. 1.

<sup>38</sup> Cong. Rec., Vol. 105 (86th Cong., 1st sess.), p. 8642.

<sup>39</sup> A revised bill, drawn on the basis of the "master plan," was reported to the Senate by the Stennis subcommittee on June 25 (S. Rept. 434, 86th Cong.).

<sup>40</sup> Army Navy Air Force Journal, May 23, 1959, pp. 1, 3.

<sup>35</sup> Ibid., pp. 13-14. The Nike was defined as a "point" defense weapon.

<sup>36</sup> Hearings, Department of Defense Appropriations, 1960, p. 33.

about two issues raised by the Senate authorizing amendment. They feared that serious delay might result if an authorization process had to be gone through annually. Major complications might ensue from disagreements on programs within each of the Armed Services Committees, between these committees, and between Armed Services and Appropriations in one or both houses. In the Senate, where there was an overlapping membership, this was less likely,<sup>41</sup> but it was a cause of considerable concern with respect to the lower chamber. Not only delay, but something approaching chaos, could be the outcome. Evidently the Nike-Bomarc experience also led some Defense officials to fear that there could easily be repetitions of this kind of encounter. One service organ, echoing these apprehensions, argued that Congress should exercise "close surveillance" over defense matters and that there should be the "closest possible liaison" between Congress and the Pentagon. But it warned that "this surveillance must not be broadened to an extent where Congress can dictate the weapons of defense."<sup>42</sup> The military commentator of the New York Times agreed that this was the clear implication in recent actions of the Senate. "Military decisions," he wrote, "properly can be made only by the Pentagon and the President." Otherwise, there was real "danger" that Congress would "choose a weapon or a system on the basis of political and economic factors rather than on objective military and technical ones."<sup>43</sup>

Against these objections the Senate Armed Services Committee stood firm. It felt that it had ample basis for its belief that something other than "objective" military factors were already involved in many weapons decisions, pointing as an example to a series of newspaper advertisements sponsored by defense contractors in support of rival Army and Air Force missiles (the Hercules and Bomarc), and released just as Congress was deliberating on the subject. It further pointed to numerous contradictions, expressed and implied, in statements released by the two military departments, and questioned whether only technical considerations were weighed in Pentagon deliberations. The Defense Department offered to submit procurement programs to the committees on an annual basis, with detailed explanations and support material; but to this Senators Russell, Stennis, and others countered that such an "information" procedure would place the burden of proof on Congress. If modifications were sought, if it were desired to effect any sort of change, legislation would have to be passed at the congressional initiative and it would be subject to a veto.

After prolonged conference consideration, the Senate and House came into agreement. Whatever his original view, Vinson now gave firm support to the revised amendment. Two reductions in scope, and one expansion, had been accepted by the Senate managers. First, it was agreed that specific mention of annual authorization would be deleted, so that more flexibility could be allowed if circumstances warranted it. The intent of annual action, however, was not dislodged. Second, the authorization of "design and development" was stricken out, and the requirement restricted to include only procurement of operational items. The Committee saw no feasible means of overseeing research. Finally, the amendment was altered to include "naval vessels" as well as aircraft and missiles—a move that no doubt quickened Vinson's interest. The provision was not to take effect until December 31, 1960. A trial run was to be made during 1960, with complete information to be submitted to the Committees on all ship, missile and aircraft procurement programs by January 31, 1960, including "cost," and the "number of each type and kind" to be procured, but this was for the Committees' study only and would not, in the first year, necessitate legislation.<sup>44</sup>

VII. THE 1961 PROCUREMENT AUTHORIZATION: PROCEDURES AND POLITICS

The full coming into effect of Section 412 thus coincided with the arrival of the Kennedy administration. The mechanics of procedure were worked out in the 1960 trial run, and the first legislation authorizing the procurement of ships, aircraft and missiles was submitted to the 87th Congress. It was a one-year authorization. No action was taken pending anticipated program revisions from the new President, and these were submitted in a special message late in March. On April 4 hearings began before the

<sup>41</sup> In the 87th Congress, five members of Armed Services are also members of the defense subcommittee of Appropriations, and three members serve ex officio on the Appropriations subcommittee.

<sup>42</sup> Army Navy Air Force Journal, May 30, 1959, p. 12.

<sup>43</sup> Hanson W. Baldwin, New York Times, May 28, 1959, p. 13.

<sup>44</sup> 73 Stat. 322. In addition to the Senate reports already cited, see Vinson's defense and explanation of the amendment to the House, Cong. Rec., Vol. 105 (86th Cong., 1st sess.), pp. 13476-77.

Senate Armed Services Committee on S. 1852, authorizing a procurement program of $11,974,800,000, as already noted, for fiscal 1962. The new obligational authority being sought in the revised Defense Appropriation Bill was $43,794,345,000.<sup>45</sup>

The circumstances surrounding this novel legislative proceeding were themselves unusual. A presidential transition had meant delay in final program determinations, so legislative action did not begin until relatively late in the session. More important, however, was the atmosphere of crisis which pervaded the deliberations—Laos, Cuba, the Geneva stalemate, and then Berlin. Indeed, little more than a month after the passage of S. 1852, the President made additional military requests on July 26 because of the Berlin threat, and a second weapons procurement authorization of $958,570,000 was immediately passed.<sup>46</sup>

In both a procedural and a political sense, the authorization process bore an impressive resemblance to the established pattern of military appropriations. Procedurally, this is first demonstrated in the framework of the legislation itself, and secondly, in the type of "compact" entered into by the Armed Services Committees and the Pentagon. As agreed during 1960, the Department's bill contained only eight categories: Army aircraft, Navy and Marine Corps aircraft, and Air Force aircraft; Army missiles, Navy missiles, Marine Corps missiles, and Air Force missiles; and Navy vessels. For each of these eight, a lump-sum authorization was provided. The military departments then supplied detailed back-up material as justification, and itemized, detailed information concerning numbers to be procured, operational characteristics, costs and schedules for each individual weapons system within all of the categories. The statute itself was confined to a listing of the broad eight categories and the total amounts under each, as has been the practice in the defense appropriations acts for many years. And, as in the case of appropriations, changes in the numbers and costs of a given weapon, or in the "mix" of various weapons in a category or in two or more categories, may be made by "reprogramming." That is, the committees are consulted, but no additional legislation is necessary for the changes to be made. Specifically, the Defense Department agreed to submit regular quarterly reprogramming reports to Armed Services along with such special interim reports as changes warranted.<sup>47</sup> Some in the House professed a desire to use a line-item procedure, and the House Committee report took pains to point out that the lump-sum method was instituted only on a "trial basis for one year."<sup>48</sup> One has difficulty, however, envisaging a line-item approach to this area.

The lump sums, it should be pointed out further, are not confined to the "hardware"—i.e., to the missiles, etc., per se. "Below the line" items essential to the weapon itself are included. In the case of aircraft, for example, not only the aircraft and all airborne equip-

<sup>47</sup> See especially the testimony of Major General R. F. Friedman, Director of the Budget and Comptroller, USAF, in Senate, Procurement Hearings, pp. 457ff.; and the discussion between Congressman Kilday and Secretary of the Air Force Zuckert:

"Mr. KILDAY. . . . Now under 412, we will have in our backup here, but not in the law, the individual planes, missiles and ships which are authorized.

"As I understand it, the Comptroller General has held that this is binding on the Department [in appropriations procedure], even though it is not in the law, but that with the concurrence of the committee you could transfer the funds to another purpose.

"So here you have so much money authorized for airplanes, but we have a detailed justification. Then you are going to put in a detailed justification for Appropriations, but you are going to get your money in a lump-sum. You are going to be required by law to abide by the commitments made to the committees. But by concurrence of the committees, you can transfer it to different types of airplanes, missiles and ships, or change the priorities to which you have committed yourself. . . .

"Secretary ZUCKERT. That is an excellent statement of my understanding."

See House Committee on Armed Services, Hearings on H.R. 6151, Authorizing Appropriations for Aircraft, Missiles, and Naval Vessels for the Armed Forces (87th Cong., 1st sess., Committee Paper No. 10), p. 1533.

<sup>48</sup> Authorizing Appropriations for Aircraft, Missiles and Naval Vessels. H. Rept. 380 (87th Cong., 1st sess.), p. 10.

<sup>45</sup> Senate Committee on Armed Services, Hearings on Military Procurement Authorization Fiscal Year 1962 (87th Cong., 1st sess.), pp. 26-27. The original Eisenhower request under 412 had been for $10,572,181,000.

<sup>46</sup> The supplemental procurement bill—S. 2311—passed the Senate on July 28 and the House on August 2, in both instances without dissent and after perfunctory debate. Cong. Rec. Vol. 107 (87th Cong., 1st sess.), daily ed., pp. 12905-12919, and 13312-13322.

ment, but the spare engines, initial spares, peculiar ground support equipment and training items are all included. Inclusion only of the "hardware" would have reduced the authorization almost in half, and would have created also major accounting and budgeting problems.<sup>49</sup>

Even more notable, however, was the extent to which the political quality of the authorization process adhered to the appropriations pattern. Although crisis restraints were increasingly operative (and fully so on the supplemental authorization bill), and a spirit of cooperativeness incidental to the launching of a new administration was evident, the hearings demonstrated, first, a search for dissent within the military as a basis of criticism, evaluation and revision. After the style of Secretaries of Defense in the appropriations hearings over recent years, Mr. McNamara commented in his comprehensive statement to the committees that the requests did "not provide everything that everyone would like to have."<sup>50</sup> Accordingly, a considerable part of the hearing revolved around congressional inquiries as to the nature of the items the military departments would have "liked," but which were denied by the office of the Secretary of Defense. The Navy was disappointed that its Eagle Missileer project had not been provided for.<sup>51</sup> The Army was displeased that it had again—after a strenuous campaign—failed to obtain authorization for funds to put into production certain components of its Nike-Zeus anti-ballistic missile. Senator Thurmond attempted to persuade the committee to add $169 million authorization in the Army missiles category for this purpose, but the committee accepted the Defense Department's ruling and defeated the amendment by a "decisive" vote.<sup>52</sup> Representative Gubser sought a $697.5 million addition to the bill to provide authorization for six more Polaris submarines. When the House committee, again accepting Defense Department recommendations, defeated this proposal by a vote of 3-25, Mr. Gubser carried it to the floor with the endorsement of the Republican Policy Committee. There the amendment was defeated 58-105.<sup>53</sup>

In one important respect only did the committees, and the two houses, reach a consensus at variance with the administration's program of major weapons procurement. The defense establishment did not include a request for authorization of further procurement of the B-52 or the B-58 bombers. The Secretary of Defense indicated that under existing plans B-52 production would end in August, 1962, and B-58 production in October, 1962. Pending further study of the role of the manned bomber, therefore, he saw no need for procurement authority during fiscal 1962. Further, in connection with the Department of Defense Appropriation Bill, the administration reduced the development funds for the B-70 by $138 million.<sup>54</sup>

The committees took strong issue with this evident downgrading of the manned bomber. During the hearings, according to the House committee report, a "perceptible hesitancy in placing sole reliance and dependence on the ICBM for now or the near future" appeared. It noted that the bomber concept was still under study and emphasized the untried nature of the ballistic missile:

...Also—and this is a thought which to the knowledge of the committee has not been stressed in the past—who knows whether an intercontinental ballistic missile with a nuclear warhead will actually work? Each of the constituent elements has been tested, it is true. Each of them, however, has not been tested under circumstances which would be attendant upon the firing of the missile in anger.

By this the committee means an intercontinental ballistic missile will carry its nuclear warhead to great heights, subjecting it to intense cold. It then will arch down and upon reentering the earth's atmosphere subject the nuclear warhead to intense heat. Who knows what will happen to the delicate mechanisms involved in the nuclear warhead as it is subjected to these two extremes of temperature?

The scientists may say that all of these things are determinable by extrapolation. Perhaps this is so. To the committee, however, it seems that our only knowledge of the actual workability of an ICBM fired in anger is in textbooks and in laboratories. The committee is unwilling to place the

<sup>49</sup> Senate, Procurement Hearings, p. 462.

<sup>50</sup> Ibid., p. 3.

<sup>51</sup> See Ibid., pp. 290-291.

<sup>52</sup> Cong. Rec., Vol. 107 (87th Cong., 1st sess.), daily ed., p. 7412. The Army's drive for Nike-Zeus production was "kicked off" by the February issue of Army magazine, published by the Association for the United States Army. Speeches were made on the floor on behalf of the Zeus by Congressmen Daniel Flood, George P. Miller, and John McCormack; and by Senators Thurmond and Mundt. See ibid., pp. 1580, 1727, 2022, 2439, 3560, 4425.

<sup>53</sup> Ibid., p. 8321.

<sup>54</sup> House Committee on Armed Services, Authorizing Appropriations for Aircraft, Missiles and Naval Vessels, pp. 4, 6.

safety of this country in a purely academic attitude, and for this reason has added to the bill authorization for bombers.<sup>55</sup>

The committees not only sounded the trumpet against the academicians but also observed that (1) the bomber possesses a "utility and flexibility in application" not obtainable in missiles; (2) if a stable strategic deterrence were achieved the manned bomber would be able to respond to "other forms of warfare"; and (3) the availability of the Hound Dog air-to-ground missile and the development of the Skybolt enhanced the effectiveness of the manned bomber as a strategic weapon.<sup>56</sup>

The upshot of all this was, in the Senate, an amendment authorizing $525 million for B-52 procurement, and evidence of serious misgivings about the cuts made in the B-70 development. The House reduced and altered this, adding $393 million authorization for B-52 and B-58 procurement. The conferees agreed to restore the Senate figure—$525 million—and specified only that it was for "procurement of long-range manned aircraft for the Strategic Air Command."<sup>57</sup> The Appropriations Committee concurred in this judgment on the need for manned bombers, noting the aerial demonstrations during the year in Moscow. The appropriations bill accepted by the conferees in August thus added $515 million for purchase of B-52s or B-58s, and also added $400 million over the administration requests for the B-70 program.<sup>58</sup>

Obviously, however, Congress can no more compel Defense Department utilization of what it has authorized than it can compel expenditure of funds which it has appropriated. Does the authorization process merely result in a situation identical with that of the appropriations process? Has Section 412 altered the realities of the decision-making process, or merely added a new procedural layer?

VIII. CONCLUSIONS

In three respects, Section 412 opens the way for an expansion of the role of Congressional

<sup>55</sup> Ibid., p. 3.

<sup>56</sup> Senate Committee on Armed Services, Authorizing Appropriations for Aircraft, Missiles and Naval Vessels, S. Rept. 253, 87th Cong., 1st sess., p. 4.

<sup>57</sup> Cong. Rec., Vol. 107 (87th Cong., 1st sess.), daily ed., pp. 9314-9315. The Senate agreed to a House amendment for additional funds for new engines for the C-135 and a compromise was reached on the procurement of guided missile frigates by the Navy.

<sup>58</sup> Ibid., pp. 14262-14265.

leaders in defense policy-making. First, it strengthens the access of Congress to the processes of policy formulation. Strategy is an area of executive initiative and, in this basic sense, Congress' role must be usually and essentially a negative one—the role of critic, questioner, skeptic—though occasionally it can be a prodder. With major strategic doctrines underlying policy inherently focused in the procurement of major weapons systems, the procedure of annually authorizing these systems (and the intent to make this an annual process seems very firm) involves more Congressmen more immediately in the intellectual, technical and political processes from which policy and strategy emerge.

The authorization procedure lends itself to this function better because it possesses, in turn, the utility of focus. Defense appropriations must roam across an immense terrain of policy decisions, from the trivial to the momentous. The range of choices is too complex for busy legislators to be able to extract and analyze systematically the pertinent and the fundamental from the irrelevant and transitory. Moreover, important decisions not of a strategic nature become interlocked in the vast reaches of defense appropriations. A great deal of time was given in the debates on the Defense Appropriations Act for Fiscal 1960, for example, to the issue of federal subsidies to local educational resources in areas where large defense installations are located.<sup>59</sup> This is not an insignificant problem, and it falls into a category of constituency interests that demand legislative attention. But it is time-consuming and diverting from the central issues involved in national defense. Issues of this sort are always involved in the appropriations acts.

Such diversions are less likely to emerge in legislation wholly concerned with authorizing procurement of ships, aircraft and missiles. Strategic issues are not exhausted in the problems of weapons procurement, but S. 1852 clearly raised such questions as (1) the relative allocation of resources to preparations for limited and general war, (2) the relative utility of varying types of strategies of deterrence, (3) the mix of strategic weapons, and (4) the roles and missions of the services relative to these various policy objectives. Procurement hearings and debates may be sidetracked, but aside from the inevitable discussions about the mechanics of the novel procedure the 1961 record demonstrated an impressive degree of focus on the policy choices implicit in the legislation. Events dictated also a considerable concern in the hearings with intelligence programs and with the release of information on military programs, but these were questions deserving of legislative scrutiny and interest.

<sup>59</sup> Ibid., pp. 13624-13633.

Finally, access and focus lead into one other important alteration in this executive-legislative dialogue. The authorization procedure creates an expanded base of knowledge in Congress for the critical analysis of defense issues. With decision-making in defense centralized around the budgetary process, the Committees on Appropriations—or, more specifically, the defense subcommittees—were in a peculiarly powerful position in setting the terms of debate and deliberation. Under Section 412, the subject-matter committees assume new importance. Chairman Vinson stated in the debates:

... I am afraid ... that members of the Appropriations Committees were the only ones in Congress who actually had very much knowledge of the tremendous programs and expenditures which the Congress was called upon to pass on each year.

It is my hope that section 412 has called a halt to this situation. If it did nothing else, it brought 37 members of the House [i.e., those on Armed Services] into the heretofore exclusive area of knowledge of these very large programs.<sup>60</sup>

The Appropriations Committees have understandably refrained from expressing enthusiastic support for Section 412 and its implications. Privately some of the members agreed with the Defense Department in 1959 that it was an unwise and unnecessary procedure. But 412 certainly does not displace Appropriations from an important position in debate.<sup>61</sup>

<sup>60</sup> Ibid., p. 8218.

<sup>61</sup> On the preeminence of the appropriations committees, an interesting comment will be found in Douglas Cater, "The Lonely Men on Capital

It does add, however, to that reservoir of information and knowledge available in Congress which is the prerequisite of effective and intelligent debate. While this may represent Congressional "negativism," the role of serious debate is fundamental.<sup>62</sup>

The authorization requirement poses some hazards to a rational political process. It may create delay and more troublesome complications if disputes arise between the two houses and the Armed Services and Appropriations Committees. It invites additional pressure tactics from weapons contractors. It imposes added burdens on overworked civilian and military officers by requiring that they spend more time on the Hill giving duplicating testimony before different committees. If these become the real legacy of Section 412 in fact, and if the "preparedness" atmosphere continues, a strong President and Secretary of Defense can probably even dislodge the requirement, ultimately.

Nevertheless, the innovation embodied in Section 412 opens the door to the fulfillment of a vital need in the processes of defense policy-making in the United States: effective searching debate of strategic issues and choices. Confinement of legislative review of policy to the appropriations process has not met this need. The enactment of 412 is thus not only suggestive of the circumstances in which Congress is prone to intervene in strategic decisions. Properly utilized, it provides an improved basis upon which such intervention can be informed and effective.

Hill," The Reporter, Vol. 21 (October 15, 1959), pp. 23-26.

<sup>62</sup> See the remarks of Henry Kissinger in The Necessity for Choice: Prospects of American Foreign Policy (New York, 1961), p. 3.

THE STABILITY OF COALITIONS ON ROLL CALLS IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES*

WILLIAM H. RIKER AND DONALD NIEMI

Lawrence College

University of Chicago

In some recent discussions of roll calls in Congress a model of interacting blocs has often been adopted and to a considerable degree verified.<sup>1</sup> This model assumes the existence of several fairly cohesive blocs along with, perhaps, some unattached members. Furthermore, it is assumed that some of these blocs are fairly consistently opposed on roll calls, while others ally now with one side, now with the other. This model is attractive, not only because it accords with the usage of journalists, but also because it seems to provide a rational explanation of what sometimes appears to be the almost random confusion of Congressional voting behavior. As the evidence here presented suggests, however, this model is somewhat too neat and requires modification to account for shifting alliances over (often relatively short periods of) time. In a trial, reasoning from the assumptions of this model, we attempted to pick out those blocs and members who shifted from side to side. We were, however, unable to do so except in a few instances, largely, we believe, because the model as heretofore developed is static.

The technique by which we tried to pick out the marginal or shifting members was the calculation of an "empirical power index" for each Representative in the first session of the Eighty-Sixth Congress, using as an index a refined version of one suggested by Shapley and Shubik as the empirical analogue of their a priori power index.<sup>2</sup> Entirely aside from the question of whether or not "power index" is an appropriate name for this measure—indeed it almost certainly is not, for roll calls do not reveal all, or perhaps even much, of the power relationships in Congress<sup>3</sup>—still the index does measure something which, conceivably, may be important. Precisely, it is a computation (over a series of roll calls, where the roll calls are weighted according to their significance) of the average chance that each Representative had to be the pivotal or marginal voter on the winning side. Somewhat more crudely explained, it orders Representatives according to the number of times they were on the winning side, with some adjustment for the relative importance of the kinds of winning.

The potential value of such an index is that, if a member is consistently rated high, this fact indicates he is usually voting with the winners. In a legislature like the House of Commons where one bloc always wins, this reveals nothing we do not already know. But in a legislature like Congress, where everybody wins once in a while, a high index separates out members who are marginal with respect to basically opposed blocs. Had we been able to use the index in this way, we would not only have additionally verified the model, but also have created a tool of practical value for, e.g., lobbyists who could use it to select those members most susceptible to conversion. We discovered, however, that high indices were not consistent over time, which indicates the need for some revision of the model. It suggests, furthermore, that the index might be used to detect, in practical circumstances, when major shifts of allegiance are occurring.

I. THE INDEX USED

Shapley and Shubik's a priori power index rests on the assumption that, for a member of a voting body, the most advantageous position is that of the marginal or last-added member of a minimal winning coalition, defined as a coalition which would be losing or for Evaluating the Distribution of Power in a Committee System," this REVIEW, Vol. 48 (1954), pp. 787-792.

<sup>3</sup> Wilder Crane, "A Caveat on Roll Call Studies of Party Voting," Midwest Journal of Political Science, Vol. 4 (1960), pp. 237-249.

* Much of the material in this essay was originally reported in the junior author's honors paper, "An Attempt to Predict Power in the House of Representatives" (Lawrence College Library, 1960, typewritten). We are indebted, for grants to defray the cost of computation, to The Social Science Research Council; the Lawrence College Fund for Research on Public Affairs (a gift of the Ford Foundation); and the Numerical Analysis Laboratory of the University of Wisconsin, where the computation was done. The senior author thanks the Center for Advanced Study in the Behavioral Sciences, where this essay was written.

<sup>1</sup> See, for example, David B. Truman, The Congressional Party: A Case Study (New York, 1959).

<sup>2</sup> L. S. Shapley and Martin Shubik, "A Method

blocking if one member were subtracted. This seems intuitively persuasive and explains our attempt to use an empirical index based to some degree on the same assumption.<sup>4</sup>

In order to estimate a member's chance to occupy the pivotal position, Shapley and Shubik constructed the following model. For a body of  $n$  members, in which there exists a group large enough and willing to pass a motion, let the members vote randomly and declare the motion passed when the  $m$ th member has voted for it, where  $m$  "yes" votes are required for passage. Define as the pivot the member in the  $m$ th position and note that there are  $n!$  (read " $n$  factorial," that is  $1 \cdot 2 \cdot \dots \cdot n$ ) such random orderings of  $n$  voters (that is, the permutations of  $a, b, \dots, n$ ). Then define the power,  $p$ , of a member,  $i$ , thus:  $p_i = t_i/n!$ , where  $t_i$  is the number of times  $i$  is pivot. It is difficult to say just what ought to be regarded as the empirical analogue of this ratio because one almost never knows who is in the pivotal position on a real vote. But Shapley and Shubik have suggested the following as one possibility: When there are  $d$  members on the winning side  $p_i = 1/d$ , if  $i$  is on the winning side, and  $p_i = 0$ , if  $i$  is not. This measure can, by appropriate processes of summation, be extended to cover a series of roll calls. Furthermore, it readily admits of interpretation as the chance that a particular member was pivotal. But, as its originators pointed out, it has the disadvantage of failing to distinguish among roll calls of varying significance. In order to adjust for this feature, we corrected the empirical index with a coefficient of significance of roll calls in voting bodies. This coefficient,  $s$ , where  $0 \leq s \leq 1$ , is based on the assumption that the most significant outcome possible on a vote occurs when (a) all members vote and (b) the margin between winners and losers is at minimum; and that the least significant outcome is one in which (a) a bare quorum votes and (b) the outcome is unanimous. The coefficient,  $s$ , is constructed by appropriately combining these standards into a measure that gives a unique value for each possible outcome of voting, and then normalizing these values into the interval between zero and one.<sup>5</sup> Using  $s$ , the empirical power index is corrected to the following:

$$P_i = \sum_{\lambda \in M} \left[ \frac{1}{d_\lambda} \cdot \frac{s_\lambda}{\sum_{\mu=1}^v (s_\mu)} \right]$$

where " $v$ " denotes a series of roll calls, " $P_i$ " denotes the power index for  $i$  over the series of  $v$  roll calls, " $\lambda$ " and " $\mu$ " denote particular roll calls, and " $M$ " denotes the set of all roll calls in which  $i$  is on the winning side. Then,

$$\sum_{i=1}^n (P_i) = 1.$$

We should note in passing that the correction with  $s$  considerably complicates the calculations, in some cases perhaps needlessly so. It is our subjective and unverified impression that, if  $v$  is a large number, say 100, the corrections tend to cancel out. If, however,  $v$  is a small number, say 5, the corrected index may be quite different from an uncorrected one.

II. PROCEDURE

This study used all the roll calls in the House of Representatives during the first session of the Eighty-sixth Congress, a session chosen entirely on the practical grounds that we were reasonably familiar with the issues and political tone of the Congress. For each of the 87 roll calls, it was recorded that a member (a) voted on the winning side, (b) voted on the losing side, (c) did not vote, although eligible to do so, or (d) did not vote because ineligible. Members who had specific pairs were recorded as voting; members who had general pairs were not.

The 87 roll calls were divided into various kinds of subsets:

(1) Twelve subsets were based on a classification of subject matter. Although every one of the 87 roll calls was assigned to at least one of these twelve subsets, the subsets were not disjoint. For example, all the roll calls classified under "foreign military aid" were also classified under "foreign aid." Again, some of the roll calls classified under "prestige of Mr.

<sup>4</sup> It is difficult to make a precise empirical observation that will strengthen one's confidence in the appropriateness of this assumption. See William H. Riker, "A Test of the Adequacy of the Power Index," Behavioral Science, Vol. 4 (1959), pp. 120-131, where it is shown that it is not clear whether or not the "power" of the index corresponds to the participants' notion of what "power" is. For a related investigation of a related definition see Duncan MacRae, Jr., and Hugh D. Price, "Scale Positions and 'Power' in the Senate," Behavioral Science, Vol. 4 (1959), pp. 212-18.

<sup>5</sup> The technique of calculation of  $s$  and some a priori arguments justifying its use as a measure are set forth in William H. Riker, "A Method for Determining the Significance of Roll Calls in Voting Bodies" in John C. Wahlke and Heinz Eulau, eds., Legislative Behavior (Glencoe, 1959), pp. 377-383.

Ezra Benson" were also classified under "agriculture." The substantive content of these subsets is fairly clearly indicated by their titles as given in Table I, except perhaps for "development projects," by which we mean such subjects as grants for airports, sewage disposal, etc.

(2) Five subsets were based on a classification according to procedural or political considerations which, prior to the calculation, we thought might turn out to be important. Again, these were not disjoint sets. Furthermore, not all roll calls were assigned to them. One was a set of those roll calls classified by the Congressional Quarterly as expressive of a Republican-Southern Democratic coalition.<sup>8</sup> Others were roll calls with high party cohesion in both parties (using Lowell's standard of 90 per cent of the party on one side, rather than Rice's index), roll calls requiring a two-thirds majority for passage, roll calls on overriding Presidential vetoes, and roll calls on amendments and motions to recommit.

(3) Finally, the eighteenth subset was the identity subset of all 87 roll calls, that is, the subset which is the set itself.

One major consideration in the construction of these sets was that each should contain at least three and preferably eight or ten roll calls. With small numbers of roll calls, most of the members are likely to have one of four or five indices so that there is very little differentiation. Naturally, this requirement biased the result, as did also our a priori selection of classifications. If this calculation were to be replicated, we believe that a considerably larger number of subsets would be desirable. In particular, it occurs to us that calculations involving subsets of scalable roll calls would be especially interesting.<sup>7</sup>

Each of the 18 subsets was then divided in half chronologically and  $P_i$  was calculated for the 36 resulting subsets as well as for the original 18, making 54 sets of power indices altogether.<sup>8</sup> Finally, for each of the 18 subsets, coefficients of correlation,  $r$ , were calculated between the  $P_i$  of the first and the second chronological halves of the roll calls in the subset.

III. RESULTS

While the a priori power index is about .002288 for each member of the House, the empirical index on all 87 roll calls (subset 18) varied from zero to .003283.<sup>9</sup> The medians for groups often thought to be relevant to coalition-making in the House were:<sup>10</sup>

All Democrats	.002582
All Republicans	.001810
Southern Democrats	.002554
Northern Democrats	.002553
Border Democrats	.002746

<sup>8</sup> This calculation was done on an IBM 650 at the Numerical Analysis Laboratory of the University of Wisconsin. The work was programmed by Mr. Stephen Robinson under the direction of Mr. George Struble. We are indebted to both of them for a clever program and the sharpening of the interpretation of the index. In addition to the power index, two closely related indices were calculated. One was an eligibility index, that is, the  $P_i$  for each member for that part of each set of roll calls in which the member was eligible to vote. The other was a voting index, that is, the  $P_i$  for each member for that part of each set of roll calls on which the member actually voted. These latter indices varied only slightly from the empirical power index for most members. They did help to distinguish, however, between members whose power index was low because they genuinely occupied a disadvantageous position and those whose index was low because of adventitious circumstances. In general, only the empirical power index is used in the subsequent interpretation.

<sup>9</sup> An index of zero was only obtained by those who never voted, such as Speaker Rayburn. (Part of the difficulty with the name of the index is underscored by this curious result: that the man often considered the most powerful had an "empirical power index" of zero.) The lowest index for a member who participated fully and who also had the lowest voting index was .001022.

<sup>10</sup> Throughout this essay "Southern Democrat" (or "SD") means Democrats from the 11 states of the old confederacy; "Border Democrat" (or "BD") means Democrats from Delaware, Maryland, West Virginia, Kentucky, Missouri, and Oklahoma; while "Northern Democrat" (or "ND") means Democrats from all the remaining states.

<sup>6</sup> Congressional Quarterly Weekly Report, Vol. 17 (#49, 4 December 1959), p. 1519 ff.

<sup>7</sup> See Duncan MacRae, Jr., Dimensions of Congressional Voting (Berkeley, University of California Press, 1958). Since we were attempting to predict rather than interpret, we constructed no Guttman-type scales, which are more useful for post-hoc interpretation than for day-to-day prediction. An effort to use our index for interpretation, however, might be especially informative if scalability and consistency of indices over time were found to be associated.

TABLE I. COEFFICIENTS OF CORRELATION BETWEEN EMPIRICAL POWER INDICES OF MEMBERS ON ROLL CALLS, BY SUBSETS DIVIDED CHRONOLOGICALLY, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, 86TH CONG., 1ST SESS.

Subset	Description	No. of Roll Calls		Coefficient of Correlation
		First Half	Second Half
1	Interest rate and monetary policy	3	3	.537
2	Defense	6	6	.240
3	Foreign military aid	3	2	.829
4	Foreign aid	4	4	.826
5	Agriculture	6	6	.572
6	Prestige of Mr. Ezra Benson	2	2	-.534
7	Development projects	12	12	.815
8	Public Works projects	4	4	.084
9	Public housing	3	3	.627
10	Public housing and labor reform	5	5	.078
11	Labor reform and civil liberties	4	4	.452
12	States rights	3	2	.004
13	Republican-Southern Democratic coalition	6	5	.843
14	High party cohesion in both parties	2	2	-.754
15	Roll Calls needing 2/3 Majority	6	5	.411
16	Overriding vetoes	2	1	.761
17	Amendments and motions to recommit	14	13	.361
18	All roll calls	44	43	.484

The main results are set forth in Table I. In two instances the value for  $r$  is negative, when, with only four roll calls involved, one set of blocs won on the first two and the other set on the second two. Since the generally low values of  $r$  might be the result of the variations among members with medium or low indices, we also tried to predict members with "high" indices in both the halves on several selected sets (where "high" means all those indices that stood above an obvious break in the scale). But in most subsets the number of members with "high" indices is too large to be useful. Some of these results are set forth in Table II. It will be observed that, except in the case of subset 11 (Labor Reform and Civil Liberties) this second attempt at prediction adds almost no information to what Table I shows.

IV. INTERPRETATION

For the set of all roll calls the coefficient of correlation between the  $P_i$  of the first chrono-

TABLE II. FREQUENCY OF HIGH EMPIRICAL POWER INDICES ON SELECTED ROLL CALL SUBSETS, DIVIDED CHRONOLOGICALLY, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, 86TH CONG., 1ST SESS.

Subset	Description	No. with High Indices			$c \div a$
		First Half (a)	Second Half (b)	Both Halves (c)
1	Interest rate and monetary policy	175	172	110	.63
3	Foreign military aid	216	210	165	.76
8	Public works projects	18	18	3	.17
11	Labor reform and civil liberties	264	264	216	.82
13	Republican-Southern Democratic coalition*	168	159	114	.68
13	Republican-Southern Democratic coalition*	18	145	9	.50
18	All roll calls	44	44	13	.30

* For subset 13, two standards of "high" have been used.

logical half and the  $P_i$  of the second chronological half is  $r = +.484$  which suggests that one might expect to be right on a prediction about once in four times. While this is considerably higher than pure chance, it is not high enough to warrant staking a heavy wager on it. While other correlations in Table I are considerably closer, there is a technical explanation for some of these high values for  $r$  and this explanation somewhat vitiates the usefulness of the empirical index. Thus the set for which  $r$  is highest is set 13, involving roll calls expressive of the Republican-Southern Democratic coalition as selected by the editors of Congressional Quarterly. Since these roll calls were selected precisely because they betokened a visible and enduring and cohesive coalition, naturally the power indices in the first and second halves are roughly identical. In short, these roll calls are known beforehand to satisfy the conditions under which in the introduction of this essay we inferred that prediction would be possible. The discovery that it is possible in these cases is, therefore, not surprising. Indeed, the only odd feature of this rather high value for  $r$  is that it is not somewhat higher. Even in what skilled journalist observers regarded as a very tight pair of coalitions there is apparently considerable fluidity if one can predict only about 70 per cent of the indices accurately. Two other high values for  $r$  are also explained by the same technical fact that the subsets were defined in terms of known and cohesive blocs (i.e., subset 14, involving roll calls with high party cohesion, and subset 16, involving roll calls on overriding Presidential vetoes).

Nevertheless, apart from these special cases, there remain two subsets constructed around substantive issues (subset 4 on foreign aid and subset 7 on development projects) for which the values of  $r$  are fairly high. (We ignore the high value for set 3, since all the roll calls in this set are also in set 4.) For these two subjects in this session of Congress, we have in effect discovered that the model of consistently opposed blocs with unattached members supplying the margin of victory is reasonably accurate. In the Congress that MacRae studied, votes on foreign aid issues were reasonably scalable on a uni-dimensional scale and we assume that these are also. The interesting additional information is about development projects, which were at the heart of the disagreement between parties in this session. Regardless of whether or not a uni-dimensional scale exists on this subject, it is apparent that some sort of consistent structure of blocs exists. In these two areas, at least, it may be said that the attempt at prediction was somewhat successful. Unfortunately, however, these issues involved only 16 of the 43 roll calls on which we tried to predict. So in the larger sense the attempt at prediction was unsuccessful.

The interesting question is, therefore, why the values for  $r$  were so generally low for subsets 1-2, 5-6, and 8-12. We offer two mutually reinforcing explanations.

The first is that the character of the issues, and indeed the whole tone of Congress, changed during the session. For all the subsets on substantive issues (numbers 1-12) the roll calls are drawn almost equally from the two halves of set 18 and indeed from the first and second temporal halves of the session. This is to say that, for each substantive issue, roll calls were scattered about equally through the time of the session. But for set 13 (Republican-Southern Democratic coalition) only 3 out of 11 roll calls are drawn from the first half of set 18 and one of these three is the 44th, the last roll call in the first half of the set. This fact fairly clearly indicates that the so-called coalition played a much greater role in the second half of the session than in the first. Systematic evidence to this effect is set forth in Table III. As the table indicates, slightly over half of the highest 44 indices in the first half of the session belonged to Northern Democrats; while in the second half of the session exactly half the high indices belonged to Southern Democrats. Apparently, in the first half of the session, Northern Democrats were more likely to have pivoted, and in the second half, Southerners. Clearly, the balance of power shifted as the session proceeded. We have no inside information to explain why this occurred (and would probably mistrust it if we did). Perhaps, as some (Republican-oriented) journals of opinion suggested, it was owing to the ingenuity of the

TABLE III. DISTRIBUTION OF MEMBERS WITH POWER INDICES AMONG THE HIGHEST
10 PER CENT, BY BLOCS

	ND	BD	SD	R
First half (roll calls 1-44)	23	9	12	0
Second half (roll calls 45-87)	8	8	22	6
All roll calls	11	10	23	0
Idealized Distribution*
1. Assuming only Democrats may have high indices	24	5	15	0
2. Assuming all members may have high indices	15	4	10	15

* Assuming each bloc is represented in the highest 10 per cent in proportion to its strength in the House.

minority leader, Mr. Halleck. Just as reasonably, it may be attributed to the reluctance of the majority leader, Mr. McCormack, to bring up issues he knew would split his party before the issues on which they were better agreed were disposed of. Regardless of the causal explanation, the fact of a shift in tone during the session is undeniable. And this fact can in turn explain much of our failure in prediction. If the kind of winning coalitions changed somewhat, if the best chance of pivoting was transferred from Northern to Southern Democrats—if, in short, the persons in the marginal positions changed—then, of named them, we then suppose that their members always behave as if they were bloc members. To a very considerable extent, indeed, they do; but sometimes they do not and it is this fact that so often distorts our discussion of events in Congress.

For example, the assertion that Southern Democrats combine with Republicans to defeat Northern Democrats is of course often true—except when it is not. In this session it was mostly true of 11 out of 87 roll calls. But it cannot always be true, else we would not have the astonishing result that the median empirical power index for Northern and course, the index of marginality for the first half would not accurately predict marginality in the second half.<sup>11</sup>

FIGURE 1. Distribution by faction of power indices for all 87 roll calls.

A second explanation for the low values of  $r$  on 9 of the 12 subsets is that the blocs themselves are considerably less cohesive than popular opinion would have them be. We often fallaciously reify blocs and, having <sup>11</sup> This reason for our failure to predict turns out to suggest an interesting and possibly valuable use of the empirical power index. Since it is temporally oriented and since (unlike other techniques of studying roll calls such as scalograms or bloc analysis) it is computed wholly by a machine once the roll calls are recorded and does not therefore require the judgment of a skilled observer in computation, it could be used to detect in week-by-week analysis just such changes in tone and coalitions as they occur.

Southern Democrats was for the whole session almost exactly the same. Instead, in terms of medians, it was the Border Democrats who showed up as 'strongest—a result which, on reflection, seems wholly acceptable intuitively. In Figure 1, the distribution of power indices among several factions is set forth. The distribution for Southern Democrats is actually trimodal, which suggests that there is not one Southern Democracy but three (or more), each of which has a different relationship with the rest of the party. Similarly, Border Democrats display a bimodal distribution which suggests that they too are far from homogeneous. If a simple modal distribution, such as appears for Republicans and Northern Democrats suggests a basic uni-dimensional continuum of attitudes, certainly the bimodal and trimodal distributions within commonly recognized factions hints at the existence of a multidimensional set of attitudes, which, of course, complicates prophecy.

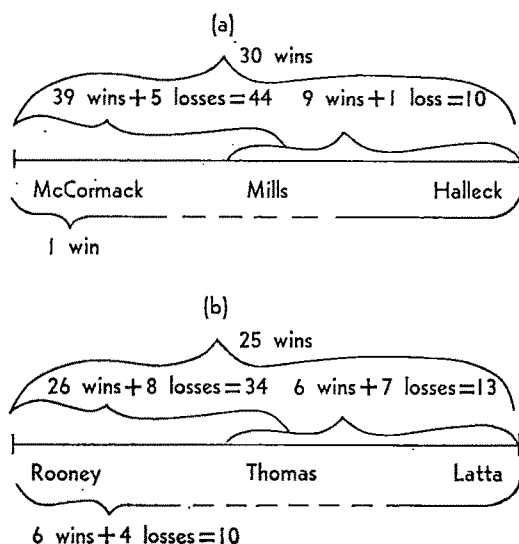

FIGURE 2. Diagram of coalitions of (a) leaders and (b) followers.

We believe that the fallacy of reification occurs because journalists and scholars alike observe chiefly the behavior of leaders of blocs without also closely observing the behavior of all members. Of course, all techniques for dealing with roll-call results force the scholar to consider the rank and file; but this pressure is especially strong when one is faced, as we are, with expectations drawn from observation of leaders that turn out to be false when applied to followers. We find that the behavior of leaders of the three blocs, Northern Democratic, Southern Democratic, and Republican, was quite coherent and indeed almost scalable on a unidimensional scale. This is not true of rank-and-file members. In Figure 2 is shown the number of occasions—regardless of their relative significance—on which (a) leaders of blocs voted together and (b) rank-and-file members voted together. For this Figure we selected Messrs. McCormack and Halleck because they were the authoritatively selected leaders of their parties. Southern Democrats have no authoritatively selected leader, so we arbitrarily gave them one in the person of Wilbur Mills of Arkansas, the Southern Democrat with the second highest power index (.003280, as compared with .003283 for another Southerner, Lindley Beckworth of Texas) and one who was often believed to act for Speaker Rayburn. Messrs. Rooney (Dem. of Brooklyn, N.Y.), Thomas (Dem. of Houston, Texas) and Latta (Rep. of Bowling Green, Ohio) were selected because they had the median empirical power indices of their respective factions. In these diagrams the brackets indicate acting together on a vote and the numbers above each bracket record the number of occasions when each kind of coalition formed. The broken bracket and figures beneath the names indicate the number of occasions when members at both ends sided together against the one in the middle.

It is apparent from Figure 2 that, when all three did not agree, McCormack and Halleck hardly ever combined against Mills. Hence a rather neat continuum is shown, with Mills in the middle—and indeed he undoubtedly achieved his high index by the fact that whichever one he sided with won. When we turn from leaders to rank-and-file members, however, the picture is less clear. Although Thomas voted with Rooney much more frequently than he did with Latta and thus behaved somewhat like Mills, nevertheless, Rooney and Latta combined against Thomas much more frequently than McCormack and Halleck combined against Mills. All three rank-and-file members exhibit some deviation from the behavior of leaders. Both Rooney and Thomas showed considerably greater preference for alliance with Republicans than did their leaders. And conversely Latta found it easier to vote with both Southern and Northern Democrats than Halleck did. Clearly, the relationship in Figure 2 (b) is not scalable on a uni-dimensional scale and rank-and-file members do not follow their leaders as much as we might expect.

This fact accounts for much of our failure to predict. If all members of all blocs perceived all issues in the same (uni-dimensional) way, prediction would be easy. But in fact issues are not so perceived nor, as MacRae has demonstrated, and as Figure 2 also demonstrates, are they uni-dimensional. Hence attempts at prediction by essentially uni-dimensional devices, such as the empirical power index and all other measures known to us, are bound to fail.

These two explanations of the low values for  $r$  reinforce each other. To say that dominant coalitions change over time is to say that the perception of issues changes over time. Hence these two explanations are probably two aspects of one more complex explanation, which is that Congress is a dynamic system that can only with difficulty be analyzed by essentially static statistical techniques. Yet all evidence for the existence of relatively stable blocs is largely static in conception. Bloc analysis, for example, is carried through by counting pairs of ballots on a vote as if all the votes occurred simultaneously, when in fact they are cast over a period of many months. The same comment applies (with less force) to scalogram analysis wherein, necessarily, attitudes are scaled as if there were no time dimension. (When scalable issues are discovered, however, the scalogram proves that the attitudes persisted over time; no such proof is inferable from the results of bloc analysis.) Even the simple selection of roll calls that reveal a coalition (such as the Congressional Quarterly makes) is only crudely related to time. Out of all these static analyses we obtain some evidence of the existence of continuing factions, evidence which tends to confirm the hypotheses of the model. If we considered only the third line of Table III our calculations also would tend to confirm them, for Southern Democrats appear to be marginal far more frequently than their numbers warrant. But if we take into account the first and second lines, it quickly appears that this high degree of marginality occurred mostly in the second half of the session. Without the time dimension, therefore, our study would constitute merely some more not-very-conclusive evidence in support of the model. The time dimension, however, tends to cast some doubt on its validity.

V. CONCLUSION

The findings of this attempt to predict power indices may be summarized as follows:

1. A rather imprecisely defined set of blocs did exist in the first session of the Eighty-Sixth Congress.
2. On two kinds of issues (and for 32 out of 87 roll calls) a fairly high degree of consistency of power indices persisted through the session. For these issues the model was to some degree validated. These 32 roll calls involved (a) the main political issue of the session (i.e., development projects) and (b) the main political issue of the decade (i.e., foreign aid). Precisely what inference should be drawn from this fact we are not certain.
3. On the other sorts of issues, the model was not validated for it turned out to be impossible to predict members' voting behavior with accuracy. This failure does not mean that on these issues no underlying blocs existed. Rather it means that, if they did exist, their outlines were fuzzy.

4. The exact membership and relative strength and position of blocs changes over time. The crucial features of the change seem to be the content of issues and perhaps the skill and strategy of leaders.

The significance of these findings may be interpreted by a paradox (suggested to us by Professor Glendon Schubert): the wholly literary interpretations of Congressional behavior (in which class one might place Bailey's and Young's<sup>12</sup>) leave one with the impression of anarchy in Congress. No generalizations whatsoever, so one infers, can be made, for every decision is the product of some unforeseeable combination of strategy and counter-strategy. On the other hand, the interpretations based on statistical manipulation of a massive amount of data on voting (in which class one might place the aforementioned studies by Truman and MacRae) suggest that fairly coherent and cohesive blocs exist, so that generalization is possible. In resolution of the paradox, our evidence suggests that the truth of the matter lies somewhere in between the literary and statistical extremes.

In particular, our evidence suggests why this paradox of interpretation has occurred. Literary analyses are historical in orientation and hence fully cognizant of temporal changes. Statistical analyses, on the other hand, usually treat material gathered from different times as simultaneous. Undue concentration on temporal change of course results in an undue emphasis on the unique, while static analysis tends to ignore those unique events of which the results tend to cancel out in summary presentation. These considerations lead us to conclude that a really adequate model of Congress—or of any legislature—must be susceptible to verification by both static and dynamic techniques, and so must allow for both persistent tendencies and episodic variations.

<sup>12</sup> Stephen Bailey, Congress Makes a Law, (New York, Columbia University Press, 1950) and Roland Young, This is Congress, (New York, 2d ed., 1946).

RELIGIOUS INFLUENCE ON WISCONSIN VOTING, 1928-1960

ANDREW R. BAGGALEY
Temple University

The extent of religious influence on the closely contested presidential election of 1960 has been much debated. Many have claimed that the Wisconsin primary revealed a religious split which then became one of the main issues of the campaign. This paper reports the results of an analysis of religious influence on voting in that state for several elections since the campaign of 1928, when Alfred E. Smith was the first major-party presidential candidate of the Roman Catholic faith. The thesis which will be defended is that religious influences on voting in Wisconsin, although much reduced from 1928, were still considerable enough to have been critical in an election as close as that of 1960. Several independent types of evidence from voting returns will be presented to bolster this argument.

A relatively straightforward method of analysis is to correlate the percent of the two-party vote in various electoral units with available demographic statistics for the same units. A good example of this technique is Ogburn and Talbot's study of 173 counties in eight states in the 1928 presidential election.<sup>1</sup> Their analysis suggested that, of the six variables they investigated, the prohibition issue was most important, followed by the religious factor and then the factor of foreign birth. Contrary to the speculations of many commentators during 1960, they found the urban-rural split to be of quite minor importance.

Robinson has made a cogent criticism of this method of analysis.<sup>2</sup> He calls correlations calculated from percents of groups of people "ecological correlations," and correlations calculated directly from the characteristics of single persons in the groups "individual correlations." He shows that the fact that people with similar characteristics tend to cluster into groups brings about situations where ecological correlations exceed individual correlations. Thus he claims that ecological correlations based on geographically defined units give an exaggerated picture of the relations existing between demographic variables for the individuals within these units. He further shows that this inflating influence increases when the size of the groups increases.

Robinson's article stimulated Goodman to suggest an alternative way of dealing with ecological percents.<sup>3</sup> In Goodman's technique a regression line is developed such that (using the type of example which will be dealt with below), for each area, from the percent of Roman Catholics a prediction can be made of the percent in the area who will vote for Kennedy. This technique was adopted at the beginning of the present investigation. However, when the points were plotted comparing the percentage of Roman Catholic members in the total population of the 71 Wisconsin counties<sup>4</sup> with the returns for several relevant recent elections, it was apparent that a better fit to the data could be obtained by drawing parabolas instead of straight lines. Figures 1 and 2 show the scatter plots, respectively, for the presidential elections of 1928 and 1960. It will be noted that, although the percents for Smith and for Kennedy increase with an increase in Roman Catholic percent, the voting increase is not proportional, so that the regression lines bend slightly downward as they move to the right in both diagrams.

The relation of religious preference to voting was also studied for three other elections of this era: the School Bus Referendum of 1946, involving the question whether public school buses should carry parochial school pupils; the presidential election of 1956; and the presidential primary election of 1960. By a method described by Lewis<sup>5</sup> the defining statistical constants were calculated for the "best-fitting" parabola for each of the five elections. With  $X$  representing the percent Roman Catholic in each case, and  $Y$  representing, in turn, the percent (1) for Smith in 1928, (2) for the school bus referendum in 1946, (3) for Stevenson in 1956, (4) for Kennedy in the 1960 primary, and (5) for Kennedy in the 1960 final

<sup>3</sup> Leo A. Goodman, "Ecological Regressions and Behavior of Individuals," American Sociological Review, Vol. 18 (1953), pp. 663-664.

<sup>4</sup> Churches and Church Membership in the United States, Series C, Numbers 18 & 19, Bureau of Research and Survey, National Council of the Churches of Christ in the U.S.A. (1957).

<sup>5</sup> Don Lewis, Quantitative Methods in Psychology (New York, 1960), pp. 100-102.

<sup>1</sup> William F. Ogburn and Nell Talbot, "A Measurement of the Factors in the Presidential Election of 1928," Social Forces, Vol. 8 (1929), pp. 175-183.

<sup>2</sup> W. S. Robinson, "Ecological Correlations and the Behavior of Individuals," American Sociological Review, Vol. 15 (1950), pp. 351-357.

FIG. 1. Voting for Smith in Wisconsin counties in 1928 as a function of Roman Catholic concentration in the population.

election, the equations for the parabolas are:

$$\begin{aligned} Y_1 &= 22.2 + .788X - .00187X^2, \\ Y_2 &= 15.7 + 1.128X - .00482X^2, \\ Y_3 &= 38.0 - .185X + .00254X^2, \\ Y_4 &= 15.4 + .876X - .00376X^2, \text{ and} \\ Y_5 &= 35.9 + .361X - .00103X^2. \end{aligned}$$

This type of analysis gives a satisfactory descriptive picture of the religious influence in each election, but it is of further interest to attempt a ranking of the five elections in this respect by developing a single index. The solution adopted was to compare the predicted vote in each election for hypothetical counties which were 0 percent Roman Catholic with those which were 100 percent Roman Catholic. In the 1928 election, for example, substitution of 0 for  $X$  in the first equation above gives a  $Y$  value of 22.2 percent. Similarly, substitution of 100 for  $X$  gives a  $Y$  value of 82.3 percent (i.e.,  $22.2 + 78.8 - 18.7$ ). Subtracting 22.2 percent from 82.3 percent yields a difference attributable to religious influences of 60.1 percent in the 1928 presidential election. Use of this index produces the following rank ordering for religious influence: first, the 1946 school bus referendum with 64.6 percent; second, the 1928 presidential election with 60.1 percent; third, the 1960 presidential primary with 50.0 percent; fourth, the 1960 presidential election with 25.8 percent; and fifth and last, the 1956 presidential election with 6.9 percent.

The picture which these figures suggest is that the 1928 and 1946 elections showed considerable religious influence on Wisconsin voting, the 1960 primary somewhat less, the 1960 final election much less, and the 1956 election practically none at all. However, it should be noted that in the 1960 primary there were two Democratic candidates, Kennedy and Humphrey, but only one Republican candidate, Nixon. This circumstance may have produced a greater turnout of Roman Catholic Democrats than of Roman Catholic Republicans in the primary. If so, the figure of 50.0 percent given above probably represents an exaggerated picture of the extent of religious influence in the 1960 primary. On the other hand, many Roman Catholic Republicans may have voted for Kennedy in that primary with little intention of voting for him in the final election, either because they wished to give a coreligionist a chance to be a presidential nominee or because they regarded Kennedy as "less radical" than Humphrey. Many observers have noted the Wisconsin voters' long tradition of "crossover voting" during the present century. In view of these competing interpretations about voting in the primary, it is perhaps safer to conclude that both 1960 elections showed a religious influence which was significantly less than that in 1928 and 1946 but still quite a bit greater than that in 1956.

FIG. 2. Voting for Kennedy in Wisconsin counties in the 1960 final election as a function of Roman Catholic concentration in the population.

The virtual lack of religious influence in the 1956 presidential election is corroborated by the survey evidence of Campbell, Converse, Miller, and Stokes.<sup>6</sup> After comparing the candidate preference of Roman Catholic voters

<sup>6</sup> Angus Campbell, Philip E. Converse, Warren E. Miller, and Donald E. Stokes, The American Voter (New York, 1960), p. 306.

TABLE I. VOTING IN THE WISCONSIN AREAS EXTREME IN THE 1946 SCHOOL BUS REFERENDUM

	1946 School Bus Referendum %	1928 Smith %	1956 Stevenson %	1960 Kennedy
				Primary %	Final %
State of Wisconsin	45	45	38	40	48
High School-Bus
Towns	88	87	45	71	69
Villages	89	88	34	76	69
Low School-Bus
Towns	7	20	46	10	40
Villages and Cities	7	19	29	15	29

with that of a "control group matched for a variety of conditions of life situation," they concluded that Roman Catholics were only 2.9 percent more Democratic in this election than the rest of the American voting population. However, the survey evidence from this and other studies suggests that Eisenhower was the only Republican presidential candidate in recent decades who could induce Roman Catholics of higher socio-economic status to "vote their pocketbook instead of their religion."

Although Goodman's method of analysis of ecological data seems to obviate many of Robinson's criticisms, it is likely that more valid relationships can be discovered when the ecological unit used is as small as possible, for the exaggeration of ecological correlations is most pronounced with large groups. Unfortunately, statistics on religious preference are not available for political units smaller than counties. Nevertheless, the analysis reported above suggests that the 1946 school bus referendum can be used as a rather valid indicator of the percent of Roman Catholics in the smaller political units. The returns filed in the Office of the Secretary of State in Madison, Wisconsin were searched, and the precincts at the two extremes with respect to vote for the school bus referendum were recorded. Eighteen villages<sup>7</sup> and 47 towns<sup>8</sup> voted more than 80 percent for the school bus issue, and below they are referred to by the phrase "high school-bus." Six small cities, 40 villages, and 79 towns voted less than 10 percent for the school bus issue, and below they are called "low school-bus."

Collectively, the high school-bus villages voted 89 percent for the issue, and the high school-bus towns, 88 percent; whereas the low school-bus cities and villages voted 7 percent for the issue, and the low school-bus towns the same. Henceforth, the voters of the small cities and villages will be called "villagers," and the voters of the towns will be called "farmers."

Table I shows the percent vote for the Democratic candidates in the other four elections under consideration. It can be seen at once that Smith did virtually as well in the high school-bus areas as the school-bus issue itself. However, he did not do quite as poorly in the low school-bus areas as the school-bus issue, a circumstance which may have resulted from the depressed economic condition of rural Wisconsin in 1928. All 61 of the high school-bus areas which existed as political units in 1928, without exception, voted for Smith. All but 4 of the 120 existing low school-bus areas voted for Hoover in 1928. Considering the fact that 18 years separated the two elections and the fact that one election concerned candidates for office and the other an issue, it is difficult to perceive any factor which might account for the remarkable correspondence of voting in these two elections other than the factor of religious preference. Therefore in the discussion below, the assumption will be made that the high school-bus areas are Roman Catholic areas and that the low school-bus areas are Protestant areas.

On the basis of this assumption, the results for the other three elections with respect to religious influence correspond perfectly with the results reported above based on county units; i.e., the order remains: 1928, then 1960 primary, then 1960 final, and 1956 in last place. Furthermore it can be seen that the farmer vs. villager split was more important in 1956 than the religious split. Both Protestant and Roman Catholic farmers favored the Democratic ticket<sup>9</sup> more than their villager counterparts. This farmer-villager split persisted in the 1960 final election for the Protestant voters; however Kennedy seems to have appealed to the Roman Catholic villagers as much as he did to the Roman Catholic farmers.

<sup>7</sup> Two other villages, Frederic in Polk County and Stockholm in Pepin County, were recorded as more than 80 percent in favor of the school bus issue. However, their vote in other recent elections was so consistently in contradiction to this vote that the author suspected these figures had been inadvertently reversed in reporting. In personal correspondence with the author, the Polk County Clerk suggested that the election inspectors may have committed such an error. These two villages accordingly were excluded both from the "high school-bus" group and the "low school-bus" group.

<sup>8</sup> In Wisconsin "towns" are highly rural areas which correspond to the townships of most other states.

In 1956 all 18 of the Roman Catholic villages voted for Eisenhower; in 1960 all 18, without exception, voted for Kennedy. The abruptness of the change can be seen by noting the vote in the most populous of these villages, Little Chute, which is in a heavily Dutch Catholic area. In 1956 Eisenhower beat Stevenson, 1167 to 521; in 1960 Kennedy beat Nixon, 1467 to 573. This represents a change of 41 percentage points, whereas in the state of Wisconsin as a whole there was a change of only 10 percentage points.

As already noted, interpretation of the 1960 primary is less straightforward because of the presence of three candidates in the race. However, it is significant that Humphrey, the other Democratic candidate, did quite well in the Protestant areas. He gained 66 percent of the vote of the Protestant farmers, 41 percent of the Protestant villagers, 16 percent of the Roman Catholic farmers, and 8 percent of the Roman Catholic villagers.

The conclusion which emerges from these figures and other sources of evidence is that the candidacy of Kennedy in 1960 caused the old fires of religious controversy to flare anew in midwestern rural America. In the case of the Roman Catholic farmers and villagers, the issue of foreign policy has served to lessen the hold of the Democratic Party, as Lubell has so well documented.<sup>10</sup>

The town of Marshfield in Fond du Lac County provides an excellent case history of voting in a heavily German Catholic area. In the majority of elections before 1916, Marshfield gave the Democratic presidential candidate more than 90 percent of its vote. However, the influence of World War I is shown by the dip of Wilson's vote in 1916 to 45 percent and by Cox's showing of only 4 percent in 1920. LaFollette, the Progressive candidate who had opposed the entry of the United States into World War I, gained 86 percent of Marshfield's vote in 1924. Then there was a temporary return to the Democratic fold; Smith obtained 98 percent in 1928, and Roosevelt won 97 percent in 1932. Roosevelt won again in 1936, but Lemke, who opposed the international involvement which Roosevelt eventually led this country into, won 20 percent of the three-candidate vote. Then in 1940 the Democratic Presidential vote slid down to 22 percent, and it stayed below 25 percent through 1956, except in 1948 when Truman won 34 percent of Marshfield's vote. In 1960 the two powerful forces, the religious appeal of the Democratic standard bearer and the association of the Democratic Party with war, produced an almost exact equilibrium; Nixon won 379 votes in Marshfield, and Kennedy 369. (On the other hand, the Republican candidate for Lieutenant-Governor won, 432 to 254.) Only three other of the 47 high school-bus towns voted for Nixon.

On the other side of the fence, the Scandinavian Lutheran areas of western Wisconsin, heavily Republican in the 19th century, have become considerably more Democratic since 1928. The presumed reason is the position of the Democratic Party on farm issues. Yet the old religious pull has not departed completely. It can be seen from Table I that Kennedy in 1960 did no better in the low school-bus villages and cities than Stevenson in 1956 and that he ran 6 percent worse than Stevenson in the low school-bus towns.

The final evidence of religious influence on Wisconsin voting to be cited here concerns voting in Milwaukee County in the 1960 presidential primary. The areas where Kennedy won more than 75 percent of the three-candidate vote were drawn on a county map. In all these areas, the U. S. Census statistics indicated that a high proportion of the inhabitants were of Polish descent and therefore, presumably, of the Roman Catholic faith. The areas where Humphrey gained more than 75 percent of the vote were all in the Negro district, and he seems to have won the vast majority of his Wisconsin vote from Negroes and Protestant farmers and villagers.

Considered collectively, the various lines of evidence discussed above lend rather strong support to the conclusion that religious preference still exerted a considerable influence on Wisconsin voting in 1960.

<sup>9</sup> Newspaper reports during the campaign lead one to believe that Vice-Presidential candidate Kefauver attracted the Wisconsin farmers more than Presidential candidate Stevenson did.

<sup>10</sup> Samuel Lubell, Revolt of the Moderates (New York, 1956), pp. 64-74.

DEEDS WITHOUT DOCTRINES: CIVIL RIGHTS IN THE 1960 TERM OF THE SUPREME COURT<sup>1</sup>

ROBERT G. McCLOSKEY

Harvard University

In 1898, Mr. Justice Brewer measurably strengthened his claim to immortality by publicly inviting criticism of the Supreme Court. His words are well-worn now, for generations of professors have gratefully quoted them in journal and classroom;<sup>2</sup> and during the 20th century the challenge he issued has evoked a response that may give his shade occasional second thoughts. The Supreme Court has had many problems in the years since he spoke, but a shortage of critics has not been one of them. Journalists, academicians, and politicians have, in their several ways, poured out a steady stream of reproach which from time to time has swelled into a torrent.

<sup>1</sup> For a full review of the work of the term, including civil rights decisions, see "The Supreme Court: 1960 Term," Harvard Law Review, Vol. 75, pp. 40-244 (Nov., 1961); and Philip B. Kurland, ed., 1961 The Supreme Court Review (Chicago, 1962).

Among the books on the Court published during this period were: P. C. Acheson, The Supreme Court (New York, 1961); C. J. Antieau, Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States (Buffalo, New York, 1960); W. O. Douglas, A Living Bill of Rights (New York, 1961); O. K. Fraenkel, The Supreme Court and Civil Liberties: How the Court Has Protected the Bill of Rights (New York, 1960); P. A. Freund, The Supreme Court of the United States: Its Business, Purposes and Performance (Cleveland, 1961); W. L. King, Lincoln's Manager: David Davis (Cambridge, 1960); M. R. Konvitz, Bill of Rights Reader, 2 ed. rev. and enl. (Ithaca, New York, 1960); P. B. Kurland, ed., The Supreme Court Review (Chicago, 1960); Alexander Meiklejohn, Political Freedom: the Constitutional Powers of the People (New York, 1960); Wallace Mendelson, Justices Black and Frankfurter: Conflict in the Court (Chicago, 1961); W. F. Murphy and C. H. Pritchett, Courts, Judges, and Politics (New York, 1961); A. M. Paul, Conservative Crisis and the Rule of Law: Attitudes of Bar and Bench (Ithaca, N. Y., 1960); J. W. Peltason, Fifty-eight Lonely Men: Southern Federal Judges and School Desegregation (New York, 1961); E. Barrett Prettyman, Jr., Death and the Supreme Court (New York, 1961); C. H. Pritchett, Congress versus the Supreme Court 1957-1960 (Minneapolis, 1961); J. P. Roche, Courts and Rights: the American Judiciary in Action (New York, 1961); L. J. Salomon, ed., The Supreme Court (New York, 1961); G. A. Schubert, Constitutional Politics (New York, 1960); A. G. Taylor, Labor and the Supreme Court, 2 ed. (Ann Arbor, Michigan, 1961); Herbert Wechsler, Principles, Politics, and Fundamental Law (Cambridge, Mass., 1961); A. F. Westin, ed., The Supreme Court: Views from Inside (New York, 1961); T. Wilcox, States Rights vs. the Supreme Court (Boston, 1960).

I

The most recent of these outbreaks was set going by the desegregation decisions of 1954 and 1955 and a spate of mildly libertarian pronouncements involving the "subversion issue," in 1956 and 1957. The protest movement and its results have been ably recounted and evaluated elsewhere.<sup>3</sup> For present purposes it is enough to note that a vengeful and foolish anti-court law almost passed Congress in the summer of 1958, that the Court in subsequent years has stood absolutely firm on the desegregation question, but that the controversial doctrines in the subversion field have been held to extremely narrow implications. In this latter area there is room for argument as to whether the Court has significantly backtracked; at any rate the broadly libertarian promises that might have been inferred from some of the language in such decisions as Watkins,<sup>4</sup> Sweezy,<sup>5</sup> Slochower<sup>6</sup> and Konigsberg<sup>7</sup> were surely not fulfilled. If the judges were tempted three years ago to launch an all-out onslaught against subversive activities laws, a majority of them have now rather convincingly mastered the impulse.

<sup>2</sup> The most recent seems to be Schubert, op. cit., p. 18.

<sup>3</sup> Pritchett, op. cit.; Anthony Lewis, "The Supreme Court and its Critics," Minnesota Law Review, Vol. 45, pp. 305-332 (Jan., 1961); Freund, op. cit., pp. 171-191.

<sup>4</sup> Watkins v. United States, 354 U. S. 178 (1957).

<sup>5</sup> Sweezy v. New Hampshire, 354 U. S. 234 (1957).

<sup>6</sup> Slochower v. Board of Education, 350 U. S. 551 (1956).

<sup>7</sup> Konigsberg v. State Bar, 353 U. S. 252 (1957).

This self-restraint, whatever else may be said about it, has helped to temper the critical climate. The segregationist critics are still fairly robust, but their northern support among the Smith and McCarran Acts crowd has attenuated a good deal, and they miss it. On the extreme Right the anti-Court cacophony goes on; David Lawrence has not quite given up. But the Congressional temperature chart has returned to normal, and the danger of punitive action has subsided.

One man's meat is notoriously another man's poison, however, and it is not strange that the Court's recent gestures of self-denial have displeased some while placating others. Liberals, or some of them, feel that the current majority is derelict when it refuses to shackle the power of legislative investigation, or strike down our national sedition laws. Most of the critics from this new quarter have been, to their credit, more level-headed than the Jenners and Butlers of yesteryear. Indeed some of the most extreme protests have been voiced by two members of the Court itself, Justices Black and Douglas; liberal commentary has in general been milder than they.<sup>8</sup> But there is enough disquiet in this camp to merit notice. The Court, which was yesterday being criticized for defending liberty too much, is today being chided for defending it too little.

So much, for the moment, about what have been called the "result-oriented"<sup>9</sup> critiques of the Court's performance. Meanwhile still another plaint has been heard, largely from the groves of academe. It is that the judges, results aside, have been fudging their obligations as craftsmen. The point seems to be that in one way or another the Court has failed to produce doctrines that rest on the "exercise of reason":<sup>10</sup> the rhetorical flourish or the ipse dixit is found where we ought to find explicit principles rationally justified and applied.<sup>11</sup> These strictures are not backed, as the vendetta of 1958 was, by the threat of political retribution. Nevertheless they claim the respect of the Court and those who study it, because their authors are defenders of judicial review who speak more in sorrow than in anger.

The aim of this paper is to review, in terms of these two criticisms, the 1960-61 record of the Supreme Court in the field of civil rights. What is the actual pattern of results here? Did the Court of the 1960 term do less than it ought to have done to buttress the liberties of the individual? And did it at the same time maintain the standards of legal craftsmanship that ought to be maintained by the supreme tribunal of a constitutional democracy? In short, to what extent are either the "result-oriented" or the "reason-oriented" critiques warranted? It happens that the 1960 term was unusually rich in significant pronouncements involving civil rights, and it should provide, therefore, a fairly adequate test of both indictments.

II

The decisions that excited the gravest misgivings among libertarians were those having to do with alleged subversion. One of them, so Mr. Justice Douglas said, signalized "a sharp break with traditional concepts of First Amendment rights."<sup>12</sup> Others caused Mr. Justice Black to fear that the Court had adopted a deliberate policy of sacrificing individual freedom to governmental control,<sup>13</sup> that the boundaries of the Bill of Rights have been "all but obliterated,"<sup>14</sup> that the liberties of America "must be fast disappearing"<sup>15</sup> and that, "if the present trend continues . . . [g]overnment by consent will disappear to be replaced by government by intimidation."<sup>16</sup> If these forebodings are plausible, the 1960 term does indeed mark "a fateful moment in the history of a free country."<sup>17</sup>

Wilkinson and Braden involved the old, in-

73, pp. 84-125 (Nov., 1959); A. M. Bickel and H. H. Wellington, "Legislative Purpose and the Judicial Process: The Lincoln Mills Case," id., Vol. 71, pp. 1-39 (Nov., 1957); E. N. Griswold, "Foreword: Of Time and Attitudes—Professor Hart and Judge Arnold," id., Vol. 74, pp. 81-94 (Nov., 1960).

<sup>12</sup> Scales v. United States, 367 U. S. 203 (1961).

<sup>13</sup> Braden v. United States, 365 U. S. 431 (1961).

<sup>14</sup> Ibid.

<sup>15</sup> Ibid.

<sup>16</sup> Wilkinson v. United States, 365 U. S. 399 (1961).

<sup>17</sup> Communist Party v. Subversive Activities Control Board, 367 U. S. 1 (1961).

<sup>8</sup> See: "Retreat from Freedom," Christian Century, Vol. 78, pp. 163-4 (Feb. 8, 1961); "Free Speech and Movies," Commonweal, Vol. 73, pp. 495-6 (Feb. 10, 1961); "The Court and the Committee," ibid., pp. 624-5 (March 17, 1961); "Security and Civil Rights," id., Vol. 74, pp. 316-17 (June 23, 1961); "Neither Clear Nor Present," Nation, Vol. 192, pp. 509-10 (June 17, 1961); "Censorship of Movies," New Republic, Vol. 144, p. 8 (Feb. 27, 1961); "Un-American Activities," ibid., pp. 5-6 (March 13, 1961); "No Decision," Reporter, Vol. 25, p. 12 (July 6, 1961).

<sup>9</sup> Lewis, op. cit., p. 306.

<sup>10</sup> Wechsler, op. cit., p. 16.

<sup>11</sup> H. M. Hart, Jr., "Foreword: The Time Chart of the Justices," Harvard Law Review, Vol.

tractable problem of legislative investigations, specifically some recent antics of the House Un-American Activities Committee. A subcommittee of that egregious agency had invaded Atlanta armed with a Committee resolution authorizing investigation of Communist infiltration into southern industry, Communist propaganda activity, and "any other matter within the jurisdiction of the Committee." Both Wilkinson and Braden had publicly criticized this proposed inquiry, and had then been brought before the subcommittee, queried about Party membership and duly indicted when they refused to answer. They justified their refusal mainly by a challenge to the pertinency of the questions, and by an appeal to the First Amendment and to the doctrine of "valid legislative purpose."

Now with the best will in the world it was hard to argue that the questions had not been pertinent to the subject under inquiry, or that the witness had not been informed of the subject matter so that he could judge its pertinence. Since Watkins the Committee has framed its resolutions carefully and instructed its victims thoroughly, and as Mr. Justice Stewart says, it would be hard to imagine a preliminary question more pertinent to the topics under investigation. Moreover, Barenblatt v. United States<sup>18</sup> in 1959 had apparently decided that such inquiries are within the range of valid legislative purpose and do not infringe the First Amendment. But, it was said, the situation in the present cases is different; for Wilkinson and Braden have been called and questioned, not for the sake of gaining public information, but with the aim of punishing them because they assailed the Committee. A legislative purpose that might otherwise be valid is corrupted by this punitive motive.

This was the only significant contention not quite covered by Barenblatt or other precedents. Mr. Justice Stewart, upholding the convictions, replied that the Committee's behavior did not inescapably imply an intent to punish the witnesses and that even if it did, the inquiry would be valid. For, quoting Watkins, "motives alone would not vitiate an investigation . . . by a House of Congress if that assembly's legislative purpose is being served." And in these instances the subcommittee had "probable cause" to believe that the witnesses had information that would serve that purpose.

This implied requirement of "probable cause" may be a slender ray of libertarian promise in an otherwise somber landscape, but it appears slender indeed. For, as Mr. Justice

Black remarked in dissent, each witness had been identified as a Communist, so far as the record shows, only by a single paid informer's flat statement, and if that is enough to satisfy the requirement, its value as a curb on Committee excesses is negligible. As for the pertinency requirement, the legislators can obviously meet it by modest care in drafting resolutions and instructing witnesses. And the claim that the interest in individual freedom may outbalance the state's interest in procuring information is apparently answered by the Barenblatt assumption that the state interest is nothing less than the preservation of the nation, admittedly a rather awesome interest to contend with. Justice Black, and others, would insist that the destruction of America is not materially forestalled by the harassment of men like Braden and Wilkinson, and that the majority, while pretending to apply the "balancing test" in cases of this kind, has weighted the government's side so heavily (and artificially) as to preordain the result.

There is some justice in the charge, which becomes even stronger in Wilkinson where, as Justice Black says, the Court even "disclaims any power to determine whether the Committee is in fact interested in the information at all." To be sure, the balancing formula cannot be expected to produce certain and precise results. But we can fairly ask that the users of the test weigh realities against realities insofar as imperfect man can discern them.

As an exercise in reason, then, the majority opinions here are marred by an evasion: the supposed key issue—the balancing of private rights and public need—is handled by referring us back to an earlier opinion in which the heart of the matter is likewise evaded. And the net result of these pronouncements is that congressional committees remain unfettered by significant constitutional restraints. Add the latest chapter in the saga of Willard Uphaus<sup>19</sup> in which the Court adhered to a similarly expansive view of state investigatory power, and it becomes clear that the judiciary offers chilly comfort these days to the shorn lambs who face governmental inquisition.

Yet it cannot be said that the dissenters suggest alternative criteria that would meet the difficulties inherent in the problem. Justice Black's opinion in Wilkinson makes a powerful assault on the majority position, but can it be seriously proposed that the judiciary should look behind every ostensible legislative purpose and evaluate the latent motives it finds there? Is there any way to insure that such an evaluation would represent anything but the subjective bias of the judges who made it? How does one assess the weight of the public need for particular information when, in the nature of the investigatory process, the information is not yet known? Some tightening up of the probable cause standard might serve a symbolic purpose, but an investigator cannot be asked to prove in advance what he is supposedly trying to find out. And surely the standards that guide us in this field should not be determined by the performance of the HUAC. They must be applicable to other committees, past and future, whose quest might indeed be relevant to the Republic's welfare. Such standards may be devisable, but they do not emerge from the minority opinions here. And the result of Wilkinson and Braden should be judged with that fact in mind.

<sup>18</sup> 360 U. S. 109.

<sup>19</sup> Uphaus v. Wyman, 364 U. S. 388 (1960).

Wilkinson and Braden were decided in February; the judges thoughtfully waited until June to deliver the next one-two punch in the subversion field. Again by votes of five to four, the Court held that the Communist Party must register under the McCarran Act<sup>20</sup> and that the membership clause of the Smith Act had been validly applied to Junius Scales.<sup>21</sup>

The registration case presented a problem well calculated to tax the ingenuity of a judge who prefers not to invalidate a federal statute. The McCarran Act requires the registration of "Communist action" organizations with the Attorney General, and the registration statement must contain a variety of information including the names of officers and members. Once registered, or validly ordered to do so, the organization and its members become subject to certain obligations and disabilities. After hearings and appeals extending back to 1950, the American Communist Party now faced such an order to register, and the Supreme Court faced the question of that order's validity.

The statutory and constitutional challenges to the order were several, but perhaps the most weighty were those based on the First and Fifth Amendments. The Court has held that registration requirements may sometimes unconstitutionally constrict freedom of expression and association. Does not the McCarran Act applied to the Party have this effect? The Court has also held that the government cannot compel divulgence of Communist Party membership. Do not the Act's disclosure requirements force the officers to incriminate themselves?

The first of these objections could not be expected to prevail in the light of such holdings as Dennis v. United States<sup>22</sup> and such undoubtedly valid statutes as the Corrupt Practices Act and the Lobbying Act. Justice Frankfurter for the majority found that the registration order did not violate the First Amendment. The "balancing" formula was duly stated—impediments on freedom against public need—but the public-need side of the scale was heavily and decisively weighted by the idea that Congress has the primary responsibility for our security against foreign danger and that its choice of means for dealing with such threats must be respected unless the choice is rooted in "unfounded or irrational imaginings." In short, it would seem that no federal law aimed at a foreign-directed menace can fail to pass the balancing test: in this area the principle of legislative deference predetermines the result.

The Fifth Amendment is another matter. But its protections cannot be invoked by the Party on behalf of its officers; they must invoke it themselves, and they had not yet, as individuals, done so. It will be time enough to consider their privilege when they do refuse to register, citing the Fifth Amendment as their justification. Until then the challenge is premature. The Party is now required to register. Whether a given officer can escape the burden of the requirement is a matter for the future, as is the question of the validity of the disabilities imposed on those who are required to register under the Act. The Court thus managed adroitly to postpone the really ticklish Fifth Amendment issue, deciding only the narrow and relatively easy question of whether the Party was altogether immune from the obligation to identify itself. Only Justice Black was prepared to say it was. The Chief Justice wanted to postpone the whole decision by sending the case back once again to the Subversive Activities Control Board to tidy up some procedural loose ends. But, if constitutional issues were to be met, he agreed with Justice Brennan that the Act did violate the Fifth Amendment.

Justice Brennan's argument on this point was formidable. The Court had admitted arguendo that the Act would be invalid if it imposed on officials the obligation of answering in such a form as effectively to nullify the privilege against self-incrimination. But, said the Court, the question of whether the statute does contain this vice can wait until the Party or its officers are prosecuted for failure to register. Meanwhile the order to register stands. The Brennan point was that this put the official in a cleft stick: he may register and thus surrender his possible privilege or refrain from registering and expose himself to the possibility of the grave criminal penalties provided for non-compliance. He is thus coerced to give up his privilege, and this amounts to an erosion of the Amendment's guaranties. These contentions were not fully answered by Justice Frankfurter's majority opinion. Plainly he was animated by a previously expressed conviction that the privilege against self-incrimination should be rigidly enforced within its traditional limits, but not extended an iota beyond them.<sup>23</sup> In this instance, however, even the traditional limits seemed to be narrowed, for the official was being pressured to waive his rights in much the way that a defendant is pressured if the prosecutor comments on his failure to take the stand.<sup>24</sup>

<sup>20</sup> Above, note 17.

<sup>21</sup> Above, note 12.

<sup>22</sup> 341 U. S. 494 (1951).

In the Scales decision the majority again revealed its great reluctance to challenge the power of Congress in the subversion field. Scales had been convicted of being a member of the Communist Party with knowledge of its illegal purposes and with a specific intent to overthrow the government. The most serious contentions urged in his defense were three: that "guilt by association" violates the Fifth Amendment which prescribes that guilt must be personal; that the First Amendment immunizes such activities and associations; and that the McCarran Act of 1950 repealed the membership clause of the Smith Act.

The Court, by Justice Harlan, conceded that the Fifth Amendment argument had weight. Due process does require that guilt be personal, and membership alone, even in an illegal organization, may indeed be constitutionally protected. But the statute here was interpreted as punishing membership only if the petitioner was an "active" member who knew the Party was engaged in illegal activity and who had himself a specific intent to bring about the illegal result. The standard objection to the concept of guilt by association is that it may lead to punishment of the innocent or confused,<sup>25</sup> but the Court argued that these restrictive interpretations fend off that danger.

As for the First Amendment question, that too was pretty well disposed of simply by citing Dennis. Justice Harlan's only problem was the argument that the law discourages freedom of association by frightening the potential member whose aims are wholly innocent and legal. This objection is met, he said, by the requirement of knowing membership.

This may be, so far as it goes, a sufficient answer to the particular point, but the use of Dennis as a kind of vade mecum is beginning to be disturbing. The idea of that decision—and of such predecessors as Schenck<sup>26</sup>—was that the "clear and present [or probable] danger" determination depended on the circumstances "in every case." Whether the Court employs the clear and present danger rubric or its contemporary surrogate, the "balancing test," may not matter very much. In either event, the test, if it is one, must be applied to new contexts as new cases arise;<sup>27</sup> i.e., Dennis did not settle "that the advocacy with which we are here concerned" is unprotected speech. It may be answered that the Court is unequal to the task of deciding in a field related to national defense whether "the gravity of the 'evil,' discounted by its improbability justifies such invasion of free speech as is necessary to avoid the danger";<sup>28</sup> and that the majority was tacitly conceding this. If so, would it not be better to acknowledge the fact by explicitly giving the Congressional judgment conclusive weight, as Justice Frankfurter did in the registration case? There is little to be said for retaining the appearance of a reasoned, independent judgment without the reality. If both the clear and present danger and the balancing tests are defunct for all practical purposes in cases of this kind, then in the name of reason it would be well to say so.

There remained for the Court a nice problem of statutory construction which had to be met before Scales could be locked away. The McCarran Act of 1950 provides that "neither the holding of office nor membership in any Communist organization . . . shall constitute per se a violation . . . of this section or of any other criminal statute." Does not this wipe out the membership clause of the Smith Act, passed ten years earlier? No, said Justice Harlan; this simply requires us to construe the Smith Act so as to apply only to active, knowing membership. The quoted phrase declares that mere membership is not criminal, but Congress did not intend to immunize membership of a

<sup>23</sup> Ullman v. United States, 350 U. S. 422 (1956).

<sup>24</sup> See In re Opinion of the Justices, 300 Mass. 620 (1938); State v. Wolfe, 64 S.D. 178 (1936).

<sup>25</sup> Zechariah Chafee, Jr., Free Speech in the United States (Cambridge, Mass., 1946), pp. 470-483.

<sup>26</sup> Schenck v. United States, 249 U. S. 47 (1919).

<sup>27</sup> The relevant period in Dennis was 1945 to 1948; in Scales, 1946 to 1954.

<sup>28</sup> Dennis v. United States, 183 F.2d 201, 212 (1950).

purposeful sort. This interpretation was supported, as he saw it, by the context of the clause and by legislative history. Justice Brennan, on the other hand, argued in dissent that the law immunizes against prosecution for any kind of membership. The language is: "membership . . . shall [not] constitute per se" a crime, rather than "membership per se shall not constitute a crime." The position of "per se" makes a crucial difference; and without better knowledge of congressional intent than we have, we should assume that the law means what it says—that membership alone of whatever kind is not forbidden.

These were the main decisions of the term involving federal power and the Red Menace. Certainly their result is to make it clear that the substantive authority of Congress in this field will not be challenged by the Court. But this has been tolerably obvious at least since 1951, and in fact no federal sedition law has ever been held unconstitutional. Like it or not, the policy of judicial acquiescence on this point can hardly be called surprising. What is rather dismaying is the Court's failure to make more use of certain judicial options which have enabled it in the past to take a hand in matters of this kind without running head-on into Congress' basic power to govern. The registration issue might have been evaded altogether by returning the case to the Board, as the Chief Justice suggested. The membership clause might have been bucked back to Congress by construing it in the way Justice Brennan proposed, for the construction was surely not unreasonable. By these expedients, as one acute observer has remarked,<sup>29</sup> the Court could have at least deferred an outright holding that two dubious, repressive statutes are sanctioned by the Constitution. And it seems particularly unfortunate to uphold both statutes, for they look in different directions, and even a modest Court is warranted in telling Congress that it cannot have it both ways, that it must choose between the ventilation of the McCarran Act or the prohibition of the Smith Act. The Court would be on particularly strong ground in enforcing this choice, for the judges would rest squarely on the procedural right against self-incrimination, and procedure is a well-recognized judicial domain. By such techniques—the judicious use of the power to remand, the power to interpret statutes, and the power to enforce procedural regularity—the Court has performed usefully in this field in the past, and it would be a pity if it now chose to abandon even this carefully self-restrained function.

Fortunately there is evidence even in these cases that such a course of inaction has not been irrevocably set. For one thing, the Court did make it clear in Scales that the government is bound to prove active, knowing, purposeful membership in each prosecution, and this requirement should not only mitigate individual injustice, but also hold the number of such prosecutions to a minimum. For another thing, Justice Harlan reiterated the Yates<sup>30</sup> doctrine that the government must show advocacy of illegal action, not merely "abstract doctrine," and further explained that very strict standards of proof are required. These pronouncements caused a conservative magazine, loath to approve the Supreme Court's behavior even when anti-subversive laws were upheld, to suggest that the proof requirement would make the cause virtually unenforceable.<sup>31</sup> This is probably too optimistic—or pessimistic as the reader prefers. But in Noto v. United States<sup>32</sup> the Court did void a membership clause conviction because the evidence of illegal advocacy by the Party was inadequate by these strict standards. Add Communist Party v. Catherwood<sup>33</sup> which held, as against a state determination, that the Party need not be deprived of the benefits of unemployment compensation; and Deutch v. United States<sup>34</sup> which freed a recalcitrant HUAC witness under the pertinency rule; and the faint glimmer of a silver lining may be descried. The Court is probably going to behave unobtrusively in this field, but it has not yet wholly abdicated.

Apart from the after-echoes of the Uphaus problem, the only significant state cases involving the "Communist question" were In re Anastaplo<sup>35</sup> and Konigsberg v. State Bar.<sup>36</sup> Both involved state refusals to admit to the bar candidates who would not answer questions about Communist Party membership. In Illinois and California, where the cases arose, the bar examiners must be satisfied that aspirants are of good moral character, and California specifically denies bar admission to those who advocate violent overthrow of government. The committees argued that Anastaplo and Konigsberg had, by their refusals to answer, <sup>30</sup> Yates v. United States, 354 U. S. 298 (1957).

<sup>31</sup> "Let the Intellectuals Take it From Here," National Review, Vol. 10, p. 371 (June 17, 1961).

<sup>32</sup> 367 U. S. 290 (1961).

<sup>33</sup> 367 U. S. 389 (1961).

<sup>34</sup> 367 U. S. 456 (1961).

<sup>35</sup> 366 U. S. 82 (1961).

<sup>36</sup> 366 U. S. 36 (1961).

<sup>29</sup> A. M. Bickel, "The Communist Cases," New Republic, Vol. 144, pp. 15-16 (June 19, 1961).

obstructed full investigation of their qualifications, and it was this obstruction of a relevant inquiry that justified their rejection as members of the bar.

The Supreme Court, by Mr. Justice Harlan, upheld the committees over sharp dissenting opinions by Justices Black and Brennan. Mr. Justice Black insisted, inter alia, that compelling answers to such questions was an unconstitutional impingement on speech and association; and both he and Justice Brennan contended that the states were imposing upon applicants the burden of proving that they did not advocate violent overthrow, a shifting of the burden that had been condemned three years ago in Speiser v. Randall.<sup>37</sup> The Court answered the first objection by invoking the "balancing test"—"the State's interest in having lawyers who are devoted to the law in its broadest sense, including . . . its procedures for orderly change" is "sufficient to outweigh the minimal effect upon free association occasioned by compulsory disclosure in the circumstances here presented." As for Speiser, Justice Harlan was able to distinguish it. Unlike Speiser, the present cases involve the denial of positions of responsibility to "a limited class of persons" regarded as dangerous "because the position might be used to the detriment of the public." Moreover, there is no evidence that the state here shifted the burden of proof to the petitioner; rather, it seems that the state assumed the burden itself and was prevented from discharging that burden by the refusals to answer.

No cloud of words can conceal the fact that a lawyer may now be required to answer questions about Communist Party membership as a precondition to practicing his profession; and it seems equally clear from the Court's language that a state may deny bar admission if advocacy of violent overthrow can be demonstrated. No doubt it is unwise to levy such gratuitous pains and penalties on those who believe, like Shelley, in their right to silence, or even on those who still adhere to the miserable remnant that is now the American Communist Party. But wisdom and constitutionality are different matters, and—as in the investigation cases—the question is where a viable line might be drawn here. Can it be held that the State is unreasonable in believing that advocacy of illegal means to change the form of government is an important consideration in determining the fitness of lawyers "in whose hands so largely lies the safekeeping of this country's legal and political institutions?" And if this is a reasonable belief, can the applicant be allowed to thwart the inquiry designed to implement it? Justice Brennan would apparently concede, arguendum, that the belief is reasonable, but would require that the state assume the burden of proving a prima facie case against the applicant before denying him admission. This suggestion may have promise; these decisions do not altogether close the door on it. Yet such a rule would apparently be at odds with standing procedures in most states, and the Court seems justified in at least postponing so drastic a departure from custom.

<sup>37</sup> 357 U. S. 513 (1958).

Meanwhile, it must be said of the bar examination cases, like the cases just discussed involving federal power, that they contain few surprises. Some years ago the Court began to hint that it might take a hand when the urge to persecute unorthodox opinion impinged on freedom of occupation. The hints were very tentative, the limitations on state power were cautiously drawn, and the development had to be understood in the light of a line of cases that upheld such impingement when the occupation was that of a specially placed group such as public employees.<sup>38</sup> The bar examination cases surely make no libertarian advance in this field; but neither do they depart significantly from lines long since established.

III

As has been suggested, one of the justest criticisms of the Communist registration case and Scales is that they gave positive sanction to repressive acts, even though the issues might have been avoided. A rather similar point can be made about Times Film Corporation v. Chicago.<sup>39</sup>

The issue was movie censorship, and a few words of background are in order. In 1952, the Court repudiated the old doctrine<sup>40</sup> that movie censorship is immune from challenge under the free expression clauses of the Constitution.<sup>41</sup> However, although conceding that movies raise First Amendment questions, Mr. Justice Clark for the majority was careful not to condemn all regulation of this medium of expression, nor was he even prepared to rule that all "prior restraint" was forbidden. In subsequent

<sup>38</sup> Adler v. Board of Education, 342 U. S. 485 (1952); Garner v. Los Angeles Board, 341 U. S. 716 (1951); Barenblatt v. United States, 360 U. S. 109 (1959).

<sup>39</sup> 365 U. S. 43 (1961).

<sup>40</sup> Mutual Film Corp. v. Ohio Industrial Comm., 236 U. S. 230 (1915).

<sup>41</sup> Burstyn v. Wilson, 343 U. S. 495 (1952).

cases,<sup>42</sup> Justices Black and Douglas began to urge that the Court take at least this minimum step of outlawing prior restraint, which has been traditionally regarded as peculiarly objectionable in the free speech field; but the majority steadily refrained from doing so. The case-by-case approach that was adopted had this to be said for it: the whole subject was novel as a constitutional issue; the argument against censorship may depend in part on such variables as the means of communication and the form of the restriction; and judges, like lesser mortals, sometimes need the aid of time to ripen their understanding. Not even the "priorness" of the repression settles the matter. Even before Burstyn, Paul A. Freund had persuasively argued that there are kinds and kinds of prior restraint,<sup>43</sup> and the Court, charting new seas, must go slowly while such insights are evaluated and digested.

But in the 1960 term, the majority seemed to lose patience with this tortoise-like pursuit of wisdom. Chicago requires that movies must be submitted, before showing, to the police commissioner who may grant or withhold a permit, subject only to review by the mayor. The Times Film Corporation had refused altogether to submit a film, arguing that—quite apart from the standards the commissioner might employ—this system of administrative prior restraint was void on its face. The Court, by Mr. Justice Clark, saw this as presenting the question of whether an exhibitor has "complete and absolute freedom to exhibit, at least once, any and every kind of motion picture." The answer, said the Court, is no. Very well. Given this formulation of the issue, the answer is not astonishing. But the result is to uphold the principle of administrative censorship, which is as the Chief Justice said, prior restraint in its "purest and most far-reaching form." From refusing to condemn prior restraint of all kinds, the Court seems to have taken the long stride to a policy of approving a particularly vicious kind. Of course review will still be granted as to the legitimacy of the standards police chiefs may employ. But the concept of administrative licensing itself has apparently been constitutionally ratified.

The mischief of such a concept was exposed by the Chief Justice in his strong but somewhat diffuse dissent. The administrative censor operates in comparative privacy, free from the procedural safeguards that would prevail in a court of law. Though his decisions may be theoretically subject to judicial review, this is likely to be a hollow consolation in practice because of the delays of the adjudicative process—the present case had been pending for three years. Meantime the would-be exhibitor is trapped because he cannot show the film until the license issues. He is likely therefore to knuckle under to the censor's whim, even though it is based on plainly arbitrary standards.

Mr. Justice Clark's opinion proceeds as if the only alternative to this arrangement would be utter freedom to show any film—however obscene—at least once. But this is a false view of the options available. The Court in 1957 had upheld a system of book regulation which permitted New York City to seek in court a "limited injunctive remedy" under close procedural safeguards, including the right of the book-seller to immediate trial.<sup>44</sup> This procedure mitigates to a considerable degree the objections to administrative censorship mentioned in the last paragraph, and is a far cry from the Chicago arrangements. Perhaps the Court is not ready to prescribe the New York method as a universal rule; perhaps movies present problems of control different from those imposed by books. But the Kingsley Books case does at least suggest that there is a middle ground between the evils of administrative censorship and complete abandonment of the principle that condemns prior restraint.

The trouble is that Justice Clark's tendency to think in polarized terms on one side of such issues is matched by a similar tendency on the Black-Douglas side of the courtroom. Justice Douglas had denounced the New York ordinance as "censorship at its worst," which it patently was not. The Chicago arrangement was in fact a good deal worse, and it is this kind of refusal to acknowledge differences in degree that impedes the development of a workable jurisprudence in the civil rights field.

There is some possibility that the implications of Times Film are less deplorable than they seem. A later court might hold that the case merely rejected the claim of an absolute right against all prior restraint. That may be what Justice Clark meant when he said "It is that question alone that we decide." The question of the procedural sufficiency of any particular system could then still be raised. But if this was what was meant, nothing would have been easier than to say so, and the cloudiness of the majority reasoning leaves room for the lamentable inference that administrative censorship is constitutionally approved. That inference may serve as the basis for a substantial revival of censorship before the Court in its deliberate majesty gets around to facing the issue again.

<sup>42</sup> Kingsley Pictures v. Regents, 360 U. S. 684 (1959); Superior Films v. Ohio, 346 U. S. 587 (1954).

<sup>43</sup> "The Supreme Court and Civil Liberties," Vanderbilt Law Review, Vol. 4, pp. 533-554 (April, 1951).

<sup>44</sup> Kingsley Books v. Brown, 354 U. S. 436 (1957).

IV

So far the tale of the 1960 term is a rather dreary one. In the cases involving the subversion issue, the Court has added another layer or two to the long-standing but growing impression that it will deal only with the extreme periphery of the problem. In Times Film, it has marred a ten-year record of cautious but effective discouragement to the spirit of Mrs. Grundy. Despite the cross-threads and reservations that have been duly noted, an observer might understandably doubt that this is a Court whose members are all "equally zealous to enforce the constitutional protection of the free play of the human spirit."<sup>45</sup> But a term, like a book or a life, must be judged in the round, and there are further deeds to be recorded.

The decisions of the term that probably caused the most general excitement were those in the Sunday law cases.<sup>46</sup> No doubt this unwonted public concern for a constitutional issue came about partly because of the widespread impact of Sunday closing laws: there is hardly an American who has not been mildly inconvenienced by such statutes, while most have never so much as seen a communist except in television dramas. But partly the interest must be explained as an aspect of that curious and anachronistic fascination our people have for disputes with a religious undertone. No matter how secular we may become in spirit and practice, the mention of religion can still make dogmatists out of citizens and mountains out of molehills.

The issues posed in these cases were whether Sunday closing laws violated the equal protection and religious freedom guarantees, and the prohibition against laws "respecting an establishment of religion." The short answer is that they do not. But brevity was hardly the watchword for the judges in this litigation. The opinions on both sides consumed, by rough count, 58,000 words, 47,000 more than it took Marshall to decide McCulloch v. Maryland.

The four cases varied both in the circumstances of the persons involved and in the nature of the statutes challenged, but certain constitutional issues were common to all. For one thing, it was argued that the laws' purpose and effect was to aid religion and that this violated the "no establishment" principle. On the contrary, said the Chief Justice, who spoke for the Court in all four, the present purpose of the legislation is to set aside "a day of rest, repose, recreation and tranquillity." The original purpose may have been religious, but in the course of time this basis has been replaced by a secular objective which is, constitutionally speaking, unexceptionable. In each case the Chief Justice conducted an examination of the laws in question, and warned that Sunday laws would be struck down if they did betray a religious motive. But surely it would be a modest feat of legislative draftsmanship to avoid such pitfalls, and we may assume that the basic power to establish a "day of tranquillity" is now safe from constitutional assault. Only Justice Douglas seems to disagree.

The second major objection to the laws was that they violated the equal protection clause because of the eccentricity and arbitrariness of the exceptions they granted—Maryland forbids oyster-gathering but permits the playing of pin-ball machines; Massachusetts allows the sale of ice cream at retail and of dressed poultry at wholesale, but prohibits (presumably) the wholesaling of the former and the retailing of the latter. And so on. The pattern in Massachusetts had been called by the District Court an "unbelievable hodgepodge." But the possibility of overthrowing the laws on this ground was thin to the vanishing point once it was conceded that they aimed at a legitimate secular objective. For years the Court has steadily held that a statutory discrimination will not be set aside if any state of facts reasonably may be conceived to justify it.<sup>47</sup> These laws may have stretched a little the judicial capacity to conceive, but not more than some others have. A religious (or racial) basis for the classification would, of course, damn it. But absent that factor, the Court found no difficulty in imagining reasonable grounds for the distinctions.

<sup>45</sup> Frankfurter, J., Murdoch v. Pennsylvania, 319 U. S. 105, 129 (1943) (diss.).

<sup>46</sup> Braunfeld v. Brown, 366 U. S. 599 (1961); Gallagher v. Crown Kasher Super Market of Mass., Inc., 366 U. S. 617 (1961); McGowan v. Maryland, 366 U. S. 420 (1961); Two Guys from Harrison-Allentown, Inc. v. McGinley, 366 U. S. 582 (1961).

<sup>47</sup> Railway Express Inc. v. New York, 336 U. S. 106 (1949); Queenside Hills Realty Co. v. Saxl, 328 U. S. 80 (1946).

The final question was not so easy. The Sunday laws may be secular in their motivation, but suppose they have the incidental effect of imposing a discriminatory burden on certain religions—Orthodox Jews, for example, whose faith forbids them to work on Saturday. Is this not a restriction or penalty on religious freedom? The Chief Justice admitted that it is. The Orthodox may be forced to a choice between abandoning Sabbatarianism or suffering the economic disadvantage of a five-day week for their shops, as against a six-day week for their competitors. But, said the Chief Justice, the state is sometimes permitted to restrict or burden religious practices in the course of seeking a legitimate secular objective. This law does not forbid Saturday observance; it merely makes it inconvenient. Such a law is valid “unless the State may accomplish its purpose by means which do not impose such a burden.”

However, for Justice Brennan, who dissented on this issue, the quoted phrase was precisely the sticking point. Why not require the state to allow an exception for anyone whose bona fide religious beliefs require him to rest on Saturday? Many states do grant this exception which eliminates the burden on religious freedom, yet keeps the “day of tranquillity” substantially intact. This might indeed be the wiser solution, said the Court, but we are not prepared to impose it as a constitutional requirement. Such exceptions could create enforcement problems, since the state might have more difficulty in keeping track of violations. The Sunday observers might arguably claim that they were disadvantaged. And finally such a system would plunge the state into the vexing business of distinguishing between sincere and spurious claims of religious scruple. The state may choose to enter such a hornet’s nest if it likes, but the Constitution does not require it.

It should be emphasized that this question of allowing exceptions for Sabbatarians was the only one that was close enough to attract as many as three dissenters. Even if such a rule had been imposed, it would have been a minor qualification of the general holding that Sunday laws are valid, for only the Sabbatarians themselves would have standing to raise the issue, and their number is not great. Perhaps the fact alone argues for the rule. As Justice Brennan said, Sundays might be a little noisier and the task of enforcement a little more difficult, but this price is worth paying in order to avoid discriminating against religion. Yet the objections raised by the Chief Justice (and Justice Frankfurter’s concurring opinion) were more substantial than Justice Brennan conceded. In fact, the arguments on both sides in these cases have a thoughtful, cogent quality, so that the reader is held delicately poised between agreement and disagreement. The Sunday Law decisions provide us with one of those all-too-rare instances in which reason seems to have played a significant part in the result.

Why is this so? Perhaps because the Sunday laws cut across the categories into which the Court’s thinking has tended to crystallize in recent times. Such a problem as this is not answerable in terms of simplistic pro-individual or pro-government concepts, and the judges are therefore led to look beyond their prepossessions for guidance. How would the results of these cases be assessed in any pro and con enumeration? How do we weigh the individual right of A to enjoy a tranquil Sunday against the individual right of B to pursue his trade free from discrimination on account of his religion—and incidentally to mar A’s tranquillity? Certainly it is hard to classify as anti-libertarian holdings so equivocal as these, particularly when they are supported by Justices Warren, Black, and (except for the special question of Sabbatarians) Brennan. The vitality of the Court’s concern for religious freedom is evinced not only by the warnings embodied in the language of the Sunday law decisions but by Torcaso v. Watkins<sup>48</sup> which unanimously overthrew a requirement of the Maryland constitution that public officers declare their belief in God.

V

The doctrinal history of the modern Supreme Court in the area of criminal procedure has been extremely complex, partly because procedural and substantive questions are often intertwined and partly because even the cases involving “pure” criminal procedure issues are very numerous. Since the early 1930’s when the judges began to display a new sensitivity for the rights of the accused, such cases have bulked large on the Court’s docket, and the pattern of decision-making is labyrinthian. Nevertheless, allowing for cross-threads and convolutions, it can be said that there has been a broad tendency to go forward (i.e., to extend the constitutional rights of accused persons), moderated by a disposition to hold the line in certain areas, such as the right to counsel in state courts<sup>49</sup> and the right against eavesdropping.<sup>50</sup> Except for the brief period of “the Vinson Court,” when such holdings as

<sup>48</sup> 367 U. S. 488 (1961).

<sup>49</sup> Betts v. Brady, 316 U. S. 455 (1942).

<sup>50</sup> Goldman v. United States, 316 U. S. 129 (1942).

Trupiano v. United States<sup>51</sup> were spawned, relatively few important backward steps have been taken. Perhaps no other field, except racial discrimination, so clearly illustrates the general concord of the judges on a basic ideal of fairness to the individual. The disagreement has usually been between those who would go slow in extending this ideal and those who would go somewhat faster. Between these mild extremes the majority has forged gradually ahead.

The 1960 term was marked by a distinct spurt forward in this field, not indeed the kind of headlong advance that Justice Douglas would favor, but a brisk one nonetheless. Leaving aside decisions already treated like Wilkinson and the Communist registration case in which procedural questions were linked to major substantive issues, the Court upheld the government in only a handful of cases. Chief among these were a pair involving the claim of double jeopardy<sup>52</sup> and another pair involving the question whether federal courts should enjoin the use of illegally obtained evidence in state courts.<sup>53</sup> The first three simply represent a refusal to go forward; certainly they could not be regarded as retreats from settled libertarian positions. Wilson v. Schnettler may be a little cloudier, for in Rea v. United States<sup>54</sup> the Court had held that a federal court injunction could issue to prevent federal agents from presenting in state court evidence illegally seized, and Wilson was invoking that holding. But there were factual differences between the two situations, and the Court in Wilson, though rejecting the petitioner's claim, did not depart from Rea's basic holding that illegal search can warrant federal court intervention. And at all events, Mapp v. Ohio,<sup>55</sup> discussed below, seems to obviate the whole question by holding that all unconstitutionally seized evidence is excludable in state courts, so that hereafter a defendant like Wilson could simply invoke that rule, and an injunctive remedy would be unnecessary. In short the spirit of these decisions seems at most static rather than retrogressive.

And in any case they are greatly overbalanced on the libertarian side by other criminal procedure decisions of the term. Not only is it true that a heavy proportion of the cases were decided in favor of the accused. More important, two of these decisions must be regarded as landmarks in the history of modern constitutional doctrine.

The lesser of them was nevertheless highly significant, not because it carved out new doctrine but because it adhered so scrupulously to the limits of the old. Since Goldman v. United States permitted admission of "detectaphone" evidence, there has seemed reason to fear that there was no constitutional protection against the ingenious electronic eavesdropping made possible by modern science. Such fears were not entirely stilled by Silverman v. United States,<sup>56</sup> but they were confined within borders. In this, the "spike-mike" case, the Court held inadmissible evidence obtained by driving a spike attached to an amplifier into the wall of a house until it hit a heating duct. The entire heating system thereby became a giant microphone. The detectaphone in the Goldman case had not penetrated the house wall, and this, said the Court, made a crucial difference. Eavesdropping accomplished by an "unauthorized physical penetration" of this private house invaded the rights secured by the Fourth Amendment. The petitioner had asked for reconsideration of Goldman, but Justice Stewart found this unnecessary in the light of the difference in the facts. However, the language of his majority opinion reveals alertness to the threat of "frightening paraphernalia" to the right to privacy, and the determination not to go beyond Goldman "by even a fraction of an inch." There may in fact be reason to doubt that Goldman itself could now survive direct constitutional attack, especially when it is remembered that Justice Frankfurter was among the dissenters in that case.

The second and even more striking decision was Mapp v. Ohio, which held that evidence obtained by unconstitutional search was inadmissible in state prosecutions, thus overruling one of the most controversial procedural cases of the modern era, Wolf v. Colorado.<sup>57</sup> This development is so spectacularly libertarian, especially when viewed against the background of Wolf, that it must play a major part in any evaluation of the term's results. Yet not even a staunch advocate of forward movement in this field could allow himself more than two cheers, unless he were so result-oriented as to be entirely indifferent to the need for reasoned decision.

Mapp must surely rank as one of the untidest decisions in which the modern Court has announced a salient constitutional doctrine, which is saying a good deal. The case had

<sup>51</sup> 334 U. S. 699 (1948).

<sup>52</sup> Gori v. United States, 367 U. S. 364 (1961); Callanan v. United States, 364 U. S. 587 (1961).

<sup>53</sup> Wilson v. Schnettler, 365 U. S. 381 (1961); Pugach v. Dollinger, 365 U. S. 458 (1961).

<sup>54</sup> 350 U. S. 214 (1956).

<sup>55</sup> 367 U. S. 643 (1961).

<sup>56</sup> 365 U. S. 505 (1961).

<sup>57</sup> 338 U. S. 25 (1949).

arisen from a state prosecution for the possession of "lewd and lascivious" books and pictures, and the main issue briefed and argued concerned the validity of the Ohio law which punishes mere knowing possession of such material. The evidence had admittedly been seized illegally, but the Wolf doctrine of course controlled this question, and the suggestion to overrule Wolf came in the course of an amicus curiae brief and was hardly argued at all. As Justice Harlan remarked, dissenting, an important change in constitutional law should be preceded by full-dress argument, insuring the most sober kind of judicial consideration, especially when the prevailing rule has been laid down comparatively recently and when the issue is one of some intricacy. Even more, it seems unfortunate to decide a constitutional question of such moment when the case might have been disposed of by reference to another clearer question that had been fully briefed. Cases involving illegally obtained evidence are common enough, and if the Court was resolved to overthrow Wolf it would not have had to wait long for a more felicitous opportunity.

Unhappily, the faults of Justice Clark's majority opinion did not stop here. His arguments for overthrowing Wolf revealed the need for what Justice Harlan called the "aid which adequate briefing and argument lends to the determination of an important issue." The Court's basic point was that Wolf recognized that the Fourth Amendment's right to privacy applies to the states and that it is therefore anomalous not to apply the constitutionally derived Weeks rule,<sup>58</sup> which excludes illegally obtained evidence from federal trials, to the states as well. But this begs at least three important questions: is the Weeks rule of constitutional origin or rather a rule of evidence imposed by the Supreme Court in pursuance of its power to supervise the federal judicial system? Was it the Fourth Amendment that was applied to the states in Wolf or the "principle of privacy" which might have a different meaning in the Fourteenth than it has in the Fourth? Is it always anomalous that state courts are allowed more room for variation than federal courts, or does the concept of federalism warrant just such leeway?

Each of these questions needed to be carefully considered even if they were all to be answered as the Court did. And the failure to consider them weakened the Court's other arguments. One of these was that the passage of time since Wolf had undermined the case against exclusion, partly because "more than half" of the states passing on the question since then had adopted the exclusionary principle. As Justice Harlan said, half of all states still do admit such evidence, and in any case state autonomy is not to be overridden simply because a slight tendency has developed to regard one rule as more desirable than another. Another of Justice Clark's points was that we exclude involuntary confessions in state courts and that the exclusion of illegally seized evidence is analogous. But Justice Harlan gravely impaired this argument by pointing to a crucial difference. Forced confessions are excluded because they may infect the fairness of the trial itself, not because of something the police did before the trial. To admit such evidence would make the trial a farce; the strongest evidence of innocence might be overborne by a confession that was coerced and thus quite possibly false. On the other hand, illegally obtained evidence is excluded, when it is, not because the trial has been rendered unfair (the evidence may be perfectly convincing, though illegally procured) but to deter police from unconstitutional conduct. The Supreme Court has the authority thus to supervise the conduct of federal police, but under the federal system it has no such power to discipline the police of the states.

The point is not whether the majority's assumptions can be defended or whether Justice Harlan's strictures are unanswerable. Nothing the latter says quite disposes of Justice Murphy's contention in Wolf that only the exclusionary rule can make the right to privacy real. And even in connection with the argument canvassed above, one might well ask whether the Court is in fact limited to concerns bearing on the trial itself. The Fourteenth Amendment speaks of due process of law, and it might be contended that this touches the whole process by which criminals are brought in and punished. But the point is that the majority opinion did not effectively state the case for overruling Wolf; it did not meet the burden of justifying a departure from stare decisis. The dissenting opinion was in fact far more effective than the prevailing one. Wolf may have deserved to be buried, but it merited a more persuasive funeral oration.

But whatever the infirmities of the reasoning, Wolf is decisively overthrown, and the "Mapp doctrine" takes an important place among the rules that insure uniform fair play to the individual, as does the "spike-mike" doctrine of Silverman. Other decisions of the term, while less spectacular, add to the impression of judicial resolution in this field. For example the Court reconfirmed and strengthened the doctrine of Griffin v. Illinois<sup>59</sup> that financial hurdles must not bar an indigent's right to review of his conviction;<sup>60</sup> a state trial prejudiced by newspaper publicity with the prosecutor's connivance was held violative of due process;<sup>61</sup> and an indigent convicted of felony was held entitled to a hearing to determine whether the state denial of counsel offended due process.<sup>62</sup> The interesting thing about this last case was not its result, but Justice Douglas' concurring plea for reconsideration of Betts v. Brady, which allowed the state to dispense with counsel in some felony cases. "I cannot believe," he said, "that a majority of the present Court would agree to Betts v. Brady were it here de novo. . . ." If his guess about the temper of the present Court is correct, there may be further startling events to come in the near future. Has the present majority resolved the old misgivings about the wisdom of imposing procedural rules on the states? Has Justice Frankfurter's concern for flexible federalism lost out to those who contend for a more uniform standard of due process? The answer, as Justice Story would say, is "locked up in the inscrutable purposes of Providence" (and in the bosoms of five members of the Court); the chances are that it will emerge gradually, if at all. But Mapp is a very considerable straw in the breeze; and there can on the whole be little doubt about the direction of the wind currents during the 1960 term at least.

<sup>58</sup> Weeks v. United States, 232 U. S. 383 (1914).

VI

Since 1954, as every schoolboy knows, the Supreme Court—and even more the lower federal courts which it supervises<sup>63</sup>—has been heavily preoccupied with the problem of public school integration. After the seven-league stride of the Brown<sup>64</sup> decision, the Court has moved steadily but not hastily forward against other forms of racial discrimination. The implications of the Brown doctrine were applied in per curiam holdings against segregation in such facilities as public recreation grounds<sup>65</sup> and intrastate buses;<sup>66</sup> the states that sought to take retributive action against the NAACP were stymied;<sup>67</sup> the concept of "state action" was extended so as to make it a little harder to maintain a discriminatory policy.<sup>68</sup> With the possible exception of this last case, these developments might be said to be logically inherent in the broad disapproval of racial discrimination that was exemplified by the Brown doctrine.

In the 1960 term there began to be signs that the Court was approaching, though not yet reaching, the limits of that logic. For one thing, we get in some of the cases the first real break in the unanimous front that the Court has recently maintained on such questions. In Shelton v. Tucker<sup>69</sup> the majority held invalid an Arkansas law requiring schoolteachers to list all organizations they have belonged to for five years. What troubled the dissenters here was the problem of reconciling this holding with such precedents as Adler in which a state's right to inquire into its employees' associations had been upheld. Mr. Justice Stewart's point, for the majority, was that the state could have no legitimate interest in all associational ties, and it must therefore draw such statutes more narrowly if it hopes to meet judicial inspection. This doctrine may be a good one, but it is also somewhat novel, and its implications may require careful examination, if the Court is to keep its lines of logic straight.

Again, in Boynnton v. Virginia<sup>70</sup> the Interstate Commerce Act was held to bar a trespass action against a Negro who refused to leave a bus terminal restaurant. The Act forbids "unjust discrimination" in facilities "operated or controlled" by a motor carrier, and the whole Court agreed that this would prohibit racial discrimination in a bus company's own restaurant. But this restaurant was owned by a local Virginia corporation and leased to a private operator. Nevertheless, said Justice Black for the Court, it is subject to the Act, without regard to niceties of title, if the bus company has volunteered to provide terminal facilities and "the terminal and restaurant have acquiesced in and cooperated in this undertaking." This feat of constructive alchemy was too much for Justices Whittaker and Clark, who dissented.

In another line, Burton v. Wilmington Parking Authority<sup>71</sup> raised similar misgivings, this time about the elasticity of the "state action" concept of the Fourteenth Amendment. The Court held that a restaurant privately

<sup>59</sup> 351 U. S. 12 (1956).

<sup>60</sup> Smith v. Bennett, 365 U. S. 708 (1961).

<sup>61</sup> Irvin v. Dowd, 366 U. S. 717 (1961).

<sup>62</sup> McNeal v. Culver, 365 U. S. 109 (1961).

<sup>63</sup> See Peltason, op. cit.

<sup>64</sup> Brown v. Board of Education, 347 U. S. 483 (1954).

<sup>65</sup> Baltimore v. Dawson, 350 U. S. 877 (1955).

<sup>66</sup> Gayle v. Browder, 352 U. S. 903 (1956).

<sup>67</sup> N.A.A.C.P. v. Alabama, 357 U. S. 449 (1958).

<sup>68</sup> Pennsylvania v. Board of Directors, 353 U. S. 230 (1957).

<sup>69</sup> 364 U. S. 479 (1960).

<sup>70</sup> 364 U. S. 454 (1960).

<sup>71</sup> 365 U. S. 715 (1961).

operated but leased from the city was engaged in state action and thus subject to the equal protection clause. But the grounds for so deciding were far from clear in Justice Clark's majority opinion which threw together, as Justice Harlan said, "various factual bits and pieces" and then undermined "the resulting structure by an equally vague disclaimer." Since there was some basis for believing that the state law might specifically authorize the racial discrimination in question, which would flatly contravene the Fourteenth Amendment, three members of the Court wanted to seek an authoritative interpretation from the state court before deciding the case. They preferred to avoid the tortuous question of state action until it was forced upon them. Sooner or later that question will have to be faced, but its resolution would strain the powers of Daniel himself, and meantime there is little to be said for such ad hoc formulations as this majority opinion offers, however congenial the immediate results may be.

The minority qualms expressed in these cases reflect an awareness that the problems have not been entirely thought through and that pragmatic decisions in defense of the shared value of racial equality may close portals in other areas where an open-door policy has so far prevailed. These reflections are relevant to Gomillion v. Lightfoot,<sup>72</sup> which was probably the most surprising racial rights decision of the term and may have the most significant implications. It concerned Tuskegee, Alabama, which had allegedly been gerrymandered so as to exclude from voting in city elections all but four or five of its 400 former Negro voters. The state hoped, relying on Hunter v. Pittsburg<sup>73</sup> and Colegrove v. Green,<sup>74</sup> that this strategem would be beyond the reach of the federal courts and that the disadvantaged Negroes would thus be unable to raise the claim of constitutional rights.

But the Supreme Court thought otherwise. If the allegations could be proved, the act would be an invalid racial discrimination affecting the right to vote as protected by the Fifteenth Amendment. Hunter and related cases did not hold that the state has plenary power to manipulate municipal borders at will, but only that the particular constitutional clauses there invoked could not avail to limit the power in those particular contexts. As for Colegrove, the Court there held that the dilution of appellants' voting strength because of the legislature's failure to reapportion presented a "political question." The present case was different, because the legislature here had affirmatively acted to deny the vote on racial grounds, which is specifically forbidden by the Fifteenth Amendment.

This opinion was carefully and neatly wrought so as to permit the Court to checkmate racially discriminatory gerrymanders without opening up the whole vast question of apportionment. Justice Whittaker, concurring, would rely on the equal protection clause, but he too felt that Colegrove was distinguishable.

The case is important enough if its emanations go no further than this: that electoral apportionment is subject to challenge on the ground of racial discrimination. But it may prove difficult to confine it to those limits, and the case nicely illustrates the problem of logical consistency that is posed by some of these decisions in the racial field. The Court is obviously determined to nullify "sophisticated as well as simple-minded modes of discrimination"<sup>75</sup> and must therefore be alert against indirect action with a segregationist motive. But that kind of action may take forms that would apparently immunize it from attack under previously announced constitutional doctrine—most readers of Adler v. Board of Education would think that it authorized Little Rock to query schoolteachers about organizational ties; most readers of Colegrove would think that Tuskegee's gerrymander presented a non-justiciable question. In correcting these misunderstandings, as it did in Shelton and Gomillion, the Court has two choices: to declare in effect that there are special rules for situations that involve the hint of racial discrimination; or to fashion a new general rule that will cover the situation. If it takes the former course, it will be holding that the right against racial discrimination enjoys a super-"preferred position" in our system of constitutional restraints. That seems to be the idea of Justice Frankfurter in Gomillion (though he would of course ardently reject the phrase): electoral inequality is forbidden if based on racial grounds, but other kinds of inequality do not offend the Constitution. This double standard may have some warrant, as he implies, in the precise language of the Fifteenth Amendment. But the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth speaks in more general terms, and the question is whether the concept of equality, so strictly conceived to protect the Negro, can go on being interpreted permissively when the rights of men in general are at issue. There is

<sup>72</sup> 364 U. S. 339 (1960).

<sup>73</sup> 207 U. S. 161 (1907).

<sup>74</sup> 328 U. S. 549 (1946).

<sup>75</sup> Lane v. Wilson, 307 U. S. 268, 275 (1939).

some reason to suspect that Gomillion may become an entering wedge for reconsideration of the whole apportionment problem.<sup>76</sup> Whatever may be the truth about this, the fact remains that hard judicial soul-searching impends in this field. If a double standard is to prevail, it requires careful exposition and justification. If on the other hand general constitutional doctrines are to be reinterpreted so as to accommodate decisions like these, the task of synthesis will be a formidable one. So far, it seems fair to say, neither job has been done.

VII

Only brief attention can be paid here to a scattering of other civil rights decisions, though some of them might well have attracted more notice in a term less crowded with momentous developments in this field.

The nasty question of arbitrary security dismissals was raised by the case of one Rachel Brawner who was a short-order cook in a privately operated cafeteria in a naval weapons plant.<sup>77</sup> This installation was under military command, and Mrs. Brawner lost her job when the commanding officer withdrew, without specific charges or a hearing, her identification badge on the ground that she failed to meet security requirements. The Supreme Court might have held that such action was unauthorized by statute,<sup>78</sup> or that it violated procedural due process; Mr. Justice Stewart, for the majority, chose to do neither. Though he admitted that dismissed government employees may have constitutional rights in some circumstances, there was no right to notice and hearing here, where the reasons for her exclusion were not "patently arbitrary or discriminatory." This reasoning by-passed the sticky issue, which was that the "security risk" badge of infamy was involved. To recognize a constitutional right to a hearing for all dismissed government employees would plunge both the law and public personnel administration into endless difficulties. But the "security risk" tag is so damaging to the individual that its use should, at the very least, be accompanied by some procedural protections. One can only hope that a later Court will be able to confine this precedent very narrowly to its specific facts, and minimize the damage it potentially does to the tradition of procedural fairness.

<sup>76</sup> Baker v. Carr, 364 U. S. 898 (1960), prob. juris. noted.

<sup>77</sup> Cafeteria Workers v. McElroy, 376 U. S. 886 (1961).

<sup>78</sup> Greene v. McElroy, 360 U. S. 474 (1959).

Two potentially very interesting and important constitutional issues were evaded by the Court in the 1960 term. One was the issue of whether a man coerced by law to join and pay dues to an association can object if his money is used to further political purposes uncongenial to him. In a federal case, the Railway Labor Act as amended was interpreted to forbid a union so to spend a member's money;<sup>79</sup> in a state case involving a bar association, a plurality of four believed that the record did not present the facts "as leanly and as sharply" as they should be in order to justify decision of the constitutional question.<sup>80</sup>

The other issue was birth control.<sup>81</sup> The Connecticut statute in question forbids the use (not the sale) of contraceptives and makes possible the punishment of those who counsel such use (e.g., physicians). Plaintiffs had assailed the law under a state declaratory judgment act. But the fact seemed to be that the law was not currently being enforced, and until it is, said the Court, the constitutional issues are not ripe for our consideration. The plaintiffs' supposed fear of prosecution was deemed chimerical in light of the non-enforcement record.

There were dubious elements in the opinions supporting these evasive results: the federal statute had to be tortured cruelly to produce Street; five justices thought the constitutional issue was properly before them in Lathrop, so the curious result is that the evasion was supported by only a minority of the Court; the grounds for dismissal in the birth control case were somewhat novel and very debatable, as Justice Harlan's dissent shows. But it is not surprising if the judges began to feel by this time (they were End of Term decisions) that enough was enough. There may be such a thing as domestic economy, even within a Supreme Court, and the 1960 term had already produced enough significant civil liberty decisions to overfill any reasonable quota. The questions of dues and politics and birth control will no doubt be back again, and in short order. Meanwhile, they remain open, and these decisions could not be recorded either pro or con in a charting of the Court's record in the field of constitutional rights.

Finally, in two significant cases with constitutional undertones the Court construed federal law so as to protect individual rights.

<sup>79</sup> International Association of Machinists v. Street, 367 U. S. 740 (1961).

<sup>80</sup> Lathrop v. Donohue, 367 U. S. 820 (1961).

<sup>81</sup> Poe v. Ullman, 376 U. S. 497 (1961).

Monroe v. Pape<sup>82</sup> held that the 1875 Civil Rights Act provides a civil remedy for those deprived of federal rights by state officers, even though the officers have violated state law. The solid majority reconfirmed the Classic<sup>83</sup> and Screws<sup>84</sup> doctrine that "misuse of power . . . made possible because the wrongdoer is clothed with the authority of state law, is action taken 'under color of' state law" in the meaning of the statute. In short, state police who violate Fourteenth Amendment rights can now be sued in federal court by the injured party, who need not, by the way, carry the heavy burden of proving a willful deprivation of constitutional rights. In the other case the Court held that railroad publicity programs designed to influence legislation could not be made a basis for suit under the Sherman Act, even though the legislation sought was economically advantageous to the railroads and injurious to their trucker competitors, and even though "reprehensible" and "deceptive" publicity techniques were employed.<sup>85</sup> A contrary construction would "raise important constitutional questions" involving the right of petition.

VIII

This then was the 1960-61 civil rights record of the Supreme Court—or enough of it to permit evaluation. A few words of summary may sharpen the picture. In the cases involving the "communist menace"—real or imaginary—the Court, with minor exceptions, held against the individual and in favor of governmental power. This spirit of judicial permissiveness was most striking in the field of legislative investigations: it seems obvious that such inquisitions into this subject are now immune from any very meaningful substantive restraints. And pretty much the same statement can be made about government-imposed qualifications for professional practice at least as applied to "a limited class of persons" in positions of public responsibility. With respect to punishment for Party membership and the registration requirements of the McCarran Act, the Court's attitude was a little more ambiguous. Old, mildly restrictive interpretations of the Smith Act were adhered to, and the government was put to a rigorous standard of proof in enforcing the membership clause; the Fifth Amendment may still be available as an individual defense against the order to register, even though its value may be somewhat attenuated by the time the issue is finally faced. But there is no doubt that a determined government can make things warm for Communists and suspected Communists if it has the time and energy to spare, and that the plea of "security risk" carries great weight in the judicial mind.

Apart from these political offender cases, the most noteworthy anti-libertarian development of the term was the apparent ratification of administrative movie censorship in Times Film. But then the impression of the term begins to change. The Sunday law decisions defy classification, but surely little evidence can be wrung from them that the Court has flagged in its concern for religious freedom. The decisions involving dues and politics and birth control were indecisive. On the other hand, the signs of forward movement in the field of criminal procedure and Negro rights seem unmistakable. In the former area the Mapp decision stands out like a beacon, perhaps even portending a general erosion of the scruples about federalism that have heretofore retarded movement of this kind. But the pattern of other less spectacular cases reveals a similarly "progressive" trend. And the Negro rights cases also suggest a tendency to mark out new frontiers, not so dramatic as those of 1954, but salient nonetheless.

What kind of a term was it? Was it a "libertarian term," or did its results justify the dark misgivings of Justices Black and Douglas, quoted above? The answer will depend, broadly, on how one weighs the pro-government spirit of the political offender cases and Times Film against the pro-individual record in the criminal procedure and racial equality decisions. But even conceding such subjective variations in outlook, it is hard to see how it could be contended that this was, in balance, a retrogressive term. It must be remembered that a few short years ago such matters as legislative investigations, public employment standards, and movie censorship seemed arguably immune from all constitutional restraints. The doctrines correcting these misapprehensions are still in relative infancy. One may wish that the Court would push them toward adulthood a little faster, but this is a quite different thing from charging that they are old and seasoned constitutional traditions, now dead by the Court's hand. In fact, they are neither old nor dead. And a similar point can be made about Scales. The present Court is far more scrupulous about requiring personal knowledge and intent than its predecessor was

<sup>82</sup> 365 U. S. 167 (1961).

<sup>83</sup> United States v. Classic, 313 U. S. 299 (1941).

<sup>84</sup> Screws v. United States, 325 U. S. 91 (1945).

<sup>85</sup> Eastern Railroad Presidents Conference v. Noerr Motor Freight, 365 U. S. 127 (1961).

in Whitney v. California.<sup>86</sup> True, it has refused to throw out guilt by association altogether, but it never said that it would. True, it has refused to invalidate the Smith Act, but neither, as has already been remarked, has any previous Court overthrown a national sedition law; and at least this Court has construed the law so as to retain some measure of sense and justice.

The truth is that most of these cases represent refusals to advance, not retreats. They may be no less regrettable for that, but it is well to know what we are talking about. In recent years Justices Black and Douglas seem to have themselves developed a libertarian position that is more uncompromising than some of their earlier opinions would suggest.<sup>87</sup> This may create an illusion, even in their own minds, that the majority has retrogressed, but an illusion it is. It is they who have moved "forward," not the Court that has moved "back."

By and large the Court's propensity in the last decade—as exemplified by the 1960 term—has been to extend the concept of civil rights fairly steadily in certain selected but vital fields, to stand relatively still in certain others (notably those involving the security issue) and to retreat, if that is the word, only in the sense that such implied half-promises as those in Watkins are unredeemed. By common sense reckoning, this pattern of large pluses and small minuses would seem to yield a substantial gain for civil liberties.

Is this, to pose the result-oriented question, "enough" for the Court to do? Or is it failing the nation in the hour of need? The question is slippery and incurably non-objective, but it is the kind that is hard to avoid in discussing political institutions. And surely even the beginning of any answer must center around some preliminary assumptions about the range of judicial capacity. No one would contend that the Court can correct all the errors, big and small, that a great, dynamic democracy commits. The stock of prestige that supports judicial review is substantial but not inexhaustible. That stock has been drawn on heavily in recent years, as the 1958 counter-attack attested. Probably it is going to be further taxed as the judges continue to press forward ideals like racial equality and fair treatment of the accused, to name only two. There is no known perpetual inventory system that infallibly warns us when the limit has been approached. All that can be offered here is one observer's judgment that (to drop the metaphor) the Court of the 1960 term did or seemed in the process of doing about as much on behalf of civil rights as we can reasonably expect nine men to do.

IX

When we turn from the "result-oriented" to the "reason-oriented" line of evaluation, the spectacle is a little different. To be sure, the matter must again be viewed relatively. We cannot demand that a living institution, dealing with living problems, achieve perfect logical symmetry, for logic overdone can stultify all it touches. Nor is it clear that Courts of the past have followed the ideal of reasoned decision more than has the present one. What of the opinions of the 1920's and early 1930's for example, those that T. R. Powell used to dissect so mercilessly? What of such masterpieces of inner contradiction as Munn v. Illinois<sup>88</sup> or Hurtado v. California?<sup>89</sup>

Yet admitting all this, and admitting further that the modern Court faces riddles of unexampled complexity, it still seems fair to wish that more progress could be made in ordering and solving them. And it must be ruefully said that very little such progress marked the 1960 term. The balancing test begins to seem more and more a "fiction intended to beautify what is disagreeable to the sufferers,"<sup>90</sup> at least in subversion cases. The opinions in Times Film and Burton leave the reader in grave doubt as to what was decided, and why. The conclusion of Mapp v. Ohio is fairly plain, but the route to that conclusion is murky.

However, as has already been intimated, the main complaint on this score is a more general one—that the Court is not confronting the task of intellectual architecture that is posed by its modern jurisdictional claims in the field of civil rights. In 1951, Mr. Justice Jackson remarked that the Court's prior decisions

<sup>86</sup> 274 U. S. 357 (1927).

<sup>87</sup> Both of them seem to have taken leave of the clear and present danger doctrine at one end, while the majority was taking leave of it at another. Both had invoked it in earlier cases [Bridges v. California, 314 U. S. 252 (1941); Craig v. Harney, 331 U. S. 367 (1947)], though Justice Black had declared in the former case that it was only a "minimum compulsion," which left the way open for him to begin applying a more absolutist standard with Breard v. Alexandria, 341 U. S. 622 (1951).

<sup>88</sup> 94 U. S. 113 (1877).

<sup>89</sup> 110 U. S. 516 (1884).

<sup>90</sup> Tyson Bros. v. Banton, 273 U. S. 418, 446 (1927).

"will be searched in vain for clear standards"<sup>91</sup> governing civil liberties questions. The remonstrance seems just about equally valid ten years later, though it covers an even wider ground, for since then the Court has in important respects extended its power to supervise. The state action problem, the problem of censorship, occupational freedom, legislative inquisitions, the general right of the government to inform itself and ventilate facts, the right against self-incrimination, the problem of scientific eavesdropping and of other unreasonable searches, the limits of statutory flexibility, racial discrimination in the determination of voting units—all these and many more were within the judicial ambit in the 1960 term. Future terms may see new departures bearing on such matters as legislative apportionment and the right to counsel in state courts. These problems are not discrete; the resolution of one touches most of the others. To quote Justice Frankfurter (speaking ten years ago), "there are now so many of these decisions, arrived at by the ad hoc process of adjudication, that it is desirable to make a cruise of the timber."<sup>92</sup>

Why has the Court as a whole never taken that cruise? Why has it done so little to develop a reasoned, connected set of doctrines in the field of civil rights? Partly no doubt because this is easier said than done—it is one thing to call for reasoned principles and quite another thing to devise them. But though this might account for some inadequacy in doctrinal structure, it does not fully explain the failure to develop any such structure at all.

That failure seems to be caused by a certain fragmenting and hardening of attitudes that characterize the modern Court, making it impossible to achieve a consensus of reason even when an agreement on result does exist. Even with respect to results the Court has been of course far from unanimous, but the steady expansion of civil rights jurisdiction attests that a majority united by this common concern can frequently be assembled. But the dissensus as to the reasons for the holdings is far more stubborn. As the pattern of concurrences and dissents shows, there is a tendency for such pairs as Warren-Brennan, Frankfurter-Harlan and Clark-Whittaker to produce separate reasons for the positions they take. But the dissensus goes farther than that.

Doctrinal idiosyncracies often require individual statement. Justice Black's special ideas about the absolutism of the First Amendment, and his equally special ideas about search and seizure, produce personal reasoning in such cases as Noto and Mapp. Justice Clark seems to worry more about procedural regularity in state courts than in federal, while Justice Frankfurter feels quite the other way. Justice Douglas felt called on to speak separately in cases like Lathrop and Scales.

What has happened is that certain members have frozen into attitudes unacceptable to most of their brethren and they are hence unable to join in a reasoned statement of doctrine. They can perhaps agree a fortiori with results, as Justice Douglas does in Gomillion or Justice Frankfurter does in Irvin, but their reasoning fails to persuade a majority and sometimes persuades only themselves. The justice who seems most nearly free from this quality of dogmatic separatism is Stewart, the swing man in these cases. Justices Black and Douglas have taken a view toward many of these issues that appears irreconcilable with the view of any possible majority. Justices Frankfurter and Harlan can sometimes attract four others to their reasoning, but solid doctrine is hard to build on 5-4 decisions. Justices Warren and Brennan show some tendency to seek a middle ground; they seem more flexible than Black and Douglas at any rate. But they too can seldom carry a solid majority for their opinions in disputed cases.

This multiple stalemate has an incidental effect that is worth noting: it diminishes the contribution to constitutional law of those best qualified by experience and ability to make such a contribution. In the cases discussed above, Justice Black wrote the majority opinion in only three, two of them easy decisions exciting no serious question. Justice Douglas wrote only one. Justice Frankfurter wrote his share—five—but it cannot be said that any of them, except perhaps Gomillion, stated new and viable doctrine. How much more impressive and convincing Mapp and Cafeteria Workers v. McElroy could have been, for example, if these men had not been precluded, for one reason or another, from framing the Court opinions.

But the main point is that these conflicting dogmatisms have, for a long time, impeded the growth of doctrine in general. Worse, there are signs that the divisions have further crystallized with age. There seems small chance that they will soften enough, given existing personnel, to permit the development of a system of reasoned criteria in the civil rights field.

<sup>91</sup> Kunz v. New York, 340 U. S. 290, 299 (1951).

<sup>92</sup> Niemotko v. Maryland, 340 U. S. 268, 276 (1951).

This circumstance is profoundly relevant to the question of future appointments to the supreme bench. There may have been times in history when a loyal henchman or a good journeyman would be appropriate enough, but that time is not now. The Court's present need is for a man (or men) with the master crafts-man's intellectual capacity to weave the disparate strands of civil rights doctrine into a coherent tapestry, and a spirit of moderation that can marshal assent among those who are open to persuasion. It is an exacting set of requirements. But the plea for reasoned doctrine is not likely to be answered until it is filled.

APPENDIX

TABLE OF CASES

Case	Result	Opinion for court	Concurrence	Dissent
Boynton v. Va.	+	Bl		Wh, C
Braden v. U. S.	-	S		Bl, Wa, D; D, Wa, Bl, Br
Braunfeld v. Brown	-	Wa, C, Bl, Wh	F, H	D; S <sup>1</sup> ; Br <sup>1</sup>
Burton v. Wilmington	+	C	S	H, Wh; F
Cafeteria Workers v. McElroy	-	S		Br, Wa, Bl, D
Callanan v. U. S.	-	F		S, Wa, Bl, D
Communist Party v. Catherwood	+	H	Bl
Communist Party v. Subversive Activities Control Board	-	F		Wa; Bl; D; Br, Wa
Deutch v. U. S.	+	S		H, F; Wh, C
Eastern Railroad Presidents Conf. v. Noerr Motor Freight	+	Bl
Gallagher v. Crown Kosher Super Market	-	Wa, Bl, C, Wh	F, H	D; Br, S
Gomillion v. Lightfoot	+	F	Wh; D
Gori v. U. S.	-	F		D, Wa, Bl, Br
In Re Anastaplo	-	H		Bl, Wa, D, Br; Br, Wa
Int'l. Assoc. of Machinists v. Street	+	Br	D; Wh	Bl; F, H; Wh <sup>1</sup>
Irvin v. Dowd	+	C	F
Konigsberg v. State Bar	-	H		Bl, Wa, D; Br, Wa
Lathrop v. Donohue	-	Br, Wa, C, S	H, F; Wh	Bl; D
McGowan v. Md.	-	Wa	F, H	D
McNeal v. Culver	+	Wh	D, Br
Mapp v. Ohio	+	C	Bl; D; S	H, F, Wh
Monroe v. Pape	+	D	H, S	F <sup>1</sup>
Noto v. U. S.	+	H	Br, Wa; Bl
Poe v. Ullman	-	F, Wa, C, Wh	Br	Bl; D, S; S; H, S
Pugach v. Dollinger	-	per curiam	Br	D, Wa
Scales v. U. S.	-	H		Bl; D; Br, Wa, D
Shelton v. Tucker	+	S		F, C, H, Wh; H, F, C, Wh
Silverman v. U. S.	+	S	D; C, Wh
Smith v. Bennett	+	C
Times Film Corp. v. Chicago	-	C		Wa, Bl, D, Br; D, Wa, Bl
Torcaso v. Watkins	+	Bl	F, H
Two Guys From Harrison-Allentown v. McGinley	-	Wa	F, H	D
Uphaus v. Wyman	-	per curiam	Br	D, Wa, Bl; Bl, Wa, D
Wilkinson v. U. S.	-	S		Bl, Wa, D; D, Wa, Bl; Br, D
Wilson v. Schnettler	-	Wh	S	D, Wa, Br

KEY: I have arbitrarily assigned a + when the individual, for whatever reason, won his plea against governmental restriction. Bl, Wa, D=Black wrote opinion in which Warren and Douglas joined. H, Wh; F=Harlan wrote opinion joined by Whittaker; Frankfurter dissented separately.

<sup>1</sup> Concurring in part and dissenting in part.

THE 1960 TERM OF THE SUPREME COURT: A PSYCHOLOGICAL ANALYSIS*

GLENDON SCHUBERT
Michigan State University

Much recent research in the decision-making of the United States Supreme Court has been characterized by a pronounced emphasis upon the invocation of socio-psychological theory<sup>1</sup> and statistical methods of data processing<sup>2</sup> in lieu of exclusive reliance upon the legal-historical theory and methods typical of most research in this field of study. Symbolic of this development is the increasing tendency of political scientists to consider constitutional law as an aspect of political behavior as well as a branch of law, and correspondingly, to study the subject matter as judicial behavior. Naturally, this recent work has evinced a preoccupation with unidimensional analysis, since it is less complicated to work with one variable than with many, and the experience so gained no doubt is a prerequisite to multivariate study. Nevertheless, students who remain committed to the more traditional workways in constitutional law are quite right in insisting, as they do, that most Supreme Court cases raise what at least appear prima facie to be many issues for decision, and that their more subjective and impressionistic mode of analysis retains the great virtue of not oversimplifying the rich complexity of many Supreme Court cases to the extent that inescapably seems to be required by the newer theories and methods. Clearly, further advances in the behavioral study of Supreme Court decision-making depend upon the development of multidimensional models of Court action, which will make possible the observation and measurement of interrelationships among the significant major variables that in combination provide the basis for an adequate explanation of the manifest differences in the voting and opinion behavior of the justices.

The purpose of this article is to describe one such multidimensional model of the Court, and to explain its theory and application to the empirical data of the most recent session of the United States Supreme Court, which terminated only a month prior to the time when this was written. Substantively, the purpose is to demonstrate that the psychological approach to be proposed leads to more significant, more comprehensible, and more valid insights into the political behavior of the Supreme Court than seem to be provided by the case-by-case approach—an approach that attempts to realize the same ends by the quite different means of a series of précis upon what are inevitably (since there must be some space limitations in professional journals) a fraction of the hundred-odd cases that the Court decides non-unanimously on the merits each term. The specific hypothesis to be tested is that most of the variance in the voting behavior of the justices can be accounted for by the differences in their individual attitudes toward a small number of fundamental issues of public policy. These public policy issues constitute the variables of this study.

I. A BRIEF DESCRIPTION OF THE MODEL

Since both a general statement of the theory<sup>3</sup>

<sup>3</sup> Schubert, "Psychometric Research in Judicial Behavior," Modern Uses of Logic in Law, Vol. 2 (March, 1962), and "A Psychometric Model of the Supreme Court," American Behavioral Scientist, Vol. 5 (November, 1961), pp. 14-18.

* This article was prepared with the very substantial aid and assistance of the Center for Advanced Study in the Behavioral Sciences. In particular, I wish to acknowledge my indebtedness to John Gilbert, Staff Statistician, and to my colleague of the fellowship year 1960-61, Professor Clyde Coombs of the Department of Psychology of the University of Michigan.

<sup>1</sup> Harold J. Spaeth, "An Approach to the Study of Attitudinal Differences as an Aspect of Judicial Behavior," Midwest Journal of Political Science, Vol. 5 (May, 1961), pp. 165-180; S. Sidney Ulmer, "Scaling Judicial Cases: A Methodological Note," American Behavioral Scientist, Vol. 4 (April, 1961), pp. 31-34, and also his "Homeostatic Tendencies in the United States Supreme Court," in Ulmer (ed.), Introductory Readings in Political Behavior (Chicago: Rand McNally, 1961), pp. 167-188.

<sup>2</sup> Franklin M. Fisher, "On the Existence and Linearity of Perfect Predictors in 'Content Analysis'," Modern Uses of Logic in Law, Vol. 1 (March, 1960), pp. 1-9; Fred Kort, "The Quantitative Content Analysis of Judicial Opinions," American Behavioral Scientist, Vol. 3 (March, 1960), pp. 11-14; Stuart Nagel, "Using Simple Calculations to Predict Judicial Decisions," id., Vol. 4 (December, 1960), pp. 24-28; Joseph Tanenhaus, "Supreme Court Attitudes toward Federal Administrative Agencies," Journal of Politics, Vol. 22 (August, 1960), pp. 502-524.

and a technical description of the method<sup>4</sup> have been published elsewhere, only the essentials needed for comprehension of the substantive findings will be presented here. In accordance with modern psychometric theory,<sup>5</sup> which generalizes the basic stimulus-response point relationship, Supreme Court cases are treated as raw psychological data which embody the choices of the individual justices among a variety of stimuli. Each case before the Court for decision is conceptualized as being represented by a stimulus (j) point, which is located somewhere in a psychological space of the relevant dimensions, depending upon the number and intensity of issues that it raises. The combination of the attitudes of each justice toward these same issues also may be represented by an ideal (i) point, located in the same psychological space. In each decision of the Court, what is observed is the relationship between the i-point of each justice and the j-point for the case. The relationship that is measured is one of dominance; that is, whether the position of the i-point in the dimensions that define the space equals or exceeds, or is less than, the position of the j-point in these dimensions. Technically, an individual-compensatory composition model<sup>6</sup> is assumed: for an i-point to dominate a j-point, it is not essential that the individual equal or exceed the stimulus on all of the relevant dimensions, since an individual may (in appropriate instances) be able to compensate for his deficiency on one (or more) dimensions by an excess on other dimensions. To take a specific example, let us assume a simple two-dimensional space, where the relevant dimensions are judicial attitudes toward "civilian control over the military" and "stare decisis." A justice like Clark, whose attitude toward the civilian control variable was relatively negative or unsympathetic, might nevertheless be induced to vote in support of this value in a particular decision, because his relatively positive attitude toward stare decisis might lead him to follow a recent precedent, even though he had disagreed with the decision establishing it. Thus, his deficiency (in relationship to the degree of support for civil liberties demanded by the later case) might be compensated for by his strongly pro-stare decisis views. Conversely, a justice like Frankfurter, whose attitude toward civilian control was more positive than Clark's, might nevertheless vote against this value because of his slight regard for the value of stare decisis.<sup>7</sup>

Next let us consider the conjoint relationship between the i-points of all nine justices, assuming full participation in the decision, and a particular j-point. Obviously, how the case will be decided will depend upon whether a majority or a minority of the i-points dominate the j-point. If a majority of i-points dominate, then the value or values raised by the case will be upheld or supported by the decision "of the Court"; and if, to the contrary, the j-point dominates a majority of the i-points, then the value or values raised by the case will be rejected—"the Court" will refuse to support them. To take a concrete example, let us assume the general value "civil liberty," and the specific question whether "the Fourteenth Amendment requires" the Supreme Court to reverse a state court conviction of a criminal defendant, based in part upon evidence procured as the result of an unreasonable search or seizure. According to the theory proposed, it would be assumed that the i-points of no more than three justices dominated the j-point representing this issue at the time of the decision in Wolf v. Colorado,<sup>8</sup> and that no more than four did so throughout the following decade. As a consequence of Stewart's appointment and of Black's explicitly avowed shift in attitude toward this issue, a majority of i-points did dominate when the issue arose once again for disposition in a decision announced on the closing decision day of the 1960 Term; and consequently, Wolf v. Colorado was overruled.<sup>9</sup> Actually, the voting division

<sup>4</sup> Schubert, "A Solution to the Indeterminate Factorial Resolution of Thurstone and Degan's Study of the Supreme Court," Behavioral Science, Vol. 7 (Forthcoming, 1962).

<sup>5</sup> Clyde H. Coombs and Richard C. Kao, "On a Connection between Factor Analysis and Multidimensional Unfolding," Psychometrika, Vol. 25 (September, 1960), pp. 219-231; J. P. Guilford, "Factorial Angles to Psychology," Psychological Review, Vol. 68 (January, 1961), pp. 1-20; and especially Coombs, A Theory of Data (forthcoming), chs. 1, 11, and 12.

<sup>6</sup> Warren S. Torgerson, Theory and Methods of Scaling (New York: Wiley, 1958), pp. 352-359; Coombs, op cit., ch. 12.

<sup>7</sup> See Kinsella v. Singleton, 361 U. S. 234; Grisham v. Hagan, 361 U. S. 278; McElroy v. Guagliardo, and Wilson v. Bohlender, 361 U. S. 281; all decided January 18, 1960. Cf. Schubert, "Attitudes towards Civilian Control and Stare Decisis in the Warren Court," in Schubert (ed.), Judicial Decision-Making, Vol. IV in the series of International Yearbooks in Political Behavior Research (New York: The Free Press of Glencoe, Forthcoming, 1962).

<sup>8</sup> 338 U. S. 25 (1949).

<sup>9</sup> Mapp v. Ohio, 367 U. S. 643 (June 19, 1961).

in Mapp v. Ohio was 6-3, with Clark both supplying the extra favorable vote and writing the opinion of the Court; Clark's position should have occasioned no surprise, however, because it was in precise accord with the intention that he had announced seven years earlier.<sup>10</sup> Clark considered himself bound by the Wolf precedent unless and until a majority could be formed that would agree to overrule that decision—an event that was forestalled for several more years, apparently, by Black's idiosyncratic blind-spot for the Fourth Amendment.

We can now consider an operational definition of the Court's decision-making. In one dimension, the voting division of the Court is precisely determined by the intersection of the j-point with a line along which are arrayed the i-points of the justices. (This definition, it should be noted, is the one which applies for cumulative [or Guttman] scaling of Supreme Court cases.) In two dimensions, a decision is determined by the line orthogonal to the j-point vector; all justices whose i-points fall on the orthogonal line, or beyond it (in the positive direction of the variable) will vote in support of the value, and the remaining justices whose i-points lie on the negative side of the line will vote to reject it; while unanimous decisions occur, of course, when all i-points lie on, or on the positive side of, the orthogonal line, or else all i-points lie on the negative side of this line. In three dimensions, the decision is determined by the plane which intersects the space orthogonally to the j-point vector; and more generally, in r-dimensions by a hyperplane of r-1 dimensionality which intersects the r-dimensional space in a similar manner.

Thus, we conceive of both i-points representing the composite attitudes of individual justices, and j-points, representing the composite issues raised by individual cases, as sets of vectors terminating in points, each with a unique position in the same psychological space. Hereinafter we shall assume that this space is three-dimensional, since we shall work in three-space in the empirical application which follows. Cases in a set which raises questions of differing degrees of valuation about the same variable (e.g., sympathy for the constitutional claims of the right to counsel in state criminal trials) are located at various points in the space, but in an approximately linear relationship to each other; thus, each such point may be conceived of as lying upon or near a scale axis, representing the sub-variable, which transects the space. Through the centroid of a set of scale axes, representing a set of civil liberties sub-variables, would pass an axis representing a broadly defined heterogeneous major variable (such as "all civil liberties" issues for a given term); and this scale axis would follow the trace of the mean of the projections from all of the relevant j-points. But the i-points also project upon any scale axis; and therefore, a one-dimensional solution for the Court's decision-making function may be achieved by measuring the relationship between the projections from j-points and from i-points upon a scale axis representing any variable that is of interest. This, in effect, is precisely what is happening, in theory, when an analyst constructs a cumulative scale of a set of decisions that are postulated as pertaining to a single dominant variable, and positions the scale as an axis in the space. It is apparent that if the model is adapted for analysis invoking this particular definition of the decision-making function, as we shall do in the discussion which follows, the Court's decision-making is still being measured in unidimensional terms. But the model itself is multidimensional and, as we shall demonstrate, makes possible measurement of the interrelationship among several variables within a common frame of reference; and moreover, there is every reason to suppose that further research, and subsequent work with the model, will lead to the development of mathematical refinements corresponding to the multidimensional conceptions of the decision-making function given in the operational definition above.

In order to utilize the model that has been described, what we require are procedures to locate both i-points and j-points in three-dimensional space, and to measure the dominance relationship for any dyad, with each dyad consisting of a j-point and an i-point. Factor analysis affords a readily available technique for locating the set of i-points for a given set of decisions, such as a term of the Court, in a fixed spatial configuration. But the raw data come in a form that preclude the use of factor analysis, at least in the same manner, in order to locate the j-points. The reason for this is that, in a typical recent term, the Court divides in about a hundred decisions on the merits. Consequently it is possible to make a relatively large number of observations—about 100—of the location of a relatively small number of i-points—never more than 9. But more than 9 observations of the location of any specific j-point are never possible, because there are never more than 9 votes recorded in a single case. One hundred observations are ample to locate the i-points, by factor analytic techniques, with considerable precision; but nine observations are far too few to permit the same thing to be done for j-points. As we shall exemplify presently, factor analysis is essentially a statistical method for breaking down a correlation matrix into its principal component elements; and it can never be more reliable than the matrix upon which it feeds. No single Supreme Court decision contains enough votes to allow the computation of reliable correlation coefficients. If we had a hundred justices participating in the decision of each of, say, a dozen cases in the typical term, factor analysis could serve very well to locate a configuration of j-points, but it would then be incapable of locating the i-points. If there were a hundred justices participating in the decision of a hundred or more cases in each term, factor analysis could be used to locate both types of points with what ought to be good precision. This implies that the model here described may very well find application for study of the attitudes of United States Senators or for state legislators, as well as for other smaller decision-making groups like the Supreme Court.

<sup>10</sup> Concurring opinion in Irvine v. California, 347 U. S. 128, 138-139 (1954).

Although it is not possible to locate j-points in the space as precisely as i-points, at least by factor analysis, it is possible to locate sets of j-points in the same space with the i-points. This is done by cumulative scaling of sets of cases. Each cumulative scale measures the one-dimensional alignment of the attitudes of the justices towards a single variable. If most of the Court's decisions can be associated with a set of cumulative scales, and if the set of scales can be passed through the space as axes in such a way that the projections from the i-points on the scale axes are consistent with the alignments of the justices on the cumulative scales, then it will be assumed that the scale axes are indeed the counterparts of their analogue cumulative scales; and that the variance in the voting behavior of the justices is adequately accounted for by the manifest differences in the attitudes of the justices towards the cumulative scale variables. The procedure for fitting scales in the factor space will be explained in greater detail in connection with specific empirical data, in a later section of this article.

II. THE UNIVERSE OF RAW DATA

The sample of decisions to be analyzed consists of all cases in which the Supreme Court divided on the merits during the period of the 1960 Term, which extended from October 10, 1960 through June 19, 1961. Both formal and per curiam decisions accordingly are included, but unanimous and jurisdictional decisions were excluded. As Table I indicates, almost

TABLE I. SUMMARY OF DECISIONS ON THE MERITS, 1960 TERM

Decision	Formal	Per curiam	Totals
Split	87	12	99
Unanimous	34	41	75
Totals	121	53	174

three-fourths of the Court's formal decisions were reached over the disagreement of one or more justices, while this was true of less than one-fourth of the per curiam decisions. These results were in line with previous experience. It has not been unusual either, in recent years, for the justices to disagree in a majority of their decisions on the merits, as they did during the 1960 Term. The average annual number of split decisions over the past fifteen terms was 97, and the average number of unanimous decisions on the merits was 79; in this respect, the 1960 Term was quite typical.

For purposes of this study, each case, to which the Court had assigned a unique docket number and for which the Court had made a disposition on the merits, was a unit for voting analysis. As a unit of content, the docketed case offers the advantages of being specifically and uniquely identifiable, and of providing what with very rare exceptions is an unambiguous basis for voting attribution which can readily be replicated by other analysts. (Those familiar with earlier studies of judicial voting behavior will recognize that some scholars have worked with less explicit units of measurement, such as the "opinion of the Court" or the "decision" of the Court.) There are also disadvantages to the use of the case as a unit, but none relevant to the empirical data with which we presently are concerned.

For each case, one set of nine votes was counted. In each of eleven cases, one justice did not participate in the decision on the merits; and in one other, two justices did not. There were also two Federal Employers' Liability Act evidentiary cases and one Jones Act case in which Frankfurter, according to his custom,<sup>11</sup> persisted in jurisdictional dissent at the time when his colleagues voted on the merits; these three jurisdictional dissents were classified as non-participations, for purposes of the present analysis. Eight votes could not be specified, in one case in which the Court divided equally, without opinion. After these non-participations and unspecifiable votes were deducted, a total of 867 votes remained; they constituted the basis for the factor analysis and the cumulative scaling.

<sup>11</sup> See Schubert, "Policy without Law: An Extension of the Certiorari Game," Stanford Law Review, Vol. 14 [(March, 1962), pp. 284-327].

III. THE FACTOR ANALYSIS

Computation of the Correlation Matrix. The initial task in any factor analysis is the construction of a correlation matrix. In the present study, the correlation matrix was based upon a set of four-fold tables which, in turn, were constructed directly from the 867 votes just described. These votes were tabulated to show the totals of agreement and disagreement with the majority, in the decision of each case, for every pair of justices. For any such pair, each case holds five possibilities: (1) both may agree in the majority; (2) both may agree in dissent; (3) the first member of the pair may vote with the majority, while the second dissents; (4) the second member of the pair may vote with the majority, while the first dissents; or (5) either or both members may fail to participate, in which event there is no score for the pair for that case. In the tabulation of votes for the factor analysis, no attention is paid to the substantive variables to which the decisions relate; the sole criterion for the attribution of votes in each case is agreement or disagreement with the majority.

It is most convenient to arrange the summary tabulation of agreement-disagreement, for each judicial dyad, in the form of a four-fold table such as Table II. The table shows that Black and Douglas dissented together 29 times; this dis/dis (-/-) cell is the one that contains the kind of information utilized in some earlier studies<sup>12</sup> of "dissenting blocs" of the Court. Similarly, Black and Douglas agreed in 70 of these 98 sets of votes; this is the sum of the major or positive diagonal (i.e., the +/+ and the -/- cells), and this is the kind of information that was the basis for the "inter-agreement" bloc analysis of the studies just cited. The weakness of these earlier approaches was that, by concentrating upon the agreement between pairs of justices, the analysts ignored what is at least an equally important aspect of judicial voting behavior, i.e., the ways in which justices disagree. Table II, for instance, shows that not only did Douglas and Black disagree in over a fourth of these decisions, they tended to disagree in a particular way. In over 80 per cent of these instances of disagreement, it was Douglas who dissented while Black adhered to the majority. This finding certainly suggests that Douglas was more extreme in his dissenting behavior than Black (or, as we shall observe presently in Table III, than any other member of the Court during this term). Moreover, the correlation coefficients, which are computed from the four-fold tables, are very sensitive to how votes are partitioned between the two cells of a diagonal, as well as to differences between the diagonals.

In order to measure precisely the relationship among the four cells of a four-fold table, phi correlation coefficients are computed.<sup>13</sup> In

<sup>12</sup> C. Herman Pritchett, The Roosevelt Court: A Study in Judicial Politics and Values, 1937-1947 (New York, 1948); Schubert, Quantitative Analysis of Judicial Behavior (Glencoe, 1959).

<sup>13</sup> The phi coefficient is an approximation of the Pearsonian r correlation coefficient, and is appropriate to use when, as here, the two distributions to be correlated reflect a genuine dichotomy. The phi coefficient is relatively simple to compute: it is the ratio of the difference of the cross-products of the diagonals of a four-fold table, to the square root of the product of the marginals. For the data of Table II,

$$\begin{aligned} r_{\phi} &= \frac{(41 \cdot 29) - (23 \cdot 5)}{[(46) \cdot (52) \cdot (64) \cdot (34)]^{1/2}} \\ (1) \quad &= \frac{1189 - 115}{(5204992)^{1/2}} \\ &= + \frac{1074}{2281.445} = +.471. \end{aligned}$$

Evidently, the sign of the coefficient depends upon which diagonal cross-product is the larger; or, in other words, upon whether or not a pair of justices agree more often than they disagree, and also upon whether they agree both in assent and in dissent, i.e., whether their disagreement is divided

TABLE II. FOUR-FOLD TABLE OF AGREEMENT-DISAGREEMENT, DOUGLAS-BLACK, 1960 TERM*

	Black		Totals
	+	-
Douglas	+ 41	5	46
	- 23	29	52
Totals	64	34	98

* The total of joint votes counted for this dyad is 98 rather than 99, although both Black and Douglas participated in all split decisions on the merits during this term, because of the lack of any objective basis for identifying the partition of the votes in the one case, already noted, in which the Court divided equally.

he correlation matrix shown in Table III, phi ranges from +.745 (for Harlan and Frankfurter) to -.602 (for Douglas and Harlan). Harlan, therefore, was the most extreme justice in the range of his agreement and disagreement; and he voted most frequently the same as Frankfurter, and least often in agreement with Douglas.

Since there are nine justices on the Court, there are four-fold tables and correlation coefficients for each of thirty-six dyads.<sup>14</sup> For purposes of this study, all data were placed on punch cards, and both the computation of phi coefficients and the factor analysis were programmed for computer analysis.<sup>15</sup> Since both matrices are symmetrical, and in order to conserve space, Table III presents the four-fold tables above the major diagonal, and the correlation coefficients below.

Before turning to the results of the factor analysis, equally or disproportionately between the cells of the diagonals. The maximum range of the phi coefficient is from +1 to -1; but these limits rarely are attained empirically, since the maximum size of phi is a function of the distribution of the marginals, and can be  $\pm 1$  only when all four marginal frequencies are equal. See Edward E. Cureton, "Note on  $\phi/\phi_{\max}$ ," Psychometrika, Vol. 24 (March, 1959), pp. 89-91.

<sup>14</sup> When factor analysis is performed by hand use of a calculator instead of utilizing a computer program, it is necessary to arrange the correlation coefficients in the form of a square symmetrical matrix, with the major diagonal filled with the estimates of the highest communality for each justice. For the techniques of factor analysis the interested reader is referred to any of the several standard works on this subject, e.g., Benjamin Fruchter, Introduction to Factor Analysis (Princeton: Van Nostrand, 1954); Raymond B. Cattell, Factor Analysis: An Introduction and Manual for the Psychologist and Social Scientist (New York: Harper, 1952); Louis L. Thurstone, Multiple-Factor Analysis (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1947).

<sup>15</sup> I am indebted to John P. Gilbert for developing a program for the computation of the phi coefficients, and also one for the computation of the factorial distances discussed in the final section of this paper. The computer program for the IBM 650 utilized was Centroid Factor Analysis, Ident. No. SU-4524, written by Jonathan E. Robbins (April, 1957), developed and tested by the Watson Scientific Computing Laboratory, Columbia University, and modified by Mr. Gilbert, Center for Advanced Study in the Behavioral Sciences, Stanford (multilithed).

analysis of the correlation matrix, some interesting findings may be observed from a mere inspection of Table III. The most obvious is the sharp demarcation of the justices into what appear to be two opposing blocs. Douglas, Black, Warren, and Brennan all correlate positively with each other, and negatively with the five remaining justices. With the exception of Stewart's marginally negative correlation with Clark, these remaining five justices—Frankfurter, Harlan, Whittaker, Clark, and Stewart—all correlate positively with each other, and negatively with the first group. Stewart clearly was the most independent member of the Court in his voting behavior: his highest correlation with any other justice, in either direction, was less than .35; and his voting was almost perfectly independent, statistically, from what are otherwise the most marginal members of each group, since his correlation was approximately -.03 with both Brennan and Clark. As the four-fold tables indicate, Black and Warren often dissented together, as did Frankfurter and Harlan also; but neither Black nor Warren ever joined either Frankfurter or Harlan in dissent. It is obvious that these two pairs of justices, and the respective groups with which each tended to associate, were in pretty sharp and basic disagreement over something; and unless we are prepared to accept the somewhat fatuous notion that they couldn't get together over the meaning or application of the principle of stare decisis, as some students of the Court seem to believe,<sup>16</sup> then it may not be implausible to entertain the hypothesis that these groups may have been in disagreement about the social, economic, and political values that the Court upholds in its decisions.

The Factor Loadings. The initial product of a factor analysis is a set of derived correlations (or "loadings," as they customarily are called) which purport to measure the extent to which each element, of whatever has been associated in the correlation matrix, is related to the components or dimensions into which the basic correlation matrix has been broken down. In the present study, the elements are the justices, and the factor loadings purport to express the correlation of each justice with the basic underlying dimensions of the phi matrix. Although it is technically possible to extract as many factors as there are elements intercorrelated in the phi matrix—nine, in the instant case—only six factors actually were computed, and of these, only three will be used for purposes of testing

<sup>16</sup> E.g., Fred Kort in this REVIEW, Vol. 54 (December, 1960), p. 1000.

TABLE III. FOUR-FOLD TABLES AND PHI CORRELATION MATRIX, 1960 TERM

	D	Bl		Wa		Br		S		C		Wh		F		H
		+	-	+	-	+	-	+	-	+	-	+	-	+	-	+	-
D		+ 41	5	42	4	44	2	31	14	23	22	20	26	16	23	20	25
		- 23	29	31	21	33	19	43	6	51	1	45	7	47	3	50	1
Bl	.471			+ 61	3	58	6	41	19	40	23	32	32	31	26	37	26
				- 12	22	19	15	33	1	34	0	33	1	32	0	33	0
Wa	.363		.655			+ 69	4	51	18	50	22	41	32	39	26	45	26
						- 8	17	23	2	24	1	24	1	24	0	25	0
Br	.392		.403		.664			+ 57	16	55	21	45	32	44	25	49	26
								- 17	4	19	2	20	1	19	1	21	0
S	-.230		-.337		-.195		-.029			+ 56	18	52	22	51	15	56	17
										- 15	4	11	9	10	9	11	8
C	-.551		-.410		-.273		-.175		-.031			+ 56	18	55	14	59	14
												- 9	14	8	11	11	12
Wh	-.455		-.474		-.367		-.319		.133		.331			+ 51	12	53	11
														- 12	14	17	15
F	-.578		-.481		-.390		-.287		.228		.343		.348			+ 58	5
																- 4	20
H	-.602		-.441		-.362		-.322		.171		.317		.315		.745

the principal hypothesis. The reason for so limiting the number of factors is two-fold: (1) the residual matrix, representing the amount of variance unaccounted for by the first three factors, was very small, and less, indeed, than the estimated error variance; and (2) most readers of this REVIEW are accustomed to thinking in terms of three-dimensional space, and three factors can be given an Euclidean graphical representation which accords with the spatial intuitions, and therefore the comprehension, of most readers.

The usual procedure in factor analysis is to rotate the orthogonal factor axes, which are the direct product of a complete centroid routine, to oblique positions that are presumed to correspond to some criterion related to empirical reality, and thus to make possible a more meaningful psychological interpretation than would usually be possible if the orthogonal axes were retained.<sup>17</sup> The orthogonal axes have not been rotated in the present study, but for the reason that, contrary to the usual procedure, no reliance is placed upon the association of substantive meaning with the factors. Substantive meaning is associated, instead, with the scale axes which are passed through the space defined by the orthogonal factor axes; and thus the scale axes—which are oblique—perform the same function, for purposes of interpretation, that is usually accomplished by rotation of the orthogonal axes. The orthogonal axes are used, therefore, only as a set of reference axes to define the three-dimensional space in which the i-points of the justices and the j-points of the cases are located. And the factor loadings, shown in Table IV, function as Cartesian coordinates which locate the i-points of the justices in the factor space.

<sup>17</sup> Perhaps it should be noted, for the benefit of readers not familiar with the method, that orthogonal axes are statistically independent while oblique axes are correlated with each other therefore, making a factor interpretation based directly upon a system of orthogonal axes implies an assumption that there is no relationship among the factors, which must be conceived to be independent of each other. Applied to the present data, this would involve the assumption that there was no relationship, at least in the minds of the justices, among the major issues of public policy toward which they responded in their voting.

Factor loadings can vary, in principle, from +1 to -1; in practice, their variance is bounded by the extremity of the correlation coefficients upon which they are based. It will be observed that, on the average, the highest loadings (both positive and negative) are on the first factor, and that the mean magnitude of the third factor loadings is smallest. This is inherent in the centroid routine, which assumes that the first factor, to which the largest portion of the variance is attributed, is the most important factor, and so on. The loadings on the first factor range from a high of approximately +.77, for Black, to a low of -.74, for Frankfurter. Evidently, the justices are partitioned on the first factor into the same two groups that were manifest in the phi matrix; but evidently also the groupings on the second and third factors are quite different. Mere inspection of the factor matrix of Table IV suggests that the multidimensional relationships among the justices are going to be somewhat different, and certainly more complex, than the simple bifurcation of a single dimension which will account for much, but not enough, of the variance in the voting behavior of the justices. For a fuller understanding than a single dimension—even when it is overwhelmingly the most important one—can afford, we must turn to an examination of relationships made possible by work with the three-dimensional factor space.

IV. THE CUMULATIVE SCALES

Cumulative scaling is a research operation completely independent of the factor analysis, and so may be undertaken before, at the same time, or after the factor analysis is completed. In cumulative (or Guttman) scaling, the same universe of raw data is used as for the factor analysis. But instead of tabulating votes by dyads and in terms of agreement with the majority, for scaling purposes votes are tabulated by cases, and are classified as being either in support of, or in opposition to, certain defined scale variables. The variables employed here were identified on the basis of experimental work in previous terms of the Warren Court. The basic procedures for cumulative scaling have been discussed elsewhere,<sup>18</sup> although the format of Figures 1-3, below, differs somewhat in the presentation of results.

Consistent votes in support of the scale variable are denoted by the symbol  $x$ , and inconsistent positive votes by  $\underline{x}$ . A blank space indicates a consistent negative vote, and the symbol  $-$  is used to signify an inconsistent negative vote. An asterisk signifies non-participation. Scale scores are simple functions of scale positions, and a justice's scale position is defined as being fixed by his last consistent positive vote. Where one or more non-participations separate a justice's consistent positive and negative votes, his scale position is assumed to be at the midpoint of the non-participation or non-participations, since it cannot be determined how he might have voted. A justice's scale score is computed by the formula:

$$(2) \quad s = \frac{2p}{n} - 1,$$

where  $s$  is his scale score,  $p$  his scale position, and  $n$  equals the number of cases in the scale. Scale scores, like correlation coefficients and factor loadings, can range in value from +1 to -1, with the significant difference in practice that scale scores frequently attain these extreme values, reflecting the extremity of attitude of several of the justices in each of the scales shown in Figures 1-3.

The C Scale. Figure 1 is a cumulative scale of

<sup>18</sup> Schubert, op. cit. note 12 supra, pp. 270-290.

TABLE IV. FACTOR LOADINGS FOR JUDICIAL IDEAL-POINTS, 1960 TERM

Justices	Factors:
	I	II	III
D	.754	.283	.170
Bl	.769	-.259	-.130
Wa	.699	-.456	.089
Br	.578	-.298	.291
S	-.289	.126	.363
Wh	-.571	.065	-.108
H	-.714	-.373	.226
F	-.736	-.338	.270
C	-.519	-.245	-.309

1960 TERM
C Scale.
Cases	Justices								Totals
	D	Bl	Wa	Br	S	Wh	F	H	C
5/762	x								1-8
6/308	x								1-8
6/420	x								1-8
6/582	x								1-8
4/778:200	x	x							2-7
5/265	x	x					*		2-6
4/507	-	x	x						2-7
4/611	-	x	x						2-7
5/458	x	-	x						2-7
4/388	x	x	x						3-6
3370:685	x	x	x						3-6
4839:122	x	x	x						3-6
5/381	x	-	x	x					3-6
4/372	x	x	x	x					4-5
4/426	x	x	x	x					4-5
5/43	x	x	x	x					4-5
5/301:70	x	x	x	x					4-5
5/301:179	x	x	x	x					4-5
5/399	x	x	x	x					4-5
5/431	x	x	x	x					4-5
6/36	x	x	x	x					4-5
6/82	x	x	x	x					4-5
6/117	x	x	x	x					4-5
4581:1	x	x	x	x					4-5
4623:12	x	x	x	x					4-5
4719:486	x	x	x	x					4-5
6/617	x	-	-	x	x				3-6
6/599	x	-	-	x	x				4-5
4/587	x	x	x	-	x		x		4-5
4/479:14	x	x	x	x	x				5-4
4/479:83	x	x	x	x	x				5-4
5/85	x	x	x	x	x				5-4
5/551	x	x	x	x	x				5-4
6/1	x	x	x	x	x				5-4
4694:233	x	x	x	x	x				5-4
4842:161	x	x	x	x	x		x		6-3
5/715	x	x	x	x	x				6-3
4798:236	x	x	x	x	x			x	6-3
4/631	x	x	x	x	x	x			6-3
5/312	x	x	x	x	x	x			6-3
6/213	x	x	x	x	x	x			6-3
6/418	x	x	x	x	*	x			5-3
4703:238	x	x	x	x	-	x			5-4
4754:4	x	x	x	x	x	x			7-2
4577:669	x	x	x	x	-	x		x	6-3
4/350	x	x	x	x	-	-	x	x	6-3
5/534	x	x	x	x	-	-	x	x	7-2
4/454	x	x	x	x	-	-	x	x	7-2
4687:181	x	x	x	x	x	-	x	x	7-2
5/610	x	x	x	x	x	x	x		8-1
5/167	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	8-1
Totals	49-2	43-8	43-8	38-13	20-30	10-41	7-44	6-44	221-236
Scale positions	51	47	45	39	26	13	6	1	457
Scale scores	1.00	.84	.76	.53	-.02	-.49	-.76	-.96
$R = 1 - \frac{22}{403} = .945$ $S = 1 - \frac{23}{79} = .709$

FIGURE 1. Judicial Attitudes towards Civil Liberties, 1960 Term*

* In Figures 1-3, cases are cited in either of two ways. Those decided prior to June, 1961, are cited to the official United States Reports: the digit preceding the slash bar is the third digit of the volume number, and should be read as though preceded, in each case, by the digits 36; the number following the slash bar is the page cite; and if more than one case begins on the same page, a docket number follows the page cite, separated from it the 51 civil liberties cases that the Court decided by divided votes on the merits during the 1960 Term. In content, the C variable was defined broadly to include all cases in which the primary issue involved a conflict between personal rights and claims to liberty, and governmental authority. The number of cases included in the scale—over half of the total—was somewhat larger than in other recent terms; but the ranking of justices on the scale was very similar to that of the 1959 Term, and precisely the same as in 1958, which was Stewart's first term on the Court.

The scale accords with common knowledge that Douglas, Black, Warren, and Brennan are more sympathetic to civil liberties claims than the other members of the present Court. But there are definite gradations among the attitudes of these four "libertarian" justices toward the civil liberties claims of this term, and the scale distance separating Douglas and Brennan is just as great as the scale distance separating Whittaker and Clark. The mean rate of support for civil liberties claims of the four justices with high positive scale scores (the liberals on this issue) is 85%; the mean rate of opposition for the four justices with high negative scale scores (the conservatives on this issue) is 86%. This differentiation of the Warren Court into a set of liberal justices and a much more conservative group agrees with Pritchett's by a colon. Official citations are not available, at the time this is written, for cases decided during the final three weeks of the term; such cases are cited to Volume 29 of United States Law Week, Supreme Court Section, with a four-digit page number followed by the docket number.

Two coefficients appear at the bottom of each scale; they purport to measure the degree of consistency in the set of votes being scaled. R is Guttman's coefficient of reproducibility; .900 or better is conventionally accepted as evidence to support the hypothesis that a single dominant variable has motivated the voting behavior of the justices in the set of cases comprising the sample. S is Menzel's coefficient of scalability; it provides a more rigid standard than R, because S (unlike R) does not capitalize upon the spurious contribution to consistency that arises from the inclusion in the scale of either cases or justices with extreme marginal distributions. Menzel has suggested that the appropriate level of acceptance for S is "somewhere between .60 and .65"; the scales presented in Figures 1-3 are well above the suggested, minimal levels of acceptability for both R and S. See Herbert Menzel, "A New Coefficient for Scalogram Analysis," Public Opinion Quarterly, Vol. 17 (1953), pp. 268-280.

findings for the Vinson Court,<sup>19</sup> except that Frankfurter now appears as a conservative rather than as an exponent of "libertarian restraint."

It is certainly noteworthy that Douglas, over a wide range of specific issues, supported civil liberties claims in all except two out of fifty-one cases. His two inconsistent (and C-) votes both came in cases that raised technical questions of procedure relating to the statutory rights of federal criminal defendants, in cases where another variable (J-: Supreme Court deference to lower courts) also was present. Douglas was the only justice to dissent alone against C- decisions of the Court; and his four solitary C+ dissents identify him as the justice most sympathetic to civil liberties claims. At the opposite extreme was Clark, who found only five civil liberties claims, out of the total of fifty-one, sufficiently persuasive to gain his vote. Moreover, four of Clark's five C+ votes were inconsistencies, suggesting that in these cases he may have been motivated by his attitudes toward other variables than C; there is, of course, little empirical basis for assuming that all justices perceive all issues raised by cases in the same way, or that any justice's voting behavior will be perfectly consistent. The Guttman model assumes that if in a particular scale most respondents are highly consistent most of the time, it is reasonable to infer that they are predominately motivated by their differential attachments to a common value. And it is in precise accord with the assumptions of the "individual-compensatory composition model," mentioned earlier, that a justice may, in some decisions, compensate for his lack of sympathy for, say, civil liberties by his strong attachment to other appropriate values that he may perceive to be present in the decisions. This theory seems to provide a plausible explanation for Clark's inconsistencies. His most inconsistent votes, for instance, came in two cases, Burton v. Wilmington Parking Authority, 365 U.S. 715 (April 17, 1961), and Mapp v. Ohio, 367 U.S. 643 (June 19, 1961), where he joined C+ majorities against the dissents of Harlan, Frankfurter and Whitaker. The first case involved racial discrimination in a restaurant in a publicly owned building; and the second was the decision, already mentioned, which overruled Wolf v. Colorado. In both cases, Clark's strong attachment to stare decisis appeared to overcome his basically C- attitude sufficiently to cause him to support the majority, although such a consideration obviously did not forestall the more activist conservatives from voting as their convictions about libertarian claims dictated.

The key decision-maker in C cases during the 1960 Term, however, was Stewart, whose propensity to function as the swing man in an otherwise well-balanced Court was sufficiently obvious to attract journalistic comment.<sup>20</sup> Although Stewart tied with Clark for inconsistency with four such votes, he nevertheless voted consistently over 90 per cent of the time, and his scale score of -.02 indicates the close balance of his voting on civil liberties issues. Stewart was in the majority far more often than any of his colleagues, dissenting in only seven of the fifty cases in which he participated; and in nineteen 5-4 decisions, Stewart's vote was determinative. Slightly less than half (43 per cent) of the cases on the scale were decided C+, but the failure of the cases to break evenly cannot be attributed to Stewart. The division between C plus and minus decisions would have corresponded precisely to Stewart's scale position, except for the inconsistent negative votes of Black, Warren and Brennan, in the bottom three C- cases near the middle of the scale. Brennan's inconsistency is of no particular interest; it occurred in a routine case of statutory interpretation involving the imposition of multiple sentences upon a federal criminal defendant. But the Black and Warren inconsistencies appeared in two of the "Sunday Closing Law Cases," Gallagher v. Crown Koshier Super Market, 366 U.S. 617, and Braunfeld v. Brown, 366 U.S. 599, both decided in May 29, 1961. Many dispassionate observers will agree that the Black and Warren votes in these cases to uphold the constitutionality of the Massachusetts and Pennsylvania "blue laws," which upheld the principle of majority transgression of both the religious and the economic claims of the defendants, were clearly illiberal; and the fact that such votes appear as inconsistencies in the C scale should enhance confidence in the proposition that the C scale provides an adequate general measure of the civil libertarian sympathies of the justices.

The E Scale. One finding, which has resulted from applying the research approach of this paper to a much longer period—fifteen terms—has been that political scientists have been living with a somewhat distorted image of the Court during the past two decades. The pronounced emphasis upon the Court's civil liberties decisions,<sup>21</sup> reflecting, perhaps, the no-doubt laudable bias with which students of the Court approached their subject, has tended to obscure the significance of the Court's decisions relating to economic liberalism. The usual impression that one receives from reading the literature is that the traumatic events of 1937 resolved the problems of economic liberalism for our generation; and that since that time, the economic liberalism of the New Deal has motivated at least a clear majority of successively later Courts in supplanting the economically conservative precedents established by a majority of the "Nine Old Men" and their predecessors of the Taft Court. The real issues of public policy on the Court, it has seemed, have related to civil rights and liberties. But a careful and systematic examination of all of the Court's decisions on the merits contradicts the impression that the Court is preoccupied with questions of constitutional interpretation, and that statutory interpretation—which the economic cases characteristically involve—is a policy making function of lesser importance to the court.

<sup>20</sup> Time, Vol. 77 (June 16, 1961), p. 18.

<sup>21</sup> This emphasis is reflected, for example in Pritchett, ibid., p. viii; and in Robert McCloskey, "Deeds Without Doctrines: Civil Rights in the 1960 Term," in this issue of this REVIEW, above, <sup>19</sup> Civil Liberties and the Vinson Court (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1954), p. 227.

Taking the decade of the 1950's as the most relevant recent sample, there were more cases on the E scale than on the C scale in half of the terms. Specifically, there were more E than C cases in both the 1958 and 1959 Terms, so the clear preponderance of C cases in the 1960 Term is atypical. Counting, of course, is no substitute for thinking; and a quantitative measure of the relative importance of the Court's decision-making on the issues of civil liberty and economic liberalism does not foreclose a qualitative judgment on this question. But the mere assumption that constitutional questions are qualitatively more important than statutory questions is no proof; and absent acceptable criteria in terms of which it can be demonstrated that the Court's civil liberties questions generally—not just the School Segregation Cases—have had a greater impact upon American society during the past two decades than have the Court's decisions involving economic issues, it does not seem too unreasonable to accept at least tentatively findings based upon quantitative criteria.

In content, the E scale is just as broadly and heterogeneously defined as the C scale. The pp. 71-89. In his series of annual survey articles on constitutional law, published in this REVIEW during the decade 1952-61, David Fellman allocates three-fourths of the approximate 370 pages, in which he discussed civil liberties, economic, and taxation issues, to what are here denominated C scale cases, and the remaining one-fourth to E and F scale cases.

1960 TERM
E Scale
Cases	Justices									Totals
	D	Bl	Wa	Br	C	H	S	F	Wh
6/169	x									1	8
5/320	x	x								2	7
4/441	x	x						*		2	6
4614:284	x	x								2	7
4618:306	x	x								2	7
4618:307	x	x								2	7
4713:392	x	x								2	7
4743:97	x	x	x	x						4	5
5/705	x	x	x	x				*		4	4
4/325	x	x	x	x	x			*		5	3
4/520	x	x	x	x	x			x		6	3
5/1:45	x	x	x	x	x				x	6	3
5/1:46	x	x	x	x	x				x	6	3
5/336	x	x	x	x	x				x	6	3
6/316	x	x	x	x	*	*				4	3
6/276	-	x	x	x	x	x				5	4
5/731	x	x	x	x	x	x				6	3
4/642	-	x	x	x	x	x	*			5	3
5/160	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	*		6	2
5/667:64	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	*	*	6	2
5/667:85	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	*	*	6	2
5/695	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	*	*	6	2
5/705	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	*	*	6	2
5/651	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	*	*	7	1
6/28	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	*	*	6	3
										113	100
Totals	23-2	24-1	18-7	17-8	11-13	9-15	6-18	2-14	3-22	213
Scale positions	25	24	18	18	16	10½	7½	4	0
Scale scores	1.00	.92	.44	.44	.28	-.16	-.40	-.68	-1.00
$R = 1 - \frac{13}{196} = .934 \quad S = 1 - \frac{13}{49} = .735$

FIGURE 2. Judicial Attitudes towards Economic Liberalism, 1960 Term

basic value that permeates the issues of economic liberalism is that of favoring claims of underprivileged economic interests as against those of affluence and monopoly power. Thus, E+ is pro-labor in union-management conflicts, pro-small business as against big business, pro-competition and anti-oligopoly, pro-governmental economic regulation "in the public interest" of special, "private" economic interests, and, most characteristically, economic liberalism means to favor the claims of injured railroad workers and seamen against their corporate employers and insurers.

As Figure 2 shows, the four justices who are civil libertarians are also the ones who score highest on the E scale. But the remaining five members of the Court vote quite differently upon the two kinds of issues. Clark, who was least sympathetic to civil liberties, appears in the role of an economic liberal, scoring only slightly lower than Warren and Brennan, and definitely emerging as the fulcrum of the Court on E issues. Nor is this a matter of recent conversion; Clark also ranked fifth (and again, after Douglas, Black, Warren, and Brennan) on the E scales for both the 1958 and 1959 Terms. Neither fact should be surprising; Clark's judicial voting record is quite consistent with the political position of the Texas "Fair Dealer" who served as Truman's Attorney General at the time of his appointment to the Court.

Stewart scores much lower on the E scale than on C; and Whittaker, who was the most moderate of the four C— conservatives, is identified as the anchor man of the Court in terms of his economic conservatism. Of particular interest is the fact that Frankfurter, who was tied with Harlan at the next to the bottom rank on C, also is in the second lowest rank on E. If we consider, as may seem intuitively justifiable, that the C and E scales taken together provide a good test of liberalism as a generalized range of attitudes, then it seems quite clear that Frankfurter was the most illiberal justice in the 1960 Term: he voted only nine out of 67 times in support of the liberal position. The necessary inference that one would draw, on the basis of cumulative scaling theory, from Frankfurter's low scale of scores of  $-.76$  on C and of  $-.68$  on E is that he voted conservatively because of his conservative attitudes. Any inference must be evaluated, however, in the light of Mr. Justice Frankfurter's own explanations, frequently proffered, which contradict the assumption that, for him at least, these two scales each involve a single dominant variable. According to Frankfurter, who often has admitted his passionate personal sympathy for the down-trodden and oppressed among the Court's litigants, many of his illiberal votes in these cases must be attributed to his deference to federalism or to judicial restraint, or to the wise judges who sit on lower courts of the present or the Supreme Court of the past.

The F Scale. The third most important variable, in recent terms, has been the F scale, which deals with monetary conflicts of interest between private individuals and government. Thus, F+ means to uphold the position of the government (national, state, or local) in tax and eminent domain cases, and in other matters where fiscal claims are at issue. In a sense, therefore, F is a closer analogue to C than is E, since C also is concerned with conflicts of interest between private individuals and governmental authority. But an examination of the voting and opinion behavior of the justices makes it apparent that for most of them, the issues of the F scale are more closely related to issues of economic liberalism than of civil liberties. This is hardly surprising, since F is

1960 TERM
F Scale
Cases	Justices								Totals
	Bl	Wa	C	Br	F	H	S	Wh
4/443	x								1-8
5/624	x	x						x	3-6
4811:288	x	x	x	x	x				5-4
4/361	x	x	x	x	x	x			6-3
5/467	x	x	x	x	x	x	*		6-2
4/310	x	x	x	x	x	x	x		7-2
4469:533	x	x	x	x	x	x	*	x	7-1
4/289	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	8-1
4/446	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	8-1
5/753	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	8-1
3381:629	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	8-1
3381:843	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	x	8-1
4/410	x	x	-	-	x	x	x	x	6-3
6/199	x	x	x	x	x	-	x	x	8-1
									89-35
Totals	14-0	13-1	11-3	11-3	12-2	10-4	8-4	9-5	124
Scale positions	14	13	12	12	12	11	9½	8	1
Scale scores	1.00	.86	.71	.71	.57	.36	.14	-.89

$$R = 1 - \frac{1}{53} = .943 \quad S = 1 - \frac{4}{23} = .826$$

FIGURE 3. Judicial Attitudes towards Governmental Fiscal Claims, 1960 Term

differentiable from E primarily in terms of the parties whose interests are in conflict. Yet this difference in the identity of the parties may make a considerable difference to particular justices, depending upon how far they regard the government as a fiscal trustee acting in the "public interest" of the commonwealth, or as the largest single combination of monopolistic economic power.

The F variable was discovered in the process of empirically examining the voting patterns in several preceding terms. Several justices, and in particular Douglas, voted differently in some cases to which the government was a party from their behavior in most other cases involving economic issues. As Figure 3 shows, Douglas and Black, who ranked first and second on both of the liberalism scales, are at opposite ends of the F scale. In all fourteen cases which comprise the scale for this term, Black voted to uphold the position of the government, while Douglas voted in the opposite way in all except one case—which would have been decided unanimously, and thus would not have appeared upon the scale, if it had not been for Harlan's inconsistent vote. On the other hand, Frankfurter, who ranked near the bottom of the Court on the C and E scales, is tied with Brennan and Clark for the fourth rank on the F scale. Clearly, the ranking of the justices on F is different from their rankings on either C or E. Moreover, the government won twelve of these fourteen cases, and Douglas was the only member of the Court who did not vote to support the position of the government in at least a majority of the cases.

In terms of content, six of these cases raised questions of national taxation; four were state or local tax cases; and the remaining four were concerned with fiscal claims against the national government: one in eminent domain, one in tort, and two others. It is convenient to postpone, until the next section of this paper where it can be discussed in the context of Figure 4, the question why Douglas voted more often in the company of Whittaker and Stewart, than with Black and Warren, on the issues comprising the F scale.

This scale does not meet one of the recommended minimal standards for a Guttman scale, in that fewer than ten of the cases include two or more dissenting votes.<sup>22</sup> But this requirement of Guttman scaling was established in order to avoid the spurious inflation of the coefficient R; and as previously noted, the coefficient S is computed in a way that precludes that possibility. Since the value of S is quite high (.83, or about .20 above the acceptability level), and the ranking of the justices is similar to those of the immediately preceding terms, it seems justifiable to consider F to be scalable for this term, and to accept the scale.

The Minor Scale Variables. In addition to the three major variables so far discussed, three other minor variables have been tentatively identified on the basis of similar research in other recent terms of the Court. These include A (judicial activism in reviewing the decisions of the Congress, the President, and administrative agencies); N (federalism, and conflict between the national and state governments); and J (the supervisory authority of the Supreme Court over the decision-making of lower courts). Too few cases have been associated with any of these variables in recent years, to permit scaling them. In the 1960 Term there were four cases on A, two on N, two on J, besides the one 4-4 decision in which the votes were not identified. Therefore, 91 of the 99 split decisions of the 1960 Term are included on the scales of the three major variables; and together, the C, E and F scales account for the variance in the voting behavior of the justices in 91 per cent of the decisions of the Term.

V. SCALE AXES IN THE FACTOR SPACE

The next step is to position the scale axes, which are considered to be the psychological analogues of the cumulative scales, in the space defined by the factorial reference axes. It will be recalled that the configuration of i-points for the justices is uniquely determined by the set of factor loadings given in Table IV. The problem now is to determine whether it is possible to pass a set of axes through the factor space in such a manner that the rankings of the projections, from the i-points onto the axes, are equivalent, in a statistically acceptable sense, to the rankings of the justices on the scale axes. What is required mathematically in order to accomplish this are sets of weights which will determine the position of the axes in the space, and the points on each axis where the projections from the i-points fall. Given such data, it will then be possible to compare the rankings of the justices, on the cumulative scales, with the rankings of the projections from their i-points on the counter part scale axes.

It is helpful to prepare a set of two-dimensional plots of the i-points against the reference axes, similar to Figure 4 but without the scale axes. Initial estimates of weights can be made from an examination of such two-dimensional plots. More precise determination of a set of acceptable weights requires mathematical analysis of the factor matrix of Table IV, and the use of a calculating machine. The distance from the origin of the factor space to the point which is closest to a given i-point, on any scale axis, is computed by the formula,<sup>23</sup> where d is the distance from the origin to the point on the scale axis where it is orthogonal to the projection from the i-point; x, y, and z are coordinates of the factorial reference axes for the i-point; and  $\alpha$ ,  $\beta$ , and  $\gamma$  are the coefficients which determine the position of the scale axis in the three-dimensional factor space. The same set of coefficients also provides the reference axis coordinates for the positive terminus of the scale axis.

$$(3) \quad d = \frac{\alpha x + \beta y + \gamma z}{(\alpha^2 + \beta^2 + \gamma^2)^{1/2}},$$

The positions in which the scale axes have been placed in Figure 4 do not necessarily constitute a uniquely "best" fit to the configuration of i-points; but it is assumed that as defined in Table V and shown in Figure 4 they furnish an appropriate and approximately correct solution. One way to visualize this solution is to think of a cone intercepting a relatively quite small circular area on the surface of a unit sphere; any axis lying within the cone will array the projections from i-points so

<sup>22</sup> Torgerson, op. cit., p. 324.

<sup>23</sup> The use of this formula was kindly suggested by John P. Gilbert.

FIG. 4a: Reference Axes I and II<sup>24</sup>

FIG. 4b: Reference Axes I and III

FIG. 4c: Reference Axes II and III

FIGURE 4. Scale Axes and the Judicial Point Configuration in the Orthogonal Factor Space

<sup>24</sup> The direction of orthogonal factor axes extracted by the complete centroid method is

TABLE V. REFERENCE AXIS COORDINATES, COEFFICIENTS, AND COSINES FOR SCALE AXES

Scale axes	C	E	F
	1	2	3
Coordinates/ coefficients:
I/ $\alpha$	1.00	1.00	.08
II/ $\beta$	.15	-.86	-1.00
III/ $\gamma$	.43	-.47	-.25
Cosines
Figure 4a	+08½°	-40½°	-85½°
Figure 4b	+23½°	-25°	-72°
Figure 4c	+71°	-151½°	-166°

as to produce the same set of rankings of the justices as will be produced by any other axis within the cone.

The three plots of Figure 4 may be thought of as three views of a cube: Figure 4a is a top view, Figure 4b is a side view and Figure 4c is an end view. With relationship to reference axis I, the C scale axis enters from the lower right octant of the cube, passes through the origin, and emerges at the end through the upper left octant. The E scale axis passes downward and to the right of I. Reference axis I, it should be noted, is approximately the centroid, or arithmetic mean, of the C and E scale axes. The C axis clearly passes closest to Douglas, who also appears to have the most extreme projection on the positive segment of the axis. (Such a projection would correspond to Douglas' position with the highest score on the C cumulative scale.) Black, Warren, and Brennan project upon the positive segment of the C axis too, but we cannot be certain from an examination of Figure 4 precisely what the sequence of their rankings will be. Stewart clearly will project upon the C axis somewhere near the origin, which means that his "loading" on the axis will be close to zero. And the remaining four justices all will project upon the negative segment of the C axis, corresponding to their negative scores on the C cumulative scale.

Douglas, Black, Warren, and Brennan all will project positively upon the E axis, although it looks as though Douglas will rank arbitrary; the asterisks following the identifying numbers for the first and second axes (i.e., I* and II*) signify that the polarity of these two axes was reversed to facilitate uniformity in inter-term comparisons in the larger study to which this article relates.

lower on the axis than he does on the cumulative scale. Clark, who ranked fifth on the E cumulative scale, also will project to the fifth position on the E axis; and the remaining justices will project negatively, corresponding to their negative scale scores for this variable.

Douglas is somewhat separated from the other three so-called libertarians, and the reason for this becomes apparent when we consider the F scale axis, which cuts across the center of the space to emerge through the front face, with only slight deviation toward the end (at I+) and downward. Particularly in Figure 4a, which includes the two most important dimensions, it can be seen that the relationship of the F axis to the C and E axes is such that the justices who project upon the negative segment of F are Stewart and Whittaker, who have the most negative projections on E, and Douglas, who has the most positive loading on C, in these two dimensions. This suggests that F presents issues that pull together the justices who project at opposite extremes on the two liberalism scales. Douglas, in other words, might vote in opposition to governmental fiscal claims because of a strong and generalized antagonism to governmental regulation and control; this could help to explain the extremity of his support for civil liberties claims, which are also claims of private persons in opposition to governmental regulation and control. Whittaker and Stewart, on the other hand, might vote F— because of their strong economic conservatism, and their corresponding sympathy for “free enterprise” and antipathy for public fiscal controls. The converse argument would explain why the remaining justices all would project positively on the F axis. Economic liberalism, as understood by Black, Warren, and Brennan, frequently involves support of governmental regulation and control “in the public interest”; and both liberals and conservatives agree that taxation is necessary to support positive programs of governmental regulation of the economy. Douglas’ action appears to have been reciprocated by Frankfurter, Harlan, and Clark, whose support of the government against claims of personal right seems to carry over to the support of the government against claims of private fiscal right. In any event, the position of the F axis in Figure 4 is such that, from a statistical and geometric point of view, F appears to be essentially orthogonal to—that is independent of—the C axis, and moderately correlated positively with the E scale. The suggested psychological explanation is at least not inconsistent with the mathematical relationships that are evident in the data.

VI. A TEST OF THE BASIC HYPOTHESIS

The principal hypothesis underlying this study is that differences in the attitudes of the justices toward the basic issues raised by the cases that the Court decides account for the differences in their voting. In short, Supreme Court justices vote as they do because of their attitudes toward the public policy issues that come before them. We are now in a position to make a statistical test of this hypothesis.

The i-points of the justices are separated in the factor space because of variance in the extent of majority participation of individual justices; but the factor analysis routine knows absolutely nothing about the subject matter of the values to which the decisions relate. The relative degrees of support by the justices of the key substantive issues can be determined by cumulative scaling; but cumulative scaling is a unidimensional measurement device, and each such scale is based upon a different universe of content, and is quite independent methodologically (as distinguished from psychologically) from every other scale. Moreover, the cumulative scale data are inadequate to permit the recovery of the configuration of the i-points in multidimensional space.<sup>25</sup> We shall assume, therefore, that if the cumulative scales can be reconstituted as a set of scale axes whose position is consistent with the configuration of i-points in the factor space, then the attitudinal differences of the justices on the cumulative scales account for the variance in the voting behavior of the justices, which is represented by the spatial separation of their ideal-points in the multidimensional factor space. If the correspondence between the set of cumulative scales and their scale axis analogues can be established in accordance with accepted procedures of statistical proof, then we shall have proved, in a mathematical sense, that the justices of the Supreme Court vary in their voting behavior according to the differences in their attitudes towards the scale variables.

Table VI presents a comparison of the cumulative scale scores, and the distances along the counterpart scale axes at which the i-points project (as determined by formula 3), together with the corresponding sets of rankings, for all justices on each of the three major variables. Although both scale scores and axis loadings range in value, in principle, from +1 to -1, so that some meaning can be attached to direct comparisons of pairs of corresponding scores and loadings, it will be recalled that, for mathematical reasons relating to the marginal dis-

<sup>25</sup> Coombs, op. cit., ch. 12; and cf. Coombs and Kao, op. cit., p. 230.

TABLE VI. CORRELATION OF JUDICIAL RANKS ON SCALES AND SCALE AXES

C					E					F
Axis	Ranks		Scale		Axis	Ranks		Scale		Axis	Ranks		Scale
.791	1	D	1	1.00	.308	4* D	1	1.00		.341	2* Bl	1	1.00
.614	2	Bl	2	.84	.752	1 Bl	2	.92		.474	1* Wa	2	.86
.609	3	Wa	3	.76	.749	2 Wa	3½	.44		.272	3 C	4	.71
.599	4	Br	4	.53	.498	3 Br	3½	.44		.263	4 Br	4	.71
-.104	5	S	5	-.02	-.116	5 C	5	.28		.205	6* F	4	.71
-.553	6	Wh	6	-.49	-.357	6 H	6	-.16		.251	5* H	6	.57
-.610	7	F	7½	-.76	-.406	7 S	7	-.40		-.232	8* S	7	.36
-.612	8	H	7½	-.76	-.409	8 F	8	-.68		-.081	7* Wh	8	.14
-.627	9	C	9	-.96	-.411	9 Wh	9	-1.00		-.256	9 D	9	-.89
Rank correlation coefficient (tau)
Significance level, 1-tailed (p)

* Inconsistent rankings.

tributions of the four-fold tables, the intervals on the two types of continua are not genuinely commensurable. Moreover, it has been determined experimentally that the error variance in the factor analysis routine is usually around 10 per cent; while the error variance in the cumulative scales is only slightly less; and there are other sources of error variance implicit in the general method. Therefore, it seems reasonable to employ the non-parametric rank correlation test for the purpose of making the comparison. In spite of the seeming precision of coefficients carried to the third decimal place, it would be fatuous to pretend that the measurement employed in this study can hope to be more than a rough approximation of empirical reality.

As Table VI indicates, there are no inconsistencies in the two sets of rankings for C. The correlation coefficient is less than +1.00 because of the tie in the scale scores of Frankfurter and Harlan, which increased very slightly the probability of perfect agreement with another set of rankings.<sup>26</sup> The correspondence between the two sets of rankings for E also is perfect, except for Douglas, whose loading on the scale axis is much too low to correspond well with his maximal scale score. We can readily observe, from Figure 3, that with the point configuration given by the factor analysis, it would be impossible to position the E axis in such a way as to accommodate both Douglas' position, and those of the remaining justices. It has, therefore, seemed preferable to position the E axis in the way that best reflects the attitudinal alignment of the other eight justices, and to consider Douglas' i-point to be located inconsistently with his manifest attitude towards E. There are several possible explanations for Douglas' apparent inconsistency. The problem might be one of error variance, since the factor routine knows nothing of Guttman scale inconsistencies, and Douglas' two E- inconsistencies would tend to pull him below Black, at least, in projection on E, in the attribution of variance by the centroid factor routine; to this we could add the imponderable effect of the error variance inherent in the factor analysis itself. But an alternative psychological explanation might be that the i-point configuration is correct, and that it is inconsistent for a justice, who is as hostile to governmental fiscal control as Douglas, at the same time to be the Court's strongest supporter of claims of economic liberalism.

<sup>26</sup> However, it will be observed that the probability of such perfect agreement between the two sets of rankings having occurred by chance alone is less than one chance in 40,000.

The two sets of rankings for F are generally in close accord, since a tau of .87 is considered to be very high. There are three reversed pairs in the axis rankings: Black and Warren, Frankfurter and Harlan, and Stewart and Whittaker. Reference to Figure 3 shows that the reversal, for each of these pairs, was occasioned by the difference of a single vote; and the value of tau was lowered by the triple tie in the scale ranks. It seems quite likely that the F scale, which is marginally acceptable in any event, is based upon too few (and too extreme) cases to constitute an adequate sampling of the attitudes of the justices towards this value; and that a scale based upon twice as many cases might result in a much closer correspondence between the cumulative scale and the point configuration. In other words, it seems most likely that in the case of F, the inconsistency between the two sets of rankings should be attributed to the inadequacies of the scale, rather than to errors in the point configuration. This question could be resolved only by an examination of the justices' voting behavior in a term in which they chose to accept for decision a considerably larger number of cases dealing with the issue of governmental fiscal powers than they have dealt with in recent years; or, as might well be done, by pooling the data for several terms of the Court.

Nevertheless, the correlation between all three sets of rankings is very high, with or without the above explanations. From a statistical point of view, it should be noted that the probabilities shown in Table VI relate to the probability of producing, by chance alone, the indicated congruence between any one scale and the point configuration. The prospect of chance replication of as good a fit for all three scales simultaneously, with the same fixed point configuration, is of course very much more remote; indeed, the joint probability, which is the product of the three discrete probabilities, is a truly astronomical number:  $<.0^{1129}$ , or approximately one chance in a trillion. It seems warranted, under these circumstances, to accept the hypothesis that the variance in the voting behavior of the justices during the 1960 Term can be adequately accounted for by the differences in their attitudes towards the fundamental issues of civil liberty, economic liberalism, and governmental fiscal authority.

VII. THE PSYCHOLOGICAL DISTANCE SEPARATING THE JUSTICES

Taking the judicial ideal-points in the factor space as reasonably adequate symbolizations of the respective attitude syndromes of the individual justices, we can use them to examine one final question. Discussion about the justices frequently revolves around such questions as which ones tend to share the "same point of view," and which ones are "furthest apart" in their thinking. The factor space provides a convenient basis for objective measurement of the psychological distance which separates each justice from each of the others.

Since the measurement of these psychological distances is purely mathematical, we shall carry it out in five-dimensional space. This will afford a slightly more accurate basis for measurement than the three-dimensional space depicted in Figure 4, since the fourth and fifth factors will permit us to consider, presumably, the effect of the minor variables (such as A, N and J) which, although not scalable in the Guttman sense, nevertheless must be considered to be a part of the attitude syndrome of each justice. The psychological distance will be measured on the same scale as that employed for the three-dimensional factor space: along orthogonal reference axes, each of which extends from  $-1$  to  $+1$ . The standard formula for computing the distance between any two points in orthogonal five-space is:

$$(4) \quad d_{(i_1-i_2)} = [(v_1 - v_2)^2 + (w_1 - w_2)^2 + (x_1 - x_2)^2 + (y_1 - y_2)^2 + (z_1 - z_2)^2]^{1/2},$$ where  $d$  is the distance,  $i_1$  and  $i_2$  are the ideal-points of a pair of justices, and  $v, w, x, y$  and  $z$  are the coordinates (or "loadings") of the justices on factors I-V.

The result of computations according to this formula are shown in Table VII. Harlan and Frankfurter are by far the closest two justices, in terms of their attitudes toward the policy issues that the Court decided in the 1960 Term; they are separated by a distance of only .14 in the five-dimensional factor space. Contrary to what even many close observers of the work of the Court seem to believe, however, it is Warren and Brennan—not Douglas and Black—who are next most similar in attitude, at a distance of .42. In fact, there are five other pairs (Wh-C, .52; Bl-Wa, .53; Wh-S, .57; Wh-F, .67; and Wh-H, .70) with "ideational identity" closer than that of Douglas and Black,<sup>27</sup> who are separated by a distance of .75. On the other hand, the greatest difference in attitude is that between Douglas and Black, on the one hand, and Frankfurter and Harlan, on the other; the average distance separating these two pairs of justices is 1.60. Moreover, Douglas, Black, Warren and Brennan all agree that Frankfurter and Harlan are the justices whose point of view is most different from their own; and, conversely, Harlan, Frankfurter, <sup>27</sup> In an article devoted to the attitudinal similarities and differences of these two justices, Spaeth has concluded that his data, also, "show significant ideational difference between Black and Douglas." Op cit., p. 176.

TABLE VII. ATTITUDINAL DISTANCES AMONG JUDICIAL IDEAL-POINTS, 1960 TERM

	D	Bl	Wa	Br	S	C	Wh	F	H
D		.75	.93	.83	1.21	1.53	1.44	1.63	1.63
Bl	.75		.53	.80	1.30	1.47	1.44	1.58	1.54
Wa	.93	.53		.42	1.18	1.38	1.39	1.52	1.50
Br	.83	.80	.42		1.02	1.27	1.29	1.42	1.44
S	1.21	1.30	1.18	1.02		.93	.57	.78	.82
C	1.53	1.47	1.38	1.27	.93		.52	.80	.85
Wh	1.44	1.44	1.39	1.29	.57	.52		.67	.70
F	1.63	1.58	1.52	1.42	.78	.80	.67		.14
H	1.63	1.54	1.50	1.44	.82	.85	.70	.14

Whittaker, Clark, and Stewart all agree that Douglas and Black are the justices most distant psychologically from themselves.

If we seek an "average" justice whose point of view best typifies that of the Court as a whole, he is clearly Stewart at an average distance of .98. The variation of Stewart's separation from his colleagues also is confined to the smallest range. Such a finding is perfectly consistent, of course, with the findings of scale analysis, and with the configuration shown in the three-dimensional space of Figure 4. In similar accord with expectations is the finding that the most atypical justice was Douglas who, separated by an average distance of 1.24 from his colleagues, entertained the most generally extreme views of any of the justices.

Although Stewart and Clark are adjacent to each other in the two-dimensional matrix of Table VII, since the pattern shown is the most generally consistent one, these two justices are not very close to each other in five-space (as a glance at three-dimensional Figure 4 suggests). Stewart and Clark both are closer to Whittaker, Frankfurter, and Harlan than they are to each other. Finally, it is noteworthy that Whittaker—not Frankfurter—is the most typical of the group who, at least in relationship to the C and E variables, are the conservative justices; Whittaker's average distance from the other four justices at the "right wing" of Table VII was only .62. And it is Warren—not Black—who is the most typical of the four liberal justices, with an average distance of .63 separating him from the other three.

VIII. SUMMARY

The objective of this paper has been to demonstrate the utility, for a more accurate insight into the basic factors that underlie disagreement among Supreme Court justices, of a more rigorous psychological approach than has been characteristic of most discussion of their attitudes. The attention of scholars always has focussed upon the values articulated in the opinions of the justices, and particularly in majority opinions; but much less attention has been given to the possibility that an examination of the voting behavior of the justices might provide a better and more reliable approach to the understanding of their attitudes than the study of opinions. Research during the last two decades has turned increasingly to the analysis of judicial voting records, in addition to opinion language; and reliance understandably has been placed, during what might well be termed the pioneering stages of the development of a science of judicial behavior, upon unidimensional models. These necessarily are limited in their capacity to represent adequately the complex interplay of attitudes in the mind of any human being. The time has now come when it may be appropriate for students of judicial behavior to consider the advantages to be gained by utilization of multidimensional models of the behavior of Supreme Court justices.

One such model, exemplified here, is suggested by recent (and on-going) research in psychometrics. It proceeds on the premise that a justice reacts in his voting behavior to the stimuli presented by cases before the Court, in accordance with his attitudes toward the issues raised for decision. This article has presented what is believed to be persuasive evidence that this is precisely what the justices were doing when they voted in the decisions of the 1960 Term.

TWO THEOREMS ON CETERIS PARIBUS IN THE ANALYSIS OF DYNAMIC SYSTEMS

FRANKLIN M. FISHER AND ALBERT ANDO

Massachusetts Institute of Technology

Analysis of the dynamic properties of two or more interrelated systems is a recurrent problem in social science theory. A particular problem frequently arises (although it often goes unrecognized) in assessing the validity of an analysis of a system, some variables of which are causally related to other variables, which latter, in turn, are either not explicitly taken into account or are assumed constant. Examples are easy to find: economists may study the behavior of a single country's economy with only secondary regard for the rest of the world; studies of group behavior may pay only secondary attention to the other roles played by the group members in other contexts; two more examples are worked out below and others may be found in the works about to be cited. Indeed, in a larger sense, the division of social science itself (or of natural science, for that matter) into separate disciplines is an example, for the variables taken as given by one discipline are the very subject matter of another and vice versa. In all these examples, the very real problem is present that if variables taken as given are causally affected by the variables of the system being analyzed, or if variables assumed not to affect that system actually do affect it, the results of the analysis may have little relevance for the study of real problems.

The principal purpose of this paper is to call the attention of social scientists outside the field of mathematical economics to two related theorems in this area that have recently been proved.<sup>1</sup> We shall not attempt a technical discussion of the theorems here but instead give a general description of them in the next section. We then present two illustrative, albeit somewhat simplified, examples of the sort of results that these theorems can be used to obtain in political science.

I

Suppose a number of variables such that at any time,  $t$ , the value of each of them is a function of the values of some or all of the same set of variables at some past time  $t-1$ .<sup>2</sup> Suppose further that it is possible to collect the variables into subsets such that the variables within each subset are functions only of the past values of variables in the same subset, but not of the past values of any variables in any different subset.<sup>3</sup> Then the system is said to be completely decomposable and it is obvious that it really consists of several independent systems each one of which can be analyzed separately without reference to any of the others. In the examples mentioned above, this would be the case if every country's economy were really closed so that there were no inter-country effects and if every member of a group had no other roles to play outside the interrelated systems is covered in F. M. Fisher, "On the Cost of Approximate Specification in Simultaneous Equation Estimation," Econometrica, Vol. 29 (April 1961), pp. 139-170.

<sup>2</sup> If values in the further past are relevant, a formal redefinition can always be made to eliminate time before  $t-1$ , without changing anything. Simultaneous dependencies can also be treated, though, for reasons of clarity and intuitive appeal, we restrict ourselves to cases where there is some time lag somewhere in the system. Further, we could consider time as continuous without essential changes. Strictly speaking, however, the theorems under discussion are only known to hold for cases in which the relations involved are linear. Since this was written, the principal results of the theorems have been shown to hold for at least one important class of nonlinear systems in F. M. Fisher, "Decomposability, and Balanced Growth Under Constant Returns to Scale" (forthcoming).

<sup>3</sup> Hereafter, to simplify terminology, by the term "set" instead of "subset," we mean a subset within the set of all variables in the system under consideration.

<sup>1</sup> H. A. Simon and A. Ando, "Aggregation of Variables in Dynamic Systems," Econometrica, Vol. 29 (April, 1961), pp. 111-138 and A. Ando and F. M. Fisher, "Near-Decomposability, Partition and Aggregation, and the Relevance of Stability Discussions," in detail (forthcoming) present and prove the theorems. The relation of the sort of system involved to ordinary notions of causation is discussed in H. A. Simon, "Causal Ordering and Identifiability," ch. 3 in Studies in Econometric Method (W. C. Hood and T. C. Koopmans, eds., New York, 1953; Cowles Commission Monograph No. 14), reprinted as ch. 1 in H. A. Simon, Models of Man (New York, 1957); while the bearing of this sort of problem on the estimation of parameters in one of a set of group or if those other roles had no effect whatsoever on actions within the group.

While the assumption of complete decomposability (or ceteris paribus) is often convenient to make, it is seldom likely to be fully satisfied in practice. Thus there are some exports and imports affecting every country; there are outside roles for group members, and so forth. The question thus naturally arises: What remains of the results of an analysis carried out under an assumption of complete decomposability if the system being studied is in fact embedded in a larger system which is not truly completely decomposable, so that variables assumed to be causally irrelevant do in fact matter? Of course, if the assumption of irrelevance—of complete decomposability—is a very bad one, it is unreasonable to expect much to be left of results obtained under it; but what if variables assumed irrelevant do not in fact matter very much? Is there any sense in which complete decomposability and the great simplification which it permits can be used as a good approximation, so that results obtained under it can be expected to be approximately valid when it is relaxed? This is where the first of our two theorems comes in.

Suppose that our system, instead of being completely decomposable, is in fact only nearly completely decomposable. In other words, suppose that the variables within each set do depend on the past values of variables outside that set but that this dependence is small relative to within-set dependencies. In such a case, the Simon-Ando theorem<sup>4</sup> asserts the following: carry out the analysis of the system on the assumption that it is really completely decomposable (i.e., ignore inter-set dependencies altogether). Provided that inter-set dependencies are sufficiently weak relative to intra-set ones, in the short run that analysis will remain approximately valid in all respects—that is, the system will behave almost as if it were completely decomposable.<sup>5</sup>

Now, if this were all, it would be useful but not very remarkable, for it would merely mean that if neglected influences are sufficiently weak they take a long time to matter much; however, the theorem does not stop here but asserts a far stronger result.

<sup>4</sup> Simon and Ando, op. cit.

<sup>5</sup> Here and later what is meant by "sufficiently weak" depends on what standard of approximation one wishes to impose on the results. The more closely one insists that the behavior of the system must approximate that of the corresponding completely decomposable one, the weaker must "sufficiently weak" be. What the theorem guarantees is that whatever standard of approximation is required (so long as it is an approximate and not an exact standard) a non-zero degree of weakness always exists which is sufficient to produce results satisfying that standard.

Consider the long-run behavior that the system would exhibit if it were truly completely decomposable. In particular, consider the relative behavior of the variables within each set (i.e., consider the long-run behavior of their ratios). Provided again that inter-set dependencies are sufficiently weak relative to intra-set ones, that same relative behavior will show up approximately in the long-run behavior of the true only nearly completely decomposable system. It is important to fully grasp this result. It asserts that even when influences which have been neglected have had time to make themselves fully felt, the relative behavior of the variables within any set will be approximately the same as would have been the case had those influences never existed, and this despite the fact that the absolute behavior of the variables—their levels and rates of change—may be very different indeed. To recapitulate: if a nearly completely decomposable system is analyzed as though it were really completely decomposable, the results obtained will remain approximately valid even in the long run as regards the relative behavior of the variables within any one set.<sup>6</sup>

The detailed examples of the next section will make all this clearer; however, let us pause briefly over the examples already cited. In one variant of the international trade case, the Simon-Ando theorem asserts that if a country trades very little with the rest of the world, its short-run production of every commodity will be approximately the same as if it did not trade at all. Further, in the long run, the ratio in which it produces any two commodities will also be approximately the same, although the levels and rates of growth of production may be very different in the two cases. Similarly, in the group behavior case, the Simon-Ando theorem asserts that, if outside roles for group members are relatively unimportant, the short-run behavior of the group will be approximately the same as if those roles did not exist, while in the long run, the relative behavior of the group members vis-à-vis each other will also be approximately the same, even though the behavior of the group as a whole<sup>7</sup> vis-à-vis the rest of the world may be quite different.

<sup>6</sup> Even before the full system settles down to its ultimate behavior, variables within any one set will move proportionally, so that inter-set influences can be analyzed as influences among indices, each index representing all variables in a particular subset of the system, rather than as among the individual variables themselves. This point, while a little aside from the main drift of our discussion in the text, is useful and important and will show up in our examples below. It is true of both theorems.

Unfortunately, however, useful as completely decomposable or nearly completely decomposable systems are, the assumptions inherent in near complete decomposability are grossly unrealistic for many systems which are of great interest to social scientists. We often study systems which we do not believe, even as an approximation, to be causally uninfluenced by outside forces. In many cases, we deal with systems whose variables are believed to be influenced by outside forces but not to influence these outside variables, so that the latter may be taken as givens of the problem. This is the case of causal influences running only one way among sets of variables (although there may be "whorls" of causation within each set). Thus the economist frequently takes tastes or technology as causally influencing the variables he studies but as being causally uninfluenced by them. So too, a sociologist may take the existing means of production as given independently of the variables he studies but as influencing the latter in a significant way.

More formally, this kind of assumption is equivalent to saying that our variables can be collected into sets numbered (from 1 to N, say) so that the variables in any given set are functions of their own past values and of the past values of the variables in any lower-numbered set but not of the past values of the variables in any higher-numbered one. This sort of system is called decomposable. (The reader should go back to the definition of complete decomposability to be sure he understands the difference.) Clearly, the dynamic behavior of any set of variables in a decomposable system can be studied, taking the behavior of variables in lower-numbered sets as given and without any regard for higher-numbered sets. (Note, however, that the influence of lower-numbered sets must be explicitly recognized.)

Again as in the case of complete decomposability, however, the assumption of decomposability is frequently justified only as a working approximation. Thus tastes and technology are not really independent of the workings of the economic system; the means of production are not really given independently of sociological factors.<sup>8</sup> The question then arises as before of the validity of results obtained under such assumptions. Indeed, this question is perhaps even more important here than in the completely decomposable case, for we have already pointed out (and the examples just cited illustrate) that the very separation of social science into the social sciences is a use of the assumption of decomposability.

<sup>7</sup> This phrase is not used accidentally. The influence of the outside roles will eventually be on group behavior as a whole rather than on individual behavior within the group (remember that such influences are small relative to within-group forces). See the preceding footnote.

Fortunately, the same things are essentially true here as in the nearly completely decomposable case. For nearly decomposable systems which are not nearly completely decomposable—in other words, for systems in which one-way inter-set influences are too large to ignore—the Ando-Fisher theorem<sup>9</sup> yields substantially the same results as the Simon-Ando theorem does for the nearly completely decomposable case. Thus the economist who takes tastes and technology as influencing but uninfluenced by economic variables will find—provided that such an assumption is nearly correct—that his results will be approximately valid in all respects in the short run and that even in the long run, when the full effects of feedbacks in the causal structure are felt, the internal, relative behavior of the variables he studies will be approximately the same. The importance of this result for the usefulness of intra-disciplinary studies in an interrelated world needs no emphasis.<sup>10</sup>

II

We come now to the application of these theorems to two examples in political science which we shall work out in moderate detail, although without any attempt to argue that these examples are more than illustrations.

First, let us consider an over-simple model of armament races. Suppose that at any time, the stocks of armaments of any country (as measured by the number of units of each type of weapon in its arsenal) are a function of the stocks of armaments of all countries (including itself) at some past date.<sup>11</sup> The influences of

<sup>8</sup> Indeed, it would be odd (although not impossible) for both statements to hold exactly.

<sup>9</sup> Ando and Fisher, op. cit.

<sup>10</sup> This is not to deny, of course, the usefulness of inter-disciplinary work. The point is that the results of intra-disciplinary studies need not be vitiated because the real world is not so neatly divided as the academic one.

<sup>11</sup> Again, the use of past time is not a restriction; the past date can be last year or yesterday such past stocks may be of different kinds. Thus armaments may be higher the higher a prospective enemy's armament stocks; lower the higher the stocks of prospective allies; effects on different weapons may be different; stocks of one type of weapon may influence stocks of others positively or negatively; and so forth.

Now suppose that the world is divided into several arms races in such a way that the armaments of a country in any one arms race depend principally on those of the other countries in the same arms race and relatively little on those of countries in other arms races. (This may not be a bad approximation; one might think of the Arabs and Israelis on the one hand and the East-West arms race on the other.) The system is then nearly completely decomposable and the Simon-Ando theorem predicts the following.

From the initiation of the various arms races (since they are at least slightly interdependent they will all begin at least nominally at the same time) until some time thereafter, each arms race will proceed approximately as it would in the absence of the other races. Indeed, this will continue until after the transient effects of different starting stocks of armaments have effectively disappeared. Once this has happened, there will come a time after which the stocks of various weapons for all the countries in each arms race will grow (or shrink or fluctuate) approximately proportionally, so that the influence of any one arms race on any other may be considered as that of an aggregate "country" with one aggregate stock of weapons on another, despite the fact that the influences among the countries and weapons making up the aggregates may be quite varied. Finally, in the long run, the size and rate of growth of every country's armament stocks at any period will be determined by the rate of growth of that arms race which would grow fastest in the absence of the other arms races, but the relative sizes of the weapon stocks within any one arms race will remain approximately the same as if no other arms races existed.

Now consider a somewhat different situation in which the world is again divided into arms races and the arms races are numbered such that armament stocks in any given country are functions of past stocks of other countries in the same arms race and of countries in lower-numbered arms races but only slightly of stocks of countries in higher-numbered arms races.<sup>12</sup> (This, too, may be somewhat realistic. On the one hand, the level of Pakistani armaments is affected by United States military aid; on the other hand, the level of United States armaments is hardly affected by Pakistani arms levels.) Then the system is nearly decomposable and the Ando-Fisher theorem yields results similar to those just presented in the nearly completely decomposable case. Perhaps it is worth remarking here that the theorem thus shows that a very rapid long-run rate of arms accumulation in a high-numbered arms race (say India-Pakistan or North and South Vietnam) can force the long-run rate of arms accumulation in a lower-numbered race (say U. S.-U.S.S.R.) to the same level but cannot more than negligibly affect the relative positions in the latter race.

For our second example, we turn to the voting strength of political parties. Suppose that there are several political parties and that the number of votes for any one party at a given time is a function of the number of votes for each party at some past time. For convenience, we shall assume a constant total population and that every individual votes for one and only one party. We shall further assume that the effect of past votes on present party strength can be represented for each party by a sum of terms, each term representing the probability of an individual who votes initially for a particular party changing his vote to the party in question, times the number of people voting for the initial party. Of course, individuals who stay in the same party are counted as going from that party to itself. It follows then that if we add the coefficients which give the probabilities of going from a particular party to all parties in existence, the or an hour ago. Similarly, influences in the further past can be formally subsumed under this model by redefinition. Finally, the formulation includes the case in which it is the rate of change rather than the level of the armament stocks which are dependent on past armaments. This sort of treatment of arms races originates with L. F. Richardson. See his Arms and Insecurity (Chicago, Quadrangle Books, 1960). Of course the stocks of armaments depend on other things such as economic resources; we are trying to keep the example as simple as possible. The functions in question are supposed to represent the strategic choices made by governments.

<sup>12</sup> They need not be functions of armament stocks in all lower-numbered races; one will do. Similarly, not every country in the given arms race need have such links; all that is required is that at least one does, so that the system, while nearly decomposable, is not nearly completely decomposable. It is also possible to analyze a case in which a part of a nearly decomposable system happens to be nearly completely decomposable.

sum must be unity, as every individual must end up somewhere.<sup>13</sup>

Thus, in equation form, let  $X_{1t}$  be the number of votes for the first party at time,  $t$ ,  $X_{2t}$  be the number of votes for the second party at the same time, and so forth. We have (where there are  $n$  parties):

$$\begin{aligned} X_{1t} &= A_{11}X_{1t-1} + A_{12}X_{2t-1} + \cdots + A_{1n}X_{nt-1} \\ (1) \quad X_{2t} &= A_{21}X_{1t-1} + A_{22}X_{2t-1} + \cdots + A_{2n}X_{nt-1} \\ &\vdots \\ X_{nt} &= A_{n1}X_{1t-1} + A_{n2}X_{2t-1} + \cdots + A_{nn}X_{nt-1} \end{aligned}$$

Here,  $A_{11}$  is the probability of an individual voting for party 1 continuing to do so;  $A_{12}$  is the probability of an individual voting for party 2 changing to party 1;  $A_{21}$  is the probability of an individual voting for party 1 changing to party 2; and so forth. Clearly, all the  $A$ 's must lie between zero and one, and the sum of the  $A$ 's in any column must be unity.

Now consider any set of parties (a single party can count as a set). Ignore the fact that such a set may gain votes from outside itself and consider only its own internal workings. There will be in the long run a single probability that a randomly chosen individual voting for some party in the set will continue to vote for some party in the set at the next time period (he may move between parties in the set). Equivalently, without ignoring the fact that the set may gain votes from outside, we may consider the long-run probability that one of the people originally voting for some party in the set who has remained so voting through some particular time will continue so to vote for yet one more period; this comes to the same thing. (In either definition, we assume that every party in the set begins with a very large number of votes so that a zero vote does not become a problem save for parties which lose all their votes every time period.) We call that long-run probability the cohesiveness of the set. Clearly, it must lie between zero and one; the cohesiveness of any single party is the  $A$  coefficient in its own row and column (thus, for example,  $A_{11}$  is the cohesiveness of the first party taken alone); and the cohesiveness of all parties taken together is unity (since nobody can leave the system as a whole). In general, the cohesiveness of a set lies between the smallest and the largest probability of an individual voting for any given party in the set staying put or changing to another party in the same set (this latter probability is given by the sum of the  $A$ 's in the column corresponding to the party in question and in the rows corresponding to all parties in the set including the initial one).<sup>14</sup>

Now suppose that the parties can be divided into sets such that the probability of an individual moving between sets is small relative to the probability of his remaining in the same set. Clearly, each set then has cohesiveness close to unity. The system is then nearly completely decomposable and the Simon-Ando theorem yields the following results:

Begin with any distribution of voting chosen at random. In the short run, the voting strength of each party will behave approximately as it would if there were no movements between sets of parties whatsoever. Moreover, there will come a time after which the ratio of the votes for any party to the votes for any other party in the same set will remain approximately constant. Thereafter, each set of parties can be treated as a single party for purposes of analyzing inter-set movements, with the cohesiveness of the set acting as the probability of remaining therein. Finally, even in the long run, the equilibrium distribution of relative voting strength within each set of parties will be approximately the same as if there were no inter-set movements, although the absolute number of votes involved may be quite different.

In this example, however, the more interest-

<sup>13</sup> A discussion of this general sort of model which aggregates from the individual level is given in T. W. Anderson, "Probability Models for Analyzing Time Changes in Attitudes," Chapter 1 in Mathematical Thinking in the Social Sciences, P. F. Lazarsfeld, ed. (Glencoe, 1954). It would be possible to abandon the probability interpretation and to let higher strength in one party lead to lower strength in another, but this would lead to an example without some of the nice features of the present one. It would also be possible to build in other influences on party voting strength. Again, we are striving for an illuminating example rather than for a full-blown "realistic" theory. The assumption that every individual votes for some party is innocuous, since we can count all those not voting for any formal party as voting for a party of their own, the "Non-such" Party.

<sup>14</sup> Technical footnote. Precisely, cohesiveness is given by the largest characteristic root of the submatrix of  $A$ 's corresponding to the parties in the set. See F. M. Fisher, "An Alternate Proof and Extension of Solow's Theorem on Nonnegative Square Matrices," Econometrica, Vol. 30 (July, 1962) forthcoming. The fact that the root lies between the largest and smallest column sums is well known—see R. M. Solow, "On the Structure of Linear Models," Econometrica, Vol. 21 (January, 1952), pp. 29-46.

ing case is that of near decomposability. Let us first consider what a truly decomposable system would be. This would occur if the parties could be divided into sets where the sets are numbered (from 1 to  $N$ , say) in such a way that nobody voting for a party in any set ever changes to a party in a lower-numbered set but such that there are non-negligible movements into higher numbered sets. Thus anybody in set  $N$  stays there; anybody in set  $N-1$  either stays there or moves to set  $N$ ; anybody in set  $N-2$  either stays there, moves to set  $N-1$ , or moves to set  $N$ ; and so forth. (Note that set  $N$  has cohesiveness 1; no other single set has cohesiveness 1, but set  $N$  and set  $N-1$  together, set  $N$ , set  $N-1$ , and set  $N-2$  together, and so forth all have cohesiveness 1). The sets are thus "nested," in the sense that all inter-set movements go toward the center which consists of set  $N$ .

Now suppose that all sets begin with a very large number of votes (so that the fact that the lower-numbered sets will eventually lose all their votes is not a difficulty). Consider any set. A time will come such that thereafter the relative strength of the parties in that set is determined primarily by their tendency to attract voters from parties in the set with the highest cohesiveness among those sets that are not higher numbered than the set in question. (In the case of set  $N$  or of set 1, this is the set in question itself; in any other case, it need not be.) This is a reasonable result, because as time goes on the parties in the sets with the greatest cohesiveness will acquire more and more votes, so that, given the probabilities of any single voter moving among the sets, what happens to these sets becomes of increasing importance to all those sets of parties that acquire voters from them.

We now alter the assumptions and suppose that although the dominant inter-set movements are to higher-numbered sets, there are small movements to lower-numbered ones. (This may not be too unrealistic. We might think of set  $N$  as the major parties; there may be a far higher tendency to move into or stay in them than there is to move out.) The system is now only nearly decomposable and the Ando-Fisher theorem yields the following results:

Begin with any distribution of voting chosen at random. In the short run, the actual number of votes for each party will behave approximately as it would if the only inter-set movements were to higher-numbered sets. Moreover, there will come a time after which the relative distribution of voting among the parties within any set will remain approximately the same as would have been the case in the truly decomposable case earlier described. After this time, inter-set movements can be analyzed without regard for the voting distribution within the various sets. Finally these relative intra-set distributions will be approximately maintained even in the long run, although the absolute number of votes eventually cast for the parties in each set will depend almost wholly on the tendency of that set as a whole to gain voters from set  $N$  (which by this time is far larger than any other set).

Note that this result implies that an analysis of the relative strength of "minor" parties can proceed without explicit account of the tendency of such parties to gain voters from or even to lose voters to major ones, despite the fact that the latter tendency is large. So far as relative voting strength is concerned, all that matters are the various tendencies of the minor parties to lose voters to and gain voters from each other (and even some of these may be negligible). Even wide differences in tendencies to lose voters to (or gain them from) major parties need not be explicitly taken into account, provided only that the former tendencies are very strong relative to the latter, a rather surprising result.<sup>15</sup>

<sup>15</sup> We are perhaps making this result sound a bit more paradoxical than it is. Different tendencies to lose voters to major parties do in fact matter and get taken into account in an implicit fashion. Since every party's voters end up somewhere (the sum of the  $A$ 's in any column is one), a minor party with a high propensity to lose voters to major ones will have—other things being equal—a lower propensity to retain voters than a minor party with a lower propensity to lose voters to major ones. This will show up in considering their relative strength in isolation; however, it can be nullified by other tendencies if other things are not equal.

POSITIVE LIBERTY, 1880-1914

DAVID NICHOLLS

The Theological College, Chichester, Sussex

It would not, I think, be entirely misleading to suggest that doctrines of laissez faire and attacks upon reasoned state intervention in political and social life have tended to emanate from two extremes in social philosophy—ultra individualism and an extreme organicism. In the first case, and we may take Locke as an example, society is made up of a heap of individuals who came together to form the state for the limited purpose of the protection of property.<sup>1</sup> Man is not seen as a part of a larger whole, influenced by the structure of that whole, but as an isolated individual; thus any state interference beyond the protection of property is viewed as a restriction of individual liberty. On the other hand are thinkers who regard society as such a complicated and delicate organism that they can only—and governments should only—sit back and gasp at the complexity of it all. Any attempt to improve one aspect will affect the balance of the whole in ways impossible to predict. It is difficult to point to a pure instance of this opinion, but this is the impression left with the reader after perusing such works as Burke's Reflections on the Revolution in France,<sup>2</sup> Hegel's Philosophy of Right,<sup>3</sup> Bradley's Ethical Studies and the works of some more modern conservatives.<sup>4</sup> All that <sup>1</sup> " 'tis not without reason that he [man] seeks out and is willing to join in society with others who are already united, or have a mind to unite for the mutual preservation of their lives, liberties, and estates, which I call by the general name, property." Second Treatise on Civil Government (1690), para. 123.

<sup>2</sup> Burke, of course, asserted the need for a means of change, but it is not clear how this is to function, and he does not appear to conceive of rationally determined action by the state.

<sup>3</sup> Hegel was not reactionary, as is sometimes asserted, but was gently conservative. If the philosopher were successful enough to achieve an understanding of society, his reflections would be of little use to the practical politician who must proceed in a somewhat hand-to-mouth fashion. Hegel was really a sceptic in politics.

<sup>4</sup> I am thinking, for example, of Professor Oakeshott, for whom political ideals can never guide the politician, and attempts by him to follow anything but intimations are sure to end in catastrophe; the only healer of social complaints worth considering is time. Cf. articles on rationalism in politics in Cambridge Journal, 1947. T. E.

governments can be expected to do is to prevent the worst collisions and any attempt to pursue a positive policy is doomed to failure.<sup>5</sup>

The group of thinkers with whom we are here principally concerned held neither view, and although they differed widely in their metaphysic of society, they avoided the extremes.<sup>6</sup>

I wish to distinguish the notions of freedom or liberty<sup>7</sup> with which we shall be concerned in this essay from other conceptions and misconceptions. It is, I think, possible broadly to differentiate two conceptions of freedom,<sup>8</sup> what Utey also shows a similar scepticism based on complexity; cf. Essays in Conservatism (1947).

<sup>5</sup> Herbert Spencer, as we shall see, falls into both camps; he was an extreme individualist, and believed as well that "the social organism cannot be dealt with in any one part, without all other parts being influenced in ways that cannot be foreseen." "Over-Legislation" in Essays Scientific, Political and Speculative (1868 ed.), ii, p. 63.

<sup>6</sup> The possible exception is Bosanquet, whom we shall discuss at a later stage, but in many ways was hardly a liberal at all.

<sup>7</sup> I understand the two words "liberty" and "freedom" as synonymous and they will be used indiscriminately; efforts to distinguish between them appear to me not to have met with much success. In the following essay the terminology I shall use will, even when discussing the views of others who use different terminology, be my own as defined in the text, except when the contrary is explicitly stated.

<sup>8</sup> G. de Ruggiero in his History of European Liberalism (1927), pp. 350f, divides conceptions of freedom in roughly the same way as this, but names them differently, as does Professor Sir Isaiah Berlin, Two Concepts of Liberty (1958). Both these thinkers fail to distinguish the notion of positive liberty which is the purpose of this essay to examine. The former tends to confound it with what he calls positive freedom—and what I call the realist conception of liberty, from which, as we shall see, it can fairly clearly be distinguished. The latter confuses it with what he calls negative freedom—what I call empiricist freedom in general, of which it is merely one variety. Professor Berlin seems to assume that only a fool could hold to what I call negative freedom without seeing that this implies positive freedom; it is certainly possible if one conception of society be held, and the distinction between extrinsic and intrinsic barriers be ignored, to slide

I shall call the empiricist and the realist notions, the former being subdivided into positive and negative (which can itself be broken down into dogmatic and sceptical), and the latter into rationalist and idealist. This is illustrated in the following diagram:

tyranny of his passions.<sup>10</sup> Rousseau believed that a rational man would willingly submit to the general will which is his will;<sup>11</sup> if he does not voluntarily submit, he can be compelled to do so, and thus "he will be forced to be free."<sup>12</sup> Idealist thinkers like Kant, Hegel, Green and

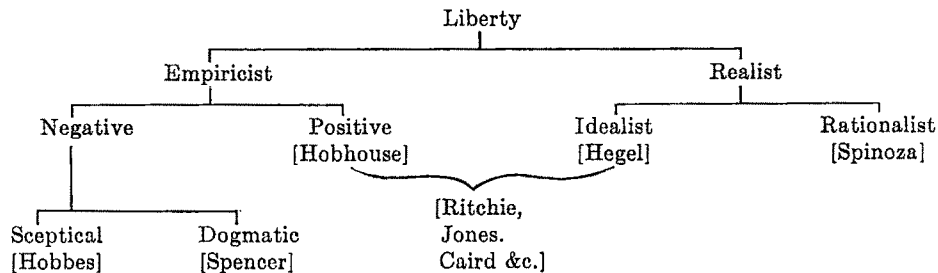

FIGURE 1. Diagram of conceptions of liberty

I

We shall first of all deal with the realist conception of freedom. In this way of thinking the term freedom is used to signify an objective situation which has little or no relation to the actual will or desire of the person who is said to be free. A free man is one who is doing either the right thing, or the reasonable thing, or the thing which is most in line with his nature. Two types of thinkers have adopted this conception of liberty. The first were the rationalists, like Descartes, Spinoza and, though in a somewhat different way, Rousseau. For Spinoza, a man is free when he is behaving rationally,<sup>9</sup> and when he is removed from the from one to the other. Nevertheless, Professor Berlin ignores the fact that many eminent thinkers from Hobbes to Spencer have been negative liberals without believing that this implies a positive element. Ruggiero, on the other hand ignores our positive liberals, and seems to assume that all forms of empiricist liberty imply realist liberty, though not in its most rigorous form. Berlin sees that negative and positive liberty have something in common and shows sympathy with the more positive elements in the empiricist notion of freedom (op. cit., p. 8), yet he goes on to quote with evident approval Bentham's dictum that "every law is an infraction of liberty" (ibid., p. 35). If what Berlin says on p. 8 is correct, then some laws increase the total liberty in a society (though not, of course, to the person coerced) and Bentham's statement is misleading. Thus Berlin's terminology leads to confusions, and to the idea that all laws decrease human freedom—implying a laissez faire attitude.

<sup>9</sup> "A free man is one who lives under the guidance of reason, who is not led by fear but who

Bosanquet had a similar notion of freedom, and owed much of their political theory to Rousseau.<sup>13</sup> Yet, for Hegel, self-consciousness is essential for a true freedom, and man must will the general will freely.<sup>14</sup> Hegel and his followers introduced into the realist notion of freedom a subjective element for which they have not always been credited; nevertheless it is true to say that for them the ethical life is primarily an objective situation into which the individual directly desires that which is good." Ethics, 4 Prop. 67. For Spinoza a man is free when led solely by reason (4 Prop. 68) and when self-determined (I. Def. 7.)

<sup>10</sup> Passions, however, cease to be passions when reason is applied to them and when we get a clear idea of them (5 Prop. 3).

<sup>11</sup> Cf. esp. du Contrat Social, 4:2.

<sup>12</sup> Op. cit., 1:7.

<sup>13</sup> For his influence on Kant and Hegel, cf. Bosanquet, Philosophical Theory of the State (1951 ed.), ch. 9 and also for his influence on the author. For Green's debt to Rousseau cf. Principles of Political Obligation, paras. 64f.

<sup>14</sup> Hegel attacked the Platonic state in which people were pushed around, into jobs which they had no particular desire to do, and had no say in the matter, Philosophy of Right, Add. to para. 262; subjective freedom, which takes into account the desires and the aptitudes of individuals is essential to the ethical life, and it was, in his opinion, Christianity which first introduced this subjective element (Add. to para. 185). He attacked the view which tries to ignore passions in man and declared that all great actions have demanded an element of private interest and of self-seeking desires, Philosophy of History (E. T. 1894), pp. 24f.

freely fits himself. When we come on to discuss the positive liberals we shall see that many of them were idealists, and held a combination of the realist and the positive empiricist conceptions of liberty. Thinkers like Lord Acton and de Ruggiero, whom we shall not include in our discussion of positive liberty, appear to have rejected the extreme realist position as well as the empiricist position. For them a free man is not one who is actually doing what he ought to do—what is right or reasonable—but one who is in a position to do so.<sup>15</sup>

The empiricist conception of liberty is roughly that a person is free when he can do as he wishes. Nevertheless, complications arise here. If an individualistic conception of society be held, then it is thought that individuals can exist in a society without being greatly affected by that society, except insofar as the government imposes certain restrictions and obligations upon them; and the person who holds this view we shall denominate a negative liberal. The object is to leave men alone as much as possible; all state intervention is regarded as bad, and must be limited to the protection of life, or of life and property. We may take Hobbes as an example. For him a man is free when he can do as he wishes, when there is no external impediment placed in his way.<sup>16</sup> In the <sup>15</sup> Liberty is "not . . . the power of doing what we like, but the right of being able to do what we ought," wrote Acton, The Rambler (1860), p. 146 (my italics). Cf. also; "By liberty I mean the assurance that every man shall be protected in doing what he believes his duty against the influence of authority and majorities, custom and opinion." The History of Freedom, p. 3 (my italics). This latter definition is somewhat more subjective than the former. De Ruggiero declared that by "recognizing as the only form of freedom the freedom to do right" we should destroy this freedom itself (op. cit., p. 356). T. H. Green appears to have held a somewhat similar position; cf. pp. 120., infra.

<sup>16</sup> "A free agent is he that can do if he will, and forbear if he will; and . . . liberty is the absence of external impediments." Of Liberty and Necessity, English Works (1840), iv, pp. 275-6. The concept of liberty applies in Hobbes's thought to inanimate as well as to animate bodies, and an object which is tied down is to that extent unfree; Leviathan, ch. 21. The constraint, however, must be external. If a man is sick, Hobbes does not say that he is unfree to get up; water is not unfree when it cannot go uphill; Liberty and Necessity, E.W., iv, p. 174. There is no opposition between freedom and necessity, the will is determined in its decisions as all things are, and a man is free state there should be as much liberty as possible,<sup>17</sup> which for Hobbes meant as little law as possible.<sup>18</sup> He was a negative liberal because he does not appear to have conceived the possibility of laws increasing human freedom, and he did not hold, with the positive liberals, that a man is more free in a situation where he can fulfill many choices than in one where he can fulfill a few or only one, as long as the impediments are not external.<sup>19</sup> A man is unfree only insofar as he cannot do what he wishes; the fact that he cannot, through ignorance, wish otherwise than he does, is irrelevant.

Another negative liberal whom we shall discuss at a later stage is Herbert Spencer, and I only mention him now for the purpose of drawing a distinction between two sorts of negative liberals. While all positive liberals were or are dogmatic, not all negative liberals were or are. For Hobbes in the Leviathan liberty is only an optional extra which the sovereign will find it convenient to grant; there can be no moral right to any liberty on the part of the subjects; politics is not concerned with liberty and the subject must be content with as much as the sovereign "shall think most convenient."<sup>20</sup> when he can carry out these decisions; Leviathan, ch. 21. He is clear that if a body lacks the power to do something it is not to be called unfree, but if this power—perhaps financial means—could have been supplied by the state and was not, would Hobbes say that a poor man was constrained in this matter? Probably not.

<sup>17</sup> It is bad, he thought, "that there should be more laws than necessarily serve for the good of the magistrate and his subjects." De cive, in E.W., ii, p. 178.

<sup>18</sup> "The liberty of a subject lieth therefore only in those things, which in regulating their actions, the sovereign hath prætermitted." Leviathan, ch. 21.

<sup>19</sup> "Extrinsic causes that take away endeavour, are not to be called impediments." Liberty, Necessity and Chance, E.W., v, p. 352. Thus, for Hobbes, ignorance is not an impediment, and education not a means of increasing liberty.

<sup>20</sup> Leviathan, ch. 21. Efforts to prove that Hobbes was a liberal are not particularly successful. It is true that Hobbes's sovereign might decide to be liberal, and Hobbes hoped that he will, but there can be no moral obligation upon him to do so. Hume is another sceptical liberal, who saw liberty as something which might as well be allowed, because there are some things which governments just cannot enforce; it is not for him a positive value in politics. The world is too young declares the sceptic, to discover truth or right, and

Liberty is the residue which may or may not remain after the sovereign has finished; it is desirable that there should be liberty but there is no moral necessity to give as much of it as possible in each situation. Liberty is not for Hobbes one of the ends of politics. Spencer on the other hand held that the purpose of politics is the development of character and that the best way for character to develop is by leaving people as far as possible free to do as they wish.<sup>21</sup> Liberty for him is a positive value which it is the purpose of the state to maintain, as far as maybe, within a system of order and peace.

By positive liberal I mean a person who holds an empiricist conception of liberty, but together with this accepts a view of society which is somewhat different from that of the negative liberal. He believes that liberty is an end—or the end—in politics, and holds that liberty means the ability to do what one chooses; but also he holds that as a man cannot wholly escape the influence of other individuals, of groups and of society at large, there may be cases in which the state can intervene with coercive measures which, while reducing the freedom of the person coerced (at the time he is coerced, at least<sup>22</sup>), increase the freedom of others who were perhaps in the power of the politics must be conducted as a matter of pure convenience; cf. "Of Civil Liberty," in Essays, 1:12. Liberty is "attended with so few inconveniences" that it might as well be granted as not; cf. "Of the Liberty of the Press; in ibid., 1:2. This distinction between dogmatic and sceptical liberalism is a vital one and is too often ignored.

<sup>21</sup> Principles of Ethics, para 380 (1900 ed., ii, p. 251).

<sup>22</sup> The question of time has sometimes been ignored in this context. The empiricists were right in saying that a man cannot be forced to be free; freedom is an ability to choose, and if you coerce a person you cannot at the same time increase his freedom: I think, though, that it is possible to coerce a person at time t and by doing so increase his freedom at time t'. An illustration might help. You can coerce a man by preventing him from going to a hypnotist, or from taking drugs, which in itself is an infringement of his liberty; yet this action might increase his freedom at a later date, because if he had been hypnotised or taken the drugs, he would not be in the position to make any choices at all. This is not, however, to say that restrictive action will always (a) increase the total freedom, and (b) work. This argument is distinct from the realist argument, which allows that a man would be following his real will in not going to the hypnotist, and thus would be forced to be free at the same time as he was being coerced.

person legislated against. There is, thinks the positive liberal, a coercion by society which can be quite as restrictive of individual freedom as coercion by the state. In addition to this he holds a slightly different view of liberty from that of the negative liberal. Not only does he believe, in Hobbist terminology, that external impediments (such as poverty) can be removed, and the range of fulfillable choices thus extended—which many of the negative liberals would have rejected—but also that some internal impediments can be removed. A person who is so ignorant that he does not know of the existence of certain alternatives and is thus not in a position to will them, is not, for the negative liberal, for this reason unfree. The negative liberal does not consider it possible or even relevant that the whole range of possible choices can be enlarged by government action. Thus there is a fairly clear distinction between our negative and positive liberals, in that the latter believe (a) that a person's freedom is limited in society anyway, and that the total freedom can be increased by coercing some people,<sup>23</sup> and (b) that the whole range of choices open to people can be enlarged by the removal of both external and internal impediments through government action. There were probably only a few pure instances of positive liberalism in our period; I shall, however, take L. T. Hobhouse as the paradigm case, most of the others we shall discuss being to a greater or lesser extent under the influence of idealist philosophy.

II

Having distinguished our concepts, we must now proceed to an examination of the clash between negative and positive liberals in the period 1880-1914. First we shall look at the negative liberals, who became vocal and in some cases aggressive in this period owing to the great increase of governmental activity, which partly also inspired (and was partly inspired by) the proponents of positive liberty.

In 1854 an essay of Wilhelm von Humboldt (originally written in 1791) was translated into English and had a considerable influence.<sup>24</sup>

<sup>23</sup> A. D. Lindsay pointed out that an increasingly interdependent society would manifest the need for more state intervention, even under the old conception of the state as the protector of negative liberty. "The State in Recent Political Theory," The Political Quarterly, February 1914, p. 143.

<sup>24</sup> The title was The Sphere and Duties of Government. Herbert Spencer claimed not to have read this book; "Specialized Administration," in

Humboldt preached a gospel of governmental limitation, arguing that the State is to abstain from all solicitude for the positive welfare of the citizens and not to proceed a step farther than is necessary for their mutual security and protection against foreign enemies; for with no other object should it impose restrictions on freedom.<sup>25</sup>

J. S. Mill was duly impressed by Humboldt's book and used a passage from it as the text for his great manifesto of Victorian liberalism. Mill, who in his essay On Liberty stressed the negative side of governmental duties, moved slightly in the direction of collectivism and was loudly proclaimed by the Fabians to have become almost one of them.<sup>26</sup> Of Herbert Spencer, on the other hand, it has never been said that he moved towards socialism; indeed he was accused of retreating from his previously sympathetic attitude towards the laboring classes.<sup>27</sup> Spencer was certainly one of the most influential writers on politics and philosophy among English-speaking people<sup>28</sup> in the second half of the nineteenth century, and he has received less than justice at the hands of philosophers and historians.<sup>29</sup> Spencer held an organic view of the nature of society,<sup>30</sup> but was, at the same time, an individualist who passionately believed in a limited state. The state is a mechanical creation existing for the purpose of maintaining law and order and a situation of equal freedom for the members of society. Like Mill<sup>31</sup> he denied that the state should ever intervene to protect a man from himself.<sup>32</sup> Freedom, for Spencer as for Hobbes, meant merely the non-existence of external impediments to the fulfilment of a man's wishes; unlike Hobbes, however, Spencer held that to be barriers to freedom these impediments must have been caused by human beings.<sup>33</sup> As society evolves from the militant type, where people are regimented into doing things, to an industrial society, where their position is determined by a contract into which they have freely entered, state activity will gradually diminish and voluntary activity will take the place of compulsion. Instead of being subordinated to the state, as in militant society, the personality of the citizens is respected,<sup>34</sup> and industrial society, he thought, would be characterized by an increasing heterogeneity, and by more scope for individual choice.<sup>35</sup> He objected to the state intervening, not only because it is harmful for individual liberty, but also because he regarded the state as incompetent and inefficient.<sup>36</sup>

Spencer recruited the theories of evolution and the survival of the fittest to support his belief in non-interference. Progress is achieved, he thought, by a process of the weak being sorted out and the strong being allowed to survive.<sup>37</sup> It is wrong to intervene in the course of nature, which is gradually improving the race,<sup>38</sup> and any organized attempt to do so (he did not include limited private benevolence)

Essays Scientific Political and Speculative (1874), iii, p. 166.

<sup>25</sup> Op. cit., p. 44.

<sup>26</sup> "Every edition of Mill's book [Principles of Political Economy] became more and more Socialist. After his death the world learned the personal history, penned by his own hand, of his development from a mere political democrat to a convinced Socialist." Fabian Essays (1889), p. 58; cf. also p. 56, and Sidney Webb, Towards Social Democracy? (1919), p. 38. It is true that Mill declared that the ideas of himself and of Mrs. Taylor "would class us decidedly under the general designation of Socialists." Autobiography (World Classics ed.), p. 196. A glance at the much vaunted fourth part of the Principles, however, confirms the suspicion that in many ways he was only a socialist in the sense that all late Victorians were said to be.

<sup>27</sup> Cf. his reply to the charge in The Man versus the State (1940 ed.), pp. 52-3.

<sup>28</sup> He had a great influence in the United States, of course; cf. R. Hofstadter, Social Darwinism in American Thought (1955 ed.), pp. 31f.

<sup>29</sup> None of his works, for example, appear in the syllabus of the "Theories of the Modern State" paper in the Cambridge history tripos.

<sup>30</sup> Cf. "Over-Legislation," in Essays, ii, p. 71; also Principles of Sociology, paras. 213f (1877 ed., i, pp. 466f) and "The Social Organism," in Essays, i, pp. 386f.

<sup>31</sup> "The only purpose for which power can be rightfully exercised over any member of a civilised community, against his will, is to prevent harm to others. His own good, either physical or moral, is not a sufficient warrant." On Liberty, ch. I.

<sup>32</sup> Cf. "Over-Legislation," in Essays, ii, p. 55.

<sup>33</sup> Man can be under either a human or a natural master. "When he is under the impersonal coercion of Nature, we say that he is free; and when he is under the personal coercion of someone above him, we call him, according to the degree of his dependence, a slave, a serf, or a vassal." "From Freedom to Bondage," in T. Mackay, ed., A Plea for Liberty (1891), p. 6.

<sup>34</sup> Principles of Sociology, para. 564, ii, p. 697.

<sup>35</sup> "Progress: its Law and Cause," in Essays, i, p. 50.

<sup>36</sup> "Over-Legislation," in Essays, ii, pp. 67f.

<sup>37</sup> Cf. Principles of Sociology, para. 438, ii, pp. 240f.

<sup>38</sup> Cf. The Man versus the State, p. 78.

will lead to a likely degeneration of the race.<sup>39</sup> Thus the state, which for some reason he regarded as unnatural, must not intervene more than is necessary for the protection of life and property; any further intervention is both immoral and inexpedient.<sup>40</sup> The less the state interferes, the more freedom there is for individuals, and this is the important thing. He does, however, appear to have believed that the liberty it is possible to grant to a people is limited in each generation.<sup>41</sup>

Spencer was not alone in his negative liberalism. In 1881 several men, including Wordsworth Donisthorpe and Auberon Herbert banded together to form a Non-Interference Union which was, however, still-born. In the following year their union was more fruitful and was blessed with increase in the form of The Liberty and Property Defence League, which gloried in the motto "Self-help versus State help." A growing amount of governmental intervention in a variety of spheres—in postal services, factory legislation, shipping regulation, sewage, housing and in other fields—had effected this union of such motley types as old-fashioned individualist radicals, aristocratic conservatives and barristers. The Earl of Pembroke, a stalwart of the League, believed that state intervention would inevitably fail, and that in the ensuing misery more demands would be made on state action until the situation got worse and worse.<sup>42</sup> The ideas of Donisthorpe and Herbert (who, in the words of D. G. Ritchie, "if one may be allowed the expression out-Herberts Mr Herbert Spencer in his advocacy of laissez faire"<sup>43</sup>) are interesting in their own right and not merely as echoes of the voice of Spencer. Donisthorpe was probably the most acute of the Spencerians; he once suggested the idea of voluntary taxation—described by its opponents as passing the hat round—but dropped the idea as soon as it was adopted by Herbert and others.<sup>44</sup> Although there can, according to Donisthorpe, be no legal limitation upon the state (he was a lawyer) there can and should be a political limitation imposed from within;<sup>45</sup> he rejected the idea that there is any single principle to determine the limits of state intervention, pointing out, as others had before him,<sup>46</sup> that Mill's attempt falls to the ground owing to the fact that almost all acts are partly other-regarding.<sup>47</sup> There is, he believed, no general principle in the matter, and we must rely on "those middle principles which originate in experience and are verified by experience."<sup>48</sup> Herbert, on the other hand was more optimistic in this

<sup>39</sup> Principles of State Interference (1902 ed.), p. 57n.

<sup>40</sup> Donisthorpe, however, in the first place, only suggested the voluntary system for non-essentials, while there would be a system of compulsory taxation for such things as defense. Herbert embraced the idea with his usual radical enthusiasm, advocating the abolition of all but voluntary taxes; cf. his The Right and Wrong of Compulsion by the State (For Liberty) (1885), pp. 43f. Donisthorpe explained his own position in Law in a Free State (1885), p. 13.

<sup>41</sup> "The Limits of Liberty," in T. Mackay ed., op. cit., p. 64. Another negative liberal wrote in the same vein, "It cannot be too carefully remembered that almost every clause of an act of parliament, if it have any force or effect at all, takes away a liberty from somebody, because it must of necessity speak of something which shall or shall not be done where before it was optional." Bruce Smith, Liberty and Liberalism (1887), p. 252. He went on to say that the situation in Britain was as good as could be expected, and that the policy of liberalism should be "to preserve that state of things." Ibid., p. 253.

<sup>42</sup> The Earl of Pembroke, Liberty and Socialism, pp. 82f, and J. F. Stephen, Liberty, Equality, Fraternity (1874 ed.), Preface to 2d. ed., p.x.

<sup>43</sup> "The Limits of Liberty," op. cit., pp. 70f. Mill, of course, realized this; his distinction was rather between those things which affect others directly and those which only affect them indirectly.

<sup>44</sup> Ibid., p. 75.

<sup>39</sup> "Society in its corporate capacity, cannot without immediate or remoter disaster interfere with the play of these opposed principles under which every species has reached such fitness for its mode of life as it possesses, and under which it maintains that fitness." Ibid., p. 80. For another example of the conservative influence of evolutionary theory reference can be made to Sir Henry Maine, who praises "the strenuous and never-ending struggle for existence, the beneficent private war which makes one man strive to climb on the shoulders of another and remain there through the law of the survival of the fittest." Popular Government (1890 ed.), p. 50.

<sup>40</sup> Cf. "Prison Ethics," in Essays, ii, pp. 212-3.

<sup>41</sup> "There seems," he wrote, "good reason to think that the degree of liberty a people is capable of in any given age, is a fixed quantity; and that any artificial extension of it in one direction, simply brings about an equivalent limitation in some other direction." "Parliamentary Reform: the Dangers and the Safeguards," in Essays, ii, p. 378.

<sup>42</sup> Address to the members of the Liberty and Property Defense League in Political Letters and Speeches (1896), p. 183.

matter; "I would therefore beg you," he wrote, to reject with scorn that idle and unmeaning creed which is so much in fashion to-day, of refusing to seek for general principles, and hoping to extract from the circumstances of the moment the right way of dealing with them.<sup>49</sup>

The limited duty of the state should not include the provision of services such as drainage, gas lighting or the enactment of such things as compulsory vaccination or factory legislation; the state should merely provide adequate and readily available legal machinery whereby citizens can claim damages when they catch disease from their neighbor's sewage, when their baker sells them adulterated bread, and when their husbands are devoured by the unfenced machinery of employers.

These thinkers, however, were not only opposed to state intervention but also to the existence of powerful groups in society. Donisthorpe thought that too much attention was being paid by individualists to the tyranny of the state; the laws of the church or of the jockey club could be quite as "socialistic" as those of the state.<sup>50</sup> "I affirm," he declared, that a people might utterly abolish and even extirpate the State, and yet remain steeped to the lips in socialism of the most revolting type.<sup>51</sup>

Spencer looked with no great favor upon trade unions,<sup>52</sup> though neither he nor his followers would have wished to legislate against any of these combinations; it was, in their opinion, up to the members of these associations to act.<sup>53</sup> The concept of evolution was used by these men, just as it was by their master, to refute the advocates of state intervention, and any interference with "the course of nature" was conceived as barring the way to progress.<sup>54</sup>

Many of the negative liberals maintained that liberty is diametrically opposed to law.

J. R. Seeley, for example, thought that liberty is not merely the opposite of over-legislation, but of law and government itself. "There cannot," he said, be in a state perfect liberty, for perfect liberty is equivalent to total absence of government, and where government is absent there can be no state.<sup>55</sup>

Nevertheless, there was, for Seeley, an inferior sort of liberty to be found in the state, and it exists in inverse proportion to the number of laws; we do not ask what the laws are like, good or bad, but how many there are.<sup>56</sup> Auberon Herbert accepted much of this.<sup>57</sup> Donisthorpe, on the other hand, said some things which indicate an interstice in the negativist armor which was to be exploited by the positive liberals. "All law," he wrote, is a restriction on liberty. It is a peculiarity of good law that it gives more liberty with one hand than it takes away with the other. The reverse is true of a bad law.<sup>58</sup>

The door was open to a new view.

III

It is now time to discuss how this last admission by one of the school of negative liberals was exploited by believers in a positive notion of liberty, and how these new liberals (or as Spencer called them, New Tories) attacked the idea that evolutionary theory leads to a belief in "let be." If we say that T. H. Green was the great prophet of positive liberalism, this must not be taken to mean that he was a pure instance of the logical type; he was strongly influenced by what I have called the realist conception of freedom, although he would not be denominated an extreme realist in this matter.

In 1881 Green gave a lecture entitled "Liberal Legislation and Freedom of Contract," which was to be the manifesto of the positive liberals who followed him. He had laid

<sup>49</sup> Herbert, op. cit., p. 14.

<sup>50</sup> "The Limits of Liberty," p. 91; cf. also "I have recently examined the rules of some of the principal London clubs, and I find that they are, many of them, [presumably he means the rules and not the clubs!] largely socialistic." Ibid., pp. 91-2.

<sup>51</sup> Ibid., p. 92.

<sup>52</sup> "From Freedom to Bondage," in T. Mackay, ed., op. cit., pp. 20f.

<sup>53</sup> Cf. G. Howells, "Liberty for Labour," in T. Mackay, ed., op. cit., p. 110.

<sup>54</sup> E. S. Robertson, "The Impracticability of Socialism," in ibid., p. 31.

<sup>55</sup> Introduction to Political Science (1902 ed.), p. 119.

<sup>56</sup> Ibid., p. 121.

<sup>57</sup> Cf. For Liberty, pp. 5-6.

<sup>58</sup> Law in a Free State, p. 17; cf. also "But liberty and lawlessness should not be confounded, one with the other; they are separate and distinct, legally and morally. Individual liberty is consistent with law and order, and the ideal of a State is reached in proportion to the individual liberty attained, and the order which is maintained, in the commonwealth of a free people." George Howell, "Liberty for Labour," in T. Mackay, ed., op. cit., p. 109.

the theoretical basis of his liberalism in his Oxford lectures on political obligation. Society is not, he had declared, merely a collection of self-sufficient individuals come together to protect property, with natural rights which they bring into society and have against society; rights must be recognized or they are mere "powers"<sup>59</sup>—like the natural right in Hobbes's state of nature. The state exists for maintaining the conditions of the good life which can only be lived in common, and this common pursuit of the good must be recognized by society and by its members. "There are," he wrote, no rights antecedent to society, none that men brought with them into a society which they contracted to form.<sup>60</sup>

If the common interest requires it, no right can be alleged against it.<sup>61</sup>

The freedom which we aim at is not merely a lack of restraint, but "a positive power or capacity of doing or enjoying something worth doing or enjoying."<sup>62</sup> It should be noted that the freedom spoken of is not the power to do as one wishes, but the power to do something worthwhile. To increase "true freedom," the state must not provide the means for a man to do as he desires, but the means for him to make the best of himself.<sup>63</sup> If this takes one step backwards from the concept of freedom as doing as we like, which Spencer and the empiricists had endeavored to establish, it takes two forward in the direction of positive freedom by the idea that society can often do much to provide the power or the means for someone to do something, and thus increase individual freedom. In one of the most significant statements of the decade Green declared that if indeed freedom be taken in a positive sense then we are right in refusing to ascribe the glory of freedom to a state in which the apparent elevation of the few is founded on the degradation of the many.<sup>64</sup>

<sup>59</sup> Principles of Political Obligation, para 31.

<sup>60</sup> Ibid., para. 30.

<sup>61</sup> Ibid., para. 99. "There is no right 'but thinking makes it so'," para. 136.

<sup>62</sup> "Liberal Legislation and Freedom of Contract," in Works (1885), iii, p. 371.

<sup>63</sup> "... the mere removal of compulsion, the mere enabling a man to do as he likes, is in itself no contribution to true freedom ... the ideal of true freedom is the maximum of power for all members of human society alike to make the best of themselves." Ibid., pp. 371-2.

<sup>64</sup> Ibid., p. 372.

It was left to later thinkers to develop the concept of positive liberty in its application to political life. We shall, for the purpose of convenience divide these into three groups, first the idealist positive liberals, secondly a group of practical politicians, and finally we shall look at the purest instance of positive liberty in our period.

In the whole of this movement the influence of Oxford University will be apparent. Green was at Balliol; Edward Caird was a fellow of Merton from 1864 to 1866 and after a long period in Scotland returned to Oxford in 1893 as Master of Balliol; D. G. Ritchie was a fellow of Jesus College and later professor at St. Andrews in Scotland; Sir Henry Jones had a connection with Oxford through his teacher Edward Caird<sup>65</sup>—he was at Bangor for some time and later returned to Glasgow; others such as Arnold Toynbee should also be mentioned in this context. After imbibing their social philosophy from such men as Green and Caird, the younger men went out into the provincial universities not merely to teach, but also to follow Green's example and play a full part in civic life; they helped to found trade unions,<sup>66</sup> joined city councils and lectured to business men on the moral obligations of citizenship.<sup>67</sup>

Almost all this first group of positive liberals held a conception of liberty which was greatly influenced by what we have called the realist notion of liberty. "It is," stated Sir Henry Jones, only the pseudo freedom of irrational caprice which has been limited. Nor has the state invaded any rights in such action; for the liberty to do wrong is not a right, but the perversion of a right and its negation.<sup>68</sup>

F. C. Montague, another Oxford thinker in this group, declared that what is important is not liberty to do as we like—this is not real freedom; rightly conceived, freedom is the release from instinct and thoughtless desire.<sup>69</sup>

<sup>65</sup> "I was born," he wrote, "in Llangernyw in 1852, and born again in 1876 in Edward Caird's classroom." H. J. W. Hetherington, Life and Letters of Sir Henry Jones (1924), p. 20n.

<sup>66</sup> Henry Jones and J. H. Muirhead, The Life of Edward Caird, p. 20.

<sup>67</sup> Henry Jones, The Working Faith of the Social Reformer, pp. 262f.

<sup>68</sup> Ibid., p. 10. This can also be seen in an earlier essay, "The Social Organism," in A. Seth and R. B. Haldane, eds., Essays in Philosophical Criticism, p. 201.

<sup>69</sup> The Limits of Individual Liberty (1885), p. 122.

Ritchie was a follower of Hegel and attempted to recruit him for the cause of state intervention,<sup>70</sup> pointing out a possible implication of Mill's man on a rotten bridge,<sup>71</sup> which Bosanquet was later to use.<sup>72</sup>

The positive liberals thought that a much wider conception of liberty than that held by the old liberals was necessary; education, they argued, extends the freedom of citizens.<sup>73</sup> Insofar as liberty is to be regarded as an end in politics it is not opposed to law, but on the contrary relies upon law for its maintenance.<sup>74</sup> "The civilized state does more for its citizens than the barbarous state," Jones observed, "and at the same time enables them to do more for themselves."<sup>75</sup> Cliffe Leslie had made the same point in 1861—that the individual is not free to do something if he has not the means and the power to do it.<sup>76</sup> This conception of liberty as including the power to do things was explicitly or implicitly rejected by the old negative liberals,<sup>77</sup> and even if they held it their individualistic conception of society would have led them to minimize the number of hindrances which could be hindered by state action.

The positive liberals in this period held a conception of society, not simply as a heap of atoms, but as a community of mutually interacting beings; these beings are continually influencing each other and there is always the possibility of the state intervening to prevent coercion and so increase liberty. The old liberalism had taught—and quite rightly according to the new liberals—that many old restrictions had become unnecessary and ought to be removed; their aim was increased liberty and their means were the removal of antiquated restraints and prohibitions. Their work had been well done, but something more was needed; the positive liberals were dissatisfied with the system of "despotism tempered by partial anarchy,"<sup>78</sup> which was the logical result of the individualist philosophy of many of the negative liberals. Ritchie pointed out how liberalism had come to be associated with a negative state policy.<sup>79</sup> Yet there is, he argued, no inconsistency in the same party struggling for the removal of bad restrictions and also for the imposition of good ones, both for the purpose of increasing freedom.<sup>80</sup> State and civic enterprises had greatly multiplied and yet so far from diminishing the realm of individual freedom they had enlarged it.<sup>81</sup>

<sup>70</sup> "Put together Hegel's resuscitation of the Hellenic conception of the State with his declaration in the Philosophy of History, that the end of the modern State is to realize the positive freedom of all, and it becomes obvious enough that, though the advocate of laissez faire will not relish Hegel's politics, he will have more reason to blame him for (unconsciously it may be) begetting socialism than for supporting the old régime." Mind, Vol. 13 (1888), p. 434.

<sup>71</sup> Principles of State Interference, pp. 86f., though he does not accuse Mill of holding a theory of the real will without knowing it.

<sup>72</sup> Philosophical Theory of the State, pp. 64f.

<sup>73</sup> D. G. Ritchie, Natural Rights (1895), pp. 139-40.

<sup>74</sup> D. G. Ritchie, The Moral Function of the State (1887), p. 9; cf. also "Evolution and Democracy," in Stanton Coit, ed., Ethical Democracy (1900), p. 27.

<sup>75</sup> The Working Faith, pp. 143-4.

<sup>76</sup> "Practical Freedom involves much more than the absence of legal and social restraint; every limitation of power is an abridgement of positive liberty. A man is not free to go from Shropshire to London . . . if the journey is too long and expensive for him; nor is he actually free to develop a powerful intellect if education lies beyond his reach." "The Individual and the Crowd," in Essays in Political and Moral Philosophy (1879), pp. 19-20.

<sup>77</sup> One of them rejected the idea in explicit Hobbist terminology: "No one now-a-days would seriously contend that one citizen should possess better opportunities than another. It is admitted, on all hands . . . that every citizen should be free to attempt anything which his fellow-citizens are allowed to do. . . . There is a great difference between giving a man the liberty to do anything, and supplying him with the means with which to do it. This distinction has been clearly stated by Hobbes. . . . True Liberalism would give to every man the liberty to do anything which his fellow-citizens are allowed to do; but Socialism is not content with liberty only: it wants the state to confer the power also, that is to say the means." Bruce Smith, op. cit., p. 434. The distinction between opportunity—in any substantial sense of the term—and means or power is prodigiously deep.

<sup>78</sup> Studies in Political and Social Ethics (1902), p. 58; cf. "Arbitrary freedom (of the individual) and arbitrary despotism (of Caesar or the State) are not mutually exclusive. They are only a dual phenomenon of the same situation. They may struggle with each other more or less, but by nature they are allies." F. Tönnies, Community and Association (E. T. 1955), p. 235.

<sup>79</sup> Principles of State Interference, pp. 137-8.

<sup>80</sup> Ibid., pp. 7-8.

<sup>81</sup> "Is it," demanded Sir Henry Jones of the new idea of the positive state, "a mammoth State,

The state might, argued the positive liberals, take over more things and at the same time leave a wider range of choices open to individuals. Those who worked in the mines with no effective choice, being compelled by economic necessity, were not really free; Jones wrote of them:

They really are as little free as an instrument is free from the manipulation of the man who plays on it.<sup>82</sup>

It is possible, as James Seth pointed out, that by intervening in the economic sphere, the state can secure greater power and freedom to its members.<sup>83</sup> Property, thought Jones, is essential for individual freedom, and the fact that it is sometimes the means of selfishness and greed is no reason to abolish it; property is also the condition of many virtues such as generosity.<sup>84</sup>

This school of positive liberals rejected the idea that the state exists merely to maintain the status quo in matters of property, and to keep the citizens from each other's throats. Ritchie ridiculed the Spencerian conception of society with no state intervention except to provide means for criminal and civil redress; the amount of litigation would be too great for a tolerable society, and most men would not have the time to engage in it.<sup>85</sup>

Another important plank in the Spencerian platform was attacked most effectively by Ritchie and others. This was the use of evolutionary theory to bolster up theories of laissez faire. Progress is not the same as evolution,<sup>86</sup> they pointed out; progress is achieved by the diminution of waste, while a Leviathan, gradually absorbing its citizens into itself, annihilating their private wills and all the good and evil which springs therefrom . . . ? Or is it a country whose people are more free, whose private wealth is greater, whose individual enterprises are more far-reaching . . . ? It is possible that the State as a single organism grows in power, even as its citizens acquire freedom." The Working Faith, pp. 103-4.

<sup>82</sup> Life and Letters of Sir Henry Jones, p. 232.

<sup>83</sup> A Study of Ethical Principles (1908 ed.), p. 291; cf. also Jones, The Working Faith, p. 105.

<sup>84</sup> The Working Faith, p. 96.

<sup>85</sup> Principles of State Interference, pp. 60-1.

<sup>86</sup> "Every careful biologist (the qualification is unfortunately necessary) recognizes that evolution is not identical with what we mean by progress. Even in the biological sphere, success in the struggle may be attained by degeneration as well as by advance." Ritchie, International Journal of Ethics, Vol. 5 (1894-5), p. 110.

The mere struggle for existence between individuals means waste unchecked. The State, by its action, can in many cases consciously and deliberately diminish this fearful loss; in many cases by freeing the individual from the necessity of a perpetual struggle for the mere conditions of life, it can set free individuality and so make culture possible.<sup>87</sup> Rational selection must come to take the place of natural selection, which is a cruel and wasteful process.<sup>88</sup> Nature is non-moral, and must be governed by moral forces.<sup>89</sup> In an address to the Oxford branch of the Guild of St. Matthew, Ritchie remarked upon the curious way in which those who were most suspicious of the state with a big "S" were willing to throw themselves into the hands of nature with a very large "N."<sup>90</sup> John Caird similarly remarked that civilization is the result of a struggle with the irrational aspects of nature, rather than of a meek submission to natural processes.<sup>91</sup> T. H. Huxley lent the weight of his prestige to this assault against Spencerian biopolitics. The natural process must be checked by rational and ethical forces, he maintained in his Romanes Lecture of 1893; it is the ethically fittest who should survive.<sup>92</sup> Ethical beliefs, the scientist observed, may be a part of the evolutionary process, but this is no reason why they should not govern it;<sup>93</sup> neglect of this fact leads to what he called "the fanatical in-

<sup>87</sup> Principles of State Interference, p. 50. This is not to say that a study of evolution is unnecessary. By studying what has been we are able to see the possibilities for the future, and are able to make use of them; cf. The Moral Function of the State, pp. 5-6.

<sup>88</sup> Darwinism and Politics (1889 ed.), p. 82; cf. also Natural Rights, p. 64.

<sup>89</sup> Philosophical Studies (1905), p. 334.

<sup>90</sup> The Moral Function of the State, p. 7. Spencer seems to have recognized the distinction between the fittest and the best. "Very often," he wrote, "that which humanly speaking is inferiority, causes the survival." "Mr. Martineau on Evolution," in Essays, iii, p. 242. Yet he continued in his political writings to argue as though they were the same.

<sup>91</sup> "It is because man is a spirit and not an animal that history is the record of a progress to which the biologist expert has no key. Civilization is not the result of the forces of nature, but the issue of a struggle with them." University Addresses (1898), p. 259.

<sup>92</sup> "Evolution and Ethics," in Collected Essays (1895), ix, p. 81.

<sup>93</sup> Ibid., p. 115.

dividualism of our time."<sup>94</sup> Darwin himself was always cautious in expressing his views on these matters, but he seems to have held the opinion that while the development of the moral sense itself can largely be attributed to natural selection, its content is due much more to education, habit and religion.<sup>95</sup>

Simply because ethical ideas have evolved by natural processes we are not, thought Ritchie, justified in believing that they are therefore invalid; the origin of an idea must be distinguished from its validity. The logical principle of contradiction and the ethical idea of duty come to man in the process of evolution, but they are not therefore inapplicable.<sup>96</sup> We might be able to explain how a few individuals came to own a large proportion of the country, but this is no justification or condemnation of their doing so at the present time; this, he argued, must be sought in social utility.<sup>97</sup>

The second group of people to be dealt with are the politicians, in particular H. H. Asquith, R. B. Haldane, Edward Grey and Herbert Samuel. These men followed closely the ideas of the philosophers already discussed. For them liberty was a positive concept and they believed that the old negative idea must be superseded. Asquith went up to Balliol in 1870 and became an ardent admirer of T. H. Green, though more, perhaps, with regard to his social and political ideas than to his philosophy which was always something of a mystery to the politician.<sup>98</sup> A mere freedom from compulsion and restraint does not make men free; "To be really free," he wrote, "they must be able to make the best use of faculty, opportunity, energy, life."<sup>99</sup> He based his election address of 1892 upon this positive notion of freedom; it was this, he thought, which justified the Liberal Party's insistence on more state intervention. "I am one of those," he declared, who believe that the collective action of the community may and ought to be employed positively as well as negatively; to raise as well as to level; to equalize opportunities no less than to curtail privileges; to make the freedom of the individual a reality and not a pretence.<sup>100</sup>

He maintained these views on liberty to the end of his life.<sup>101</sup> It is this concept of positive liberty which led to the progressive attitude of liberals on such questions as education, housing, and factory legislation; however, elements of the realist conception of freedom remained in the Liberal Party's attitude to the drink question, although by a tortuous process it is possible to justify temperance legislation under the canons of the empiricist notion of positive liberty.<sup>102</sup>

Others in the group of new liberal politicians were Edward Grey, who was at Balliol from 1880 (although he was sent down for a short period); Herbert Samuel, who was there from 1889 to 1893, and Arthur Acland, who was bursar of the college for some years. In his book on Liberalism, which embodied many of the positive liberal ideas of Green and the philosophers at the same time as attempting to work out their practical implications in politics, Herbert Samuel argued that although self-reliance and self-help are important in the development of character, this does not rule out the need for state intervention. The extension

Andrews, whose Professor of Philosophy was Sir Henry Jones. The professor wrote of the politician, "I like the statesman in him and believe in his cause." Life and Letters of Sir Henry Jones, p. 55.

<sup>100</sup> Memories and Reflections of the Earl of Oxford and Asquith, i, p. 113.

<sup>101</sup> Speeches of the Earl of Oxford and Asquith (1927), p. 308.

<sup>102</sup> I.e., by saying that a man who is drunk, like a man who is hypnotized, is not in a position to take decisions; thus it is possible to restrict his freedom at time t in order to increase it at time t'. In this matter, however, it should be borne in mind that present freedom is worth more than future freedom, and on the question of liquor laws the position of Archbishop Magee is perhaps more attractive to the liberal than that of the restrictionists; "I would," he declared, "distinctly prefer freedom to sobriety." House of Lords Debates, May 2, 1872, quoted in Speeches and Addresses, p. 120.

<sup>94</sup> Ibid., p. 82. Huxley was by no means a socialist; cf. "Government: Anarchy or Regimentation," in Collected Essays, i, p. 402.

<sup>95</sup> The Descent of Man (1871), ii, p. 404.

<sup>96</sup> Mind, Vol. 10 (1885), p. 136. "Whether our ideals of goodness are due to natural selection (of individuals and societies and usages) or partly to natural selection and partly to use-inheritance may be an interesting historical problem; but it has no direct bearing on the problem of what meaning there is in calling anything 'good' at all." "Heredity and Ethics," in Proceedings of the Aristotelian Society, iii: I, p. 147.

<sup>97</sup> Darwin and Hegel (1893), p. 29, and Natural Rights, p. 104.

<sup>98</sup> J. A. Spender and H. Asquith, Life of the Earl of Oxford and Asquith, i, p. 36.

<sup>99</sup> Introduction to H. Samuel, Liberalism (1902), pp. ix-x. Asquith was for a time Member of Parliament for the Fifeshire Burghs, in which constituency was situated the University of St.

of law need not reduce the realm of freedom, but can enlarge it:

to support a policy of State regulation in industry is quite consistent with a belief in liberty, and not merely consistent with it but rather to be regarded as its necessary consequence.<sup>103</sup>

The liberal government of 1892-5 was considerably influenced by the ideas of political and social liberty advocated by these new liberals, and Samuel discusses in his Memories the development of thought about liberty among politicians in this period.<sup>104</sup> The influence of such men as Ritchie and T. H. Huxley was beginning to tell.<sup>105</sup> Later a group of Liberals including Haldane and Charles Trevelyan went over to the Labour Party, though they claimed to retain a belief in liberty as the end in politics. They regarded the Labour Party policy as a natural extension of the ideas of positive liberty which they had held as liberals.<sup>106</sup>

Mention should also be made of the attitude of the Fabians to the question of liberty. They regarded the positive conception of liberty as one of the ends of political activity; in 1891 Sydney Webb had remarked on the individualists' inability to understand the phenomenon of "the expansion of the sphere of government in the interests of liberty itself."<sup>107</sup> This effective liberty could, he thought, be realized only by substituting what he called "democratic self-government" in industry for control by a few individuals.<sup>108</sup> The prospectus of the Fabian Society proclaimed that its socialist programme would result in much less interference with personal freedom than was the case with the contemporary system.<sup>109</sup> They do not appear to have thought that liberty was the sole end in political activity and believed that it might have to be sacrificed on occasions to the demands of equality.<sup>110</sup>

<sup>103</sup> Liberalism, p. 28.

<sup>104</sup> Memories (1945), p. 25.

<sup>105</sup> Samuel records going to hear Huxley's Romanes Lecture, ibid., p. II.

<sup>106</sup> "I never felt laissez faire inherent in Liberalism, or I could never have remained as long as I did in the Liberal Party." Charles Trevelyan, Preface to H. Langshaw, Socialism and the Historic Function of Liberalism (1925), p. vi.

<sup>107</sup> "The Difficulties of Individualism," reprinted in Socialism and Individualism (1908), p. 22.

<sup>108</sup> Ibid., pp. 26-7.

<sup>109</sup> Cf. Sidney Webb, Socialism in England (1890), p. 13.

<sup>110</sup> Fabian Essays, p. 59.

It is not always quite clear whether L. T. Hobhouse wished to make liberty the sole end of politics or merely one among several. Certainly he thought that development of individual character is the ultimate end; insistence on personality is the creed of democracy just as the dominance of power and efficiency is that of bureaucracy.<sup>111</sup> It is upon this notion of the development of character that true liberalism is based. The essential thing about liberalism is not that it is unconcerned with people's characters, but that it believes that the best way for character to develop is not by pushing people around, but by leaving open to them as many effective choices as possible. "If we refrain from coercing a man for his own good," he wrote, it is not because his good is indifferent to us, but because it cannot be furthered by coercion.<sup>112</sup>

The chief means of encouraging the development of character is the increase of freedom, not merely negative freedom, but the positive ability to fulfill choices. He emphasized, as Ritchie had done, that as liberty involves the power of doing things, it is not opposed to the principle of state intervention; the modern state has more power than the ancient one, yet there is more freedom left to the individual.<sup>113</sup> The criterion of state intervention must always be whether it will increase the total amount of individual freedom.<sup>114</sup> J. A. Hobson, another of the positive liberals, and a friend of Hobhouse, said much the same.<sup>115</sup> Bosanquet too had pointed out that there is no antagonism between law and liberty—even "in the plainest and simplest sense of the word."<sup>116</sup> "The range of possible actions presented to the individual for his choice," he wrote, becomes, as society develops, more and more com-

<sup>111</sup> The Metaphysical Theory of the State (1918), p. 134.

<sup>112</sup> Liberalism, p. 143. "Liberalism is the belief that society can safely be founded on this self-directing power of personality." Ibid., p. 123. "The central principle of Liberalism is self-government." Democracy and Reaction (1904), p. 47.

<sup>113</sup> Democracy and Reaction, p. 127.

<sup>114</sup> Social Evolution and Political Theory (1911), p. 203; cf. also, "Hence in the main the extension of control does not impair liberty, but on the contrary is the means of extending liberty and may and should be conceived with that very object in view." Ibid., p. 202.

<sup>115</sup> The Crisis of Liberalism (1909), pp. 92-3.

<sup>116</sup> The Civilization of Christendom (1893), p. 379.

prehensive. His liberty, therefore, in the common straight-forward sense of doing what he pleases becomes greater and greater.<sup>117</sup>

But Bosanquet was never content with the simple sense!

Hobhouse was one of the pure instances of our category of positive liberals. Unlike the earlier representatives whom we have discussed, he was basically an empiricist and regarded freedom as the ability to do what one wants to do, whether good or evil; he purged the concept of positive liberty of the elements of idealism which up to this time had adhered to it. Although there is, for Hobhouse, no antithesis between law and liberty when talking of the whole society, there is in regard to one individual. All law is restraint, and all restraint is a limit on freedom. "Law," he observed, of course restrains the individual; it is therefore opposed to his liberty at a given moment and in a given direction.<sup>118</sup>

Criticizing the idealist conception of freedom, he pointed out that Hegel saw that freedom involved restraint on something but did not see that it was restraint on something else, that which is free being in the respect in which it is free necessarily unconstrained.<sup>119</sup>

Hobhouse was a fervent critic of idealist metaphysics, and occasionally burst forth into torrents of righteous anger against the influence of this philosophy on social and intellectual life. "The Rhine has flowed into the Thames," he declared in a famous passage, "at any rate into those upper reaches of the Thames, known locally as the Isis."<sup>120</sup> The effect of idealist philosophy was to weaken the brain, to undermine morality by blurring the distinction between right and wrong, and "to throw a gloss over stupidity, and prejudice, and caste, and tradition."<sup>121</sup>

Like Ritchie and Huxley before him, Hobhouse attacked the idea that evolutionary theories necessarily lead to a policy of non-intervention by the state; people who have hastily applied ideas of the survival of the fittest to society in an effort to prevent state action have understood neither Darwin nor society.<sup>122</sup> The fittest to survive in an all-out struggle are not always the best. The evolutionist, however, is right in one sense; the fittest ought to survive. But who are the fittest for life in society? Are they the unscrupulous men of force who are likely to survive in the anarchical struggle for existence? No; rather they are the men most fitted for co-operating with others.<sup>123</sup> It is moral and social progress to eliminate and restrict the immoral and the unsocial man; but there is all the difference in the world between progress and evolution.<sup>124</sup> Progress is not inevitable,<sup>125</sup> and so far as there has been any it has been social rather than racial;<sup>126</sup> there is no law of racial progress to which we must meekly submit.<sup>127</sup> The study and practice of eugenics might prove useful, but its application is more a matter of ethics than of biology; before we start improving the stock by rational means we must have some conception of what man exists for.<sup>128</sup>

The state can, then, intervene in the social process quite legitimately, and in so doing will not necessarily diminish the total of human freedom. How did the concept of positive freedom apply in practice for Hobhouse? First of all, he believed that it implies a considerable degree of equality;<sup>129</sup> a reorganization of society is needed if we are to achieve a maximum of human freedom. The so-called freedom of contract under which the laborer is said freely to work for a particular employer, is a myth; in many slave systems a man is forced into

<sup>117</sup> Ibid., pp. 84-5.

<sup>118</sup> The Labour Movement (1893), p. 91.

<sup>119</sup> "The Ethical Basis of Collectivism," in International Journal of Ethics, Vol. 8 (1898), pp. 145, 147.

<sup>120</sup> "I was never one of those who think that the general fact of progress may be readily assumed, or that mankind constantly advances to higher things by an automatic law which can be left to itself." Development and Purpose (1913), p. xxi.

<sup>121</sup> Social Evolution and Political Theory, p. 80.

<sup>122</sup> Development and Purpose, p. 207, cf. also Democracy and Reaction, pp. 99-100 and 115-6.

<sup>123</sup> Social Evolution and Political Theory, p. 43.

<sup>124</sup> Liberalism, pp. 24, 29. "Is a man free," demanded J. A. Hobson, "who has not equal opportunity with his fellows of such access to all material and moral means of personal development and work as shall contribute to his own welfare and that of his society?" The Crisis of Liberalism, p. 93.

<sup>117</sup> Ibid., p. 368.

<sup>118</sup> Liberalism, p. 23.

<sup>119</sup> The Metaphysical Theory of the State, p. 36. G. D. H. Cole similarly attacked the idealists, Labour in the Commonwealth (1918), p. 194, although only a year previous he appears to have held much the same notion of freedom himself, Self-Government in Industry (1917), p. 227.

<sup>120</sup> Democracy and Reaction, p. 77.

<sup>121</sup> Ibid., p. 79.

slavery by economic necessity.<sup>130</sup> Trade unions do not primarily restrict the liberty of the individual but increase his power (and thus his positive liberty). "True consent is free consent," he declared, "and full freedom of consent implies equality on the part of both parties to the bargain."<sup>131</sup>

A considerable growth of government and municipal trading might be found not only consistent with, but positively to promote, individual freedom; direct government management, however, is only one of the methods of public control which can be exercised in the interests of freedom.<sup>132</sup> A great extension of public education would be justified in the interests of positive freedom; it is necessary, remarked Hobson, "both to the achievement and the utilization of every other element of personal liberty."<sup>133</sup> Freedom to choose a job, to be really effective, implies equality of opportunity with others, and this in turn justifies liberals in demanding a state system of free education.

There is an important difference in the way in which such men as Hobhouse and Hobson interpreted positive liberty, and the way in which Bosanquet and his school did. For the former, some considerable changes in the structure of society were thought to be essential for the securing of real freedom, while Bosanquet was willing to see the state intervene only to help individual "cases" back on to their feet; any social reorganization was to him anathema, and an increase in wealth by the lower orders might undermine their characters. With all his talk of society as an organism, Bosanquet, like Spencer before him, had a basically individualistic approach to the practical problems of society such as poverty. The Charity Organisation Society had a fanatical belief in self-reliance, in providence, and in thrift—"the duty of carrying at least one's own burden"<sup>134</sup>—which sounds passing strange from a professed opponent of individualism. Promiscuous gifts to the poor were held to undermine their characters,<sup>135</sup> although the inheritance of large sums of money by the rich carries responsibility with it and enables the possessor to develop his character by donations to deserving causes.<sup>136</sup>

There was much in common between the ideas of Hobson, Hobhouse and others of this school, and those which inspired the formation of the Labour Party, but the liberals remained critical of certain aspects of socialist policy. As early as 1902 Hobhouse hoped for a union between the new liberals and the rising labourites,<sup>137</sup> and later classified political thinkers as follows: Communist and Theoretic Socialist; Ordinary Labour and Good Liberal; Bad Liberal and Ordinary Tory; Diehard. He went on to observe that the distinction between the ordinary labor man and the positive liberal was obsolete.<sup>138</sup> Yet both he and Hobson were suspicious of doctrinaire socialism, which was thought to lay insufficient emphasis on individual liberty and too much on state power.<sup>139</sup>

IV

A study of the rise of the concept of positive liberty is interesting from several points of view, and illustrates the power of this word—or rather concept of—liberty. Instead of renouncing liberty as the great end in politics, the positive liberals found it convenient to enlarge and adapt the notion of liberty.

On the practical level, though much cannot be said about this here, the movement has an interest. The Labour Party in Britain is abandoning some of its old dogmas and is moving towards a more flexible position. In spite of its old puritan spirit, it is making its peace with a situation of relative prosperity which it was instrumental in creating. Yet the concept of flexibility is only meaningful when applied to an object which has some purpose or aim; to have flexible ideas is not to have no ideas at all—and there is always the danger of thinking that it is. Empirical politics, as Professor Oakeshott has reminded us,<sup>140</sup> is strictly these chance interferences." "The Principles and Chief Dangers of the Administration of Charity," in International Journal of Ethics, Vol. 3 (1892-3), p. 324.

<sup>136</sup> The smug way in which these organizers of charity used to speak of helping people to help themselves (Bosanquet, The Social Criterion [1907], p. 29) would be amusing if it were not that this attitude held up efforts towards real social reform for many years.

<sup>137</sup> Cf. Hobson and Ginsberg, op. cit., p. 63.

<sup>138</sup> Ibid., p. 66.

<sup>139</sup> Hobson, The Crisis of Liberalism, p. 93.

<sup>140</sup> Political Education (1951), pp. 9f.

<sup>130</sup> Democracy and Reaction, pp. 37-8.

<sup>131</sup> Liberalism, p. 91.

<sup>132</sup> "The Problem," in J. A. Hobson and M. Ginsberg, L. T. Hobhouse, p. 273.

<sup>133</sup> The Crisis of Liberalism, p. 94.; cf. also Hobson, The Social Problem (1901), pp. 10, 96.

<sup>134</sup> The Civilization of Christendom, p. 338. In the Preface to this book the reader is told that the C.O.S. conception of thrift is very different from the individualist idea; as to exactly how, he is left in the dark.

<sup>135</sup> "Nothing undermines character so much as speaking impossible, but a belief in its possibility is possible, and mischievous at that; how many people do we hear talking of expediency as if it were a policy, when what they really mean is self-interest? The Labour Party might do worse than to examine once more the ideas of the positive liberals which have been discussed in this article—the idea first of all of liberty as the great end in politics. There is surely a lesson to be learned from Hobhouse who was dogmatic on fundamentals and flexible on details, refusing to erect such things as state ownership into dogmas. The Labour Party has tended to transform this mere means into one of the chief ends of politics; this the positive liberals never did.

The implications of this movement for the historian are also intriguing. It is illuminating to trace the way in which, in mid-Victorian England it was found desirable, for a variety of generally very practical reasons, for the state to play an increasingly important role in the life of society. It was gradually discovered that on many questions the state cannot be neutral; and, having the power to intervene, a refusal to do so is tantamount to a positive acceptance of existing conditions. In response to these changes, a social philosophy grew up, which attempted to justify state intervention under the old and generally accepted canons of liberty; thus was evolved the notion of positive liberty. The idea was taught in the universities, and its fuller implications were worked out both by the more practically minded of the academics, and by a group of young liberal politicians; these men proceeded to apply them in a more systematic manner. We thus have an idea growing up in response to changing social needs, and then itself affecting the structure of society in a subsequent period, illustrating the assertion of J. N. Figgis that

If ideas in politics more than elsewhere are the children of practical needs, none the less is it true, that the actual world is the result of men's thoughts. The existing arrangement of political forces is dependent at least as much upon ideas, as it is upon men's perception of their interests.<sup>141</sup>

<sup>141</sup> Political Thought from Gerson to Grotius (1916 ed.), p. 1.

TOWARD A DEFINITION OF EDITORIAL POLICY FOR THE REVIEW*

HARVEY C. MANSFIELD, Managing Editor
The Ohio State University

Editorial policy reflects in part an ideal, in part a code of operating practice. It is the editor's business to maintain some gap, but not too large a gap, between the two—to keep the ideal always some distance ahead of the practice, and to keep the practice from lagging too far behind. And it is inherent in the notion of policy that both ideal and practice embody a degree of rational consistency in statement and application that rules out mere personal caprice.

The distinctive characteristics of the REVIEW are marked out for it in the main by its functions as a scholarly journal and as an institutional medium, the official journal of the Association. It is not in any significant degree, therefore—as a journal of opinion may be—a vehicle for the predilections of the editor; his duty is to formulate and apply standards appropriate to the purposes of the Association that supports the REVIEW and furnishes its principal audience. Because the Association is a national professional society, rather than either an organ of a particular educational institution or the outlet of a group committed to a particular school of thought, the REVIEW must be correspondingly catholic in its outlook. Because the domain of political science—however its boundaries are defined—is so broad, the doors must be open to a diversity of subject matters, including occasional essays in neighboring disciplines. Because the REVIEW audience—even if narrowly conceived as the dues-paying membership of the Association—extends well beyond the ranks of teachers of political science, to take in many people in public life here and abroad, whether officials or not, materials addressed to questions of public policy have a place along with those confined to more strictly scientific concerns. And because a significant part of the REVIEW's ultimate audience is still unborn, or at least has not yet emerged from school, while verity is supposed to be timeless, the range of appropriate material is not, like a newspaper's, significantly limited by considerations of timeliness to topics of current interest.<sup>1</sup> On the contrary, one criterion of quality is posed by the question, how well will an item read five years or more hence? Finally, because the REVIEW is made up mainly from contributed materials, the distribution of emphasis must reflect primarily the interests of those who are moved to write, rather than any a priori desires of the editor's.

In one sense, editorial issues may be thought to arise, like budgetary decisions, from the necessity of choice: space is scarce, more material is available for printing than the customarily available space in the REVIEW will contain, and so an ordered scheme of preferences and allocations is needed. Five or six times as many manuscript pages of articles are offered as are printed; a great many books are listed as "received" without being reviewed; the authors of book reviews and especially of book notes are allowed severely limited numbers of words; news and notes items are cut down or rejected, and so on. The amount of space can be increased somewhat by using a double-column page with narrower margins and smaller type, by increasing the number of pages, or by increasing the frequency of issues. But there are financial and other practical limits on all these palliatives, and the overall pressure for space is unremitting.

Nevertheless, the lively and recurrent policy questions regularly emerge in qualitative rather than quantitative terms. Only occasionally, at the margin, does the process of choice work like a zero-sum game where, if A is excluded, B can be admitted. For one reason, since the change in format last year, and because the Association is solvent, there is no longer a fixed number of pages setting an absolute and mechanical limit to the size of each issue. A few more pages, within reason, can always be bought. For another, the several departments of the REVIEW—articles, book reviews, bibliographical sections, news and notes, and advertising—are autonomously edited and only put together at press time, and their space requirements vary from issue to issue; so that specific allocations of page limits set in advance for each section would usually be unduly arbitrary or unfeasible. In the upshot, then, the criteria of selection and rejection must in the main be formulated and applied qualitatively to each candidate for inclusion on its merits with sufficient rigor to forestall the necessity of a harsher and less discriminating method of choice, word against word. This conclusion is reinforced by the reflection that the primary purposes of the REVIEW as a scholarly journal are qualitative, the advancement of the profession and of the understanding of its disciplinary subject matter: better a small journal, if need be, of top quality, than a guaranteed output of a scheduled number of pages.

<sup>1</sup> References and citations in current literature to issues of the REVIEW that antedate the end of World War II are quite uncommon. This may be set down as one of the marks of the gap between the ideal and the practice, either on the part of the REVIEW or of the current literature. More likely it only means that articles, more than books, make their contributions to the ongoing stream of professional thought within a few years and then usually lose their distinctive identities as sources needing individual citation. It also reflects the shifts in present professional concerns and in conceptions of the discipline.

* Presented originally at a special panel at the annual meetings of the Association, St. Louis, September 8, 1961, this paper has been circulated to the members of the Editorial Board and carries their general concurrence. I am grateful for their suggestions and improvements.

One consequence of present policy in this respect is that there is virtually no backlog of accepted articles waiting their turns to appear in print. At any given moment there may be a substantial inventory of manuscripts at the successive stages of reading and editorial consideration, but once a favorable decision has been reached the standards of selection are such that an article can ordinarily go into the next issue or at any rate the issue following. This is a wholesome if not always comfortable condition, in contrast with the situation of some journals whose space, I am informed, is committed for a year or more in advance.

Bearing these general considerations in mind, I shall try in what follows to clarify the principal issues and to some extent codify the practice of REVIEW policy. Since no other journal has quite the same audience or purpose, I shall refrain from gratuitous advice on how other journals ought to be conducted.

The main issues, in my experience, can be conveniently discussed under a baker's half-dozen heads, which I shall take up in the following order: (1) the sources of supply; (2) the rule against reprinting; (3) the balance between service and research functions; (4) the place of opinion and public policy arguments; (5) the room for specialists; (6) the priority for analysis over description; and (7) style, or the sanctity of an author's words.

I. SOURCES OF SUPPLY

Market principles of supply, demand and incentive have a bearing on the output of materials the REVIEW needs, and so policy must take into account some elementary differentials in the operation of these principles. At one end of the line, the Managing Editor has not yet discovered any qualified person who is willing as a labor of love to contribute over 100 hours of her time and disrupt her Christmas vacation in order to furnish the indispensable annual index to the REVIEW, in the form and on the schedule the printer requires, for the sheer satisfaction of seeing her name on the cover page. So the index must be procured and paid for; and so too must the annual listing of dissertations. In a different category stand the stalwart compilers of the bibliographic sections, sorting out the current periodical literature for the convenience of the inquisitive. The REVIEW furnishes its readers with much more of this reference material than most comparable journals. In undertaking to prepare their copy regularly the several compilers respond to a call to duty, in a species of selective service, and like good soldiers are compensated (at a page rate) rather for out-of-pocket expenses than for the economic value of their time; but they must be called.

In a third category are the book reviewers. They are far more numerous, and if they respond at all to invitations, they need no more tangible reward than the retention of the books they review. But they are free agents, not conscripts. They may and often do refuse to serve when called upon. Moreover, they can seldom know in advance what new books are forthcoming, which need reviewing or which are already provided for; and if they volunteer for specific books, their motives may sometimes be suspect. So the Book Review Editor will welcome suggestions from any quarter but must generally take the burden of selection and solicitation book by book. I need not go into the criteria he applies,<sup>2</sup> for I believe these are widely understood and not often in controversy. He has a formidable managerial task, challenging his imagination, his range of acquaintance and his resources for locating appropriate reviewers beyond his acquaintance. Quarrels with his performance are apt to be rather ad hoc or ad hominem than based on policy or principle, and critics need to bear in mind, what they cannot ordinarily know in a particular case, that the reviewer may have been his first or his fourth choice. On editorial questions other than the allocation of space he can afford to allow reviewers the more latitude of expression because the Communications section provides a medium for complaint, reply or rebuttal.

<sup>2</sup> See the admirable discussion by Avery Leiserson, "Toward a Definition of Book Review Policy," that follows this paper, below, pp. 139-141.

I am told that the honors for the best book reviewing job among political science journals belong to the Revue Française de Science Politique which employs three categories: (a) bibliographical articles consisting of concise characterizations of recent books on a subject, followed by detailed book lists; (b) bibliographical notes corresponding to our regular reviews, of individual books; and (c) bibliographical information consisting of some five to fifteen lines apiece of content analysis and brief characterization of new books in at least five major languages; some of these bear a notation indicating that a full review will come later. This last category strives for maximum coverage as well as for qualitative assessment, and affords the advantage that the selection of books for full review need not be made until after specialists in the several fields have familiarized themselves generally with their contents. Such extensive coverage of books in the REVIEW would leave no room for bibliographies of current periodical articles unless the whole space were considerably expanded. A more formidable obstacle is that the preparation of so many pages of concise abstracts is hardly conceivable except in the framework of a centralized organization such as the Fondation Nationale des Sciences Politiques, which maintains a staff of specialists under the same roof—or such, perhaps, as the Legislative Reference Service of the Library of Congress. A system practicable for the REVIEW must be compatible with the decentralized deployment of academic resources in this country.

The News and Notes materials stand on quite a different footing. Editorial policy calls for quarterly notices to department chairmen inviting the submission of materials; obituaries are occasionally invited; and official committees of the Association are informed of deadlines for notices they may wish to see printed. But the REVIEW maintains no staff of reporters or correspondents and makes no other systematic provision for securing news items for this section. The section editor gives a semblance of order to the materials that are volunteered, uses his blue pencil on items that seem unduly verbose or self-serving, tries to reward brevity in response by inclusion where possible, and excludes classes of items that have the least claims on general attention. Readers sometimes complain that space is given to trivia, but volunteers also complain when items that concern them are rejected. Perhaps no other section of the REVIEW poses so sharply the conflicting demands for saving space and for accommodating personal inclinations; none so perplexingly defies the editor's attempts to formulate criteria that will be uniformly applicable and satisfactory. And all suggestions to date that look toward improving on the vagaries of the present reliance on volunteered items by introducing a more regularized system of positive procurement of news material have foundered on either or both of two rocks: they make impossible demands for staff unless substantial sums of money are to be paid; and they promise even more disappointments for those who want to see their activities noticed unless substantially more space is allocated for the purpose. Proposals for a separate newsletter seem to involve more rather than less expense.

Still different considerations apply to the supply of article manuscripts. Here, in contrast with some of the service features, with commercial magazines and (so I am informed) with the practice of some scholarly journals abroad, no question of payment arises. The satisfaction of seeing an article in the REVIEW, and of getting a modest number of reprints free, is a sufficient reward for most academic contributors, though perhaps not enough for some senior scholars. Nor, in contrast with the book reviews, are invitations to contribute needed to secure an adequate supply of manuscripts that are acceptable or can be made so. There is no consistent surplusage, particularly of the highest quality, but in recent years at least there has been a sufficiency. REVIEW policy accordingly has been to depend, for the supply of articles, mainly upon a selection from amongst the manuscripts offered.<sup>3</sup> I shall come presently to the criteria of selection. At this point it is relevant to ask whether more of the present offerings should be rejected in order to make room for the fruits of a different policy, that by active solicitation might procure articles of a sort not now, or seldom offered.

Two possibilities may be suggested as alternatives. One would seek more control over the subject matter by a systematic editorial selection of topics in need of treatment, followed by invitations to scholars qualified to treat them. In this fashion symposia might be constructed, and presumably the Editorial Board would find a larger scope for collective deliberation on the choice of subjects and authors than is feasible now in the appraisal of two or three hundred unsolicited offerings annually.

<sup>3</sup> Customarily, only two of the 40-odd articles published each year—the President's address and the annual review of developments in constitutional law—have been regularly solicited. I have not hesitated to follow up occasional tips from trustworthy sources telling me of significant work in progress that might be had for the asking; and on other occasions I have invited a comment on a manuscript already in hand, to be published along with it. But these are infrequent and ad hoc exceptions to the usual policy of reliance on offerings.

The other would seek to alter the sources of supply by securing a larger proportion of the articles printed from authors who are senior statesmen in the profession and recognised masters in their special fields. The overwhelming majority of manuscripts now submitted comes from younger scholars with reputations still to be made or in the making. Taking three recent consecutive issues as a handy sample, the ages of the authors at the time of publication of the 33 articles these issues contained were distributed as follows: eleven under 35; sixteen between 35 and 45; and six over 45, of whom only one was over 60. Perhaps writing for the REVIEW is another New Frontier; evidently, at any rate, publication in the REVIEW is less often a sufficient incentive to induce established authors to submit their thoughts in writing, unasked. Presumably, direct invitations to contribute might be productive.<sup>4</sup>

A first objection to either alternative is self-serving: it would mean more work for the Managing Editor, and indeed would hardly be practicable without a full-time editor, or unless the responsibility were parcelled out, as with the Program Committee for the annual meetings, so that a series of associate editors took charge of particular areas or undertook to fill successive issues in turn. But putting the editorship "in commission" would surely dilute the responsibility for the finished product.

Taking higher ground, I would also doubt the wisdom of the concentration of power, and its anti-democratic implications, inherent in an arrangement for the management of the official journal of the Association that was premised on the assumption that one editor—or even a small group—knew, better than those who are engaged in their own research and writing, what topics are most in need of attention, or which scholars deserve, in advance of their production, a preferred and protected claim on the REVIEW audience for their output. I believe it possible to find and to replace editors with the critical faculties needed for the appraisal of manuscripts they have not themselves inspired, and who are skilled in helping an author to put his best foot forward in matters of style, logic, organization and the like. I think the Association might soon grow restive with an editor, however conscientious, who was charged with programming the scholarly output that the Association will publish. The Program Committee, which arranges what the Association will hear at the annual meetings, changes each year; but frequent rotation in the office is not a practicable restraint on the potential tyranny of an editor. Finally, considering the difficulties in rejecting articles that have been invited sight unseen, I am not persuaded that the products of a policy of planned contents for the REVIEW would in fact be superior to those now obtained. I favor the continuance of the present policy, therefore, without prejudice to opportunistic exceptions of the sort already noted—whenever opportunity knocks.

II. THE RULE AGAINST REPRINTING

The REVIEW has a one-way policy of long standing that expresses a preference for the advancement, as against the diffusion, of knowledge: except in its advertising pages and masthead it does not knowingly publish materials of substantially the same content that have already appeared elsewhere in print, even in another country, even in another language. On the other hand, if the author consents, permission to reprint from the REVIEW is ordinarily given as a matter of course.<sup>5</sup> So an article which will presently become a chapter in a book may be accepted and published with a notice to that effect—book publishers seem to welcome that form of advertising—and so may an article that has had a mimeographed circulation. But an article drawn from a book, even if very recently published, or from an address published as a separate pamphlet or in official proceedings, or a translation from a foreign journal—buried in obscurity though these may be for practical purposes—will ordinarily be rejected.

<sup>4</sup> In a conversation I had some years ago on this point with the editor of an esteemed British journal he expressed astonishment on learning of REVIEW policy: "With us, no one who is anyone would dream of sending off an article to our journal without first receiving a nod of invitation from the editor." We concluded that his journal fills its requirements in the way that American departments prefer to make their appointments, by consulting knowledgeable friends informally; while the REVIEW works in the way the British make appointments, by a public advertisement inviting all who think themselves qualified to come forward and submit their credentials.

<sup>5</sup> Over the signature of the Executive Director of the Association, not the Managing Editor, since the Association holds the copyright, and with or without a royalty charge depending on circumstances. A charge is made, e.g., for the inclusion of a REVIEW article in a book of readings commercially published. Policy to govern charges is currently under review in the Executive Committee of the Association.

A good reason but not the real reason for the rule is the risk of infringing copyrights when materials are reprinted. A better reason is the need to conserve space in order to afford an outlet for original work, the encouragement of which is a prime purpose of the Association and of the REVIEW. A final reason is that without it—and stopping points would be hard to define—the REVIEW might be transformed into an anthology, if not into a reader's digest of "great" articles. There is much to be said for such a publication, since no doubt, across the spans of space and time, more distinguished pieces have been written, and have perhaps escaped the notice of the contemporary American audience, than any particular issue of the REVIEW is apt to contain. Nevertheless, articles meriting reprinting may find their way into the books of readings and other outlets that commercial publishers will support. An insistence on originality, in the form of a rule against self-plagiarism, is one buttress to a larger policy of promoting the highest quality standards attainable.

Like any mechanical rule in human affairs, this one presents evident difficulties and occasional inequalities in application. This is why the reservation of scienter was included in stating it. The REVIEW has sometimes been taken unawares in violation of the rule, since the Managing Editor and his advisers have not read everything in print and authors do not always call attention to their prior or pending publications. In close cases where the timing is crucial, adjustments in publication schedules might lead to unintended violations; and here, if a commitment to publish has been given, the REVIEW does not retract it. It is easy to sympathize also with an author who, when he has once committed his thoughts to paper, would like to see them appear in as many places as possible; or who, impatient with the time it takes for one journal to reach a decision, submits them to several and finds it hard to withdraw if more than one accepts what he has written. But an author who hopes to publish in the REVIEW a second time would be short-sighted if he deliberately took advantage of editorial ignorance in a knowing violation of the rule.

It may be that an occasional exception is warranted in the case of an article substantially similar to one the author has published abroad in a foreign language, if it has a widespread interest and would otherwise be largely inaccessible; but the exceptions should be rare or the REVIEW could easily be swamped. It appears prudent also to weight the scales somewhat against an article drawn from a book already scheduled for publication though not yet out.

III. SERVICE VS. RESEARCH FUNCTIONS

Considerably more than half the printed matter in any issue of the REVIEW comes under the general rubric of the diffusion rather than the advancement of knowledge—a proportion that is in line with the definition of a conservative as one who realizes that most of men's time and energy must be devoted to preventing things from getting any worse than they already are. The sections given over to advertising, index, news and notes, bibliographies and book notes—which because of space limits are seldom more than expository—are all of this nature, and all have a tendency to grow. The conscientious bibliographer, for instance, as well as the indiscriminate one, leans toward inclusion rather than exclusion; and as the volume of materials he canvasses increases, so does the number of entries. The indexer inserts cross-references to be more helpful; the dissertation list is expanded to include Canadian titles; the northern and southern California schools form separate associations with separate programs and lists of officers to record; and so on. All this is useful and desirable, and moreover, some part of the diffusion, not specifiable a priori, leads indirectly to further advances in knowledge later on. Even if this were not so, a profession that earns most of its bread and butter by teaching has needs that constitute an independent justification for the provision of reference materials of a specialized nature not readily accessible elsewhere. What, then, is an appropriate balance to maintain between these service functions and the provision of an outlet for original research, in the REVIEW?

One answer is to stick with the status quo. Whenever suggestions have been made in recent years to drop or reduce drastically one or another of the existing service sections, defenders of the target have arisen to protest, and approximately the present balance has been preserved. No satisfactory measure of their numbers or relative need has been devised. On the other hand, no strong pressure for a sharp reduction has developed, because the volume of article manuscripts of acceptable quality has remained in rough correspondence with the space remaining after some modest economizing measures.

So long as these conditions continue, I am at a loss to suggest a more elevated principle for justifying or altering the present balance, other than the one implicitly given above, that the service materials carried be not readily accessible in other sources; and a corollary, that the burden of proof should lie with those who argue for their expansion. That burden I believe has been sustained for the services I have mentioned at about their present levels.

A further criterion of allocation—though hardly a lofty principle—might be a rule that service materials should not be accepted as articles or occupy space allotted to articles. In conformity with that thought the “bibliographical essays” that appear from time to time are located in the book review department, and occasional “teaching notes” have been relegated to rear positions.

But to state such a rule in this way risks prejudging the most perplexing and controversial case posing this general issue that has arisen in my tenure: namely, the future of the annual article on constitutional law, an issue precipitated last winter when its eminent author for the last dozen years asked to be relieved of continuing it. It has been a regular feature of the REVIEW for upwards of 35 years at least, surviving the demise of annual reviews of the sessions of Congress, of developments in state constitutional law, and perhaps other subjects. It has been located and counted among the articles. It is intentionally a service to the diffusion rather than the advancement of knowledge, and many value it as such. It is capably and carefully done, and widely and on the whole favorably known. It is long, as articles go, but it has not precluded the publication of other articles on constitutional law topics in the REVIEW. Even if that were not so, authors in that field probably have, in the plethora of law journals, more opportunities to find outlets for their writings than scholars in most other branches of our discipline. Should the annual article be continued?

In my search for counsel on this question I encountered two characteristic and opposing views. Specialists in the field, with a few exceptions, see no need for it that is not better supplied in more specialized services familiar and available to them—in the more exhaustive annual surveys of the Harvard Law Review, in the volumes from the Chicago Law School, and in a variety of official and commercial undertakings. They would prefer to see the space freed for the fruits of original analysis and research. Defenders of the article—not all of them readers of it, nor any longer teachers in introductory courses—urge not so much their own needs as those of harried teachers in smaller places who are not specialists in the field and have heavy loads and limited library facilities that do not include much in the way of legal materials; and of those in other fields altogether who want an annual refresher. For such as these, it is said, nothing else is so handily available or gives so much in comparable space. Some correlation between age and attitude is also observable: the seniors I have consulted in the profession are more apt to favor continuing the tradition; the juniors are readier to discard it.

My own view is that the annual article has lost much of its former utility, not through its own fault. In part, it cannot any longer be a unique and pioneering effort as it once may have been; teachers and students in constitutional law are far better supplied than before the war with a variety of materials and resources that reduce their dependence on an annual survey. In part also, approaches to the teaching of American government have shifted away from the systematic exposition of constitutional doctrines, so that teachers who are not constitutional lawyers have less occasion to brush up on recent cases. But if the article has thereby in some degree become outmoded, its many loyal friends are testimony to the strength of the case that can still be made for it.

Other considerations enter into editorial policy. The annual article is a species of a potentially numerous genus. It is anomalous standing alone. If there is one on constitutional law, why not one also on, say, the state of the public finances, or the activities of the President, or of the UN—all topics presumably of as much importance and general interest, and as hard to keep track of from day to day? More basically, it is anomalous because, alone among the articles it does not, by design, meet two of the criteria, novelty and a problem focus, that are applied to the others. But these objections would lie in principle against any service feature, and it would be dogmatic to rest on them entirely. All in all, sound policy at this stage appears to counsel, not abandonment, but a conclusion that the time is ripe for a period of experimentation with alternative approaches to the design and concept of the article and the purposes it may serve.

IV. OPINION AND PUBLIC POLICY VS. SCIENCE

Most articles coming to the REVIEW embody the results of inquiries by their authors aimed at furthering our understanding of some political ideas, institutions, interests, personalities or processes, singly or in combination, or of more effective ways of studying them: inquiries that may be called more or less scientific in a loose sense of that term. Depending on the subject—and on the perspicacity of authors and readers—they have a bearing more or less remote or immediate on practical concerns of the day, on public policy of the past and future; depending on the authors' interests, this bearing may be emphasized or subordinated; and depending on the authors' temperaments, their policy views may be expressed with judicious caution or passionate conviction. A concern for policy may have been the motivating inspiration of a study; more often it appears to be an incident to reflection on the significance of the results.

All this is proper and to be expected in a social science journal; and this is not the occasion for arguing fundamental questions of the relations between knowledge, opinion and action, between research and policy, or of the nature of science itself in social studies. A fair regard for the diversity of views on these matters, as well as the traditions, alike of individual scholarly responsibility and of the freedom of scholarly inquiry and expression, counsel a latitudinarian policy for the REVIEW. The editor may question particular phrases or passages in a manuscript as needless editorializing or as opinion masquerading as fact though unsupported by any evidence offered; but he is not a censor. If there is room for both behaviorists and philosophers in the profession, there is room for them both in the REVIEW.

Questions of editorial policy arise, however, in the appraisal of manuscripts that are explicitly pitched to argue issues of current public policy. A scholarly piece like Professor Osgood's recent study of the inner contradictions in American concepts and policies of deterrence is acceptable and accepted. A report of a scholarly advisory committee endorsing larger appropriations to the State Department's historical staff, to expedite publication of the series Foreign Relations, is a marginal case, legitimate if there is space for it. But an editorial criticizing, for instance, our policy toward Castro, or a plea for more federal aid for urban redevelopment, or a review of events, say in Algeria, leading to the conclusion that the French should or should not concede Algerian claims in the Sahara, or a speculative peering ahead into the next ten years of Sino-Soviet relations, will be rejected, no matter how closely it may correspond to the editor's personal views. How is the line to be drawn between these and the first example?

One part of it, not often needed, is suggested by the Association's self-denying constitutional prohibition against partisan political activities or commitments. Although the REVIEW disclaims responsibility for an author's views, it has no reason to provide a vehicle for views of that sort.

More cases can be disposed of on principles of the division of labor. The REVIEW's editorial and production processes span three to six months or more. Arguments on topics of the day are apt to lose their timeliness or to need recasting in the light of unfolding events during such a period: better leave them to the daily and weekly press that can move more nimbly.

The rest of the line is marked out by the differences between journalism and scholarship, between decision and proof, and between authority and evidence. A journal of opinion like Foreign Affairs, to take a distinguished contemporary example, may publish an article by a prominent or controversial public figure at home or abroad whose views are important because they are his views, whether or not they are persuasive; or an article, say, on British policy toward the Common Market because it is important whether Britain joins that organization. Allowing for some overlap at the margin, the REVIEW's criteria of importance are different: as the scholarly journal of a profession it is properly more concerned with the grounds and articulation and theoretical implications of an argument than with its sponsorship, its outcome or the practical stakes that hang on it.

V. THE ROOM FOR SPECIALISTS

Very few members, I suppose, even start to read all the articles in any issue of the REVIEW; the titles alone are enough to warn most readers away from many pieces as "outside their field" or "too specialized," and the savor of the first two or three paragraphs will lead them to abandon still others at that point. Very few authors, by the same token, choose topics (or if they choose them, are able to carry them off successfully) so evidently broad in scope or pervasive in significance as to command the general attention of the profession. Considering the diversity of the potential audience, what room should the REVIEW make for specialists who talk only to specialists?

A reductio ad absurdum response to the progress of specialization may not seem altogether fanciful after a glance into some scientific journals: let the REVIEW be converted into a sort of bibliographical telephone directory where authors list their names and the titles of their works. Then if some umpire made sure that the titles were truly descriptive, each solitary reader by consulting the classified yellow pages could ring up the author who had something to say to him alone, and listen to it; and so the publication of tiresome articles might be avoided. But this solution disregards the interests of authors who want to be published more than they want to be read. The opposite solution, of rejecting anything that does not have something to say to at least a majority of the possible readers, is a more attractive goal but no more realistic. Specialization is here to stay.

One line of accommodation is to consider the provinces of more specialized journals and refer authors to them—to the regional journals, to the journals in history, philosophy, law, international law and politics, public administration, municipal affairs and so on. But no journal likes to think of itself as an outlet for hand-me-downs, so that direct referrals are seldom practicable. And while many authors, including established authorities, seek the journals in their specialties by preference—whether because these lead more surely to their selected audiences or because they present fewer uncertainties about the publication of specialized contributions—the REVIEW has prestige enough to attract a great many articles that, good or bad, would interest only a circumscribed clientele. If they seem good enough, the REVIEW will accept them even though more specialized journals, offered the chance, might gladly have taken them. The problem of editorial choice is sometimes but not usually solved by the existence of the other journals.

A more feasible accommodation is to distribute the selections so that in any particular issue there will be, if possible, at least one or two articles in each of the four or five main branches of the discipline. This is editorial policy, in order that each issue may offer something to nearly everyone, but it does not help much in choosing the articles that are to be so distributed.

No single criterion of excellence will settle that choice. No line distinguishes big facts from little ones objectively; the presence of a large idea helps, but does not guarantee that it will be effectively exploited. As Thomas Huxley demonstrated many years ago, in a celebrated essay On a Piece of Chalk, an author with insight and imagination can on occasion invest an apparently small thing with a large significance. Even an unpretentiously small point, written up with economy and elegance, can be a gem. A solid and lengthy study that exhausts a narrow subject in workmanlike fashion may seem pedestrian by contrast, but may have compensating virtues too.

A useful distinction can sometimes be drawn between innovation and application. The REVIEW, for example, published two or three quantitative studies of Supreme Court decisions, and two political interpretations of Shakespearean plays—all controversial, but seemingly pioneering efforts—and then drew the line for a time against refinements and extensions of these themes, on the ground that their possibilities had now been shown and further exploitations in the same vein would interest only a limited number of specialists. For the same reason it might decline to take an extended series of local voting studies, or opinion poll analyses, all employing more or less the same method, even though conceivably some day the accumulation of such studies might furnish the basis for comparative generalizations.

A boundary facing in the opposite direction marks off prospectus from performance. While a brilliant bit of speculation is always welcome for its suggestiveness, an elaborate plan of work to be carried out in the future, especially if it is for someone else to do, is something else again—and particularly if the proposal is mainly methodological. As the utility of tools is proved in their use and plans are commonly changed in the course of their execution, it is in the ultimate interest of the author no less than of his audience to withhold publication in the REVIEW until he has some completed research to show. A better appraisal of the methodology can be made in the context of a substantive contribution, and a prospectus is not usually a ripe subject for a REVIEW article.

Apart from such considerations as these, and the standard criteria of scholarship, editorial policy toward highly specialized pieces can hardly go much beyond seeking the counsel of other specialists in the field in appraising their relative values, and perhaps tempering the wind somewhat in favor of articles from specialties that are infrequently represented in the incoming flow.

In a different vein, another question related to specialization arises in connection with articles by authors in cognate disciplines—by an economist, a lawyer, a sociologist or psychologist or anthropologist, or by a mathematician. Generally such an article seeks an outlet in a journal closer to the author's disciplinary home. But when one comes to the REVIEW, it is begging the question—or being chauvinistic or excessively mechanical about the division of labor—to dismiss it out of hand as belonging elsewhere. For political scientists probably do too little reading in the journals of other disciplines: why should Mahomet not come to the mountain once in a while? The decisive question—assuming other standards are met—appears to be whether he comes talking to political scientists qua political scientists, i.e., to illuminate our understanding of some essentially political phenomenon or problem, bringing the tools and skills of his discipline along for the help they can give in that endeavor; or is talking chiefly to his own kind or to undifferentiated laymen. If an affirmative answer can be given to the first branch of that question, his work is welcome in the pages of the REVIEW; this is so in regrettably few cases.

VI. A PROBLEM FOCUS: THE ROOM FOR DESCRIPTION

No other single shortcoming accounts for the rejection of so many manuscripts as that they are "purely descriptive" or narrative. The criterion that requires a problem focus and gives priority to an analytical treatment of a subject is what chiefly distinguishes a good article for the REVIEW from a good article for an encyclopedia. For the one, the author must give the reader a reason for staying with him; information alone will not usually hold him long unless his curiosity is engaged; and economy in the provision and use of facts is a virtue guarding against irrelevance. For the other, the reader brings his own questions with him; makes what he can, or needs to, from the information furnished; and is grateful for fullness.

A double reason justifies the criterion, the difficulty of abundance and the concerns of political science. On the one hand there are more millions of facts—events, transactions, recorded utterances, deeds, thoughts, etc.—than the REVIEW or any journal can possibly notice; some selection is inescapable and it is not enough to take only what comes handily to reach. A problem focus in an article supplies the standards of relevance and exclusion and suggests the organization of analysis. A working rule of editorial policy therefore calls upon the author, somewhere early in the introductory paragraphs of his paper, to state as explicitly as may be what he is up to: what problem he is addressing himself to, and why that problem matters. There are artists who can write an absorbing article—like a mystery story that builds suspense to the end—without being explicit about their intentions at the beginning; but these are exceptions.

On the other hand, a clear and accurate statement of the problem often suffices to dispose of the article, by identifying it as within or without the boundaries of the significant professional concerns of an audience of political scientists. Not just any problem will do.

So, for example, if an author says in substance, "I have been looking into the subject of X, and let me tell you what I have found," the odds are overwhelming that what follows will be purely descriptive. If he says, "I mean to inquire whether the United States should have dropped the atomic bomb," or "I will argue that capital punishment is self-defeating," then he has a problem and the start of an editorial or a piece for a journal of opinion, but probably not an article for the REVIEW. If he poses a problem of fact, e.g., "It is commonly supposed that Wilson was the father of the principle of self-determination, but I will show that the true origin was much earlier," then editorial judgment is suspended until it appears what answer he makes to the political scientist's demurrer, so what? An unsatisfactory answer here is a reason why historians so seldom succeed in placing articles in the REVIEW. Yet there is room, as Robert Dahl and others have lately urged, for many more studies that address a political scientist's questions to historical data.

Generally speaking, the problem needs to be political and it needs also to be intellectual. Whether it is one of substance or technique, whether it is a problem in theory, in doctrine or in behavior, it should invite the reader to join in a search for explanations and generalizations, hitherto unrecognized or unappreciated, about political phenomena past or present—phenomena that it is the business of political scientists to understand if they can.

Having stated this standard of editorial policy I should at once acknowledge that not all articles published in the REVIEW meet it, or meet it in equal degree. The border between information and analysis is not sharp. A study of an institution or of a doctrine may be more or less descriptive or critical. Expository treatments of such subjects ideally belong presumably in textbooks, but if these are inadequate a claim can be advanced for an article, similar to the claims on behalf of the service features already discussed.

VII. STYLE: THE SANCTITY OF AN AUTHOR'S WORDS

No one expects or wants a journal of articles by different authors to maintain a uniform English style except in its most mechanical aspects; and even in the form of footnote citations some diversity in authors' practices is harmless. Questions of editorial policy respecting style consequently turn on two points: the minimum standards applicable to manuscripts submitted for consideration, and the sanctity of the author's language in an article that has been accepted—or, putting it the other way around, the extent of the Managing Editor's license to tinker with that language.

On the first point there is little to say. Minimum literary standards are a notable barrier to the serious consideration of articles by foreign authors whose native tongue is not English, and unless the REVIEW were to print in other languages this will probably remain true. In the past five years, six foreign authors have seen their articles published, only two or three of them from countries outside the English-speaking world, and two at least of these had been in the United States for extended periods. Literary deficiencies have been contributing factors in the rejection of a good many articles from domestic sources as well, but here, with one special type of exception, they are usually associated with other more fatal difficulties, of conception, logic, organization and the like. Standing alone, they can usually be ameliorated, at least, if the editor is willing and free to devote time to reworking sentences. The exception is professional jargon and takes me to the second point.

I have heard it argued, and with conviction, that an article manuscript is an author's property and inviolate; and that the business of a professional journal is to reproduce it untouched—unharmed, some might say—for who else knows better what he means to say, and how else can colleagues judge him if they cannot be sure that what appears under his name is altogether his?

An editor would be exceedingly fortunate, in my experience, who could afford to accept that position. In practice it yields to two other considerations. An editor who can ultimately reject a manuscript can also insist on stipulated revisions before he accepts it, unless the author prefers to withdraw rather than revise. In turn, this power relationship evidently imposes professional and moral restraints on the editor, and with good will on both sides is generally understood and accepted. Beyond this is the fact that the editor has a responsibility to the audience as well as to the author, and because he is inevitably a reader himself, he may be more sensitive than the author to the audience's concern for a clear and readable style. In most cases these interests are not really in conflict and the editor does a service to both in helping an author to put his best foot forward with clarity, point and grace.

In this view, editorial policy should encourage the editor, in preparing a manuscript for the printer after it has been accepted—except in the case of state papers such as the presidential address—to improve on the language wherever he thinks he can, to clarify and simplify, to economize on the use of words, to sharpen points, etc., saving to the author the right to see and object to changes, and the right, after argument, not to have words put into his mouth against his will. In practice the likeliest of the infrequent occasions for unreconciled disagreement in this give-and-take process arises when an author wants to employ a technical vocabulary to express what the editor believes can as accurately and more simply and understandably be said in words that are closer to common speech. No formula will settle all these differences, but a clear and readable style ranks high enough among the criteria of excellence in the REVIEW to warrant a considerable prerogative in the editor to attain it.

If a conclusion can summarize in a single sentence the points this paper has touched, perhaps it can be phrased in a reversal of Gresham's law: let the editorial policy of the REVIEW throughout be to encourage the superior to drive out the not-so-good.

TOWARD A DEFINITION OF BOOK REVIEW POLICY*

AVERY LEISERSON**

Vanderbilt University

A part-time book review editor is a sort of conscripted volunteer, and his problems resemble those of the amateur in any organized enterprise. He undergoes an educational experience in the course of which everyone hopes his mistakes will do as little harm as possible. He learns the things he can do something about and those he had better let alone, those things that have to be put in writing—when—and those things that shouldn't. Perhaps the best example of the first category is his decision to go to work; he is well advised to pick an editor-in-chief whose judgment and standards he respects implicitly, and whose idea of supervision is to create circumstances under which the book review editor can do his job better.† The second category consists largely of resisting the temptation to rewrite reviews. Apart from grammatical corrections, clarifying phraseology, and deletions based upon considerations of space, the book review editor should content himself with firm, polite reminders to reviewers, whose drafts he finds unsatisfactory, of the purpose of the review within the word limitation specified in the original invitation. This brings us to the two strategic principles upon which the B.R.E. in most cases can secure acceptance of his responsible judgment: (1) space allocation, translated into reasonable word limitations, and (2) time pressure, expressed in lead times to meet editorial deadlines. The same principles also operate to guide the B.R.E. in his correspondence; if he cannot speak his mind in one page there is apt to be something wrong with his thinking, and an administrative decision that cannot be satisfactorily stated in a public letter should probably be reconsidered.

The Concept of the Book Review Section. Pervasive and critical as it is, the space principle does not determine what proportion of pages the book reviews should bear to the total non-commercial content of the journal. In this REVIEW the percentage varies between 40 and 50, including bibliographical matter; the other journals vary downward from one-fourth to one-seventh. Explanations of this variation turn on the inclusion of bibliography, on the personal history of the editorship-in-chief, the composition of the affiliated association and sources of financial support, and the scope and audience of the journal—whether it aims at a discipline-wide content, specializes in a cross-disciplinary area or concentrates on a sub-disciplinary field.

The book review sections may emphasize one or more of three "service" functions: (1) disciplinary notice, (2) professional criticism, (3) conceptual analysis and re-formulation. Each is important; none is a substitute for, or should be confused with, original research and advancement of knowledge. Thus the book review section and book review policy must be subordinated to the requirements of the member-readers in the Association, editorial perceptions of the scope and state of the discipline, and the demands of the journal's multiple or special constituency.

National and regional political science journals in the United States tend to emphasize subject-matter coverage and professional criticism. The analytical reviews in Public Administration Review and World Politics provide an outstanding and welcome contrast. But both these journals follow an extremely discriminating policy in selecting books and they employ a format of joint reviews that approach articles of journal length. Such a policy implies the existence of other journals performing the coverage function, a special constituency, and a somewhat rare acceptance of the journal's pedagogical authority. If it be admitted that political science needs both broad coverage of single books in brief reviews and the review-essay, the two vehicles probably should not be combined in the same journal. The principal alternatives are bibliographical articles on special subjects, or periodic surveys of the literature in established sub-fields or interdisciplinary subjects in the manner of the Psychological Bulletin. Such an enterprise on any kind of comprehensive scale would require a full-time journal editor (the B.R.E. could be dispensed with), who would in turn appoint a special editor-analyst for each such study.

* Presented at a special panel at the annual meetings of the American Political Science Association, September 8, 1961.

** A former Book Review Editor of this REVIEW, and now editor of the Journal of Politics. [Man. Ed.]

† I should add that the B.R.E. is fortunate indeed, as I was, to have a predecessor who had not only systematized the procedures of the job, but knew how to "swing" the replacement into the rhythm of the journal, in the manner of the runner handling over the baton in a relay race.

Selection of Books and Criteria for Reviews. When a book review editor is in the position of choosing among many books submitted by publishers, conventional practice permits him to adopt a two-fold classification consisting of "reviews" and a list of "other books received." Within his space allocation, he may differentiate between reviews and "briefer notices." What makes a book worthy of review is a compound of (1) the fundamental character and significance of the problem attacked, (2) the quality of data, analysis and interpretation, and (3) the author's achieved status and reputation. If the workmanlike research monograph of Ph.D. caliber is visualized as the norm for briefer notices, review status may be accorded any work which has the additional qualities of philosophic universality, relevance, timeliness, analytic insight and penetration, and brilliance and originality of presentation. Fortunately or unfortunately, the B.R.E. must assign review status, designate word limits and strive to maintain a balance among the fields of the profession in advance of reading the book or the review manuscript. It is in exercising this discretion, and in the selection of reviewers, that he has whatever responsibility he enjoys of "making policy" in his own right.

In the general political science journal, "review status" means 750-1500 words; a "briefer notice" may range from 200-400 words to the lower limit of reviews; "review articles" seem to vary from 2000 words up. Each format has its merits. I should underscore the value to the reviewer, as well as to the author and the profession at large, of the two shorter review-forms, when carefully and competently rather than casually done. The criteria of excellence do not substantially differ for reviews and briefer notices. The concise, accurate statement of the author's conception of the problem, what he did and how he did it, and the reviewer's objectively technical judgment of the author's contribution—these are the criteria, not extended analysis, not elaboration of alternative perspectives and methods, above all not personalised argument over the rectitude and acceptability of the author's position. The book review section of a professional journal is important not only as the place where productive entrepreneurs receive recognition and evaluation from their colleagues for their published work. It is also a significant testing ground of the reviewer and the level of professional discussion in the discipline. If I may hazard another personal opinion, a good research man or productive writer is not necessarily a good reviewer, but I do not know a good political scientist who is not a good reviewer in the sense defined above—if he wants to be. Which brings me to the final set of considerations pertinent to a statement of policy for book review editors.

The Selection of Reviewers. The practice of review by invitation poses a nice problem of "matching" for the book review editor. There is an objective appropriateness in the relation between book and reviewer that can only be estimated in advance. Many things complicate the matching process: the busy-ness of competent reviewers, the author's legitimate expectation of reasonable timeliness, the desirability of giving young members of the profession a chance to show their mettle, and the author's sensitivities to the quality of the man chosen to appraise his precious work. Every book review editor has to rely upon his friends and acquaintances, but he cannot possibly presume to impose upon them exclusively, or even primarily, when he has to assign for review 200 books or more a year published in at least eight subject-matter specialties within political science and a number of related disciplines. So he maintains, and at every opportunity solicits suggestions for, lists of potential reviewers classified by fields of interest. Certain books and authors will be snapped up by the first invitee, but in my experience it more frequently takes two, three and sometimes four requests to secure an acceptance.

Volunteer reviewers who indicate their willingness and availability are welcome and usually prove to be helpful, but volunteers who want to review specific books must be watched carefully. This is particularly true in the case of textbooks and research studies with which the volunteer has somehow acquired a personal animus that he does not divulge to the editor. On the other side, I found a high degree of objectivity and competence among persons who were associated in an advisory or consultative capacity with complex, collaborative research enterprises; the problem there was to overcome their feelings of conflict-of-interest.

Invitation to do a job implies acceptance of the competently done manuscript, and this binds the editor as well as the contributor. A part-time editor cannot afford the time to engage in running battles or disagreements over manuscripts, and this makes the original invitation all the more important. It occasions trouble when respondents are slow in answering mail; in my impatience to secure acceptances, I would sometimes send out another invitation after two or three weeks and then find myself with two reviewers for the same book. Perhaps debatably, I always honored the original solicitation.

Young reviewers and men on the make may take comfort in the fact that their better established colleagues are frequently uninterested in doing reviews; and the sensitive editor would much prefer to have an able, conscientious review than one which is done resentfully or superficially under pressure. I can happily testify to an experience with the older members of the profession of frank, regretful refusals when they are too busy or unable to respond to a request; but this would usually be more than made up on another occasion. Political scientists are almost invariably generous and aware of their professional obligations. This is indeed the principal compensation of an unpaid book review editor, together with the satisfaction he can take in a stimulating, rewarding, improving book review section.

One last point that the book review editor should keep in mind is that the lines of communication should be kept open between reviewers and his editor-in-chief; while the latter should not be a constant source of editorial intervention in disputes between the B.R.E. and the reviewer, or the author, it is appropriate for both to have a sort of appeal to higher authority over a reviewer's opinionatedness or a book review editor's arbitrariness. The editor-in-chief's control over the "Communications" or "Views and Opinions" section provides an excellent forum of appeal, and the best thing a review editor can do is to minimize appeals of the personalised variety, and reduce the chief editor's problems in this area to limited and definable situations. In the last analysis this comes back to finding the right man to review the right books. The book review editor capable of living with these ambiguities will probably not enjoy his job too much, but he ought not to disparage himself for what he does either.

COMMUNICATIONS

TO THE EDITOR:

I must protest against some of the points that Professor John A. Armstrong saw fit to raise in his review of my A History of the Cold War (Sept. 1961). About John Foster Dulles I wrote that "from his racial background, this Dutch American, an early admirer of the Boers against England, unusually sympathetic toward Germany, brought with him an enduring small core of distrust against England." This, I believe, is a reasonable expression of well-known conditions; yet Mr. Armstrong calls it an "extreme, almost ludicrous deduction." I wrote that "Stalin's ambitions were expansive; but they were national rather than international, Russian rather than revolutionary": Mr. Armstrong calls this a "drastic oversimplification." Why "drastic"? I did not write that Stalin's ambitions were not international and not revolutionary; I wrote that they were national rather than international, Russian rather than revolutionary. Mr. Armstrong says that I accepted "the myth" that "many thousands of Russians, Ukrainians and Tatars moved spontaneously over to the Germans' side" in the early phase of the German-Russian war. The "myth" to which Mr. Armstrong refers (and I emphatically agree with him) is the current notion that millions of dissatisfied Soviet citizens deserted to the Nazis: but I said thousands, not millions. All of the preceding are quotes from my book exactly as they were cited by Mr. Armstrong in his review. I can only deduce that he has not read them well enough.

The most serious—and perhaps the only really serious—charge in Professor Armstrong's review is the assumption of my "spotty acquaintance with the mass of critical material, scholarly and memoir, on postwar events." With what materials? The memoirs of, say, Sherman Adams? The New York Times Index? Or State Department propaganda releases? Or the politico-psycho-strategical magna opera produced by the RAND Corporation, by Messrs. Kissinger, Kahn, et al.? Or the clipping calendars compiled by the Brookings Institution? Or the papers of six hundred symposia from Pugwash or Arden or from some other dear park? Professor Armstrong was generous enough to mention my "massive" and scholarly The Great Powers and Eastern Europe, a book that contained 125 pages of footnotes, a bibliography of more than a thousand entries, and a 31-page index, a book that, incidentally, sold seven hundred copies since its publication eight years ago, and from which dozens of reputable scholars have borrowed and stolen ever since. I can only presume that Professor Armstrong was set aback by the now unorthodox condition that in A History of the Cold War I put not many referential footnotes, and no bibliography at all. Nor did Macaulay. Or Tocqueville. Or Churchill.

JOHN LUKACS

Chestnut Hill and La Salle Colleges

TO THE EDITOR:

It is obvious that part of the difficulty in interpreting Professor Lukacs' work arises from his singular word usage. I am unconvinced, however, that the principal point at issue is semantic. I shall not take the space here to demonstrate further that his central interpretative theme is the dominance of national characteristics, including "racial" ones, for his insistence on interpreting Dulles' allegedly pro-German and anti-British policy by reference to his Dutch ancestry seems ample evidence on this point. But I should suggest that Professor Lukacs test the validity of this line of interpretation by applying it to that other Dutch-American, Franklin D. Roosevelt.

JOHN A. ARMSTRONG

University of Wisconsin

ON NORMS, ROLES AND FOLKWAYS

TO THE EDITOR:

Professor Donald Matthews is right to correct my interpretation of his book: I certainly would not have attributed so extreme a position to him as he has now taken in his "Communication" to this REVIEW, Vol. 55 (December, 1961), pp. 882-883. I readily concede that his "folkways" of the Senate are widely shared among senators—they are, after all, pretty much like the little rules for getting ahead which obtain in most institutionalized groups—and that going against them is not the way to popularity in the body. But I doubt very much that he has discovered all the patterns of acceptable behavior in the Senate, and I think he is mistaken to reify the Man of Accommodation as the only effective senator.

My suggestion that the "Outsider" role in the Senate is legitimate is helped by the example Matthews has mentioned of genuinely deviant behavior, prostitution. The fallen lady is and always has been stigmatized by society and usually has been subject to punishment by law. This hardly fits the situation of a Proxmire or a LaFollette in the Senate. Furthermore, when the picture of a known prostitute is hung in a public building as an outstanding example of American womanhood I will say that prostitution, too, has become a legitimate role.

As for my general argument, I am glad to let my article stand on its own. It is common knowledge in the discipline, I think, that the concepts "norm" and "role" can be defined several ways, which is why they are useful for different analytical purposes, and both have a behavioral dimension. It is common sense that a person in choosing a role may take more than one factor into account, including his own temperament.

RALPH K. HUTT

University of Wisconsin

BOOK REVIEWS, NOTES AND BIBLIOGRAPHY

REVIEWS OF BOOKS

Dahl, Who Governs? Democracy and Power in an American City. HEINZ EULAU.....	144
Newman, Recognition of Communist China? ROBERT B. STAUFFER....	145
Matthews, The Cuban Story. JAMES L. BUSEY.....	146
Kennan, Russia and The West Under Lenin and Stalin. ANDREW GYORGY	148
A Report on Social Security Programs in the Soviet Union, Prepared by the U. S. Team that Visited the U.S.S.R. Under the East-West Ex- change Program in August-September 1958. HERMAN M. SOMERS	149
Banfield, Political Influence. HARRY M. SCOBLE.....	151
Bollens, Ed., Exploring the Metropolitan Community. LEE S. GREENE..	152
Berelson, Graduate Education in the United States. LYNTON K. CALDWELL	153

BOOK NOTES AND BIBLIOGRAPHY

POLITICAL THEORY, HISTORY OF POLITICAL THOUGHT, AND METHODOLOGY	156
AMERICAN GOVERNMENT AND POLITICS.....	172
FOREIGN AND COMPARATIVE GOVERNMENT.....	191
INTERNATIONAL POLITICS, LAW AND ORGANIZATION.....	208
OTHER BOOKS RECEIVED.....	225

BOOK REVIEWS

Who Governs? Democracy and Power in an American City. BY ROBERT A. DAHL. (New Haven and London: Yale University Press, 1961. Pp. vii, 355. $7.50.)

One is tempted, on first thought, to locate Professor Dahl's research on New Haven's influence structures and processes in the polemical context of other community studies—from the Lynds' Middletown through Warner's Yankee City and Jonesville to Hunter's Regional City and beyond. At least it is not far-fetched to predict that some reviewers will appraise this book in just that context. And I have no doubt that the book will join the classical community studies as a classic in its own right. But as Professor Dahl himself hardly touches on the possible comparisons with other community studies which could be made (though we know, from some of his other writings and those of his associates, that he is quite self-conscious about it), I shall resist the temptation of dwelling on the obvious. For doing so, it seems to me, would only detract from what I feel is the central importance of the book. This is the problem of the relationship between the findings of empirical research on political behavior and the theory of democracy.

Some years ago, the authors of a well-known study of voting behavior, on reviewing their findings, came to the shocking conclusion—shocking, at least, to them—that not all was well with democratic theory. It is easy, from the vantage point of hindsight, to charge them with naivete. But for decades it has been fashionable to blame the practices of democratic politics rather than the theory of democracy for what were more or less vaguely felt as lasting shortcomings, and to accept what one could not do much about as a kind of price for the luxury of indulging one's fantasies about an unperturbed democratic system as it might exist in a Platonic heaven.

On the other hand, the relationship between political theory and the facts of political life is such that, if one does not wish to blame the facts, one may easily tailor one's theory to fit the facts. Conservative thought and, indeed, some empirical formulations of politics in equilibrium terms, come at times close to doing just that. I don't think, and I'm at last coming back to the book under review here, that Professor Dahl can be accused of either the normative or the naturalistic fallacy. He has left, in the last ten years, a too clearly discernible and distinguished trail of his theoretical journey. If the journey ends, for the time being, in New Haven, it is, in part, because that is Professor Dahl's home town, a convenient real-life setting for testing or at least demonstrating some of his propositions about the political process in a pluralist democracy. The choice of New Haven as a research site, or the contribution the book makes to community research, seem to me rather secondary considerations. Any other research site or situation might have served equally well what I sense to be the book's critical objective.

In the present stage of behavioral research, on the one hand, and development of political theory on the other hand, neither can be allowed to become a strait jacket for the other. Professor Dahl successfully avoids falling into this trap. He presents not only a series of proofs which, of course, require theoretical stability, but also a series of fresh hypotheses, especially regarding the twin problem of stability and change and the problem of democratic consensus. In other words, Professor Dahl's empiricism is not a cul-de-sac of specious objectivity. I say this because my own inclination, unlike Professor Dahl's, would be to withhold certain speculations, no matter how empirically relevant, from the public gaze until more evidence is in. But this, I suspect, is more a matter of temperament than of methodological etiquette.

Professor Dahl's approach in studying the politics of influence in a pluralistic system with, in his own words, noncumulative or dispersed inequalities, is as plural as the political order he investigates. Three broad research strategies serve his purposes. First, a historical analysis of the transformations of New Haven's ruling groups. Second, case analyses of three arenas of policy-making—party nominations to public office, urban redevelopment, and public education. And third, a cross-sectional analysis of the distribution of resources among New Haven's citizenry. This cutting into the research pie from quite different angles is dictated by Professor Dahl's complex model of the democratic order in a competitive environment—a political system in which the politics of influence is not a zero-sum game, but a function of highly fragmented patterns of more or less direct influence, of reciprocal relations between leaders, sub-leaders and constituents, of shifting coalitions and bargaining between more or less overlapping networks of influentials who specialize in different issue areas, of varying structures of influence such as "executive-centered coalition" or "rival sovereignties," and of different and unequal distributions of those resources whose successful mobilization is the task of politics. As a result, Professor Dahl manages to escape, on the one hand, the fallacious conception which confuses the bases of influence with its scope, and, on the other hand, the equally fallacious notion that, because influence has been exerted, it is, of necessity, an all-pervasive and unified phenomenon. On the contrary, Professor Dahl shows that influence can be fragmented, both with regard to control over resources and with regard to issues, and yet can be mobilized, under certain conditions, for effective decision-making in a plural-democratic order.

With its broad-gauged theory, but middle-range empiricism, Professor Dahl's book is more than just another community study. It is a sophisticated and undogmatic treatise on democratic politics. Only in the concluding chapter does Professor Dahl take the role of the pundit who, with authority but usually with less supportive data than Professor Dahl commands, speaks about power elites, mass democracy or countervailing powers. And so we hear about the political stratum and the ordinary citizen. But fortunately, Professor Dahl is aware of the pitfalls of empirical generalization. Speaking of the function of beliefs in the engineering of consensus—"a recurring process of interchange among political professionals, the political stratum, and the great bulk of the population"—Professor Dahl is quick to point out that consensus is not a static and unchanging attribute, but "a variable element in a complex and more or less continuous process."

This, then, is a book in political science, more than a book about local politics in an American city, which no political scientist, whatever his area of specialization—international, comparative or domestic—can afford to miss. Because of its generic character, it is rather unfortunate—and I don't want to sound stuffy—that the book's index is so unsatisfactory. Some of Professor Dahl's most interesting concepts and usages have been omitted.

HEINZ EULAU

Stanford University

Recognition of Communist China? By ROBERT P. NEWMAN. (New York: The Macmillan Company, 1961. Pp. ix, 318. Cloth, $4.95; paper, $1.95.)

During the winter of 1954-1955, college debate teams throughout the United States had assigned to them the subject: "Should the United States Recognize Communist China?" The topic was obviously a rather foolhardy choice considering the recent military clash between armies of the two nations in Korea, and the temper of domestic politics. At that juncture in time, the subject of recognition of Communist China was not "debatable" in the United States. That it was not was illustrated even within the forensic fraternity: West Point, Annapolis, the other Service academies and a number of Roman Catholic colleges refused to permit their teams to debate the topic.

We can, however, be thankful for the brashness of those who, in 1954, chose the highly controversial theme, since the debate began the involvement of speech professor Robert P. Newman in the subject of United States' recognition policy toward the Chinese People's Republic. Seven years later we have his book on the subject; it is an excellent contribution to the continuing debate.

The merits of the book are many. By breaking the argument down into a number of subdivisions, and by ordering the great mass of data around these points, he makes it possible for rational processes to begin to operate again on this emotion-laden question. In his presentation of the material he is careful to let the protagonists speak for themselves, although his skill in weaving the quoted evidence together overcomes what might well have been a major handicap to readability. Furthermore, it is obvious that a high sense of moral purpose guides his research and writing. Because he sets such high standards for himself, he is distressed when he finds that others do not always follow equally puritanical codes. For example, he is concerned that the late John Foster Dulles seemingly repudiated an early pro-recognition stand as the price for the position as Secretary of State. And Newman, discussing the 1957 edition of Dulles' War or Peace, comments: "His facility for incorporating two irreconcilable positions [on recognition of Communist China] within the covers of one and the same book is indeed amazing."

It is in the statements of top State Department personnel that the author finds the greatest degree of biased argument. He makes note of the complete absence of any reference in State Department publications to the highly probable beneficial effects of United States' recognition of Communist China on our relations with a number of nations such as Japan, Great Britain, New Zealand, Denmark, Norway, etc., as well as on neutral nations. He carefully compares the legal arguments made during the Eisenhower Administration by such officials as Walter S. Robertson and Walter P. McCaughy with all the recognized authorities on the subject of recognition and concludes that the Department of State has "attempted to apply wholly spurious criteria to recognition." That partisanship is not behind this analysis is suggested by his recalling that it was during the Truman Administration that the Assistant Secretary of State for Far Eastern Affairs, Dean Rusk, on May 18, 1951, made public the nonrecognition policy for the first time, and developed many of the arguments that were to become the stock in trade of the Department for the next decade. Furthermore, Newman points out that in 1961 Dean Rusk, as the new Secretary of State, supported the nonrecognition policy with the argument that "recognition of Red China would require abandonment of the National Chinese government of Chiang Kai-shek," an argument that, by implying more than it says, becomes a distortion of reality. Recognition of Communist China would, of course, mean giving up support of Chiang's claims to being the government of mainland China; it would not mean abandoning Chiang and his regime on Taiwan.

The substantive conclusions reached fall under three clusters of questions relating to different phases of the argument on recognition. These are grouped under the headings: (1) moral issues; (2) political issues; and (3) issues of law. Space does not permit a detailed review of the fifteen questions into which these three are broken. However, a brief summary might at least be suggestive of Newman's approach.

He analyzes the moral arguments under, first, the comparative merit of the two rival regimes; secondly, the question of America's word of honor, involved as it is through our pledges to the Nationalist regime; and lastly, the broad matter of support for the rule of law. He decides that on the first, Nationalist China has a slight edge, on the last that the rule of law would be supported by recognition, and that the issue of honor breaks about evenly. He concludes that the moral arguments may be interpreted to support continued nonrecognition but by such a narrow margin as to be inconclusive.

The second group of issues, the political, comprises the largest of the three with some eleven different arguments analyzed. On four Newman finds that the evidence is clearly in favor of recognition. These are: to improve communication and negotiation; to improve our stature and influence in world affairs; to avoid defeat on the representation of China issue in the United Nations; and to face political reality by not continuing to view Communist China as a passing phenomenon. On another four he concludes that the arguments support a moderate pro-recognition stand. These include the need to convince the rest of the world that we are not sabotaging a possible disarmament agreement; to bring China into the world network of international organizations; to expand trade; and to put mainland China on the spot for being the one that is guilty of preventing a normalization of relations in the Far East. This last would result from China's likely rejection of any United States' unilateral recognition offer. And lastly, the author finds that on three other political issues the evidence is not clear-cut. The three indecisive issues are: the effect on our Asian allies; the possibility that recognition might increase subversive activities in Southeast Asia; and the impact on Soviet-Chinese relations.

In reviewing the conclusions on the final set of issues, those of law, the author's words succinctly summarize his findings: "Both the force of American precedent and the requirements of international law support recognition of any government with effective and reasonably permanent control of its territory—and this does include Communist China."

On the basis of the strong pro-recognition conclusions to the political and legal sets of questions, and the near-split on the moral, the author concludes his exercise in the rational analysis of political argument with a strong recommendation for United States' recognition of the Communist Government of China, adding, "with or without a guarantee of reciprocity, with or without agreement on Peking's part to renounce all claim to sovereignty over Taiwan."

I find myself in complete agreement with the author. He has done a superb job of presenting all salient aspects of a tough, and politically touchy, problem in our foreign and domestic politics. I doubt, however, if the American public is much closer to accepting his conclusions today than it was to listening to the collegiate debaters in 1954.

ROBERT B. STAUFFER

University of Hawaii

The Cuban Story. By HERBERT L. MATTHEWS. (New York: George Braziller, Inc., 1961. Pp. 318. $4.50.)

This is a book-length news story and editorial, written in both haste and heat, about a series of events for which Mr. Matthews of the New York Times conceives an exaggerated personal responsibility. The Cuban Story, or rather the Cuba-Matthews-Castro story, opens with the author's famed interview with the elusive Fidel, on February 17, 1957. It does not follow from the achievement of this notable scoop that one must agree with all the journalist's interpretations of subsequent Cuban developments; or even that the people (such as this reviewer) who sensed before Matthews did that the Communists were moving in on fidelismo, were all "at best naïve and at worst fools, simpletons, or knaves."

Though Matthews covers the critics of fidelismo with purple invective and fugitive innuendo, he never does really come to precise grips with detailed, critical reports that were available to him when he wrote the book—such, for example, as the Draper studies, to which Matthews makes isolated references where they suit his purposes. Except for a devious and labored argument that seems to say that democratic Latin American reformist leaders are afraid of losing prestige to fidelista movements, Matthews never offers a substantive answer to the criticisms of notable former Castro supporters such as José Figueres, Rómulo Betancourt, and Luis Muñoz Marín.

The political scientist or historian may agree with journalist Matthews that on January 1, 1959, the fidelista revolution was not Communist, and was not hecha en Moscú; or that in many blundering ways before 1959, U. S. conduct in Cuba made it inevitable that the republic would undergo a wave of anti-gringoism. One may warmly endorse the author's plea for greater U. S. awareness and understanding of the bursting social revolution in this hemisphere. The political scientist may take only mild exception to the Matthews view that the fidelistas turned to totalitarian socialism as late as summer or autumn of 1960, or even to the threadbare argument that Fidel was somehow "forced" into the Communist sphere by mistakes committed by the United States after the revolution.

On two other counts that are more profound, many political scientists are likely to part company with Herbert L. Matthews.

First, despite all his years on a great newspaper, Matthews never seems to grasp the nature of the deep conflict that now engulfs the U.S.A. and the U.S.S.R., and the rôle of the Cuban forward position of the U.S.S.R. in that conflict. At one point late in the book, the author confesses that if it should turn out that the Cuban regime is "actively playing a rôle on the side of the Sino-Soviet bloc against the United States," then the fidelista government "will have to be destroyed." But this, like many similar contradictory statements whereby the author may hedge against his critics, is totally out of character with the dominant motif of the book. The treatment of the U. S.-Cuba question goes rather in this style: (1) Cuba is not yet Communist, (2) acceptance of Communism by Cuba need not mean its participation in the Sino-Soviet bloc, (3) in any event it is not yet in the Sino-Soviet bloc, (4) even if it were, we should be able to live with it, (5) if we interfere, it might cause a holocaust, and (6) there is no point in interfering because the Soviet leaders wouldn't fight a war over a region so far from the U.S.S.R. In response to this bewildering argument, political scientists might have something to say about the implications and goals of competition between two behemoths in a world of bipolarized power; and logicians might wish to add a few words about internal coherence and about arguing from the conclusion to the premises.

Secondly, it is startling that Matthews, of all people, reveals no comprehension of the meaning of the age-old struggle between liberty and tyranny. The journalist presents Fidel's self-righteousness and messianism almost as though they were virtues. Even Castro's interminable speeches are "effective, clearly reasoned, interesting, and well organized." There are the inevitable brief allusions to certain defects, which a determined defender of Matthews might twist out of context as evidence the journalist is really quite anti-Castro; but these run contrary to the prevailing message: Fidel is a prophet, fidelismo is the wave of the future, we'd better adjust ourselves to the facts of life, and the facts of life are not so bad anyhow.

No anti-democratic practice of the regime is so revolting as to be unworthy of Matthews' praise or at least his apology. He can even find something good to say for the 30-year imprisonment of Huber Matos, and for the executions ("By revolutionary standards, this has not been a sanguinary affair."). It is central to Matthews' theme that Cuba is undergoing a "real revolution"; that a revolution "is not a tea party"; and that a social revolution cannot tolerate either elections or liberty. The author repeatedly assures us that Cubans are not Anglo-Saxons, and cannot take one hundred years (as it allegedly took us) to bring their revolution to fruition—as though it takes a century to create a multitude of independent proprietors or to organize an election. The meaning of the recent pamphlet, No hay revolución sin libertad, by Costa Rican left-wing political leader Luis Alberto Monge, would be lost on today's Herbert L. Matthews. As in Greek tragedy, there is here a distressing flaw.

It is the flaw whereby a sympathy for despotism as a means to attain their goals throws certain great liberals into the same camp with the most tyrannically minded reactionaries.

The truth is that there is ample evidence on every continent that distribution of the economic, social and political instrumentalities of power, and creation of a pluralist society, is not just a Yankee gadget, is applicable everywhere, and must be the primordial beginning point for the fruition of any popular social revolution. In fact, it can be argued that until the day comes when Cuba, and much of the rest of the world including Russia and China, have undergone their revolutions against feudalism-collectivism and for the individual liberation of man from the chains of monolithic political and economic power, they will not have had any revolutions at all. One hopes the great journalists of the world will help to hasten that day by catching up on their homework.

JAMES L. BUSEY

University of Colorado

Russia and The West Under Lenin and Stalin.

By GEORGE F. KENNAN. (Boston: Little, Brown and Company, 1960, 1961. Pp. x, 411. $5.75.)

Originally prepared as a series of illuminating lectures delivered at Oxford University in 1957-58 and at Harvard University in the spring of 1960, George Kennan's book brilliantly combines the best of two worlds. In the depth of its scholarship it clearly reflects the author's association with the Institute for Advanced Study, while in its more informal asides and colorful personal recollections it convincingly portrays Ambassador Kennan's long and significant diplomatic service. The reviewer is indeed struck by the steadily recurring dichotomy of this valuable book. One sector of it is based on a scholarly investigation of the nature and limits of Soviet totalitarian government under Lenin and Stalin as projected into the complex domestic and foreign relations of the Russian state, while the other presents a series of lively profiles of the leading figures of the last four decades of world politics. In effect, these beautifully drawn personality portraits lend the book a liveliness and vividness most unusual in the world of the historian's scholarship. As the dramatic narrative progresses from one of these historic vignettes to the next, the absorbed reader is reminded of William Shirer's Rise and Fall of the Third Reich which pursues—although on a far different and considerably more popularized level—a similar approach to the intricacies of contemporary international relations.

Kennan's discursive method reflects the author's original intent: to present the 1917 to 1945 period of Soviet development in the form of a series of loosely and leisurely organized lectures, each devoted to a narrow central theme while indirectly also dealing with a broader world political setting. The lecture form itself then implies a great deal of summarizing, a certain amount of repetitiousness and colloquial asides which have been conspicuously absent from Kennan's other writings. A delightful sense of informality pervades this important work and guarantees in advance a long and healthy tenure on the national non-fiction best-seller list.

The book is divided into twenty-five chapters of which the first fifteen concentrate on the Leninist period, with the sixteenth (a most sophisticated essay on the importance and relevance of Great Britain as a continuing "Soviet target") serving as a transition-link between Lenin and his successor. The next eight chapters offer a scintillating insight into the operational details and political structure of Stalin's regime. The final lecture ("Keeping a World Intact") is frankly a puzzler since it so openly conflicts with Kennan's entire philosophy as lucidly expressed throughout his work. Maybe the cautious historian has yielded his place here to the exuberant diplomat turned voyeur, an uninhibited forecaster of future trends in the development of Soviet-American relations. Throughout his lectures Kennan firmly stressed his inner conviction that despite their multiple acts of recognition, business talks and endless political conversations, the leaders of the Soviet Union were firmly and inflexibly devoted to the total ultimate destruction of the capitalist world and to the final and complete victory of Communism. Yet here we are suddenly reminded that what the author has patiently described in previous chapters was merely "the eras of Lenin and of Stalin, and not that of Khrushchev," and that the differences between these periods of Russian history are both relevant and fundamental. Suddenly, and for no obvious reason, the Soviet regime's basic assumptions and strategic expectations seem to have altered with major consequences for American diplomacy and for our national posture. We must give up our previous, Stalin-based preconceptions and prejudices vis-à-vis today's Soviet Union and compare instead our present relationship to the Soviet leadership with "the national level of recalcitrance, of sheer orneriness and unreasonableness, which we encounter in the behavior of states anywhere." (Italics mine.)

While this conclusion might be tenable in the context of a different type of analytical treatment, it is unacceptable as a prescription for conflict-resolution after the systematic and lengthy theorizing to-the-contrary in the previous twenty-four chapters (or lectures).

This concluding "sermon" cannot detract, however, from the overall merit of the historic gems which punctuate Russia and the West Under Lenin and Stalin. This reviewer was particularly impressed by the scope and sweep of "The Siberian Intervention" (Chapter 7) including the vivid story of the Czechoslovak Corps or Legion; by the gripping and colorful vignette on Stalin ("Stalin as a Statesman," Chapter 17) forcefully applied to the murky and mysterious Sino-Soviet relationships ("Stalin and China," Chapter 18) and by the original—and occasionally debatable—analysis of the Soviet-German "Nonaggression Pact" (Chapter 21). But while one may take exception to Kennan's portrayal of Hitler, and future historians are bound to disagree with some of his value-judgments, no one could perform a more scintillating piece of diplomatic surgery (or postmortem) on the anatomy of the Hitler-Stalin pact. "The ultimate aims of Stalin's Russia were contrary to the wartime purposes of both the great warring parties in the West. Hitler, with his brutal realism, recognized this, and was reconciled from the start to the instability of the German-Soviet relationship—to the fact that there would soon come a day when it would have served its purpose and would have to end."

ANDREW GYORGY

Boston University

A Report on Social Security Programs in the Soviet Union. Prepared by the U. S. Team that Visited the U.S.S.R. Under the East-West Exchange Program in August-September 1958. U. S. Department of Health, Education, and Welfare. (Washington: Government Printing Office, 1961. Pp. 157. $1.00.)

Social security programs have now become important institutions in all but the least developed nations of the world, despite widely varying political and economic systems. The underdeveloped nations are also expressing intense interest in the programs of the more advanced countries. They look upon the extent and quality of a nation's social welfare institutions as one significant measure of its character.

As our own social security system matures and faces increasingly difficult decisions, it becomes more important to have specific knowledge of systems elsewhere. Relatively little of a detailed nature has been known in this country regarding these vital institutions behind the iron curtain. We have cause for gratitude that an agreement between the Department of State and Soviet officials under the East-West Exchange Program made possible a visit to the Soviet Union by a team of U. S. social security experts for an intensive 30-day on-the-spot investigation of the U.S.S.R. system. The resulting Report is correct in its claim that it constitutes "the most complete statement of certain aspects of the social security system of the U.S.S.R. in the English language." Moreover, the extraordinary talents of our investigating team, made up of five high officials of the Social Security Administration, resulted in an unusually sophisticated and pertinent inquiry.

Although the authors point out that the different economic and political conditions of the U.S.S.R. require a social security system different from ours, this reader found the similarities remarkably striking. The basic problems of income maintenance against the hazards of old-age, death, disability, illness, and unemployment are universal. The response to these problems in industrial societies does not appear to vary very greatly and the methods available for dealing with them are not limitless.

The Report makes clear that the material needs of families in the U.S.S.R. are being planned for and met through a widely developed and extensive social security system which is uniform throughout the 15 republics. The cash benefit programs cover a broader range than our public programs. They include: sickness benefits, with no waiting period and no limit on duration, at 50-90 percent of most recent earnings; maternity benefits for a 16-week period at 100 percent of pay; industrial injury and disease benefits at full pay; family allowances for children in large families and for unmarried mothers at relatively low levels; retirement pensions which average about 65-70 percent of past earnings; disability pensions which are graded by degree of disability; survivorship benefits which are similar in amount to disability pensions.

There is no program of unemployment benefits on the theory that there is no unemployment in the U.S.S.R. On the whole a condition of full employment does exist, but there are of course inescapable episodes of frictional and structural unemployment, and less formalized means are available for providing for people temporarily out of work.

The national system is largely concentrated on urban dwellers. Most peasants—those who live on collective farms and constitute about 40 percent of the labor force—are outside the basic system, although collective farmers and their families have the same provisions for medical care and for family allowances as the remainder of the population. In addition, modest benefits are provided through mutual benefit societies established at each collective farm.

Because public medical care programs are administered by the Ministry of Health rather than by the Ministry of Social Security, the study team did not investigate those programs. This results in a significant gap in the picture furnished by the Report as medical care is basic to judging the adequacy and balance of many other social security provisions. For example, it does not appear possible to measure the value of retirement benefits for the aged without reference to the costs of medical care which they are expected to shoulder.

Among the findings which the study team regards as especially noteworthy for the United States are: 1) the idealization of productive work on the part of every individual capable of working has resulted in development of programs and techniques for employing the aged, the physically handicapped, and many others unable to perform in competition with more able-bodied workers. 2) Emphasis on research in disability and welfare programs is apparently yielding results in making such people more nearly self-supporting. Research in social security has been accepted by Soviet officials as essential for effective and economical administration. 3) Despite political and economic centralization in Moscow, there is substantial decentralization of administrative authority and responsibility although not of policy. 4) Research institutes are engaged in developing guides for physicians and medical examining commissions for determination of disability for purposes of eligibility to social security benefits. "This is an area of scientific endeavor which is of considerable importance to disability insurance programs in all countries."

5) Experience recently convinced the Soviets of the necessity for instituting a retirement test for receipt of old age pensions. This has been fundamental from the beginning in the United States program, but there has been increasing pressure here to abandon it and it has been generally liberalized and completely removed for persons 72 and over. It is doubtful that many advocates here have considered the additional costs which a removal of the retirement test would incur. Soviet authorities found it too expensive and "stated that a more equitable distribution of funds could result if fully employed persons did not have a full pension in addition to their wages."

This reader was also impressed by the fact that benefits under the Soviet system are, like ours, based upon individual past earnings. They are, like ours, generally weighted so that those with low earnings receive relatively higher benefits. Although pensions are available at lower ages—60 for men and 55 for women, reflecting the different age structure of the Soviet population—the average retirement age is between three and four years above the statutory minimum age, which is similar to our experience.

Unlike ours, financing of the entire Soviet programs is non-contributory for the workers, being entirely paid for by contributions of the employing enterprise and the government. All sickness and disability programs are related to encouraging recovery and job adjustment and reemployment where necessary. In such programs there is administrative concern with the quality and relevance of medical care, not frequently enough the case in this country. Unlike this country, the system is in part used to furnish incentives to direct people to occupations in which the government wants them.

The Report is both fact-filled and analytical. Social security is thoughtfully related to other economic and social conditions such as wages, hours and working conditions, including some data which the reviewer has not encountered in other sources. The authors not only evince a high regard for accuracy and thoroughness but attempt to be scrupulously fair. They point out that the system is highly regarded by the Soviet people and that it is "well administered with a genuine concern for the people's material welfare on the part of the social security officials." There are, however, places where the authors give way to a tendency to compare the general run of benefits under the Soviet programs with the very best available in this country. The total picture is creditable in comparison with most western countries and would have been even more impressive had medical benefits not been omitted.

The great value of this Report suggests that it would be profitable to our general understanding of comparative government if we had more explorations of the detailed experience of specific operating programs in many countries. The realities of comparative public policy and public administration will not become clear without them. This report can be studied with benefit by students of comparative administration, government, economics and social welfare not only for its information but as a model for competent inquiry.

HERMAN M. SOMERS

Haverford College

Political Influence. BY EDWARD C. BANFIELD.
(Glencoe: The Free Press, 1961. Pp. vi, 354.
$6.00.)

Professor Banfield's book examines political influence in the "Second City." His treatment is undertaken on three levels. The first section comprises descriptive narratives of six controversies in Chicago: the effort to build a branch of the County Hospital (unsuccessful); the absorption of the city Welfare Department by the County Welfare Department; the attempt to gain state subsidization of the Chicago Transit Authority (unsuccessful); the Fort Dearborn Project to revitalize the central business district (unsuccessful); the effort to establish a Chicago campus of the University of Illinois (also unsuccessful); and the building of an Exhibition Hall. Banfield then devotes his second section to generalizing from the case studies to the structure, process, and mythology of influence; and in his third he attempts a general model of power and coordination in metropolitan politics and a normative evaluation of how the present system now serves the public interest vis-à-vis alternative structures.

In reviewing this work, I should like to examine four problems. First, Banfield genuflects to the cry popular among us all for "systematic comparative analysis." At the minimum this would seem to require that each researcher self-consciously articulate his research design. But the reader here is left uninformed as to the criteria for defining the universe of controversies "of city-wide or more than city-wide importance" or as to what is left out and why when one has only "virtually a 100 percent sample." On a different level, three of the controversies, and perhaps a fourth, are site controversies. Does this mean the disputes as to land-use provide the unifying focus of metropolitan politics in Chicago? Does it mean that site-questions constitute a phase in the life-cycle of political issues, a new potential veto point to which initially defeated opponents inevitably retire? Alternatively, if land-use disputes are the stuff of influence attempts in Chicago, then this cries out for further inquiry. Why doesn't the social structure of the city give rise to disputes based on ethnic, religious, class, generational, etc., conflict? If we are to work toward comparative analysis, then we must begin to sort out and tentatively rank independent and intervening variables. Is the incidence of higher formal education, of blue-collar jobs, etc., different in Chicago from that in other major American cities? If not, then does the political structure operate as an intervening variable to depoliticize identifications and demands that elsewhere become highly politicized? What is—what are—the possible relation(s) between political structure and social structure? This is not something the author does not concern himself with: Banfield at several points draws attention to the impressive strength of the Democratic machine in Chicago and explicitly contrasts this with New York. Why has the machine persisted in Chicago? Where are we going to place our bets?

A second question arises concerning the use of role theory. If role is position and positions have occupants, then doesn't systematic comparative analysis require inventories or samples of alternative role occupants? For example, the civic leaders in Chicago are characterized as overwhelmingly Republican in national politics yet inactive in local Republican politics. Why? And what about national Democrats or local Republican activists? Why are they so? Are there functional (sub-role?) consequences? Alternatively, are these civic leaders high stationary or upwardly mobile? Do factional alignments exist among them on local issues? Are they to be characterized by a political ideology with content, cohesion, and dominance in the system? We learn little in response to such questions. Perhaps this is a consequence of the author's studiously non-statistical approach; but a cost of this apparent choice is the high risk of drowning one's reader in the welter of discrete names, places, dates that make up case study narratives.

This lack of statistics is associated with what I see as a third problem. In his chapter on the mythology of influence, Banfield does not hesitate to attribute a concrete view of the power structure to Chicagoans. Yet he employed no survey instrument, no adult sample. If he is generalizing from the informal interviews with the civic leaders et al. then I suspect it would be more useful for us to determine not (a) that most or many hold a monolithic image in their minds but (b) that differences in power images are (or are not) associated with different roles, different kinds of power, differing degrees of influence. But this requires more systematic data-gathering and analysis.

As it is, Banfield imposes an interpretation upon his data without providing us with much for assisting independent judgment as to whether they bear such burden. He informs us that civic controversy in Chicago arises out of the survival needs of large formal organizations—and not from group interests (among other causes rejected); yet the examples given seem to this reviewer to fit entirely within the group approach, and I think we ought not to become intrigued with terminological distinctions unless the advocate can demonstrate some net increment in understanding or research utility. In this same light, Banfield generalizes a business-transaction model. Whether this model is useful will be proven in the marketplace of future research proposals; whether it is different—except in terminology—will be evident to those familiar with the political economists' control-process models of hierarchy, polyarchy, bargaining, and price system.

Other readers undoubtedly will discern different virtues and faults. But there will be other readers, I am sure, because the book comes as a welcome addition to the meager, and far less satisfactory, literature on urban and especially metropolitan politics. The questions are raised precisely in the hope that more political scientists will follow in Banfield's pioneering attempt, for Banfield has torn our attention away from the navel of small towns and has also correctly avoided the sociological approach to community power structure associated with Floyd Hunter. But in reaction to what might now be accorded a decent death, there is a danger that we draw back too far from useful tools of other social sciences.

HARRY M. SCOBLE

University of Wisconsin

Exploring the Metropolitan Community. EDITED BY JOHN C. BOLLENS. Contributors: John C. Bollens, Scott Greer, Werner Z. Hirsch, Carl A. McCandless, Henry J. Schmandt. (Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1961. Pp. xvii, 492. $7.50.)

The metropolitan area, variously defined in detail, but presenting a reasonably clear concept to most social scientists, has become the focus of a considerable body of study in the past few years, an expansion of an already sufficiently formidable literature. Many of these studies and their reports have been oriented towards reform (a matter which is somehow suspect and distasteful to many members of the political science profession). Some have been entirely informative or diagnostic. This present volume is one of the products of the widely known and intensive study of the St. Louis area, which attempted to combine with an action and reform-oriented program a careful and detailed analysis of certain economic features of the area, an examination of the opinion climate, and the measurement of local governmental services. Surveys in other cities have resulted in recent reports of similar character based on areas such as those of Cleveland and New York.

The Ford Foundation was the major angel of the St. Louis study, which was conducted jointly by Washington and St. Louis Universities, under the immediate direction of Professors Thomas H. Eliot and Paul Steinbicker. The full-time staff of the survey was directed by John C. Bollens. The contributors to the present volume are noted above.

Discussion of the governmental setting in the St. Louis area provides no surprises. This survey went further than some do in providing information on the economic and business background of the area. The "government and politics" portions of this section of the book show a heavy emphasis on governmental structure and distribution of services, with some material on the extra-legal political devices—party, pressure, and opinion organs—which supposedly animate the governmental machine. Critics of conventional metropolitan surveys, who have been numerous and vocal (often unnecessarily so) have been insistent in their clamor for going back of the formal machine. The St. Louis study meets these demands, but, I think, not completely. Perhaps it is most productive in its examination of participation and attitudes. In Part I the following quotation, in view of the emerging dogma of some critics, seems to me especially significant:

Attempts at structural reorganization in a metropolitan community are frequently met with the argument that government must be kept close to the people. Those who advance this position maintain that small units of government stimulate the interest of the people and provide them with the opportunity to participate actively in the affairs of their local community.

If it is true that small governments foster a high degree of political action, widespread grass-roots opposition might be expected to any movement designed to lessen local autonomy. The viability of this principle, in other words, would act as a severe check on governmental coordination and make more difficult the functioning of a metropolitan area. Several studies made by the Survey, however, raise serious doubts about the validity of the belief that small political units constitute the best means of keeping government in the control of the people. In fact, these studies indicate that the "small government" argument is in many respects a myth. [Pp. 86, 87.]

The reform proposals which came out of the survey were, on the whole, fairly conventional. This is no surprise and no criticism. The structural options available for local government are limited in number. The Survey decided to recommend the creation of a multipurpose metropolitan district. In effect this is the federal plan which has become a sort of rainbow shining through the rain of "metro" reports. With the example of some federations and many proposals (a recent report on rearranging the London federation follows this same line) before my eyes, I cannot summon much conviction of the viability of the federal approach in local affairs. It does have the merit of acceptability, for it seems to preserve local institutions (and this acceptability was acknowledged to be a strong persuader for the St. Louis Survey), but it seems to me to be an illusion. If an effective centralization develops, significant functions cannot be left to component units and I cannot see how the normal citizen can be heavily involved in insignificant functions. If we really think that political participation is closely connected with size (which seems to be doubtful or, at least, not proven) then we ought to live in villages. We can see the St. Louis Survey itself involved in the transfer of important matters to the central agency in the proposed federation at the point of planning and zoning—a fundamental point. If you are to have coordination, the really significant choices can't be decentralized. What remains is pap.

The attempt of the Survey to preserve local autonomy while still upgrading performance became, in my judgment, most strained when a scheme was created to establish minimum service levels which would be enforced by such means as tax rebates. This all seems to me excessively complicated. Establishing a minimum standard would be a difficult matter. The whole scheme would provide a happy hunting ground for the manipulator and the pressure group. And to what end? We already have enough of this sort of thing in federal-state and state-local arrangements.

Part Three of the volume is entitled Citizen Participation and Attitudes. Appendix C describes the methodology of the sample survey employed to secure data used in the report. This appendix should be very useful to students, as is indeed true of other appendices. I am in no position to quarrel with the findings of the Survey on citizen activities and attitudes. In seeking this material the Survey is in line with the practices recommended by students of metropolitan problems. I cannot entirely suppress doubts in my own mind whether the findings justify the expenditures required to secure them. For example, the report notes that "awareness of metropolitan problems should increase with social rank, and it does." Does this contribute significantly to our existing knowledge? Does it help in formulating recommendations? It is true, certainly, that general knowledge would not permit us to predict all the conclusions which the Survey reached. For example, "Older persons are more likely to prefer merger in both areas, but particularly in the County; younger persons are more likely to prefer status quo only in the City." Are such generalities really useful? Can they have any effect on the action program? If not, can they serve the purpose of contributing to a general knowledge of voting behavior? I suppose we have no certain answer to this question. The Survey faced the same problems as many other voting surveys. We can all hope that careful study of and long familiarity with material of this type may permit scholars to reach some general conclusions, but anxiety on this score persists.

Part Four is devoted to Measurement and Economic Studies. Again, the methodology of the Survey is detailed in a way which should be useful to students. Generally I believe the findings will not be surprising to persons familiar with municipal affairs, but the Survey performs a service in pinning certain matters down. No major economies are visible as the result of scale of operation, which will give aid and comfort to the anti-efficiency theorists. (Many metropolitan reformers are, of course, not troubled by this, but wish to shift the burden of costs.) That wealthy areas can and do spend more and that "the expenditures of some communities are low because they cannot afford more" is surely to be expected. Perhaps the real question is the ethical one: what should be done about the community that can't afford more?

The Survey wrestled with the very elusive problem of measuring local services. Standards in this field are likely to be highly subjective, but not much fault can be found, I think, with the Survey's approach and again some useful, although not unusual, conclusions were reached.

LEE S. GREENE

The University of Tennessee

Graduate Education in the United States. By BERNARD BERELSON. (New York: McGraw-Hill Book Company, 1960. Pp. vi, 346. $6.95.)

Berelson's study (one of the Carnegie Series in American Education) is as thorough and systematic a general study of graduate education in the United States as has yet appeared.

The book is divided into three parts and a comprehensive appendix. Part One deals with the historical background of graduate education in the United States. Part Two deals with the present and is subdivided into chapters dealing with the purposes of graduate education, with institutions, students and programs. Part Three consists of conclusions, commentary and recommendations.

The Appendix includes a classified bibliography and data descriptive of the methods used in the study. Among these data are descriptions of the actual studies undertaken, samples of questionnaires, responses to criticisms and reforms of graduate education and a list of consultants from the various academic and professional disciplines. The author has thus provided the reader with some basis for testing the validity of the observations and conclusions.

The author has also been careful to discriminate between the reporting and analysis of evidence and his own recommendations. His study gains much in significance and value because he has placed his findings into context. For example, he identifies various factors in the history of American higher learning that give rise to a pervasive mood of dissatisfaction with the state of graduate education. Among these factors are social attitudes and institutional traditions that, while not elements in the substantive quality of graduate education, nevertheless influence that substance and quality.

Criticisms of graduate education are therefore not always to be taken at face value. Berelson detects attitudes of perfectionism, frustration and dissatisfaction with disciplinary focus as factors influencing adverse evaluations of graduate education. It would not advance our understanding of the present state of graduate education merely to know the evaluations of it in the academic community and throughout society generally. One needs also to know, as best he can, what these evaluations actually mean. As a case in point, Berelson's findings with respect to political science offer grounds for some interesting speculations concerning the attitudes and expectations of those professing the discipline called political science.

To the political scientist dissatisfied with the state of his discipline Berelson's study offers evidence that he is not alone in his concern. Of graduate faculty members and recent recipients of Ph.D.'s in eighteen academic and professional fields, Berelson found that the proportion of political scientists describing the state of their discipline as "very satisfactory" was substantially the lowest. Only six percent of graduate faculties in political science and thirteen percent of recent Ph.D.'s considered the state of political science as "very satisfactory." In contrast the proportions in physics were sixty-four percent among graduate faculties and fifty-eight percent among recent Ph.D.'s. Among the social sciences, political science stood conspicuously below the related disciplines of sociology, history and economics.

As might be expected, the proportion of graduate faculty in political science dissatisfied with the state of graduate teaching was conversely high. In contrast to the physical sciences, dissatisfaction with graduate education was high among all social sciences, but only in economics (fifty percent) was the reported dissatisfaction greater than in political science (forty-eight percent). Berelson's concern being with graduate education generally, he did not undertake to analyze in detail the reasons for the sharp contrasts in satisfaction among the several academic and professional disciplines. Nevertheless his study contains some observations regarding the condition of the social sciences, and political science may present an exaggerated illustration of difficulties affecting the social sciences generally.

Before considering the relevance of Berelson's findings to political science, one other possibly significant piece of evidence regarding the state of political science emerges from his study. Among twenty-two academic and professional disciplines surveyed, the longest doctoral dissertations were in political science (median length 357 pages) contrasted with the "number disciplines" of mathematics, bacteriology and physics (71, 88 and 96 pages respectively). In comparison with other "word disciplines" the contrast is much less great, but nevertheless distinct. For example:

	Range		Middle Half of Cases Fall Between
	Low	High
Sociology	61	989	178-352
Economics	60	811	197-339
Political Science	147	863	268-443

It may of course be argued that human behavior in politics is more complex than in other aspects of life, that documentation of dissertations in political science is unavoidably encumbered by a greater variety of data than in other disciplines, that political scientists tend to include a more complete presentation of background data than other disciplines. None of these arguments is thoroughly convincing either as to what is or what should be. A comparative study of Ph.D. dissertations in political science would be needed to provide an adequate explanation of their length. One plausible hypothesis, however, is that inadequate sharpness of focus in the study of politics has induced wordiness. It is difficult to be concise in matters about which one cannot be precise.

Berelson's study suggests that something is amiss with the discipline called "political science." Examination of Charles Hyneman's The Study of Politics (notably chapters I, VII, and VIII) suggests a probable basis of dissatisfaction in the lack of clarity and direction of effort in the field. On the evidence of Berelson's study political scientists appear to be less satisfied with graduate education and with the state of their discipline than almost any other academic group. Berelson's belief is that dislike of the "present character of their field" is the root of dissatisfaction. If this is so, it impairs among political scientists the things that Berelson says that American academic life needs most, "... a sense of pride, of esprit de corps, of profession in the best sense."

There may be no simple explanation of the failure of political science to achieve a focus and integrity as adequate as its effectiveness and reputation as a discipline would seem to require. Dissatisfaction with the field of study is not conclusive evidence that the field is not yielding results—is not creative. Political scientists have taken the lead in developing several important areas of study that because of the special (one might say increasingly peculiar) conditions of American society had not found a home elsewhere in the university. Public law and public administration are two of these areas that have an obvious relevance to the study of politics, but have ties of equal or perhaps greater significance to other disciplines. The same may be said for certain aspects of international affairs.

Is it because political science as a discipline attracts a disproportionately large number of vicarious politicians with empire building proclivities that it blurs its focus and fragments its purpose through a jealous retention of so-called "fields" that might more profitably be organized as separate disciplines or as interdisciplinary programs? Perhaps what the discipline of political science now needs most is a psychological study of political scientists. Perhaps here might be found the basic reason for the dissatisfactions reported by Bernard Berelson and the slowness in achieving clarity and direction of purpose as noted by Charles Hyneman.

LYNTON K. CALDWELL

Indiana University

BOOK NOTES AND BIBLIOGRAPHY

POLITICAL THEORY, HISTORY OF POLITICAL THOUGHT, AND METHODOLOGY

The Predicament of Democratic Man. By EDMOND CAHN. (New York: The Macmillan Co., 1961. Pp. 164. $3.95.)

Professor Cahn's new book investigates the moral implications of democracy. His central problem, examined with the keen sensitivity that characterized The Sense of Injustice and The Moral Decision, is whether it is possible to live in a democracy without becoming tainted by the wrongs and misdeeds of the government.

A feeling of moral guilt by citizens, for injustices perpetrated by governmental officials, is not prompted by the internal organization of despotic states. It becomes crucial, however, in systems of free government which rest authority upon consent; for then the citizens, as participants in making public decisions, are ultimately responsible for what the government does. Because control over the state is lodged in their hands, the state becomes their agent and they consequently share in its misdeeds. This moral involvement of the populace in the injustices of government constitutes for Professor Cahn the predicament of democratic man.

In wrestling with this question, Professor Cahn shuns abstract theories of automatic and universal guilt. Collectively, the populace's obligation is threefold: to prevent the occurrence of injustice, particularly those types of social injury (such as racial discrimination) which are beyond the reach of later recompense; to provide reparation for political injuries which do occur; and to protest continually against injustice, wherever it may be found.

In assessing individual responsibilities for governmental wrongdoing, Professor Cahn asks each person to determine for himself whether he is guilty or innocent of inciting an official to commit a wrong, authorizing it, helping to install a dangerous public instrument, remaining passive when the injury might have been prevented, ratifying and knowingly accepting its fruits, suppressing the truth about it, and contributing to the vulnerability of the victim. Withdrawal from civic life, the author emphasizes, is no escape from this moral confrontation.

Following this negative approach to the problem, the book then discusses what positively may be done to assure self-fulfillment and diminish the incidence of injustice. Democracy, Professor Cahn asserts, both demands and encourages equality in the political order and quality on the part of citizens and public officials. These are the moral incentives which contribute to the better life.

Equality has two manifestations. Its "passive" aspect calls for the preservation of a minimum status for all people. Its "active" expression requires opportunities for personal advancement, with no regard in particular for a person's race or nationality. Quality on the part of the citizen necessitates good judgment, courage to dissent, and a willingness to cooperate. On the part of public officials, it requires justice.

Professor Cahn's elaboration is obviously one which makes high ideals normative for politics. But his approach is neither utopian nor sentimental. Throughout, the argument is based upon a realistic assessment of man's limits which emphasizes the inadequate grip of all men upon both truth and righteousness.

What makes protest necessary is the fallibility of those who exercise political power. They err. Their special interests give them an "official" perspective which differs from the "consumer" perspective of the citizens upon whom government impinges. The democratic temper, therefore, must be marked by "a sort of briny irreverence towards officials." Even majorities in a democracy deserve no exemption from this skepticism; for they too are not always right, and the democratic freedom to dissent is therefore a corrective necessity.

Human fallibility means that men ought to continually reconsider their political and social conclusions. Most beliefs, upon which political man acts, are non-verified; and the more free they are from corroboration, the less they should form the grounds for political coercion. In the legal sphere, man's fallibility thus warns us to avoid harsh accusations and strict penalties (such as capital punishment) which are beyond later correction.

Above all, a recognition of man's ignorance and the partiality of his virtues calls for political "modesty." A person must never be "moved to infer that he is categorically right in his choices and they [other people] are wrong." Justice soon flees whenever humanity is thus viewed as divided between the morally pure, on the one hand, and the contaminated on the other. Political solutions based upon compromise are far preferable.

What emerges in this book is thus a defense of democracy grounded upon an awareness of both man's capacities for justice and the obstacles which his moral limits pose to the attainment of that high end. As such, the work contributes significantly to our understanding of democratic man and the essential foundations upon which the democratic order stands.—DONALD K. MCKEE, Uppsala College.

Tradition, Values, and Socio-Economic Development. EDITED BY RALPH BRAIBANTI AND JOSEPH J. SPENGLER. (Durham: Duke University Press and London: Cambridge University Press, 1961. Pp. viii, 305. $6.00.)

This volume, the subject matter of which is "the effect of tradition and values in socio-economic development," contains contributions by Wilbert E. Moore (Princeton), Bert F. Hoselitz (Chicago), Melville J. Herskovits (Northwestern), Ishtiaq Husain Qureshi (Pakistan), John D. Montgomery (Boston U.), Mason Wade (Rochester), and the distinguished editors, Ralph Braibanti and Joseph J. Spengler (Duke). Each addresses himself to several aspects of this topic, though the essays conform to no standard format. In many respects they complement one another and overlap without very much repetition. Taken together the papers explore an array of concepts, define a range of problems, and outline some issues that, though unevenly developed, suggest some thought-provoking confrontations of an intellectual and practical nature in this complex area.

Frequently in a work of this type the editors expound a central concern, but the authors, however much they share it and strive to deal with it, tend to go off on their professional tangents. In this instance, they stick to their assignment more faithfully than usually happens, thus enhancing advantages and rewards accruing to the reader. While addressing themselves to the multi-dimensional processes of change, the contributors venture well beyond, into the examination of such items as ideologies, traditions, theory, and cultural dynamics, to mention only a few. It is not for sheer originality of conceptualizations that one will take up this collection—most of the authors have published their views elsewhere—but for the complex relationships indicated and refinements worked out.

Though the volume is organized by chapters, the contributions of Professors Spengler, Moore, Hoselitz, and Herskovits contain enough in common to form a distinct section by themselves. No one thread runs consistently through all of them, but in their own ways these authors have much to say about what has come to be designated strategic access in the developmental process. Their expositions illuminate strategic access into minds, social structures, cultures, and economies where change is being deliberately promoted and where there is direction or administration for this purpose. Such facets as the points of penetration, timing, internal and external sources of support, retardation and advancement factors, multiplier and ripple effects, and forces that influence the patterning of the evolving or transplanted institutions are brought under discussion from different vantage points. There are some inevitable gaps that are by no means the fault of the authors but reflect the degree of non-contiguity of the several social sciences. Where the respective approaches are based on academic disciplines, there is a slight distortion of emphasis which the chapters as a whole tend to correct.

It is Professor Spengler who explicitly deals with "the content of men's minds . . . as the potentially dynamic element, as the source whence issue change and novelty, in a world or universe that is otherwise essentially passive." He postulates that both rate and direction of development for a society "depends largely upon what is in the minds of its members, and above all upon the content of the minds of its elites. . . ." Employing optimal activity and rational selection of alternatives as operational criteria for development, he prefers the value-orientation of scientific objectivity to that of ideology on the ground that the former means flexibility (with opportunities for the private sector) and the latter rigidity (which he identifies with the predominance of the state in economic life). How his treatment of ideology squares with the Mannheimian distinctions is one question of some theoretical importance, but how valid is his operational credo, in light of the strictures in Professor Herskovits' chapter on culture, is a more serious issue.

Institutions or social structures constitute the activational universe for Professor Moore as does culture for Professor Herskovits. In the former, mobility has a function comparable to that of cultural dynamics in the latter. Here is where a synthesis or fusion is called for, some analytic turn that allows these processes to be treated as continuous or at least on the same plane of action, perhaps with emphasis on the first as the more general (here I deliberately avoid the words "universal" or "empirical") and on the second as particularistic, or vice versa. However, this is far too simple, and both are entitled to demur.

Professor Hoselitz, by his discriminating insights into the various types of tradition, meets an obvious need with skill. It is his conclusion that "economic development and tradition are not aspects of social action which are necessarily antagonistic." His use of tradition provides a workable referent that crosses discipline boundaries.

In his essay, Professor Braibanti offers some observations on "The Relevance of Political Science to the Study of Underdeveloped Areas." He notes, as has Professor Apter in another study, that no subdiscipline of political development or growth has yet evolved within the field of political science, though he credits comparative government and public administration with "substantial progress" in this regard. It is his position that a quite respectable subdiscipline might emerge from serious consideration of six principal issues in political development, namely, the character of exogenous ideas and structure, process of transmission, facilitation and impedance of internal factors, prediction of ideological and structural variants, adequacy of variants to satisfy the expectations of modern constitutional government, and verification of hypotheses of a political process and emergence of laws of politics.

Some years ago a reviewer for this journal wrote to the effect that the book under consideration was of less interest to the student of political science than to the student of social institutions. How many political scientists today can accept the explicit differentiation or the implicit injunction contained in the observation? Surely Professor Braibanti is not likely to enter among them. It can be contended that the trend to subsume under political science what is called cross-cultural or transnational institution-building, especially in the context of development, has already enriched the pool of political data and increased awareness of institutional variability in politics, but is political science as a discipline better off as a consequence?

Professor Braibanti elaborates his case for this new departure for political science in a highly convincing manner. However, by doing so, he raises a critical problem of a practical nature. There is still a grave need—perhaps it is now greater than ever—for political science to carry out its primary task, to put it simply, to increase and deepen understanding of how communities govern themselves or are ruled and what, for the community are the political consequences of the constitution it lives by, laws it enacts, and policies it supports. Here is the area where the strength of political science lies, in which it is best equipped to probe and explain. Here is where it has a foundation on which to grow and where it can stir peoples to pose to themselves questions about the nature of the political environments they inhabit in the nuclear and space age. How political institutions are selected for export, transferred, and implanted are not to be downgraded or dismissed as insubstantial matters, but political science, as it has matured, cannot claim to shed bright light on them. Whether it will form interdisciplinary alliances, as Professor Braibanti forecasts, depends largely upon individual inclinations and efforts and incentives from foundations, but the cost to the discipline may be steep if political scientists, as a result, pay less and less attention to the great issues of political life.

It is, therefore, a pleasure to read Dr. Qureshi's double contribution that is befitting a political scientist. Regrettably, lack of space does not permit comments on the separate, distinctive essays prepared by Professors Wade and Montgomery.—JULIAN R. FRIEDMAN, Maxwell Graduate School, Syracuse University.

Marxism, an Historical and Critical Study. By GEORGE LICHTHEIM. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger, Inc., 1961. Pp. 412, $8.50.)

Forty-five years ago the name of Marx was scarcely mentioned, any more than that of Mrs. Eddy, in our major universities. It was possible to be regarded as a fully educated man without having heard of him. Lenin was the name of a disreputable revolutionary who had let down the Allied cause of making the world safe for democracy. Their names did not occur in scholarly examination papers, which were only concerned with the "classics" and revolutionaries of yesteryear. Today the Marx literature, criticisms, comments, and work of glossators achieve the elephantine proportions of the Goethe and Shakespeare literature. Dr. Lichtheim wisely abstains from providing a bibliography, which would run to many pages. He compensates by ample footnote references. He acknowledges his debt to that remarkable man, Franz Borkenau, and calls our attention to such indispensable studies as the Dialectical Materialism of Father Gustav Wetter. The little Karl Marx which is perhaps the best known work of Professor Sir Isaiah Berlin, oddly enough he does not mention.

Today, then, there is a mountain of secondary writings analyzing, criticizing and proving wrong the thesis of Karl Marx. Still, however, for all these darts the "Red Prussian" stands. Why? He was obviously an unbalanced, if learned, fanatic, sizzling with hate. It seems to make no odds. Every American schoolboy is brought up to revere the principles of Thomas Jefferson (also a revolutionary). Yet, as Dr. Lichtheim writes: "between 1776—when Adam Smith and Thomas Jefferson simultaneously summed up the Eighteenth Century doctrine of society—and 1848, when Marx challenged that doctrine, the 'bourgeois revolution' in the West had run its course." This may give us one clue: How much of our accepted political thought is indeed too archaic and "Eighteenth Century"—too lacking in realism—to put up effective resistance? Dr. Lichtheim offers another clue, in this really remarkably thorough book. His purpose, he states, is "to present an integrated account of Marxist theory since its first formulation"; to trace its development in the "union of theory and practice"; and to note how it was shaped by "the impact of the industrial revolution on European society." This economic and technological impact, taken by Lichtheim in historical rather than metaphysical survey, damages traditional Liberal doctrine, leaves John Stuart Mill a remote figure, and gives body to the Marxist movement. It does so peculiarly in underdeveloped countries, such as Russia itself, where the situation asks for rapid technological development; and it is aided by the tendency to centralizing techniques of bureaucracy in modern society—although this last, in Stalinism, ends in a profound and unsolved crisis for Marxism itself. Indeed, in one sense, Marx, a product of a Liberal age and bearing its stigmata, is not a contemporary Marxist.

The criticism can be made that Dr. Lichtheim here accepts too much—accepts too much of Marxism in his interpretation of Marxism. But the explanation of political behaviour is not solely economic and historical; it is also psychological and recurrent. It is interesting to note that Marx was preoccupied with philosophy before, as a Rhineland editor, for good professional reasons he became concerned with economics and later, in Britain after his French political period, preoccupied with it. At first, like many another, he spent his time defending his doctoral thesis on materialism. What often yet escapes notice is that Marx is the philosophic child of the Liberal early Nineteenth Century in yet another sense. He inherited uncritically the psychology of the French Hedonists, which psychology at a slightly earlier date was also shaping Benthamism, different although its mood was. This hedonism traces lineally from the crude "over-under," dominative psychology of Hobbes; and Marx is a truer, and more uncritical, child of Hobbes than Bentham. So are Lenin and Stalin. It is to Hobbes that fundamental political analyses should look. Not pleasure, but fear, resentment and obsessive need for power take first place. Here is the citadel of Marxist theory. "No man can be neutral."

This is not the place to discuss a new dynamism. Perhaps it will be found in the idealism to shape some new Western regional organization with power. In the alternative, the probability is high that Marxism will dominate the world, partly due to a Puritanism which meets decadence with a steel hand, and partly due to sheer military and diplomatic might. But this will not be the Marxism of Marx—which we can either say with Dr. Lichtheim has "ossified" or we can say will become a Sunday religion. Most of the history of the world is of tyranny confronting cowardice, comfort and anarchy; and the effective Marxism will be that of Moscow and the more intolerable variety of Peking. We may, indeed, (with George Kennan) "seek to understand," and realize that understanding is seldom in terms of ink-black and pure white.

We may come to see that although scientific sociologists may show that Marx' central concept of "class" was unforgiveably vague, yet for the layman it is the immemorial distinction between rich and poor, Dives and Lazarus; that the early Marxists, frères-ennemis of Liberalism (especially in the Continental sense) yet shared with it the errors, which still curse our times, of secularist humanism; that Marx himself was an eminent Victorian; and that Marxism, along with Leninism, had the great advantage of being an aristocratic theory.

To this understanding Dr. Lichtheim has contributed in a not unduly long, scholarly, refreshing and highly readable book. His chapter on Engels is critically quite invaluable. Dr. Lichtheim's own view seems to be that of an ardent secularist and primitive Marxist, pre-Trotskyite, who regards the Anglo-Saxon political tradition as today negligible compared with that which derives from the Jacobins and Blanqui, and one to be cheerfully put, along with Thomist rationalism, into the trash-bin. Stalin's deviation makes this offhand disposal more difficult. Perhaps, just as early Marxism was dismissed by academics as disprovable error, so Dr. Lichtheim too readily dismisses contemporary Marxism as "a grotesque distortion," "a travesty." Nevertheless, it is with this Marx-Leninism, not with Marx-Engels, that we have to co-exist; and it is this which bourgeois democracy has to understand and confront.—GEORGE E. G. CATLIN.

The Religious Factor. By GERHARD LENSKE. (New York: Doubleday & Company, Inc., 1961. Pp. xvi, 381. $5.95.)

It must be accounted as somewhat anomalous that the modern intellectual, especially as social scientist, so often refuses to take seriously the possibility that ideas and beliefs may have practical consequences. A case in point is the fact that the great majority of standard textbooks and original studies in public opinion, parties and such have in effect ignored the factor of religious belief as a possible determinant of political attitudes and behavior. In recent years the sample survey technique has taken this subject a step beyond the offhand paragraph about Al Smith and the 1928 election. But even so the apparent correlations of religious loyalties with political opinion have been interpreted as probably accidents of history, or at most as indicating mere religious reinforcement of the genuine "prime determinants."

Gerhard Lenski's The Religious Factor stakes out a bold claim for religion as one of the more potent independent, causal variables operative in not only political but also economic and family life. On the whole, the claim is rigorously justified in the findings of this unusually careful, wide-ranging and clearly written study in empirical sociology.

The data for the study come primarily from sample survey interviews with 656 representative Detroit residents, conducted as the 1958 project of the Detroit Area Study, a facility of the University of Michigan. Professor Lenski, a sociologist, checks and supplements these materials by data from interviews with the clergymen of a sample of the churches attended by his original respondents, and from surveys by the D.A.S. in several earlier years.

The four socio-religious groups studied are white Protestants, Catholics, Jews and Negro Protestants. A number of the 185 questions on the interview schedule are aimed at uncovering the types and degrees of religious commitment within these groups. Involvement in the religious association (the church) is treated separately from involvement in the accompanying, larger religious subcommunity, and two religious "orientations" (doctrinal orthodoxy and devotionism) within each group are distinguished and studied. As one result, very considerable light is thrown on the present vitality and cohesiveness of the groups, intergroup images, the theological and social beliefs of the clergy, and on the impact of social change on the groups—including evidence relevant to the Herberg thesis.

But the central hypothesis is that these differences in religious belief and commitment really cause differences in the attitudes and behavior of people in their daily lives—in secular activities such as politics, economics, family life and education. Here Lenski is deliberately building upon Durkheim and Weber, particularly the latter's thesis about the relationship of Protestant values to the emergence of capitalism. Lenski finds that, while certain of the specific elements in the "Protestant ethic" seem to have disappeared, there is in this contemporary survey of an American metropolis striking support for the basic proposition that each major religion develops its own distinctive orientation toward a wide range of secular activities, and exercises significant influence in shaping the behavior of its adherents with relation to secular institutions. He concludes that "socio-religious group membership is a variable comparable in importance to class, both with respect to its potency and with respect to the range, or extent, of its influence." This finding rests not only on painstaking research design, exacting methodology, and strong correlations;

Lenski has also applied to his causal hypothesis every feasible test of controlled data, temporal sequence, intragroup comparison of activist and marginal members, and the check of other relevant research.

Lenski's substantive results are of course too numerous and complex to summarize; but a few examples may suggest their character. On most of the items identifiable with the "spirit of capitalism"—a positive attitude toward work, identification with businessmen, entrepreneurial spirit, importance of saving, etc.—Protestants (especially white Protestants and church activists) and Jews rank considerably higher than Catholics. Catholics enjoy stronger family solidarity than Protestants, have a more rapidly increasing birth rate, and emphasize personal autonomy much less in the rearing of their children. White Protestants are much more likely to vote Republican than Catholics, even when father's party preference and class position of both respondent and father are held constant. Church activists (both Protestant and Catholic) are substantially more likely than others to favor government by law rather than by men. Of all the groups, middle class white Protestants are clearly most likely to oppose the welfare state and to support freedom of speech.

Readers may of course quarrel with Lenski about the framing of some of his questions and the nuances of interpretation of the responses. For example, in his questions regarding theological orientation, his "orthodoxy" category makes no room for the crucial distinction between "neo-orthodoxy" and "fundamentalism." More seriously, he sometimes presses his concern for white Protestant-Catholic differences to somewhat debatable conclusions, and to the relative neglect of striking data about the Jewish and Negro positions.

Minor complaints aside, Lenski's work will surely stand as a sound and pioneering venture in the sociology of religion and society. It clears many channels of potential traffic between theoretical formulations and hard data in the study of the religious factor. It is to be hoped that the grip of positivism is loosening enough to permit an increasing number of political scientists to take up the argument on both the theoretical and data-gathering sides. There are multiple ironies in a situation which requires behavioral science to recall attention to the reality of religion.—HARRY R. DAVIS, Beloit College.

H. G. Wells and the World State. By W. WARREN WAGAR. (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1961. Pp. 301. $6.00.)

H. G. Wells was a man who found it easy to speak for himself. In some hundred and ten books and several hundred articles, published over a span of more than 50 years, he tirelessly gave the millions his opinions on all subjects. Now comes W. Warren Wagar to speak for him. The question is, what is worth saying?

Of the many messages of H. G. Wells, Wagar has chosen to present the one which, presumably, has the greatest bearing on our condition. He writes of Wells the diagnostician of the modern sickness, and of Wells the planner and propagandist of a future world order and world civilization. Wagar does in his one book what Wells never had the time for in his hundred: he relays the message clearly and in good order. He also presents it fully, and that is the virtue of this book. It is all here—that whole vast jumble of an evolutionist metaphysics, a biologicistic ethics, and a technocratic politics which was the mind of H. G. Wells. The reader who wants a good presentation of Wells' ideas on the world state will find it in Wagar's book.

But the question remains: was it worth saying? Wells had no sense of the political. He was not an original thinker: much of his work, as Ezra Pound said, was "chewed up newspaper." Nor was he a distinguished thinker. He lacked discrimination and he gave little care to style. He seemed as comfortable with the outlandish as with the hackneyed; and he could on one page offer a snappy criticism of Victorian sexual customs and a grandiose vision of the coming world order. What does it all come out to?

Wagar does not address that question. His work is primarily descriptive. He does not attempt a sustained critique of Wells' ideas on the present disorder and the coming order, although it is clear that he thinks they have great merit, which men may soon come to realize. Indeed, one can get the impression that Wagar sees himself in the vanguard of a rising army of Wellsians: "The wheels are turning. . . . The heyday of the symbol-mongers and the literary technicians cannot last much longer; it is time again for Wells."

When Wagar does turn to analysis it is analysis of a curious kind. He addresses the question, how successful was Wells as a "prophet"? And by success he means influence over the opinions of other men. Wagar justifies this approach to the task of criticism by describing himself as an intellectual historian. In this view, an intellectual historian is one who is concerned only with the question of who thought what, and not with the quality of what was thought. That definition does not fit the vocation of any of the great intellectual historians.

Wagar's analysis of Wells' success reaches two conclusions. Wells was a failure in that he lost his audience; and he lost his audience because he made the foolish error of speaking to masses instead of directing his appeal "to the elite groups who would, ultimately, have to manage a Wellsian world revolution." Wells was a success in that he did stimulate many men to think, and in that many of his ideas are commonplace today. Furthermore, Wagar suspects that Wells will soon be awarded the high place which is rightly his: "in another generation or two . . . when the anguished disillusionment of mid-century men has ripened into sober resolution, H. G. Wells will be acknowledged as a crucial intermediary between the intellectual inheritance of the West and the coming world civilization."

To this, I must make that most presumptuous of all replies: perhaps . . .

Wells was not an intermediary. He discarded the whole past as outmoded, leaving only the future. When a man calls us to the future we must examine most earnestly his vision of that future. Wagar persists in calling Wells a prophet, but he never asks the questions which really matter in the discussion of prophets. Perhaps Wells failed because he was not a prophet but merely a magician, or a propagandist. Or perhaps he was a false prophet. Perhaps men have found reason to suspect that the god for whom Wells spoke, the god of the machine, is a Janus-faced god at best, and an empty idol at the worst.

The "miracles of science," we say; and Wells was one of the men who taught us to say it. He was one of the publicists who led men to believe that those miracles were their own justification, and that the power that worked them had the right to our worship. We have come to doubt that. When a rocket goes up from Cape Canaveral we no longer believe in our hearts that it rises up to the heavens. It blasts off into empty space, and it may one day return to destroy. And for all of Wells' astounding images of the coming world technocracy, we have come to fear that there may be no room in that huge order for mere men.

Wells lost his faith at the end, and announced man's doom. And since the blockheads would not listen, they deserved not only their destruction, but the teacher's curse as well. According to Sir Ernest Barker, Wells wanted his epitaph to read: "God damn you all: I told you so." Perhaps in another generation or two, "when the anguished disillusionment of mid-century men has ripened into sober resolution," that curse will be thrown back upon Wells as the prophet of a false god.

Perhaps these matters have something to do with the failure of Wells the prophet. They are surely the matters that any reader of Wells must ponder today. They are not pondered in this book.—JOHN H. SCHAAER, University of California (Berkeley).

The Political Context of Sociology. BY LEON

BRAMSON. (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1961. Pp. v, 164. $4.00.)

Perhaps a more apt title for this methodological essay would be The Ideological Context of Sociology. It is nonetheless relevant to students of politics. Mr. Bramson's purpose is to indicate how some theory in sociology, ostensibly derived empirically, originates instead in the culture-bound beliefs and personal values of the theorists. The author, in supporting his thesis, offers us a useful bit of intellectual history that searches out the cultural and philosophical bases of a modern scholarly discipline. The body of social theory he uses as illustration is the conception of "mass" behavior and "mass society" of European and American sociologists and social psychologists. That sociology itself is culturally relative is convincingly demonstrated in the comparison of European and American varieties. For the European sociologist, there is the social problem of class conflict, while for the American there are many social problems—crime, divorce, minority problems, poverty—which exemplify a society that has achieved a basic consensus but is wrestling with side effects of urbanism and industrialization. Similarly the idea of "mass" is laden with a variety of cultural and philosophical meanings; and conclusions about the nature of mass society often are conclusions by sociologists, or ideologists, of the left or right, European or American.

The science of today's presumably value-free empiricists is permeated no less by the writers' conceptual systems than was the work of the more obvious ideologists in early American sociology. As modern evidence for his thesis Mr. Bramson finds that the social and political philosophies of contemporary mass theorists (Adorno, et al., Reich, Fromm, Marcuse) unconsciously became mixed with their work leaving the validity of their results uncertain. These scholars' descriptions of the relationship between so-called mass behavior and the growth of totalitarianism, Mr. Bramson believes (echoing many others before him), have been tainted by their own experiences with Hitlerism and by their attachment to a liberal socialism to the point where they fit their evidence into their own belief and value frameworks. What is unacceptable, we are told (in another chapter that can be added to a growing list on the subject), is the carelessness of social scientists who disguise value judgments as facts. The author's own resolution of the old fact-value problem (which he rightly describes as probably no solution at all) is a compromise of the natural law and the positivist positions. The values and the total cultural experience of the observer inevitably color his perceptions at every stage of his research; but this simply requires more strenuous efforts at impartiality by the researcher, more emphasis on the testing of his formulations by others, and a continuing search for "intersubjectively verifiable criteria for checking his generalizations." It is at this point that some ambiguity in the author's purpose becomes troublesome. His "solution" clearly offers nothing more than is found in traditional scientific procedure. But if the history of modern sociology tells us that an attachment to this procedure has not been sufficient to keep subjectivity, individual or cultural, from distorting the results of investigation, it is hard to see how a reaffirmation of these ancient rules can solve the problem. How does an observer achieve impartiality if all his perceptions are the partial ones of his culture and how, in these circumstances, can "intersubjectively verifiable" criteria of validation be discovered? If, instead, Mr. Bramson's criticism is of social scientists who select and interpret evidence so that it will bear out their conceptions about the way things are or ought to be, then we simply are privy to an unexceptionable criticism of bad research—and another exhortation to social scientists to be careful certainly can do no harm.

That the social scientist's conceptual framework, wherever derived, affects his perceptions certainly is true. That some social scientists use their social-political values to guide their selection of data and the conclusions they draw from them undoubtedly can be shown. But the second does not necessarily follow from the first. For the social scientist seeking support for his values there is no real remedy other than exposure. For the social scientist who mistakes the part of the world that he has seen for the totality, the remedy is to look outside. A general causal analysis clearly is faulty if it is derived from the observer's own limited experience or from his own value preferences. But such analyses are outside of social science. In such cases the solution is not more science, but just science.

The reader may have difficulty following all of the author's argument to his conclusions, but his scholarly review of the philosophical bases of one social science clearly has relevance to others and earns for the book a place in a sparse literature on the subject.—SEYMOUR SCHER, University of Rochester.

The Russian Revolution. BY NICOLAS BERDYAEV. (Ann Arbor: The University of Michigan Press, 1961, pp. 91. $1.75.)

Terrorism and Communism. BY LEON TROTSKY. (Ann Arbor: The University of Michigan Press, 1961, pp. 193. $1.95.)

The Russian Revolution and Leninism or Marxism?

By ROSA LUXEMBURG. (Ann Arbor: The University of Michigan Press, 1961, pp. 109. $1.65.)

These are the first three in a new series of "Ann Arbor Paperbacks for the Study of Communism and Marxism." Sidney Hook's From Hegel To Marx, Franz Borkenau, World Communism, and Karl Kautsky's The Dictatorship of the Proletariat are expected to be published in 1962 and other works will follow.

In the period of the final disintegration of Marxism, it is fascinating to recall the diversity of ideas encompassed by it in the early part of this century. We owe a debt of gratitude to the publishers of this imaginatively planned series for making available such writings, for long most difficult to obtain, as Rosa Luxemburg's biting attacks of 1904 on Lenin's "ultra-centralism" and her friendly but highly critical appraisal in 1918 of the Russian Revolution, Karl Kautsky's vigorous assault of the same year on the anti-democratic character of the Bolshevik revolution and Leon Trotsky's spirited counter-attack of 1919 on Kautsky in defense of terrorism. Such works are essential for an understanding of the Marxian tradition and the ideological background of modern Communism.—JOHN H. KAUTSKY, Washington University (St. Louis).

SELECTED ARTICLES AND DOCUMENTS ON

POLITICAL THEORY

CECELIA M. KENYON

Smith College

Ahmad, Aziz. Political and Religious Ideas of Shah Wali-Ullah. The Muslim World. January, 1962.

Albert, Hans. Ethik und Metaethik. Archiv für Philosophie. October, 1961.

Alexander, Robert J. Nationalism, Latin America's Predominant Ideology. Journal of International Affairs. XV, 2, 1961.

Allen, R. E. The Argument from Opposites in Republic V. The Review of Metaphysics. December, 1961.

Allen, Richard V. Religión, Filosofía y Revolución: Carlos Marx y la libertad. Revista de Estudios Políticos. March-April, 1961.

Althusser, Louis. "Sur le Jeune Marx" (Questions de théorie). La Pensée. March-April, 1961.

Aranda, Luis Rodriguez. El racionalismo en el pensamiento político español. Revista de Estudios Políticos. September-October, 1961.

Arendt, Hannah, et al. The Cold War and the West: A Symposium. (Some comments pertain to contemporary ideology or theory.) Partisan Review. Winter, 1962.

Ascher, Abraham. "Radical" Imperialism Within German Social Democracy, 1912-1918. Political Science Quarterly. December, 1961.

Aubenque, Pierre. Aristoteles und das Problem der Metaphysik. Zeitschrift für Philosophische Forschung. July-September, 1961.

Bahm, Archie J. The New Conservatism. The Humanist. September-October, 1961.

Bailyn, Bernard. Political Experience and Enlightenment Ideas in Eighteenth-Century America. American Historical Review. January, 1962.

Bedau, Hugo A. On Civil Disobedience. Journal of Philosophy. October 12, 1961.

Beneyto, Juan. La interacción informativa en la órbita del poder del Estado. Revista de Estudios Políticos. March-April, 1961.

Bestor, Arthur. State Sovereignty and Slavery—A Reinterpretation of Pro-slavery Constitutional Doctrine, 1846-1860. Journal of the Illinois State Historical Society. Summer, 1961.

Bien, David D. Religious Persecution in the French Enlightenment. Church History. September, 1961.

Bobbio, N. Teoria e ricerca politica in Italia. Il Politico. June, 1961.

Brown, Stuart M., Jr. Civil Disobedience. Journal of Philosophy. October 26, 1961.

Brown, Stuart M., Jr. Has Kant a Philosophy of Law? The Philosophical Review. January, 1962.

Bruhat, Jean. Un retour aux sources: colonialisme et anticolonialisme au temps de Robespierre. La Pensée. November-December, 1961.

Cantimori, Delio. Il "Machiavelli." Belfagor. 30 November 1961.

Cohen, Arthur A. How Original is "Maoism"? Problems of Communism. November-December, 1961.

Collinet, Michel. The Idea of Progress in the Nineteenth Century. Diogenes. Spring, 1961.

Conilh, Jean. Vers un pluralisme marxiste? Esprit. January, 1962.

Cornu, Auguste. Karl Marx à Paris (octobre 1843-fevrier 1845). La Pensée. November-December, 1961.

Davies, James C. Toward a Theory of Revolu- tion. American Sociological Review. February, 1962.

- Deininter, W. T. Political Power and Ideological Analysis. Il Politico. June, 1961.
- Demos, Raphael. Some Remarks on Aristotle's Doctrine of Practical Reason. Philosophy and Phenomenological Research. December, 1961.
- Dhondt, Urbain. Fondements d'une éthique sociale. Revue Philosophique de Louvain. August, 1961.
- Easton, Lloyd D. Alienation and History in the Early Marx. Philosophy and Phenomenological Research. December, 1961.
- Eitner, Hans-Jürgen. Mao Tse-tungs Kriegsphilosophie. Schweizer Monatshefte.
- Le fait et le droit*. Several articles in a single issue devoted to this subject, by R. Dekkers, K. Englisch, P. Foriers, W. Hallemans, A. Bayart, T. Ascarelli, J. Rivero. H. Buch, G. Boland, M. Domont, L. Morgenthal, M. Motte, C. Perelman. Dialectica. Vol. 16, No. 3/4, 1961.
- Fisichella, D. Il metodo scientifico nella politica di Auguste Comte. Studi Politici. April-June, 1961.
- Foriers, Paul. Réflexions sur l'argumentation juridique. Revue internationale de Philosophie. 4/XV/1961.
- Fragata, Julio. Materialismo Dialéctico e Mundo Contemporâneo. Revista Portuguesa de Filosofia. January-March, 1962.
- Fueyo Alvarez, Jesús F. El principio de autoridad en la crisis de la sociedad contemporánea. Revista de Estudios Políticos. January-February, 1961.
- Goldstein, Leon J. The Meaning of "State" in Hegel's Philosophy of History. Philosophical Quarterly. January, 1962.
- Goodman, Elliot R. East Against West in Communist Ideology. Journal of International Affairs. XV, 2, 1961.
- Gusfield, Joseph R. Mass Society and Extremist Politics. American Sociological Review. February, 1962.
- Haring, Ellen S. Aristotle's Physical Philosophy. Review of Metaphysics. December, 1961.
- Hassner, Pierre. Les concepts de guerre et de paix chez Kant. Revue Française de Science Politique. September, 1961.
- Hause, E. Malcolm. India under the Impact of Western Political Ideas and Institutions. Western Political Quarterly. December, 1961.
- Hensel, Donald W. Religion and the Writing of the Colorado Constitution. Church History. September, 1961.
- Iribarne, Manuel Fraga. La evolución de las ideas de Bolívar sobre los poderes del Estado y sus relaciones. Revista de Estudios Políticos. May-August, 1961.
- Jansen, Theo. Thielicke—ein führender Ideologie der Bonner Kriegspartei in der Evangelischen Kirche Deutschlands. Deutsche Zeitschrift für Philosophie. 10/IX/1961.
- Kateb, George. Aspects of Rousseau's Political Thought. Political Science Quarterly. December, 1961.
- Kendall, Willmoore. Natural Law and "Natural Right." Modern Age. Winter, 1961-1962.
- Landau, Martin. On the Use of Metaphor in Political Analysis. Social Research. Autumn, 1961.
- Larroque, Enrique. Retorno a la Revolución. Revista de Estudios Políticos. March-April, 1961.
- Leñero, José Pérez. Concepto y valoración del trabajo en la Filosofía. Revista de Política Social. July-September, 1961.
- Lively, J. F. Power and Ideology in Soviet Politics. Il Politico. June, 1961.
- Manasse, Ernest Moritz. Bucher über Plato: II, Werke in Englischer Sprache. Philosophische Rundschau. October, 1961.
- May, William E. The Nicomachean Ethics. The New Scholasticism. January, 1962.
- Meynaud, J. A propos de la technocratie. Revue Française de Science Politique. September, 1961.
- Minar, David W. Ideology and Political Behavior. Midwest Journal of Political Science. November, 1961.
- Mollnau, Karl A. Die Negation der Demokratie in der Klerikalen Staatslehre. Deutsche Zeitschrift für Philosophie. 10/IX/1961.
- Mouloud, N. Logique de l'Essence et logique de l'Entendement chez Hegel. Revue de Métaphysique et de Morale. January-June, 1961.
- Morgan, Edmund S. Essay Review: John Adams and the Puritan Tradition. New England Quarterly. December, 1961.
- Murphree, Idus L. Culture, Values and Political Theory: A Reply to Professor Jaffa. Journal of Politics. November, 1961.
- Neal, Fred Warner. Titoist Theory and Titoist Practice. Journal of International Affairs. 2/XV/1961.
- Niebuhr, Reinhold. Consensus in einer demokratischen Gesellschaft. Politische Vierteljahresschrift. September, 1961.
- Niemeyer, Gerhart. The Ideological Motivation of Communists. Modern Age. Fall, 1961.
- Oakley, Francis. Christian Theology and the Newtonian Science: The Rise of the Concept of the Laws of Nature. Church History. December, 1961.
- Oetzel, E. Die humanistische Grundhaltung unseres Staates als Ausdruck seiner Rechtmässigkeit. Deutsche Zeitschrift für Philosophie. 10/IX/1961.
- Oliver, Revilo P. Conservatism and Reality. Modern Age. Fall, 1961.
- Ollero, Carlos. El sistema representativo. Revista de Estudios Políticos. September-October, 1961.

- Ortega, Augusto A. Iglesia y Estado. Revista de Estudios Políticos. May-August, 1961.
- Parella, J. Roura. La filosofía política de Nicolai Hartmann. Revista Brasileira de Filosofia. April-June, 1961.
- Partridge, P. H. Politics, Philosophy, Ideology. Political Studies. October, 1961.
- Petrachik, A. Les problèmes de l'humanisme dans les premières oeuvres de Marx. La Pensée. March-April, 1961.
- Riedel, Jost. Gemeinwohl und Person. Politische Vierteljahresschrift. September, 1961.
- Roberts, Warren, Jr. Bentham's Conception of Political Change. Political Studies. October, 1961.
- Rose, H. J. World Ages and the Body Politic. The Harvard Theological Review. July, 1961.
- Rothman, Stanley. Modernity and Tradition in Britain. Social Research. Autumn, 1961.
- Sánchez-Barba, Mario Hernández. Los problemas de la Democracia en Hispano-america. Revista de Estudios Políticos. September-October, 1961.
- Schiavone, G. Adamo Ferguson e la società civile. Studi Politici. April-June, 1961.
- Schmitt, Carl. La tiranía de los valores. Revista de Estudios Políticos. January-February, 1961.
- Smith, Constance I. Locke and John Austin on the Idea of Morality. Journal of the History of Ideas. January-March, 1962.
- Solt, Leo F. The Fifth Monarchy Men: Politics and the Millennium. Church History. September, 1961.
- Swart, Koenraad W. "Individualism" in the Mid-XIXth Century (1826-1860). Journal of the History of Ideas. January-March, 1962.
- Szegedi, Mihaly. "New Class" or Classless Society? The Review. 3/III/1961.
- Teles, A. Xavier. Ideologia e realidade brasileira. Revista Brasileira de Filosofia. July-September 1961.
- Thorson, Thomas L. Political Values and Analytical Philosophy. Journal of Politics. November, 1961.
- Uscatescu, George. Tres meditaciones sobre el comunismo. Revista de Estudios Políticos. September-October, 1961.
- Viano, Carlo Augusta. L'abbozzo originario e gli stadi di composizione di "An Essay Concerning Toleration" e la nascita delle teorie politico-religiose di John Locke. Revista di Filosofia. July, 1961.
- Vissi, George. Political Ethics and Liberty. The Review. 3/III/1961.
- Wasserstrom, Richard. Disobeying the Law. Journal of Philosophy. October 12, 1961.
- Zolla Elemire. Proust e la politica di potenza. Nuovi Argomenti. March-June, 1961.

SELECTED ARTICLES AND DOCUMENTS ON METHODOLOGY AND RESEARCH IN THE SOCIAL SCIENCES

JULIAN FELDMAN
University of California, Berkeley

Philosophy of Social Science

- Cole, M. The Webbs and social theory. British Journal of Sociology, 1961, 12, 93, June.
- Gross, L. Preface to a metatheoretical framework for sociology. American Journal of Sociology, 1961, 67, 125, September.
- Sargent, H. D. Intrapsychic change: methodological problems in psychotherapy research. Psychiatry, 1961, 24, 93, May.
- Simey, T. S. The contribution of Sidney and Beatrice Webb to sociology. British Journal of Sociology, 1961, 12, 106, June.
- Stark, W., Herbert Spencer's three sociologies. American Sociological Review, 1961, 26, 515, August.

Research Methods

- Anderson, N. H. Scales and statistics: parametric and nonparametric. Psychological Bulletin, 1961, 58, 305, July.

- Anderson, N. S. Comments on the use of computers in psychological research. Behavioral Science, 1961, 6, 266, July.

- Andrews, R. S., Lebo, D., and Lucier, O. A pragmatic validation of a simple, status free measure of intellectual ability. Journal of Social Psychology, 1961, 54, 273, August.

- Berman, L. H., and Freedman, L. Z. Clinical perception of sexual deviates. Journal of Psychology, 1961, 52, 157, July.

- Brinton, J. E. Deriving an attitude scale from semantic differential data. Public Opinion Quarterly, 1961, 25, 289, Summer.

- Burroughs, G. E. R., and Miller, H. W. L. The rotation of principal components. British Journal of Statistical Psychology, 1961, 14, 35, May.

- Coan, R. W. Basic forms of covariation and concomitance designs. Psychological Bulletin, 1961, 58, 317, July.

- Crespi, I. Use of a scaling technique in surveys. Journal of Marketing, 1961, 25, 69, July.

- Crowell, L., and Scheidel, T. M. Categories for analysis of idea development in discussion groups. Journal of Social Psychology, 1961, 54, 155, June.
- Dadayan, V., and Chernyak, Y. Mathematical methods in economics. Management Science, 1961, 7, 323, July.
- Davison, W. P. A public opinion game. Public Opinion Quarterly, 1961, 25, 210, Summer.
- Drechsler, R. J., and Shapiro, M. I. A procedure for direct observation of family interaction in a child guidance clinic. Psychiatry, 1961, 24, 163, May.
- Fulkerson, S. C., and Barry, J. R. Methodology and research on the prognostic use of psychological tests. Psychological Bulletin, 1961, 58, 177, May.
- Gilmer, B. V. H. Toward cutaneous electro-pulse communication. Journal of Psychology, 1961, 52, 211, July.
- Greene, J. E., Sr., and Greene, J. E., Jr. Illustrative uses of the "incomplete" sentence technique in investigating certain attitudes of middle management personnel. Personnel Psychology, 1961, 14, 305, Autumn.
- Hagen, E. E. Analytical models in the study of social systems. American Journal of Sociology, 1961, 67, 144, September.
- Kaiser, H. F. A note on Guttman's Lower Bound for the Number of Common Factors. British Journal of Statistical Psychology, 1961, 14, 1, May.
- Kircher, P. Translator's note on "Mathematical methods in economics." Management Science, 1961, 7, 335, July.
- Koenigsberg, E. Some industrial applications of linear programming. Operational Research Quarterly, 1961, 12, 105, June.
- Lewis, J. W., and Caldwell, W. E. A psycholinguistic investigation of verbal psychological tests. Journal of General Psychology, 1961, 65, 137, July.
- Mason, W. S., Dressel, R. J., and Bain, R. K. An experimental study of factors affecting response to a mail survey of beginning teachers. Public Opinion Quarterly, 1961, 25, 296, Summer.
- Maxwell, A. E. Canonical variate analysis when the variables are dichotomous. Educational and Psychological Measurement, 1961, 21, 259, Summer.
- Miller, C. R., Eyman, R. K., and Dingman, H. F. Factor analysis, latent structure analysis and mental typology. British Journal of Statistical Psychology, 1961, 14, 29, May.
- Parsons, T. Preface to a metatheoretical framework for sociology: Comment. American Journal of Sociology, 1961, 67, 136, September.
- Peterson, R. A. A technique for the detection of blind checking in questionnaire research. Educational and Psychological Measurement, 1961, 21, 361, Summer.
- Pool, I. de S., and Abelson, R. The simulmatics project. Public Opinion Quarterly, 1961, 25, 167, Summer.
- Ronning, R. R., and Horrocks, J. E. A method of estimating effectiveness of groups in a "group" teaching situation. Educational and Psychological Measurement, 1961, 21, 331, Summer.
- Schuessler, K. F. A note on statistical significance of scalogram. Sociometry, 1961, 24, 312, September.
- Starbuck, W. H. Testing case-descriptive models. Behavioral Science, 1961, 6, 191, July.
- Stone, M. Subjective discrimination as a statistical method. British Journal of Statistical Psychology, 1961, 14, 25, May.
- Turner, W. S. A reexamination of the two kinds of scientific conjecture. Psychological Record, 1961, 11, 279, July.
- Waters, L. K., and Wherry, R. J., Jr. Evaluation of two forced-choice response formats. Personnel Psychology, 1961, 14, 285, Autumn.
- Webster, F. M., Jr. Why management games? Data Processing, 1961, 3, 9, August.
- Willis, R. H. Data-collection procedures for the method of controlled marginals. Journal of Social Psychology, 1961, 54, 367, August.

Motivation and Personality

- Babladelis, G. Personality and verbal conditioning effects. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology, 1961, 62, 41, January.
- Bindra, D. Components of general activity and the analysis of behavior. Psychological Review, 1961, 68, 205, May.
- Bovard, E. W. A note on the threshold for emotional stress. Psychological Review, 1961, 68, 216, May.
- Cowen, E. L., Staiman, M. G., and Wolitzky, D. The social desirability of trait descriptive terms: applications to a schizophrenic sample. Journal of Social Psychology, 1961, 54, 37, June.
- Dillon, D. J. The variation of choice reaction time among groups of hospitalized psychiatric patients. Journal of Psychology, 1961, 52, 105, July.
- Guertin, W. H. Medical and statistical-psychological models for research in schizophrenia. Behavioral Science, 1961, 6, 200, July.
- Haywood, H. C. Relationships among anxiety, seeking of novel stimuli, and level of unassimilated percepts. Journal of Personality, 1961, 29, 105, June.
- Heilbrun, A. B., Jr., and Goodstein, L. D. The relationships between individually defined and group defined social desirability and performance on the Edwards Personal Preference Schedule. Journal of Consulting Psychology, 1961, 25, 200, June.
- Hilgard, E. R., and Hommel, L. S. Selective amnesia for events within hypnosis in relation to repression. Journal of Personality, 1961, 29, 205, June.

Hunt, J. McV., and Quay, H. C. Early vibratory experience and the question of innate reinforcement value of vibration and other stimuli: a limitation on the discrepancy (burnt soup) principle in motivation. Psychological Review, 1961, 68, 149, May.

Jessor, R. Issues in the phenomenological approach to personality. Journal of Individual Psychology, 1961, 17, 27, May.

Kagan, J., and Moss, H. A. The availability of conflictful ideas: a neglected parameter in assessing projective test responses. Journal of Personality, 1961, 29, 217, June.

Keehn, J. D. Response sets and the Maudsley Personality Inventory. Journal of Social Psychology, 1961, 54, 141, June.

Kilpatrick, F. P. Personality in transactional psychology. Journal of Individual Psychology, 1961, 17, 12, May.

Knapp, R. H., and Green, H. B. The judgment of music-filled intervals and  $n$  achievement. Journal of Social Psychology, 1961, 54, 263, August.

Krause, M. W., The measurement of transitory anxiety. Psychological Review, 1961, 68, 178, May.

Linn, E. L. Tolerance of deviant behavior. Human Organization, 1961, 20, 92, Summer.

Lowe, C. M. The self-concept: fact or artifact? Psychological Bulletin, 1961, 58, 325, July.

Luchins, A. S. Some aspects of Wertheimer's approach to personality. Journal of Individual Psychology, 1961, 17, 20, May.

Luckey, E. B. Perceptual congruence of self and family concepts as related to marital interaction. Sociometry, 1961, 24, 234, September.

Martin, B. The assessment of anxiety by physiological behavioral measures. Psychological Bulletin, 1961, 58, 234, May.

Merrifield, P. R., Guilford, J. P., Christensen, P. R., and Frick, J. W. Interrelationships between certain abilities and certain traits of motivation and temperament. Journal of General Psychology, 1961, 65, 57, July.

Messick, S., and Jackson, D. N. Acquiescence and the factorial interpretation of the MMPI. Psychological Bulletin, 1961, 58, 299, July.

Patterson, C. H. The self in recent Rogerian Theory. Journal of Individual Psychology, 1961, 17, 5, May.

Perloe, S. I. Assimilation as a consequence of categorization. Journal of Personality, 1961, 29, 148, June.

Prentice, W. C. H. Some cognitive aspects of motivation. American Psychologist, 1961, 16, 503, July.

Rees, M. E., and Goldman, M. Some relationships between creativity and personality. Journal of General Psychology, 1961, 65, 145, July.

Reese, H. W. Manifest anxiety and achievement test performance. Journal of Educational Psychology, 1961, 52, 132, June.

Reitman, W. R. Need achievement, fear of failure, and selective recall. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology, 1961, 62, 142, January.

Rosen, B. C. Family structure and achievement motivation. American Sociological Review, 1961, 26, 574, August.

Rudin, S. A. The relationship between rational and irrational authoritarianism. Journal of Psychology, 1961, 52, 179, July.

Stotland, E. Motivation for security, certainty, and self-esteem. Journal of General Psychology, 1961, 65, 75, July.

Sutton, R. S. An analysis of factors related to educational achievement. Journal of Genetic Psychology, 1961, 98, 193, June.

Taylor, J. A., and Rennie, B. Recovery from approach-avoidance conflict as a function of escape and displacement experiences. Journal of Comparative and Physiological Psychology, 1961, 54, 275, June.

Opinions and Attitudes

Bloom, L., De Crespigny, A. R. C., and Spence, J. E. An inter-disciplinary study of social, moral, and political attitudes of white and non-white South African university students. Journal of Social Psychology, 1961, 54, 3, June.

Deutsch, M., and Proshansky, H. Information and opinion during an international crisis. Journal of Social Psychology, 1961, 54, 169, June.

Garrison, K. C. Worldminded attitudes of college students in a southern university. Journal of Social Psychology, 1961, 54, 147, June.

Greenberg, H. M. The development of an integration attitude scale. Journal of Social Psychology, 1961, 54, 103, June.

Joseph, J. Research note: attitudes of 600 adolescent girls to work and marriage. British Journal of Sociology, 1961, 12, 176, June.

Lang, K., and Lang, G. E. Ordeal by debate: viewer reactions. Public Opinion Quarterly, 1961, 25, 277, Summer.

Lawton, M. P., and Goldman, A. E. Cigarette smoking and attitude toward the etiology of lung cancer. Journal of Social Psychology, 1961, 54, 235, August.

Markham, J. W. Foreign news in the United States and South American press. Public Opinion Quarterly, 1961, 25, 249, Summer.

McKenna, H. V. Religious attitudes and personality traits. Journal of Social Psychology, 1961, 54, 379, August.

McLachlan, D., Jr. Communication networks and monitoring. Public Opinion Quarterly, 1961, 25, 194, Summer.

Merrill, I. R. Broadcast viewing and listening by children. Public Opinion Quarterly, 1961, 25, 263, Summer.

Roper, E. College ambitions and parental planning. Public Opinion Quarterly, 1961, 25, 159, Summer.

Stearns, B. J. Five fallacies about women. Journal of Marketing, 1961, 25, 50, July.

Westerstahl, J., Sarlvik, B., and Janson, E. An experiment with information pamphlets on civil defense. Public Opinion Quarterly, 1961, 25, 236, Summer.

Cognitive Processes and Individual Decision Making

Adams, J. A. The second facet of forgetting: a review of warm-up decrement. Psychological Bulletin, 1961, 58, 257, July.

Aldis, O. Of pigeons and men. Harvard Business Review, 1961, 39, 59, July-August.

Barmack, J. E., and Payne, D. E. Injury-producing private motor vehicle accidents among airmen: psychological models of accident-generating processes. Journal of Psychology 1961, 52, 3, July.

Baron, A., and Littman, R. A. Studies of individual and paired interactional problem-solving behavior of rats: II. Solitary and social controls. Genetic Psychology Monographs, 1961, 64, 129, August.

Bloom, J. M., and Capaldi, E. J. The behavior of rats in relation to complex patterns of partial reinforcement. Journal of Comparative and Physiological Psychology, 1961, 54, 261, June.

Bourne, L. E., Jr., and Beier, E. G. Effect of duration of inspection upon kinesthetic figural aftereffects. Journal of General Psychology, 1961, 65, 163, July.

Burt, C. Intelligence and social mobility. British Journal of Statistical Psychology, 1961, 14, 3, May.

Cadoret, R. J. Some applications of information theory to card-calling performance in ESP. Journal of General Psychology, 1961, 65, 89, July.

Christiansen, K. C. Response duration as a measure of ambivalent response tendencies. Journal of Personality, 1961, 29, 115, June.

Cline, V. B., and Richards, J. M., Jr. A comparison of individuals versus groups in judging personality. Journal of Applied Psychology, 1961, 45, 150, June.

Cohen, A. R. Cognitive tuning as a factor affecting impression formation. Journal of Personality, 1961, 29, 235, June.

Cotton, J. W., and Jensen, G. D. Extinction and reacquisition after differential numbers of acquisition sessions. Journal of General Psychology, 1961, 65, 189, July.

Crane, R. R. The place of scientific techniques in mergers and acquisitions. The Controller, 1961, 29, 326, July.

Davis, R., Sutherland, N. W., and Judd, B. R. Information content in recognition and recall. Journal of Experimental Psychology, 1961, 61, 422, May.

Dyer, D. W., and Harcum, E. R. Visual perception of binary patterns by preschool children and by school children. Journal of Educational Psychology, 1961, 52, 161, June.

Edwards, W. Costs and payoffs are instructions. Psychological Review, 1961, 68, 275, July.

Eisenberg, E. Aggregation of utility functions. Management Science, 1961, 7, 337, July.

Elkind, D. Children's discovery of the conservation of mass, weight, and volume: Piaget Replication Study II. Journal of Genetic Psychology, 1961, 98, 219, June.

Epstein, W., and De Shazo, D. Recency as a function of perceptual oscillation. American Journal of Psychology, 1961, 74, 215, June.

Estes, W. K. A descriptive approach to the dynamics of choice behavior. Behavioral Science, 1961, 6, 177, July.

Feigenbaum, E. A., and Simon, H. A. Comment: The distinctiveness of stimuli. Psychological Review, 1961, 68, 285, July.

Fey, C. F. An investigation of some mathematical models for learning. Journal of Experimental Psychology, 1961, 61, 455, June.

Fillenbaum, S. Own position in relation to estimates of average standing and desirability for more and less self-comparable objects. Journal of Personality, 1961, 29, 195, June.

Fillenbaum, S. How fat is fat? Some consequences of similarity between judge and judged object. Journal of Psychology, 1961, 52, 133, July.

Frey, A. H. Human behavior and atmospheric ions. Psychological Review, 1961, 68, 225, May.

Gaito, J. A biochemical approach to learning and memory. Psychological Review, 1961, 68, 288, July.

Gardner, R. A. Multiple-choice decision-behavior with dummy choices. American Journal of Psychology, 1961, 74, 205, June.

Gemelli, A., and Alberoni, F. Experimental studies of the concept of chance. Journal of General Psychology, 1961, 65, 3, July.

Glickman, S. E. Perseverative neural processes and consolidation of the memory trace. Psychological Bulletin, 1961, 58, 218, May.

Goss, A. E., Verbal mediating responses and concept formation. Psychological Review, 1961, 68, 248, July.

Guilford, J. P., Christensen, P. R., Frick, J. W., and Merrifield, P. R. Factors of interest in think-

- ing. Journal of General Psychology, 1961, 65, 39, July.
- Harleston, B. W., and Cunningham, S. M. Task difficulty and anxiety level as factors affecting performance in a verbal learning situation. Journal of Psychology, 1961, 52, 77, July.
- Helm, C. E., Messick, S., and Tucker, L. R. Psychological models for relating discrimination and magnitude estimation scales. Psychological Review, 1961, 68, 167, May.
- Hodgden, L. H. Variability of behavior as a function of intelligence and incentive. Journal of Personality, 1961, 29, 183, June.
- Jensen, A. R. On the reformulation of inhibitions in Hull's System. Psychological Bulletin, 1961, 58, 274, July.
- Jensen, B. J., Tilton, J. R., and Anderson, D. N. Differential effects of knowledge of results and discussion. Ergonomics, 1961, 4, 183, April.
- Johnson, D. M., and Hall, E. R. Organization of relevant and irrelevant words in the solution of verbal problems. Journal of Psychology, 1961, 52, 99, July.
- Johnson, J. I., Jr. Double alternation by raccoons. Journal of Comparative and Physiological Psychology, 1961, 54, 248, June.
- Kamano, D. K., and Drew, J. E. Selectivity in memory of personally significant material. Journal of General Psychology, 1961, 65, 25, July.
- Kanfer, F. H., and McBrearty, J. F. Verbal conditioning: discrimination and awareness. Journal of Psychology, 1961, 52, 115, July.
- Karn, H. W., and Gregg, L. W. Acquisition of perceptual responses as a function of loading, location, and repetition. Journal of Experimental Psychology, 1961, 62, 62, July.
- Kaufman, H., and Becker, G. M. The empirical determination of game-theoretical strategies. Journal of Experimental Psychology, 1961, 61, 462, June.
- Kellner, A. D. Can "response set" be controlled? Journal of General Psychology, 1961, 65, 171, July.
- Kendler, T. S., and Kendler, H. H. Inferential behavior in children: II. The influence of order of presentation. Journal of Experimental Psychology, 1961, 61, 442, May.
- Kenkel, W. F. Dominance, persistence, self-confidence, and spousal roles in decision making. Journal of Social Psychology, 1961, 54, 349, August.
- Kidd, J. S. A comparison of two methods of training in a complex task by means of task simulation. Journal of Applied Psychology, 1961, 45, 165, June.
- Klausmeier, H. J., and Loughlin, L. J. Behaviors during problem solving among children of low, average, and high intelligence. Journal of Educational Psychology, 1961, 52, 148, June.
- Llewellyn, R. W. A game-information theoretic decision model. Journal of Industrial Engineering, 1961, 12, 159, May-June.
- Luchins, A. S., and Luchins, E. H. Imitation by rote and by understanding. Journal of Social Psychology, 1961, 54, 175, June.
- McCollough, C. Forming and acting on impressions. Journal of Psychology, 1961, 52, 63, July.
- Messick, S. The perceived structure of political relationships. Sociometry, 1961, 24, 270, September.
- Miller, L. B., and Estes, B. W. Monetary reward and motivation in discrimination learning. Journal of Experimental Psychology, 1961, 61, 501, June.
- Miner, J. B. On the use of a short vocabulary test to measure general intelligence. Journal of Educational Psychology, 1961, 52, 157, June.
- Neimark, E. D. Information-gathering in diagnostic problem-solving: a preliminary report. Psychological Record, 1961, 11, 243, July.
- Nettler, G. Good men, bad men, and the perception of reality. Sociometry, 1961, 24, 279, September.
- Noble, C. E. Meaningfulness ( $m$ ) and transfer phenomena in serial verbal learning. Journal of Psychology, 1961, 52, 201, July.
- Osler, S. F., and Fivel, M. W. Concept Attainment: I. The role of age and intelligence in concept attainment by induction. Journal of Experimental Psychology, 1961, 62, 1, July.
- Osler, S. F., and Trautman, G. E. Concept attainment: II. Effect of stimulus complexity upon concept attainment at two levels of intelligence. Journal of Experimental Psychology, 1961, 62, 9, July.
- Parnes, S. J. Effects of extended effort in creative problem solving. Journal of Educational Psychology, 1961, 52, 117, June.
- Postman, L., and Sassenrath, J. The automatic action of verbal rewards and punishments. Journal of General Psychology, 1961, 65, 109, July.
- Prokasy, W. F., Jr. Nonrandom stimulus sampling in statistical learning theory. Psychological Review, 1961, 68, 219, May.
- Pronko, N. H. Perspectives in psychology: XVIII. Some reflections on perception. Psychological Record, 1961, 11, 311, July.
- Rasmussen, E. A., and Archer, E. J. Concept identification as a function of language pretraining and task complexity. Journal of Experimental Psychology, 1961, 61, 437, May.
- Rosenberg, S. Retroactive inhibition in incidental learning. American Journal of Psychology, 1961, 74, 283, June.
- Rotter, J. B., Liverant, S., and Crowne, D. P. The growth and extinction of expectancies in chance controlled and skilled tasks. Journal of Psychology, 1961, 52, 161, July.

Scharf, B. Complex sounds and critical bands. Psychological Bulletin, 1961, 58, 205, May.

Schoonard, J. W., and Restle, F. Analysis of double alternation in terms of patterns of stimuli and responses. Journal of Experimental Psychology, 1961, 61, 365, May.

Scodel, A. Value orientations and preference for a minimax strategy. Journal of Psychology, 1961, 62, 55, July.

Silberman, H. F., Melaragno, R. J., Coulson, J. E., and Estavan, D. Fixed sequence versus branching autoinstructional methods. Journal of Educational Psychology, 1961, 52, 166, June.

Staats, A. W. Verbal habit-families, concepts, and the operant conditioning of word classes. Psychological Review, 1961, 68, 190, May.

Sutton, S., Hakerem, G., Zubin, J., and Portnoy, M. The effect of shift of sensory modality on serial reaction-time: a comparison of schizophrenics and normals. American Journal of Psychology, 1961, 74, 224, June.

Tullock, G. Utility, strategy, and social decision rules: Comment. Quarterly Journal of Economics, 1961, 75, 493, August.

Underwood, B. J. Ten years of massed practice on distributed practice. Psychological Review, 1961, 68, 229, July.

Vickrey, W. Risk, utility, and social policy. Social Research, 1961, 28, 205, Summer.

Vickrey, W. Utility, strategy, and social decision rules: Reply. Quarterly Journal of Economics, 1961, 75, 496, August.

Wilson, W. R., and Becknell, J. C. The relation between the association value, pronunciability, and affectivity of nonsense syllables. Journal of Psychology, 1961, 52, 47, July.

Wright, B. "Goals" and "values" revaluated. American Journal of Psychology, 1961, 74, 310, June.

Zeigler, H. P. Learning-set formation in pigeons. Journal of Comparative and Physiological Psychology, 1961, 54, 252, June.

Interpersonal Influence

Adams, J. S. Reduction of cognitive dissonance by seeking consonant information. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology, 1961, 62, 74, January.

Allyn, J., and Festinger, L. The effectiveness of unanticipated persuasive communications. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology, 1961, 62, 35, January.

Attowe, J. M., Jr. Interpersonal decision making: the resolution of a dyadic conflict. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology, 1961, 62, 114, January.

Cervin, V. B., and Henderson, G. P. Statistical theory of persuasion. Psychological Review, 1961, 68, 157, May.

Gardner, R. W. Cognitive controls of attention deployment as determinants of visual illusions. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology, 1961, 62, 120, January.

Luchins, A. S., and Luchins, E. H. Social influences on impressions of personality. Journal of Social Psychology, 1961, 54, 111, June.

Luchins, A. S., and Luchins, E. H. Social influences on judgment of changing evidence. Journal of Social Psychology, 1961, 54, 13, June.

Osgood, C. E., Ware, E. E., and Morris, C. Analysis of the connotative meanings of a variety of human values as expressed by American college students. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology, 1961, 62, 62, January.

Pilisuk, M. Cognitive balance and the reception of unpleasant information: an exploratory study. Dissertation Abstracts, 1961, 22, August.

Tuddenham, R. D. The influence of a distorted group norm upon judgments of adults and children. Journal of Psychology, 1961, 52, 231, July.

Weiss, W. The effects of a communication attitude change and scale judgments. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology, 1961, 62, 133, January.

Group Behavior

Bach, M. L. Factors related to student participation in campus social organizations. Journal of Social Psychology, 1961, 54, 337, August.

Blake, R. R., and Mouton, J. S. Reactions to intergroup competition under win-lose conditions. Management Science, 1961, 7, 420, July.

Borgatta, E. F. Role-playing specification, personality, and performance. Sociometry, 1961, 24, 218, September.

Freeman, H. E., and Simmons, O. G. Consensus and coalition in the release of mental patients. Human Organization, 1961, 20, 89, Summer.

Gamson, W. A. An experimental test of a theory of coalition formation. American Sociological Review, 1961, 26, 565, August.

Gellert, E. Stability and fluctuation in the power relationships of young children. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology, 1961, 62, 8, January.

Goldman, M., Bolen, M. E., and Martin, R. B. Some conditions under which groups operate and how this affects their performance. Journal of Social Psychology, 1961, 54, 47, June.

Gruen, W. Some factors in the etiology of social interaction and group formation. Journal of Social Psychology, 1961, 54, 57, June.

Hamblin, R. L., Miller, K., and Wiggins, J. A. Group morale and competence of the leader. Sociometry, 1961, 24, 295, September.

Hare, A. P. Computer simulation of interaction in small groups. Behavioral Science, 1961, 6, 261, July.

Jackson, D. D., and Weakland, J. H. Conjoint family therapy: some considerations on theory, technique, and results. Psychiatry, 1961, 24, 30, May (supplement).

Kenkel, W. F. Husband-wife interaction in decision making and decision choices. Journal of Social Psychology, 1961, 54, 255, August.

Kiessling, R. J., and Kalish, R. A. Correlates of success in leaderless group discussion. Journal of Social Psychology, 1961, 54, 359, August.

Luchins, A. S., and Luchins, E. H. Intentional and unintentional models in social learning. Journal of Social Psychology, 1961, 54, 321, August.

Sechrest, L., and Jackson, D. N. Social intelligence and accuracy of interpersonal predictions. Journal of Personality, 1961, 29, 167, June.

Shaw, M. E. A serial position effect in social influence on group decisions. Journal of Social Psychology, 1961, 54, 83, June.

Sprunger, J. A. The ability of the individual to contribute to his group. Personnel Psychology, 1961, 14, 317, Autumn.

Stevenson, H. W., and Cruse, D. B. The effectiveness of social reinforcement with normal and feeble-minded children. Journal of Personality, 1961, 29, 124, June.

Stevenson, H. W., and Fahel, L. S. The effect of social reinforcement on the performance of institutionalized and noninstitutionalized normal and feeble-minded children. Journal of Personality, 1961, 29, 136, June.

Tannenbaum, A. S. Control and effectiveness in a voluntary organization. American Journal of Sociology, 1961, 67, 33, July.

Ullmann, L. P., Krasner, L., and Collins, B. J. Modification of behavior through verbal conditioning: effects in group therapy. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology, 1961, 62, 128, January.

Winick, C., and Holt, H. Seating position as nonverbal communication in group analysis. Psychiatry, 1961, 24, 171, May.

Organizational Behavior

Baumgartel, H., and Goldstein, G. Some human consequences of change. Personnel Administration, 1961, 24, 32, July-August.

Baumhart, R. C. How ethical are businessmen? Harvard Business Review, 1961, 39, 6, July-August.

Carlson, R. O. Succession and performance among school superintendents. Administrative Science Quarterly, 1961, 6, 210, September.

Clark, P. B., and Wilson, J. Q. Incentive systems: a theory of organizations. Administrative Science Quarterly, 1961, 6, 129, September.

Colvard, R. Foundations and professions: the organizational defense of autonomy. Administrative Science Quarterly, 1961, 6, 167, September.

Crozier, M. Human relations at the management level. Human Organization, 1961, 20, 51, Summer.

Daiute, R. J. Mary Parker Follett: philosopher of business. Advanced Management, 1961, 26, 18, July-August.

Elling, R. H., and Halebsky, S. Organizational differentiation and support: a conceptual framework. Administrative Science Quarterly, 1961, 6, 185, September.

Evan, W. M. Organization man and due process of law. American Sociological Review, 1961, 26, 540, August.

Giedt, F. H., and Thomsen, M. J. Formal organization, ideological structure, and patterns of communication among a hospital special service staff. Journal of Social Psychology, 1961, 54, 249, August.

Golembiewski, R. T. Three styles of leadership and their uses. Personnel, 1961, 38, 34, July-August.

Haberstroh, C. J. Administration of safety in the steel industry. Management Science, 1961, 7, 436, July.

Indik, B. P. Organization size and member participation. Dissertation Abstracts, 1961, 22, August.

Krugman, H. E. Organization structure and the organization man. Personnel, 1961, 38, 18, March-April.

Litwak, E. Models of bureaucracy which permit conflict. American Journal of Sociology, 1961, 67, 177, September.

Malmgren, H. B. Information, expectations and the theory of the firm. The Quarterly Journal of Economics, 1961, 75, 399, August.

Mann, J. W. Group relations in hierarchies. Journal of Social Psychology, 1961, 54, 283, August.

Marsh, R. M. Formal organization and promotion in a pre-industrial society. American Sociological Review, 1961, 26, 547, August.

Massey, R. J., and Suojanen, W. W. Bureaucracy, command, or management. Advanced Management, 1961, 26, 24, July-August.

Meier, R. L. Explorations in the realm of organization theory. IV: The simulation of social organization. Behavioral Science, 1961, 6, 232, July.

Parkinson, C. N. The art of being no. 2. Fortune, 1961, 63, 123, September.

Rosen, H. Desirable attributes of work: four levels of management describe their job environments. Journal of Applied Psychology, 1961, 45, 156, June.

Trow, D. B. Executive succession in small companies. Administrative Science Quarterly, 1961, 6, 228, September.

Weinwurm, G. F. Computer management control systems through the looking glass. Management Science, 1961, 7, 411, July.

White, H. Management conflict and sociometric structure. American Journal of Sociology, 1961, 67, 185, September.

Wilson, H. B. The "functionaline" organization plan. The Office, 1961, 54, 14, July.

Voting Behavior

Frost, R. T. Stability and change in local party politics. Public Opinion Quarterly, 1961, 25, 221, Summer.

McPhee, W. N. Abstract of empirical inputs in a voting model. Behavioral Science, 1961, 6, 265, July.

McPhee, W. N. Note on a campaign simulator. Public Opinion Quarterly, 1961, 25, 184, Summer.

White, H. B. The processed voter and the new political science. Social Research, 1961, 28, 127, Summer.

Culture and Institutions

Abu-Lughod, J. Migrant adjustment to city life: the Egyptian case. American Journal of Sociology, 1961, 67, 22, July.

Beattie, J. H. M. Culture contact and social change. British Journal of Sociology, 1961, 12, 165, June.

Bernberg, R. E. The measurement of two personality traits within a socio-cultural framework. Educational and Psychological Measurement, 1961, 21, 349, Summer.

Croog, S. H. Ethnic origins and responses to a health questionnaire. Human Organization, 1961, 20, 65, Summer.

Fischer, J. L. The Japanese schools for the natives of Truk. Human Organization, 1961, 20, 83, Summer.

Golstein, B., and Eichhorn, R. L. The changing Protestant Ethic: rural patterns in health, work, and leisure. American Sociological Review, 1961, 26, 557, August.

Goody, J. Religion and ritual: the definitional problem. British Journal of Sociology, 1961, 12, 142, June.

Katz, E. The social itinerary of technical change. Human Organization, 1961, 20, 70, Summer.

Lopreato, J. Social stratification and mobility in a South Italian town. American Sociological Review, 1961, 26, 585, August.

MacLay, H., and Ware, E. E. Cross-cultural use of the semantic differential. Behavioral Science, 1961, 6, 185, July.

Marsh, R. M., and O'Hara, A. R. Attitudes toward marriage and the family in Taiwan. American Journal of Sociology, 1961, 67, 1, July.

Park, G. K., and Soltow, L. Politics and social structure in a Norwegian village. American Journal of Sociology, 1961, 67, 152, September.

Prentice, N. M. Ethnic attitudes, neuroticism, and culture. Journal of Social Psychology, 1961, 54, 75, June.

Rogler, L. H., and Hollingshead, A. B. The Puerto Rican spiritualist as a psychiatrist. American Journal of Sociology, 1961, 67, 17, July.

Steinmann, A. The vocational roles of older married women. Journal of Social Psychology, 1961, 54, 93, June.

Wechsler, H. Community growth, depressive disorders, and suicide. American Journal of Sociology, 1961, 67, 9, July.

West, S. S. Class origin of scientists. Sociometry, 1961, 24, 251, September.

Wilensky, H. L. Orderly careers and social participation: the impact of work history on social integration in the middle class. American Sociological Review, 1961, 26, 521, August.

Winick, C. Anthropology's contributions to marketing. Journal of Marketing, 1961, 25, 53, July.

Works, E. The prejudice-interaction hypothesis from the point of view of the negro minority group. American Journal of Sociology, 1961, 67, 47, July.

Young, M., and Geertz, H. Old age in London and San Francisco: some families compared. British Journal of Sociology, 1961, 12, 124, June.

AMERICAN GOVERNMENT AND POLITICS

Justice Frankfurter and Civil Liberties. By CLYDE E. JACOBS. (Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1961. Pp. viii, 265. $5.00.)

The constitutional issues of paramount importance confronting the Supreme Court of our times are those arising under the guarantees of individual rights against oppressive acts of government. The search for the well-springs of the philosophical, intellectual and emotional forces which shape the thinking of individual members of the Court and cause them oftentimes to take sharply opposed positions on issues of this kind presents a continuing challenge to legal scholars. Inquiries of this kind lead inevitably to an examination of the constitutional jurisprudence of the two justices who currently represent a polarization of viewpoints on such issues on the present Court, Justices Felix Frankfurter and Hugo Black. The work here dealt with is a worthy addition to a rapidly growing body of scholarly research of this kind.

Professor Jacobs' approach to his task is direct and logical. An introductory chapter entitled "Libertarian Activist," reviews briefly the pre-Court career of Frankfurter as a champion of what were then deemed liberal causes. It may come as a surprise to some of his recent critics to learn, for example, that he was one of the founders of the American Civil Liberties Union. The next seven chapters are devoted to a systematic analysis, in depth, of Justice Frankfurter's opinions—majority, concurring and dissenting—in cases involving civil liberties issues. Race discrimination cases arising under the equal protection clause are not covered, however, since the Court has been able to speak on such issues with relatively little disagreement among its members. A concluding chapter is given over to a general summary of Frankfurter's conception of the role of the Court in the area of civil liberties. There is a complete documentation of sources, along with a useful index and table of cases; but the devotee of the mathematically-oriented approach to the study of judicial behavior will be disappointed—as the non-mathematically inclined will no doubt be relieved—to note there are no scalograms, scattergrams, Guttman scales, indices of cohesion, etc., to over-simplify the subject matter and to mystify and impress the uninitiated.

There emerges a kind of profile of Justice Frankfurter in this area of constitutional interpretation against a background supplied by the views of his colleagues. To some extent, this profile necessarily takes on a Frankfurter vs. Black character; but this is by no means the general theme. The author's viewpoint is that of a detached, objective analyst rather than that of champion and advocate; but his analysis is characterized by a sympathetic understanding and appreciation of Justice Frankfurter's views on civil liberties issues. There is much in this volume that is not fresh and new to anyone who has followed the course of constitutional construction by the Court fairly closely in recent years. What the author does beyond this is to present Frankfurter as a Supreme Court justice with a generally consistent concept of the function of the Court in dealing with the complex issues presented in civil liberties cases, as a judge who is able to subordinate his own personal views on the merits of the public policy issues involved to his higher responsibility to the law and its orderly development.

Frankfurter's approach is that of the pragmatic-empiricist rather than that of the idealist. This is perhaps best illustrated in his rejection of the simplistic formulas of Justices Black and Douglas in favor of a more complex system of evaluation of relevant factors in freedom of speech cases. In general, it is his view that there are a variety of constitutionally valid ends and principles that must be recognized and, if possible, harmonized in a rational way in civil liberties cases. Along with the individual's claims to a constitutionally guaranteed immunity there must be taken into account such equally valid considerations as those arising out of the principles of separation of powers, federalism, and respect for continuity in the evolution of the law and for the judgments on social values made by the politically responsible agencies of government. Frankfurter's is a relatively modest view of the capacity of the Court to save the people from their own follies under a democratic scheme of government. Its duty is to dispense justice under the law, not to dispense justice as the individual members of the Court perceive it in the abstract. He recognizes that the role of the individual judge necessarily must be that of a high priest of the law; but he should behave as a priest conscious of his own infirmities, of his human fallibility and of his somewhat clouded claim to apostolic authority.

Justice Frankfurter, according to some of his critics, has "no feel for the dominant issues." He is, in their eyes, a mere "weaver of crochet patterns of legalism on the fringes of the case," a practitioner of "petty skills," a "narrow academician engrossed in the trivia of formal legal propriety." This thoughtful, well-balanced and scholarly analysis of Frankfurter's constitutional jurisprudence in the area of civil liberties is an effective answer to those who would dismiss so lightly his claim to pre-eminence as a craftsman of the law.—JOSEPH E. KALLENBACH, University of Michigan.

Presidential Transitions. BY LAURIN L. HENRY. (Washington, D. C.: The Brookings Institution, 1960. Pp. 755. $7.50.)

As Laurin Henry demonstrates in this volume, a presidential "transition" encompasses an elusively indefinite span of time. The formal period of transition, between the election and the president's inauguration, is laden with ambiguities, among them the existence of a president-elect without authority, a party in office that has been repudiated by the electorate, and a civil service partially disengaged from policies which it is still obliged to administer. But, as the author makes clear, this is not the only period of confusion and uncertainty. The actual process of transition begins weeks before the nominating conventions and invariably extends well into the year following the inaugural ceremony. The ample time perspective together with another lesson implicit in the volume (that custom, personality, and circumstance rather than institutional formalities mold the transfer of power) sets the tone of an excellent study. As the author's chronology makes clear, where once the transfer of power could be leisurely, the necessities of a continuing national security emergency give a compelling urgency to preparations for the assumption of power by the incoming administration and constructive cooperation by the weary incumbents.

Four periods of transition are discussed at length. All of them—the Taft-Wilson, Wilson-Harding, Hoover-Roosevelt, and Truman-Eisenhower transitions—occurred in the twentieth century and all were characterized by a change of party control in the White House. The author describes in detail the political environment and the personalities of the important actors in each of these transitional situations. While in each instance many administrators in the lower echelons succeeded in establishing contact to ease the transition, the presidents and presidents-elect were not always as successful. Woodrow Wilson was respectfully uncooperative both in 1912 and 1920. In 1932 and 1952 there seemed to be presidential awareness of the need for contact, but efforts at cooperation at the highest level were marked by muted disrespect. In the latter transitions cooperation was made more difficult by bitterness stirred up in the campaign, a strong element of personal antagonism, and, typically, misapplied self-assuredness on the part of the newly elected leadership.

The administrative disruption inherent in all presidential transitions seems to defy any clear solution. Beyond the desirable goal of continuity and the expectation of reasonable foresight on the part of both presidential candidates as to what they will do "if," there are few specific guidelines. The proposals made in this volume are necessarily vague, largely because a truly effective transition will depend on such unpredictable variables as personality, the residue of partisan rancor, or the flow of international events. Not the least important is the fact that a president-elect can learn to govern only when full presidential power is finally in his hands. For this reason, perhaps the most significant period of transition occurs after the president's inauguration.

Within the range of these uncertainties, the author seems to conclude that the president can initiate measures which will help to train the president-elect, while the president-elect can exercise foresight by appointing a staff early in the campaign which will help him to arrange the mechanics of change. Both of these requirements were anticipated by President-elect Kennedy and President Eisenhower. It is to be hoped that the Brookings Institution will publish an evaluation of this latest presidential transition.

All in all, Presidential Transitions is an impressive example of sound administrative history. The documentation is thorough and the author's style is clear and readable. It may be of some interest to those attentive to shifting methodological sands that the author seems to give a slight bow of apology to political "behaviorists" in his preface. He remarks that he did not adopt a more rigorous "formal analysis" because it "might add little real enlightenment and lose much of the color and 'feel' of inherently interesting events." In this instance, certainly, the reason seems sufficient.—RICHARD P. LONGAKER, University of California (Los Angeles).

Problems of American Economic Growth. By BRUCE R. MORRIS. (New York: Oxford University Press, 1961. Pp. viii, 279. $2.50.)

Some of us want growth so that we can "beat the Russians"; others want economic growth to improve the American standard of living. But few in recent years would consider growth unimportant. The economists have responded with increased attention to the problems of growth, although their attention has perhaps been predominantly directed toward the somewhat different situation of achieving growth in underdeveloped economies.

The present book does not pretend to report original research by its author, but to "bring the problems we face to the attention of beginning students and of the adult population." To the clientele for this laudable objective, we may add political scientists. For the problems, it turns out, are as much political as economic.

Defining growth as an increase in the per capita annual output of goods and services, Morris devotes a chapter to each of the major determining factors of the growth rate, emphasizing the obstacles or complexities to be faced. The factors studied are: raw materials, population trends and the supply of workers; capital formation; technological change and entrepreneurship; consumer demand; government expenditure; and foreign trade. Concerning consumer demand, by way of illustration, the author notes the tight-rope to be walked between over-consumption at the expense of investment, and over-investment at the cost of insufficient purchasing power to take goods off the market. The economic problem is to find the optimal relationship. The political (or politico-economic) problems include the distribution of income and the pattern of taxation. Will the ethically optimal degree of income equality, or income inequality, also be best for growth? If the two conflict, how is the value conflict to be resolved? Does our political system have the capacity for economic rationality that policies for growth may require? Such questions arise in each chapter, although the author does not make explicit all of the political issues contained in his analysis.

When the author summarizes the "few most vital factors" in achieving growth, however, these turn out to be primarily matters of governmental policy: promotion of education; "solving" the problem of income distribution; "settlement" of the "relative powers of the groups into which we have formed"; "determining" our role in international society; and deciding the place of growth among our national objectives. As the words in quotation suggest, Morris' political analysis tends to be static as well as sketchy; yet he may have served a useful if not fully intended purpose if his list of policy factors awakens political scientists to the vast tasks of power and value analysis imbedded in this area of economics. Growth may be almost universally thought good, but its achievement will test severely American capacity for integrated policy formation, and may create notable conflicts with other revered values: social and economic stability, equity in the distribution of rewards and hardships, and ever-increasing private consumption.

Unfortunately, one's pleasure with the utility of the book as a primer for understanding (by one's self or one's students) is somewhat diminished by certain aspects of its style. To this reviewer, at least, the author seems to be writing down. He is also maddeningly vague at times: e.g., "the device of seniority has merits and defects and must be studied so that it can be fitted into the needs of a growing society." And some sentences are almost meaningless: e.g., "In the last decade we were quite prosperous except for several recessions." In short, Morris has given us a useful book in a crucially important area of government economic policy, but it could be a better one within its own frame of reference. And, because that frame is economic, political scientists will continue to hope that one or more of their own number will provide a companion primer on the politics of economic growth.—MICHAEL D. REAGAN, Syracuse University.

Secrecy and Publicity Dilemmas of Democracy. By FRANCIS E. ROURKE. (Baltimore: The Johns Hopkins Press, 1961. Pp. x, 236. $5.00.)

It is a curious fact that two of the major threats to democracy in the United States are secrecy in government and publicity by government. The former may prevent the public and even Congress from receiving enough information or the kind of information necessary for making rational decisions. The latter may be a device for coercing or punishing private firms or individuals who cannot be successfully prosecuted in the courts. Publicity may also be a means of manipulating public opinion rather than informing it.

Professor Rourke makes clear in his excellent study of these twin evils of government that neither is new in American life. Both, however, have been accentuated by the development of big bureaucracy and the invention of vastly improved means of mass communication.

The problem that has received the most attention over the years has been that of secrecy in the executive branch. President Washington refused to give Congress materials relating to the negotiation of the Jay Treaty. Jefferson declined to provide either Congress or the courts with documents concerning the Burr case on the grounds that some of the materials were merely unevaluated rumors and might therefore be misleading. Most of the strong presidents and some of the lesser ones since Jefferson's time have refused to deliver documents requested by Congress. This action has been accepted, sometimes reluctantly, as essential to the efficient conduct of administration. The effort of the bureaucracy to hide its mistakes and misdeeds from public gaze has, of course, been less well received.

The problem of secrecy has grown more acute in recent years because of the increasing importance of military and foreign affairs. Closely related to these two areas of governmental action has been the inquiry into the loyalty and security of government employees. The executive has consistently refused access to security files to congressional investigating committees.

Congress and the press have been the two major institutions which have sought to break down the policy of secrecy in administration. Both have been aided by that special instrument of the Washington bureaucratic internal welfare—"the leak." In spite of a few celebrated decisions, the courts seem to have played a relatively minor role in limiting government secrecy.

Neither Congress nor the press has consistently pursued a policy of seeking the reduction of executive secrecy. The House Subcommittee on Government Information, for example, found 172 statutes permitting executive agencies to withhold information from the public. Some elements of the press were very vigorous in their demand that Congress enact legislation to counteract the Supreme Court's decision in the Jencks case.

While commending the press for its service in breaking down excessive government secrecy, Professor Rourke notes that the press sometimes fails to recognize any right to privacy. James R. Wiggins, Managing Editor of The Washington Post, he notes, has even criticized the government for withholding the names of persons killed in plane crashes until after the next of kin have been notified. This zeal for the sensational clearly is unrelated to the fundamental problems of governmental secrecy.

If secrecy has been a traditional device used by the bureaucracy to cover its sins of commission and omission, publicity by government agencies has been an executive instrument equally dangerous to the public good. Publicity and the threat of publicity frequently have been the means used by regulatory agencies to force industries to comply with their desires. Sometimes this threat has been legitimate, but sometimes it has been simply an unjustified instrument of coercion. Professor Rourke cites a number of instances to make this latter point clear.

Special attention is given in the book to those congressional investigating committees which have used public hearings and press conferences to prosecute persons appearing before the committees. The author points out, however, that the problem is more complicated than it appears to those who glibly criticize all investigating committees for "exposure for exposure's sake." He notes that Congress may have to expose in order to get at an understanding of the organizations and activities which are the real objects of its hearings. "It becomes improper only when a legislative committee arrogates to itself a judicial function, and deliberately sets itself up to determine the guilt or innocence of particular individuals."

Professor Rourke finds that government publicity and secrecy in the areas of foreign policy and defense raise particularly difficult questions. The author seems to accept the views of those scientists who have asserted that secrecy is actually a hindrance to American scientific development without protecting national security. He also suggests that "it is not at all certain that a community should not choose, from the point of view of its own value system, to tolerate some measure of insecurity in order to gain access to information it needs in order to exercise influence over decisions of vital public policy."

This review has been able to touch on only a few of the many questions raised by Professor Rourke. Throughout the study he has presented the problems fully. His judgments are thoughtful and moderate. The book is well worth a careful reading by scholars concerned with democratic theory and practice.—HOWARD PENNIMAN, Georgetown University.

An Uncertain Tradition: American Secretaries of State in the Twentieth Century. EDITED BY NORMAN A. GRAEBNER. (New York: McGraw-Hill Book Co., 1961. Pp. 341. $6.95.)

Given the dismal state of the world, and a healthy interest in getting out of it alive, people may understandably be attracted to this study of modern American leadership in foreign affairs. One might expect to find in it some retrospective analysis of how we came to our present condition, or some discussion of the types or qualities of leadership in which we might invest more than passing hopes in the years ahead; indeed, the title itself suggests that the study of the diplomatic uncertainties of the past might give us some clues to a more purposive future. But if these are one's hopes or expectations, one is likely to be disappointed, for this passing parade of American statesmanship adds very little to our understanding in any of these respects.

It is hard to come to grips with a collection of essays written by fourteen people, and impossible to do equal justice to each. The authors, mostly historians, labored under a severe space limitation: they seem to have aimed at about twenty pages each. As a result, they have revealed as much about themselves as authors as about their subjects as Secretaries of State. One is tempted to choose his favorites from both lists, but there is little to be gained by so doing: with one or two exceptions, the quality of the individual essays is generally even, reflecting a common approach to the subject. It is this approach that deserves comment here. Structurally, the book contains an historical introduction to our diplomatic status in the year 1898, followed by chapters on fourteen "important" Secretaries from Hay to Dulles. There is no analytical introduction, or conclusion of any kind. The two major defects of the volume, which seriously impair its usefulness to any student of foreign policy or of political science generally, may be summarized as a lack of explicit criteria of judgment and evaluation, and a lack of explicit comparison. These are related, in that it is difficult to make explicit comparisons without explicit criteria of evaluation, but for our present purposes we can look at these separately.

The lack of explicit criteria of evaluation may be translated as the absence of any explicit theoretical structure with respect to foreign policy, the role of the Secretary of State, and diplomacy which would lend meaning and importance to discrete events. As a consequence, the reader moves through fourteen different sets of implicit theories, and confronts an exasperating array of imprecise, undefined judgments; for example: "... it would seem that Kellogg's preoccupation with lawyers resulted in his being less well served by his assistants than he might have been. . . ." "For the new Secretary the issue was clear: one day he would be forced to choose between expediency and principle." "Hughes set out to protect the national interest. . . ." These words tell us nothing, because their precise content is part of an unarticulated structure of theories and values.

The absence of explicit theory and explicit criteria is nowhere felt so keenly as in those parts of each essay in which the authors grope with the question that one may be forgiven for regarding as absolutely central to a study of Secretaries of State: viz., what do we mean by a "good" Secretary? What are the qualities—of person, institution, setting, and so forth—that are associated with "superior performance" in the conduct of foreign affairs? Secretary Knox, we are told, "failed because he lacked the depth of knowledge and the stature needed to be a great Secretary of State." After a brief discussion of Stimson's breeding, military service, academic record, law career, and prior record of public service, it is said that, "Thus, on the whole, he had a reasonably good preparation for his Secretarial post. . . ." Hughes' qualifications are said to have laid "more in his general characteristics of high intelligence, unquestioned integrity, and political availability than in any expert knowledge of international relations." The trouble with such observations and evaluations is that they fail absolutely to do what they seem to do: to distinguish the factors that account for success from those that lead to failure in the job of Secretary of State. How can one get a grasp on the subject when we read that "Skill in the art of politics may or may not be an asset for a State Department head." Or that "What was probably a lifelong habit of caution sometimes stood him in good stead and sometimes stood in the way of needed action?" It is too much to ask, in such short compass, that each author provide his own theories that would clarify and give content to these meaningless generalities; but one would hope that an editor of such a volume would provide a handy set for his authors, or, failing that, would contribute one of his own to integrate the work of his authors. There is some circumstantial evidence in the volume that the editor hoped to use the notion of "national interest" as a unifying theme (it would be too much to call it a theory), but even that term is, mercifully, lost as the authors pay it little beyond lip service.

It is equally incredible that a history of recent American Secretaries of State is nowhere informed by an explicit—not to say a common—definition of diplomacy! The word is used differently in different places; for example, "Hay's deft diplomacy made such a retreat far easier for the British leaders." "Root . . . retained his basic distrust of diplomacy." How is one to relate a man's qualities to his performance of his manifest job, or an important segment of his manifest job, if no effort is made to specify what the latter consists of?

The lack of explicit comparison in the volume constitutes its second major defect. No attempt is made to bring together any relevant aspects of the experiences of Secretaries of State, so that one might hazard tentative generalizations about their significance. The book tells us nothing explicit about the institution of the Secretary of State; it only tells us about fourteen Secretaries who were apparently alike in some respects, and apparently unlike in others. In this context the absence of a chapter that gives, or even attempts, some overview is particularly regrettable. The amount of variation among Secretaries in background, in modus operandi, in operational experiences, in the judgments of "history," is tremendous, and this volume misses an equally tremendous opportunity to try to introduce some order into the subject.

Finally, one is tempted into a further reflection on the uses of the historical method in this particular volume. The life of a Secretary of State during most of the twentieth century has been a succession of awesome choices, where the costs and risks have been high, the moral components not especially attractive, the amount of relevant information inadequate to the demands put on it, and the stars not particularly auspicious. He works from the present into dim and inscrutable futures. His biographer, on the other hand, knows how it all comes out, and has an apparently inescapable tendency to write with a sense of predestination. My guess is that most of the Secretaries who are impaled in this book viewed the problems of their day rather differently than these essays suggest. But this, too, is another way of saying that we need new modes of fact-gathering in the service of more relevant theories.—BERNARD C. COHEN, University of Wisconsin.

Professional Diplomacy in the United States: 1779-1939. BY WARREN FREDERICK ILCHMAN. (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1961. Pp. 254. $6.00.)

To the growing list of titles in the newly-emergent field of administrative history must be added this volume, identified by the author as "part of a larger study tracing the growth of professional diplomacy in the United States." The intent here is to "document the evolution of a career service for foreign affairs." Later studies are to deal with numerous issues not covered here, such as the influence of administrative changes in the upper diplomatic ranks upon decision-making. Ultimately, "the effect of professional diplomacy on American foreign policy will be considered." Painstaking and scholarly analyses of such issues will make overdue additions to the literature on American foreign policy.

Professor Ilchman's study is based upon exhaustive research into the administrative development of the diplomatic and consular services during the period 1779-1939. The author reveals full command of his subject and intimate acquaintance with sources bearing upon it, to a degree which is perhaps outstanding for one writing in a comparatively new field. Brief as it is, this is an invaluable sourcebook for students interested in the evolution of American diplomatic machinery. If promised companion volumes are forthcoming, the series will doubtless become a standard reference work in the field. Regarding a book intended as part of a still-uncompleted series, both the author and reviewers are perhaps under disadvantage not present in more normal circumstances. For it may well be that implications of the subject treated briefly (sometimes superficially) here will be covered more satisfactorily in forthcoming studies; the author's terse statement of questions deliberately deferred makes it difficult always to be certain. In many instances, this is no doubt the intention. In others, it is difficult to see how it can be attempted smoothly and logically, without placing an impossible burden upon the reader to remember factual materials presented early in this first book. Meticulous as he is in tracing out successive statutes, executive orders, precedents, and other developments bearing upon his subject, throughout the process the author frequently leaves the question: what have these things to do with the actual formulation and operation of American foreign policy? What was their overall impact upon the foreign policy process?

This seems the book's principal weakness. Facts are presented in abundance, if not sometimes to the point of tedium. Documentation is impressive and as comprehensive as could be desired. Interpretation is kept to a minimum—indeed, the reader is left to wonder about the lasting significance of major and minor developments. The reader senses a recurrent reluctance on the part of the author to cut loose from his sources and quotations and to give his judgments about the evidence he has so carefully sifted.

Stylistically, the reader may also hope for some beneficial changes in future studies. One of these might be greater effort by the author in discriminating between important and relatively unimportant aspects of his subjects. It is not always evident to the reader, because sometimes it does not seem evident to the author, which is which. The readability of this book sometimes suffers acutely from a lack of priority in this respect. Another suggestion is that the author endeavor to avoid laboring his points. Even this short work could be made more interesting, particularly for the non-specialist, if needless reiteration of points and multiple quotations saying substantially the same thing were pruned.—CECIL V. CRABB, JR., Vassar College.

Cases in State and Local Government. RICHARD T. FROST, ed. (Englewood Cliffs, N. J.: Prentice-Hall, Inc., 1961. Pp. xii, 361. $3.95.)

Debate over the utility of case studies rages at two levels. The first has to do with means of advancing scientific frontiers, the second with techniques of teaching. Cases in State and Local Government clearly makes its claims at the second level. The case studies which compose it are short and relatively simple. Introductory notes indicate that each case is intended to illustrate some widely accepted proposition from the textbook literature on state and local government.

Richard T. Frost, in his preface, suggests that case studies are valuable because they can impart "a 'feel' for the governing of men." He does not deal, however, with the perennial question raised by critics of case studies as tools of science: how can one evaluate them? The better writer may not be the more perceptive observer. The case author generally feels no obligation to place his facts in the broad context of his discipline, to indicate how typical or how significant they are. The "feel" conveyed by a smoothly written book of case studies may, therefore, be neither accurate, applicable, nor profound.

In the final analysis, all case studies must be judged by their relationship to theory. This is true on both levels of debate. Case research is useful at the frontiers of social science if it inspires pregnant explanatory hypotheses. Well-written case studies can vividly illustrate such hypotheses. Cases intended as teaching implements should meet the test of illustrating well the complex relationships and important controversies of social life as described by the hypotheses which currently pass in the scholarly world for knowledge.

Most of the case studies under review are, unfortunately, pitched at a highly superficial level. Frost has endeavored to illustrate a very wide range of theories in relatively few pages. The twenty-seven cases presented average forty-five hundred words each. In general, this space limitation has precluded the development of relationships in detail. The "facts" of most of the cases are presented in bare outline and then "explained" in textbook fashion. Readers without background in the subject are likely to experience a constant sense of disorientation. Some teachers will wish to exploit this, of course, but they may find themselves doing the work of any good text writer rather than leading discussions of more difficult and controversial matter.

This reviewer is further troubled by the prominence of author biases in some of these cases. It is frequently claimed that case studies can provoke students by presenting the various sides of controversial issues colorfully and persuasively. This potential no doubt exists. But a number of contributors to this volume have chosen to dissipate it by presenting controversies as battles between the enlightened and the entrenched. The force of their partisanship is accentuated by the fact that many of these writers participated in the controversies they describe. It should be noted, however, that Frost considers the involvement of his collaborators an advantage, enabling them to have "a good grip on the events."

In a volume as diverse as this, criticism of the whole is inevitably unjust to some of the parts. A number of cases struck this reviewer as overcoming the space handicap and telling provocative stories very well indeed, notably: "The New York Fluoridation Dispute," by Gerald Pomper; "The Special Case of Public Education," by Alan Rosenthal; "Chairman and Superintendent," by Frank Sorauf; "Old and New in the Old South," by James Prothro; "The Legislature Redistricts Illinois," by Gilbert Steiner and Samuel Gove; "The Davis High School Principal," by Robert Sinclair (a pseudonym); and "Water for Wauwatosa," by David Gladfelter.—ALAN ALTSHULER, Makerere College (East Africa).

Preprimary Endorsements in California Politics.

By LEONARD ROWE. (Berkeley: University of California, Bureau of Public Administration, 1961. Pp. ix, 85. $2.00.)

In 1959 California abolished the system of candidate cross-filing for the nomination of more than one party in the primary election. This event naturally suggested analysis of the informal practices now prevailing of selecting candidates prior to the primary. The legal situation in California is that state law neither authorizes nor prohibits endorsements by official party committees; in practice, most official party committees do not make endorsements. Leonard Rowe has reviewed the origins and experience with "preprimary endorsements" by informal party groups, meeting in district and state conventions. The principal party groups are the California Republican Assembly and the California Democratic Council. He finds that preprimary endorsements have had "a healthy effect" on California politics. They have not reduced but contributed to an increase of voter participation in state primaries from less than 50 to over 60 per cent over the past twenty years. He believes that preprimary conventions provide a means by which the importance of money in making nominations may be reduced, and that they open as well as shut the door to able candidates. They have "broadened the nomination process" by restoring mass organization and delegate conventions at the county, district and state levels. The major criticism that Rowe levels against preprimary endorsements as practiced in California is that the formulas used for selecting delegates to endorsing conventions are based upon the informal "club membership" in the counties and districts rather than upon "party registration or voting strength." He suggests that thought be given to revising these representation formulas, to the possibility of multiple endorsements, and to the idea of requiring a fixed percentage of the convention vote to secure place on the primary ballot.—AVERY LEISERSON, Vanderbilt University.

American Perspectives. EDITED BY ROBERT E. SPILLER AND ERIC LARRABEE. (Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1961. Pp. vii, 216. $4.75.)

The Knights of the Round Table discovered many things, depending on what kind of men they were and what they had the capacity to see. Yet none, as I recollect, in fact found the Holy Grail they sought.

Just so in this book, where ten specialists were commissioned to find together the American national character for a volume to be entitled The Image of America in the Twentieth Century. Each finds something, but when set together, no recognizable national character emerges. The editors recognized this when they received the essays, and rather than ordering rewriting or doing it themselves, they printed the whole under the present less pretentious title.

Ralph H. Gabriel provides a quick (16 page) historiography since 1800, with the usual unstated assumption that the battle of intellects somehow reflects the attitudes of the people about whom history is written. Morton White discusses controversies regarding the definition of pragmatism, and asserts that the ambiguities at the top levels of science mirror the ambiguities of society. Spiller himself provides a history of literary criticism as Edward N. Waters does for music, painting, and sculpture, and Reuel Denney for popular culture.

Only two of the authors deal directly with the problem at hand—the national image. Thomas C. Cochran reports on what representative social scientists have said about the American character, although he warns that these social scientists selected what they regarded as important and Cochran does not attempt to judge the accuracy of their observations. Economist Kenneth E. Boulding is the only contributor who actually reports scientific data about what the general public—the consumers of ideas rather than the merchants—think. Even so, he concludes with his own impressions that economic conflicts are lessening, and that everyone is truly in the great middle class.

No political scientist is among the contributors. John M. Blum, Yale history professor, in the chapter on politics, sees the ever forming and dissolving coalitions of two-party politics as the attempt of a conciliatory middle class to protect itself by resolving through compromise the several antitheses of American life. To Blum, Theodore Roosevelt, Wilson, Coolidge, Franklin Roosevelt, and Eisenhower all expressed the public image of the middle class—a changing image, to be sure, as the middle class felt threatened in turn by corruption, big business, reform, depression, and change. Now, he finds, “leveling-up” has progressed so far that group conflict is spent, leaving the parties on dead center. He hopes that the middle class will reform itself and regain a missionary spirit to solve the remaining problems of racial discrimination and foreign policy.

The principal merit of this book to political scientists will be to counteract a tendency to overestimate the place of their discipline and subject matter in American life. Politics is after all only a rather marginal concern for many people. It is useful to know what else is occupying the minds of intellectuals and those about whom and for whom intellectuals think.—CHARLES H. BACKSTROM, University of Minnesota.

The New America: Politics and Society in the Age of the Smooth Deal. BY KARL E. MEYER. (New York: Basic Books, 1961. Pp. 206. $4.50.)

Sometimes a book review should be a warning. The imposing title of this book, and the memory some members of the profession may have of Mr. Meyer's striking article on the “Smooth Dealers” in Commentary a few years ago, may lead them to expect an important study of new developments in American politics.

Unfortunately, the book does not fulfill this promise. It is a discursive, occasionally pointed, entertaining, but generally superficial pastiche, in which the author offers impressions and opinions concerning political phenomena from the role of the presidency to the ways of contemporary political journalism. His basic argument is that our politics has grown too bland, too “Smooth Dealing,” too little concerned with a vigorous and controversial approach to the serious issues of the day as he sees them. The book is divided into a first part on “symptoms,” and a second part on “sources”; but the portion on sources is not analytical and remains an again superficial sketch of trends. They range from the conversion of the American “melting pot” into the “pressure cooker,” in which the variety of ethnic stocks is converted into a standard-American pattern, to the decline of the elan of the progressive movement as an aspect of the decline of a forthright political commitment. The author's address is generally New Dealish-liberal, though by no means dogmatic.

In many ways the book reminds one of the work of Mr. Meyer's cartoonist-colleague on the Washington Post, Herb Block. It does not have quite enough seriousness relief, however, to enable it to live up to its title or make it really worthwhile.—WILLIAM NISBET CHAMBERS, Washington University (St. Louis).

Collective Bargaining in the Federal Civil Service: A Study of Labor-Management Relations in United States Government. BY WILSON R. HART. (New York: Harper & Brothers, 1961. Pp. xi, 302. $6.50.)

Mr. Hart's qualifications for dealing with this complex subject are impressive. He has directed the personnel and labor relations program for the U. S. Army and is currently president of a public employees' union, the American Federation of Government Employees in the Office of the Secretary of Defense.

As Hart points out, the traditional approach to labor-management relations in the federal service is essentially negative. Agency directives acknowledge the right of the employees to organize, but they do so in coldly neutral terms. The regulations spell out in detail the limitations within which employee organizations must operate. The attitude of the federal executive is usually one of “spontaneous hostility bred from the conviction that the personnel director and the union leader are natural antagonists with irreconcilable conflicts of interest. The shibboleth of the conventional personnel director is, ‘If you run a good personnel program you won't have any union to deal with.’”

As a result of these personnel policies the United States government has often been accused of engaging in “unfair labor practices.” In general, critics argue that the government's labor-management relations policies are out of date in the light of recent developments in human relations and industrial relations, that it is morally indefensible for the federal government to refuse to grant the privilege of collective bargaining to its employees when it compels private employers to engage in collective bargaining with their employees and that the best public personnel programs are found in those federal agencies which have the strongest employee organizations. The federal government's existing labor-management policies are defended most strongly by managerial personnel in the executive branch who argue that the sovereign nature of the government prevents it from entering into a genuine collective-bargaining relationship with its employees that the major decisions concerning wages, hours, and working conditions are made by Congress and that the federal service has already voluntarily granted to its employees the same privileges which employees in private industry have under collective bargaining.

Hart considers these arguments at length and concludes that those which support present federal personnel policies are weak indeed. On the issue of sovereignty, he argues that while it is true that a sovereign cannot be compelled to bargain with its employees there is nothing to prevent legislative or executive authorities from voluntarily granting such a right. As for the assertion that Congress has fixed the conditions of employment, Hart shows that the executive branch has considerable discretion even in the vitally important matter of determining salaries. The claim that federal employees now enjoy the privileges that employees in private industry enjoy under collective bargaining, Hart rejects. Even if this were true, he argues, benevolent paternalism is a poor substitute for genuine participation, poor for the employees and poorer still for the public service. Further, Hart points out that there are government agencies, notably the TVA, that have experimented successfully with collective bargaining. In sum, Hart concludes that there is nothing about collective bargaining in the public service which is inherently illegal, or offensive to public policy.

Hart has made an impressive case for collective bargaining. But while agreeing with his conclusions it is still possible to raise questions of interpretation and emphasis. For example, there are doubtless those who would question whether the federal Civil Service Commission, "is part and parcel of the executive branch." Also open to challenge is the assertion that "when the government of the United States hires a new employee, it has no problem of motivation." In general the discussion of sovereignty is inadequate. The issues involved are much more complex than Hart suggests. Even more serious is the argument that staff proliferation is based on the executive's fear that one of his subordinates may commit "an impropriety or indiscretion for which he will ultimately be held accountable and by which he may be tarnished." This view seems to be based on an unduly narrow concept of the staff function.

But in the main Hart's presentation is impressive. Much of what he says has been said before, but he brings the discussion up to date and summarizes the major arguments in eminently readable fashion.—ROBERT J. MCNEILL, Purdue University.

The Strategy of Truth: The Story of the U. S. Information Service. BY WILSON P. DIZARD. (Washington D. C.: Public Affairs Press, 1961. Pp. viii, 213. $4.50.)

Dizard's study is essentially a descriptive account of the world wide operations of the United States Information Service (USIS). It does not pretend to do anything more than bring us up to date on developments within USIS since those black days when the late Senator McCarthy hammered headlines out of hapless USIS personnel. It is enough, however, that Dizard can report in confident tones of the Information Service's comeback. No longer the gaudy trumpet of messianic crusades nor the target of even gaudier accusations, USIS has entered into a stable bureaucratic existence. "The new stability that exists in the Agency's relations with Congress permits it to operate at the steady pace essential to its success."

Dizard suggests two causes for USIS' fine recovery. First, the American people, especially their Congressmen, have finally accepted the idea that the United States needs an information and culture program as part of its cold war strategy.

Equally important, USIS has developed a more professional attitude and personnel. Both the "Madison Avenue" and "psychwar" overtones that marred the early development of the Voice of America have been subdued. In place of the "hard sell" and in resistance to harebrained psychwar schemes which promised to wrest the propaganda initiative from the Communists by techniques which could not possibly stand the test of time, the Information Service has settled down to the task of projecting an image of America that will wear well year in and year out, crisis in and crisis out. Such an approach aims at creating an image that is compatible with our society and with the policies we are likely to espouse; one which will carry us through crisis periods when our policies, for reasons of national interest, are out of harmony with dominant world opinion. "We are not going to be defeated by what the world thinks of our tariff laws or our China policy. The decision will hang on the validity of our total claim as a democratic world leader and on the concurrence of our interests with those of other people."

The new professionalism of which Dizard speaks takes several forms. The Information Service has become less dependent on amateurs and people from outside its own ranks. In emulation of the Foreign Service, USIS now recruits a steady stream of people who regard themselves as professional civil servants. It remains to be seen if the function of status-building implicit in the drive toward greater professionalization on the model of the Foreign Service will serve the Information Service to its best advantage.

A more sober sense of reality also characterizes USIS operations. The strident ideological tone of earlier years has been muted in favor of objective news reporting and cultural and educational programs. The central effort now is to inform and persuade opinion leaders and opinion makers in foreign countries as the most satisfactory mode of reaching the larger public. Far from taking a dim view of what Hollywood contributes to the cultural image of America, USIS concentrates on supplementing and balancing the ever popular Hollywood diet with more serious and representative films of American life and achievements.

One of the most interesting shifts of emphasis concerns the role Dizard attributes to Radio Free Europe (RFE) and Radio in the American Sector (RIAS). RFE is privately operated while RIAS, broadcasting to East Germany, is under USIS guidance. Their mission is no longer to contribute fuel to the revolutionary fires in Eastern Europe; instead, their function is to "exert an influence on Communist leadership to modify its repressive policies." In short we are no longer operating on the premise that the walls of Jericho will fall before our trumpet blast.

It is also heartening to know that perhaps our greatest successes have been achieved by our musicians and artists, for it is they who have brought America of age in the eyes of foreigners prepared to dismiss us as barbarians and materialists. The role of culture in the cold war still awaits a more profound study, but Dizard has at least given us an interesting account of the present direction of America's information and cultural activities.—DAVID S. McLELLAN, University of California (Riverside.)

A History of the United States Weather Bureau.

By DONALD R. WHITNAH. (Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1961. Pp. vii & ix, 240. $6.00.)

The crucial role of the scientist in making governmental decisions is beginning to attract wide attention. It has been dramatized by Sir Charles P. Snow in his novels, and clearly stated in his lectures at Harvard in 1960 (published now by Harvard University Press under the title Science and Government). Of course it is the application of science to warfare and defense which has drawn most public attention. However, a small group of social scientists have observed for some time the expanding role of scientists in decision-making at all levels of government. Dean Don K. Price's Government and Science (1954), a pioneer effort by a political scientist, points up this new role in American government as no other study has done. We may expect other fruitful studies from social scientists of various disciplines.

Donald R. Whitnah's A History of the United States Weather Bureau is a study of the science-government phenomenon within the context of the historical evolution of a government bureau. It is a valuable reference book, especially for students of public administration. It traces the United States Weather Bureau from its inception in 1870 to 1960, with a major emphasis upon its history prior to World War II. Dr. Whitnah, now Professor of History at Iowa State Teachers College, writes the story with a thorough understanding of meteorology as well as history, having served as a weather observer and analyst from 1951-56 with the Illinois State Water Survey Division at Urbana.

The political scientist interested in the evolution of a governmental agency concerned primarily with scientific investigations will find Professor Whitnah's study valuable. It contains a wealth of well documented information on the development of meteorology as a special study and the importance of the Weather Bureau in that development.

The reader of this running account of the Weather Bureau will discover how it emerged from the active interests of meteorologists as pure scientists who through their professional organizations aroused public interest in weather reports and predictions and how one of their number, Professor Cleveland Abbe, led the movement for a federal agency and became the most important single figure throughout its formative twenty-one years. Although he was not regarded as an outstanding meteorologist by his colleagues in the field, Abbe's ability to organize scientific research and to arouse civic interest was outstanding. He argued from the first for a civilian agency; but practical considerations caused H. E. Paine, Representative from Wisconsin, to introduce a bill in 1869 which assigned the task of gathering information on weather to the Army Signal Corps. The period of military control from 1870 to 1891 proved not to be a happy one for the Army. The study and predictions on weather were too new and the instruments inadequate for accurate predictions. The service was subjected to ridicule and congressional investigations. Although the first ten years under the leadership of Colonel A. J. Meyer were peaceful ones, after 1880 the weather service of the Signal Corps fell into the hands of military men who had no special aptitude or interest. General William B. Hazen's administration which lasted only six years (1880-86) was one of administrative ineptitude and scandal. His attempt to apply military discipline to this scientific enterprise brought great upheaval and ultimately congressional investigations. His successor, General A. W. Greeley, proved to be little better. General Greeley's failures increased public criticism and led him to conclude that it would be best to be rid of the meteorological branch of the Signal Corps. Secretary of Agriculture Jeremiah M. Rusk was just as interested in securing the service. The upshot of the situation was a transfer of functions to the Department of Agriculture in 1890, and the establishment of the Weather Bureau.

Willis Luther Moore, the Bureau's second director, aroused Congressional criticism by his failure to give strict account of expenditures.

Investigation failed to disclose a misuse of funds but resulted in a realization by Congress of the high quality of scientific workmanship of the Bureau. However, Moore clashed too many times with the Secretary of Agriculture and finally deserted science and administration for politics. He openly tried to secure promise of appointment as Secretary of Agriculture from Woodrow Wilson. His political activity caused such a furor that he was threatened with prosecution and was ultimately removed by Wilson in 1913.

Professor Whitnah tells us little of the dynamics of administration within the Bureau after 1913. The two wars increased public interest in information on weather with a higher regard for its services as scientific instruments became more accurate and predictions more reliable. The Bureau's clientele expanded from anxious farmers and sea captains to the press which capitalized on weather information, to air lines, and even to commercial outdoor sports which depended heavily upon clear weather for large crowds. It would have been of interest if the author had given more attention to the use and misuse of meteorological information by numerous radio broadcasting stations. Partially trained weathermen who gained their knowledge in the military service during the second World War appear in competition with the Bureau on radio and television almost every hour of the day, arousing the criticism of Bureau meteorologists. For the first time criticisms are flowing both ways, the Bureau being charged with attempting to monopolize information on the weather.

A History of the United States Weather Bureau indicates some problems of administration of an agency devoted to science and information. These could be developed as dramatically as was the "Glavis-Ballinger Dispute" by Winifred McCulloch in Public Administration and Policy Development under Harold Stein's editorship. More facts would have to be obtained but the industrious case writer might find his efforts rewarding if he followed some of the leads marked out by Donald Whitnah.

The story of the United States Weather Bureau provides another illustration for Dean Price's thesis in his Government and Science of (1) the importance of professional organizations of scientists in advancing certain types of administration and (2) the inadequacies of old and established government agencies as a dynamic force in new situations. With the second World War, although the Bureau had grown in importance as a source of weather information, it was subjected to competition both within and outside the Federal Government. Perhaps its greatest future will lie in its research in outer space and less with weather per se, in which case it may be cast in a new scientific role.—LASHLEY G. HARVEY, Boston University.

SELECTED ARTICLES AND DOCUMENTS ON AMERICAN GOVERNMENT AND POLITICS

FRANKLIN L. BURDETTE
University of Maryland

ARTICLES AND BOOKLETS

National Government

Fulbright, J. William. American Foreign Policy in the 20th Century under an 18th-Century Constitution. Cornell Law Quarterly. Fall, 1961.

Howell, Wilbur Samuel. The Declaration of Independence and Eighteenth-Century Logic. William and Mary Quarterly. October, 1961.

Kraft, Joseph. The Comeback of the State Department. Harper's Magazine. November, 1961.

Miller, Arthur S. Toward a Concept of National Responsibility. Yale Review. Winter, 1962.

Proposal to Establish a New Federal Department of Urban Affairs and Housing. [Symposium.] Congressional Digest. November, 1961.

Ward, C. D. A Department of Urban Affairs. County Officer. October, 1961.

State Government

Action by the Legislatures: 1961. State Government. Autumn, 1961.

American State Legislatures in Mid-Twentieth Century. Ibid.

A Comparison of the Organization and Procedures of Six State Constitutional Conventions. Citizens Research Council of Michigan. 1961.

Darrah, Earl L., and Orville F. Poland. The Fifty State Governments: A Compilation of State Executive Organization Charts. Bureau of Public Administration, University of California, Berkeley. 1961.

Hensel, Donald W. Religion and the Writing of the Colorado Constitution. Church History. September, 1961.

Kauper, Paul G. The State Constitution: Its

Nature and Purpose. Citizens Research Council of Michigan. 1961.

Lombardi, Frank. State Planning in Hawaii. State Government. Autumn, 1961.

Mason, Bruce B., and Heinz R. Hink. Revision of the Arizona Constitution: A Commentary. Bureau of Government Research, Arizona State University. 1961.

Nelson, Gaylord A. Planning and Developing Our Resources: A Critical Task for State Action. State Government. Autumn, 1961.

Scroggs, Jack B. Carpetbagger Constitutional Reform in the South Atlantic States, 1867-1868. Journal of Southern History. November, 1961.

Local Government

Childs, Richard S. Quest for Leadership [in Council-Manager Cities]. National Civic Review. November, 1961.

Evans, S. Howard. Encouraging Effective Citizen Participation in Community Development. Public Management. November, 1961.

Grant, Daniel S., and Lee S. Greene. Surveys, Dust, Action [on Nashville Annexation]. National Civic Review. October, 1961.

Hagensick, A. Clarke. Municipal Home Rule in Wisconsin. Bureau of Government, University of Wisconsin. 1961.

Moes, John E. The Subsidization of Industry by Local Communities in the South. Southern Economic Journal. October, 1961.

Palmer, Philip F. The Allouez Study: Governmental Organization for the Town of Allouez. Bureau of Government, University of Wisconsin. 1961.

Peterson, Glen R. The Corporate Public Affairs Movement and Council-Manager Government. Public Management. November, 1961.

Ricketts, E. F., Compensating City Administrators. Ibid. October, 1961.

Riethmayer, Leo C. The Urban Gap. Western Political Quarterly. September, 1961.

Sherbenou, Edgar L. Class, Participation, and the Council-Manager Plan. Public Administration Review. Summer, 1961.

Taylor, Milton C. Local Income Taxes as a Source of Revenue for Michigan Communities. Institute for Community Development and Services, Michigan State University. 1961.

Williamson, C. Glen. New Supersonic Crisis [for Cities from Air Transport]. National Civic Review. November, 1961.

Ylvisaker, Paul N. The Miraculous City. Ibid. December, 1961.

Intergovernmental Relations

Benson, George C. S., and Harold F. McClelland. Consolidated Grants: A Means of Maintaining Fiscal Responsibility. American Enterprise Association. 1961.

Colman, William G. The Advisory Commission on Intergovernmental Relations. County Officer. October, 1961.

Estep, Samuel D., and Martin Adelman. State Control of Radiation Hazards: An Intergovernmental Relations Problem. Michigan Law Review. December, 1961.

Federal-State Cooperation in the Atomic Energy Field. [Symposium.] Kentucky Law Journal. Fall, 1961.

Gere, Edwin A., Jr. Some Aspects of Massachusetts Public Finance: A Survey of Intergovernmental Fiscal Relations in the Commonwealth. Bureau of Government Research, University of Massachusetts. 1961.

Hein, Clarence J. Metropolitan Government: Residents Outside the Central Urban Areas. Western Political Quarterly. September, 1961.

Humphrey, Hubert H. To Aid the Small City [by a Department of Urban Affairs]. National Civic Review. December, 1961.

Leach, Richard H. New Urban Challenge [Metropolitan Areas]. Ibid. October, 1961.

McLaughlin, Patrick H. Congressional Actions Affecting Cities. Public Management. December, 1961.

A Policies Plan for the Year 2000: The Nation's Capital. National Capital Planning Commission and National Capital Planning Council. 1961.

State Aid to Local Government. Bureau of Statistical Services, Division of Municipal Affairs, Department of Audit and Control, State of New York. 1961.

Tobin, Robert W. The Interstate Metropolitan District and Cooperative Federalism. Tulane Law Review. December, 1961.

Van Tassel, Roger C. State Regulation of Boston's Financial Administration. Bureau of Government Research, University of Massachusetts. 1961.

1961 Report of the Joint Legislative Committee on Metropolitan Areas Study to the Legislature of the State of New York. Legislation Doc. No. 18. 1961.

Constitutional Law and Civil Liberties

Alfange, Dean, Jr. Congressional Investigations and the Fickle Court. University of Cincinnati Law Review. Spring, 1961.

Bartholomew, Paul C. Movie Censorship and the Supreme Court. Michigan State Bar Journal. August, 1961.

Byrd, Elbert M., Jr. Constitutional Limits on International Agreements in the Space Age. Northwestern University Law Review. March-April, 1961.

- Cahn, Edmond. The "Establishment of Religion" Puzzle. New York University Law Review. November, 1961.
- Downey, Arthur T., III. Rights of Witness before Congressional Investigating Committee. Villanova Law Review. Fall, 1961.
- Ehmke, Horst P. "Delegata Potestas non Potest Delegari," a Maxim of American Constitutional Law. Cornell Law Quarterly. Fall, 1961.
- Fisher, Walter T. Double Jeopardy, Two Sovereignties and the Intruding Constitution. University of Chicago Law Review. Summer, 1961.
- Hopson, Dan, Jr. Cognovit Judgments: An Ignored Problem of Due Process and Full Faith and Credit. Ibid. Autumn, 1961.
- Jaffe, Louis L. Standing to Secure Judicial Review: Private Actions. Harvard Law Review. December, 1961.
- Kauper, Paul G. Church and State: Cooperative Separatism. Michigan Law Review. December, 1961.
- Kurland, Philip B. Of Church and State and the Supreme Court. University of Chicago Law Review. Autumn, 1961.
- Lewis, Thomas P. Burton v. Wilmington Parking Authority—A Case Without Precedent. Columbia Law Review. December, 1961.
- Magrath, C. Peter. "Nine Deliberative Bodies." Commentary. November, 1961.
- Mandamus to Review Judgments of Acquittal in Federal Courts. Yale Law Journal. November, 1961.
- Property Rights of Aliens Under Iowa and Federal Law. Iowa Law Review. Fall, 1961.
- Rackow, Felix. The Federal Loyalty Program: Politics and Civil Liberty. Western Reserve Law Review. September, 1961.
- Ruja, Harry. The Communist Menace, the Supreme Court, and Academic Freedom. Western Political Quarterly. September, 1961.
- Schmidhauser, John R. Judicial Behavior and the Sectional Crisis of 1837-1860. Journal of Politics. November, 1961.
- Schubert, Glendon. A Psychometric Model of the Supreme Court. American Behavioral Scientist. November, 1961.
- Search and Seizure in the Supreme Court: Shadows on the Fourth Amendment. University of Chicago Law Review. Summer, 1961.
- The Supreme Court, 1960 Term. Harvard Law Review. November, 1961.
- Zuckerman, George David. A Consideration of the History and Present Status of Section 2 of the Fourteenth Amendment. Fordham Law Review. October, 1961.
- Judicial Administration and Law Enforcement Appealability in the Federal Courts. Harvard Law Review. December, 1961.
- Banks, Louis. The Crisis in the Courts. Fortune. December, 1961.
- Bethea, J. W. The Action Program for Highway Safety. Public Management. December, 1961.
- Boyd, William L. Constitutional, Treaty, and Statutory Requirements of Probate Notice to Consuls and Aliens. Iowa Law Review. Fall, 1961.
- Bullock, Henry Allen. Significance of the Racial Factor in the Length of Prison Sentences. Journal of Criminal Law, Criminology and Police Science. November-December, 1961.
- Byrd, Elbert M., Jr. The Judicial Process in Maryland. Bureau of Governmental Research, University of Maryland. 1961.
- Cook, James M. Texas Corporation Courts. Institute of Public Affairs, University of Texas. 1961.
- The Exclusionary Rule Regarding Illegally Seized Evidence. [Symposium.] Journal of Criminal Law, Criminology and Police Science. September-October, 1961.
- Fox, Sanford J. Statutory Criminal Law: The Neglected Part. Ibid. November-December, 1961.
- Goldfarb, Ronald L. The Varieties of the Contempt Power. Syracuse Law Review. Fall, 1961.
- Henn, Harry G. "Libel-by-Extrinsic-Fact." Cornell Law Quarterly. Fall, 1961.
- Hospitalization of Mentally Ill Criminals in Pennsylvania and New Jersey. University of Pennsylvania Law Review. November, 1961.
- Increasing Community Control over Corporate Crime—A Problem in the Law of Sanctions. Yale Law Journal. December, 1961.
- Isaacs, Norman E. The Crime of Present Day Crime Reporting. Journal of Criminal Law, Criminology and Police Science. November-December, 1961.
- The Judicial Process Revisited. [Symposium.] Yale Law Journal. December, 1961.
- Mueller, Gerhard O. W. M'Naghten Remains Irreplaceable: Recent Events in the Law of Incapacity. Georgetown Law Journal. Fall, 1961.
- . Problems Posed by Publicity to Crime and Criminal Proceedings. University of Pennsylvania Law Review. November, 1961.
- Orfield, Lester B. Early Federal Criminal Procedure. Wayne Law Review. Summer, 1961.
- . Indictment and Information in Federal Criminal Procedure. Syracuse Law Review. Fall, 1961.
- Origins and Development of Modern Escheat. Columbia Law Review. November, 1961.
- Parsons, Malcolm B. Violence and Caste in Southern Justice. South Atlantic Quarterly. Autumn, 1961.
- Prettyman, E. Barrett. Three Modern Problems in Criminal Law. Washington and Lee Law Review. Fall, 1961.

The Right to Counsel: A Symposium. Minnesota Law Review. April, 1961.

Rosenberg, Maurice, and Robert H. Chanin. Auditors in Massachusetts as Antidotes for Delayed Civil Courts. University of Pennsylvania Law Review. November, 1961.

Seidelson, David E. The Federal Non-Capital Statute of Limitations and Public Law 769—Stare Decisis by Accretion. George Washington Law Review. October, 1961.

Shapiro, Martin. Morals and the Courts: The Reluctant Crusaders. Minnesota Law Review. May, 1961.

Tort Damages. [Symposium.] Boston University Law Review. Summer, 1961.

Public Administration and Administrative Law

Accounting, Auditing and Budgeting. [Symposium.] Municipal Finance. November, 1961.

Administrative Regulation. [Symposium.] Law and Contemporary Problems. Spring, 1961.

Administrative Rule-Making in the States. Council of State Governments. 1961.

Bosworth, Jerry C. How the Huron-Clinton Metropolitan Authority Responds to Its Public. Institute of Public Administration, University of Michigan. 1961.

The Case for Cooperative or Centralized Purchasing. County Officer. November, 1961.

Conflict of Interests: State Government Employees. Virginia Law Review. October, 1961.

Corson, John J. What the Personnel Man Should Know about Organization. Public Personnel Review. October, 1961.

Cox, David M. How Much Public Relations in Government? Public Administration Review. Summer, 1961.

Davis, Kenneth Culp. Ombudsmen in America: Officers to Criticize Administrative Action. University of Pennsylvania Law Review. June, 1961.

Engel, H. M. Administrative Adjudication in New York State. Public Personnel Review. October, 1961.

Heimbucher, Clifford V. Fifty-three Jurisdictions [for Regulation of Accountants]. Journal of Accountancy. November, 1961.

Labor Relations in the Public Service. Harvard Law Review. December, 1961.

Leys, Wayne A. R. Ethics, Social Science, and "Conflict of Interest." American Behavioral Scientist. November, 1961.

Macy, John W., Jr. Public Service and Understanding. Public Personnel Review. October, 1961.

Mahoney, J. Daniel. The Conduct of a Renegotiation Case. American Bar Association Journal. September, 1961.

McKay, Robert B. An Administrative Code of Ethics: Principles and Implementation. Ibid.

Mueller, Marjorie S. Retirement Plans for

State and Local Employees. Monthly Labor Review. November, 1961.

Penniman, Clara. Reorganization and the Internal Revenue Service. Public Administration Review. Summer, 1961.

Planning State Pre-retirement Systems. Bureau of Government, University of Wisconsin. 1961.

Procedural Safeguards for Licensees: Section 9(B) of the APA. Harvard Law Review. December, 1961.

Rollman, Robert O. Recent Developments Respecting the Sovereign Immunity of the Federal Government from State and Local Taxes. Air Force Judge Advocate General's Bulletin. November, 1961.

Scher, Seymour. Regulatory Agency Control through Appointment: The Case of the Eisenhower Administration and the NLRB. Journal of Politics. November, 1961.

Schlesinger, Edward, and William J. Williams, Jr. The Federal Tax Lien—A Practitioner's Guide to the Resolution and Avoidance of Priority Problems. New York University Law Review. November, 1961.

Shadoan, Arlene Theuer. Organization, Role, and Staffing of State Budget Offices. Bureau of Business Research, University of Kentucky. 1961.

Symposium on Implications of Electronic Data Processing for Tax Administration and Tax Policy. National Tax Journal. September, 1961.

Tompkins, Dorothy Campbell. Conflict of Interest in the Federal Government: A Bibliography. Bureau of Public Administration, University of California, Berkeley. 1961.

Van Riper, Paul P. Public Personnel Literature: The Last Decade. Public Personnel Review. October, 1961.

Wengert, Egbert S. Approaches to the Study of Technical Assistance. Philippine Journal of Public Administration. July, 1961.

Woll, Peter. Administrative Justice: Formal Prescription and Informal Adjudication. Western Political Quarterly. September, 1961.

Political Parties, Elections, and Public Opinion

Abramson, Martin. Want to Be Elected? National Civic Review. December, 1961.

Booth, David A. A Guide to Local Politics. Institute for Community Development and Services, Michigan State University. 1961.

———, and Charles R. Adrian. Simplifying the Discovery of Elites. American Behavioral Scientist. October, 1961.

Branscomb, Anne W. Should Political Broadcasting Be Fair or Equal? A Reappraisal of Section 315 of the Federal Communications Act. George Washington Law Review. October, 1961.

Dahl, Robert A. Who Participated in Local

[New Haven] Politics and Why? Science. October 27, 1961.

Danielson, Wayne A., and John B. Adams. Completeness of Press Coverage of the 1960 Campaign. Journalism Quarterly. Autumn, 1961.

Duberman, Martin B. Some Notes on the Beginnings of the Republican Party in Massachusetts. New England Quarterly. September, 1961.

Goedecke, Robert. Feelings, Facts, and Politics. Ethics. October, 1961.

Greene, Jack P. The Role of the Lower Houses of Assembly in Eighteenth-Century Politics. Journal of Southern History. November, 1961.

Haney, John B. Public Opinion on Tax-Supported Television. Journal of Broadcasting. Fall, 1961.

Harned, Louise. Authoritarian Attitudes and Party Activity. Public Opinion Quarterly. Fall, 1961.

Hennessy, Bernard C., and Erna R. Hennessy. The Prediction of Close Elections: Comments on Some 1960 Polls. Ibid.

Hutchison, Earl R. Kennedy and the Press: the First Six Months. Journalism Quarterly. Autumn, 1961.

Kaloupek, Walter E., and Henry J. Tomasek. Administration of Election Laws in North Dakota. Governmental Research Bureau, University of North Dakota. 1960. [1961.]

Key, V. O., Jr. Public Opinion and the Decay of Democracy. Virginia Quarterly Review. Autumn, 1961.

Lawton, Edward P. Northern Liberals and Southern Bourbons. Georgia Review. Fall, 1961.

McCormack, Thelma. Social Theory and the Mass Media. Canadian Journal of Economics and Political Science. November, 1961.

Minar, David W. Ideology and Political Behavior. Midwest Journal of Political Science. November, 1961.

Montgomery, David. Radical Republicanism in Pennsylvania, 1866-1873. Pennsylvania Magazine of History and Biography. October, 1961.

Morley, Felix. Democracy and the Electoral College. Modern Age. Fall, 1961.

Patterson, Samuel C., and Robert S. Walker. The Political Attitudes of Oklahoma Newspaper Editors: The Prohibition Issue. Southwestern Social Science Quarterly. December, 1961.

Rowe, Leonard. Preprimary Endorsements in California Politics. Bureau of Public Administration, University of California, Berkeley. 1961.

Rubin, Bernard. Propaganda and Ideological Conflicts, 1917-1945: The Need for Psychological Peacefare—I. Contemporary Review. December, 1961.

Ward, Benjamin. Majority Rule and Allocation. Journal of Conflict Resolution. December, 1961.

Watson, Richard A., and John H. Romani. Metropolitan Government for Metropolitan Cleveland: An Analysis of the Voting Record. Midwest Journal of Political Science. November, 1961.

Wells, Henry. Government Financing of Political Parties in Puerto Rico. Citizens' Research Foundation, Princeton, N. J. 1961.

White, John P. 1960 Supplement, Michigan Votes: Election Statistics, 1928-1956. Institute of Public Administration, University of Michigan. 1961.

Wilkening, E. A., and Ralph K. Huitt. Political Participation among Farmers as Related to Socioeconomic Status and Perception of the Political Process. Rural Sociology. December, 1961.

Economic and Social Functions

National Economy

Blackburn, John O. A Flexible Income-Consumption-Savings Tax. Southern Economic Journal. October, 1961.

Clark, Colin. Growthmanship. Institute of Economic Affairs, 66A Eaton Sq., London SW1. 1961.

Culbertson, J. M. The Use of Monetary Policy. Southern Economic Journal. October, 1961.

Dorfman, Joseph. Chancellor Kent and the Developing American Economy. Columbia Law Review. November, 1961.

Federal Fiscal Issues. Tax Foundation. 1961.

Wallich, Henry C., and Bela Balassa. New Look at Money and Credit. Harvard Business Review. November-December, 1961.

Natural Resources

The Case for a Department of Natural Resources. Natural Resources Journal. November, 1961.

Controversy over Proposal to Establish a Wilderness Area System. [Symposium.] Congressional Digest. December, 1961.

Cooter, Harriet Holt. To Stay out of Floods [through Land Use]. National Civic Review. November, 1961.

Engelbert, Ernest A. Political Parties and Natural Resources Policies: An Historical Evaluation, 1790-1950. Natural Resources Journal. November, 1961.

Forer, Lois G. Water Supply: Suggested Federal Regulation. Harvard Law Review. December, 1961.

Knetsch, Jack L., and William J. Hart. The Watershed as an Entity for Development Planning. Journal of Farm Economics. November, 1961.

Starr, Warren A. Multiple Land Use Management. Natural Resources Journal. November, 1961.

Water Resources Planning and Development. Two-Year Report of the Temporary State Commission on Water Resources Planning. Legislative Doc. No. 42, State of New York. 1961.

Water Rights and Uses. [Symposium.] Buffalo Law Review. Spring, 1961.

Wengert, Norman. Resource Development and the Public Interest: A Challenge for Research. Natural Resources Journal. November, 1961.

Business and Labor

Affeldt, Robert J. The Right of Association and Labor Law. Villanova Law Review. Fall, 1961.

The Agency Shop, Federal Law, and the Right-to-Work States. Yale Law Journal. December, 1961.

Barron, Jerome A. The Federal Communications Commission's Fairness Doctrine: An Evaluation. George Washington Law Review. October, 1961.

Booth, Philip. Temporary Extended Unemployment Compensation Act of 1961—A Legislative History. Labor Law Journal. October, 1961.

Cohen, George M. Congress Clears the Labor No Man's Land: A Long-Awaited Solution Spawns a Host of New Problems. Northwestern University Law Review. July-August, 1961.

The Commerce Clause and State Antitrust Regulation. Columbia Law Review. December, 1961.

Daykin, Walter L. Runaway Shops: The Problem and Treatment. Labor Law Journal. November, 1961.

Dinces, Stephen L. Statutory and Contractual Restrictions on the Right to Strike during the Term of a Collective Bargaining Agreement. Yale Law Journal. July, 1961.

Eberharter, Herman P., Jr., and Wayne L. Emery. The NLRB as Arbiter of Work-Assignment Disputes under 10(k). Georgetown Law Journal. Fall, 1961.

Fleming, R. W. The Obligation to Bargain in Good Faith. Virginia Law Review. October, 1961.

Gottlieb, Gerald H. The Tentative Commandments of Antitrust. Southern California Law Review. Summer, 1961.

Graham, James J. Taft-Hartley's Enigmatic Section 8(b)(2). Labor Law Journal. November, 1961.

Hale, G. E., and Rosemary D. Hale. Competition or Control V: Production and Distribution of Electric Energy. University of Pennsylvania Law Review. November, 1961.

Handler, Milton. Recent Antitrust Developments. Yale Law Journal. November, 1961.

Hanslowe, Kurt L. Regulation by Visible

Public and Invisible Private Government. Texas Law Review. November, 1961.

Hot Cargo Clauses: The Scope of Section 8(e). Yale Law Journal. November, 1961.

Karmel, Roberta S. Labor Law, International Law and the Panlibhon Fleet. New York University Law Review. November, 1961.

Kennedy, R. E. The SBIC: A New Concept in Finance. Southwestern Social Science Quarterly. December, 1961.

Koretz, Robert F. Federal Regulation of Secondary Strikes and Boycotts—A Third Chapter. Syracuse Law Review. Fall, 1961.

Kovarsky, Irving. The Jurisdictional Dispute under Taft-Hartley. Labor Law Journal. October, 1961.

Lawford, H. J. Treaties and Rights of Transit on the St. Lawrence. Canadian Bar Review. December, 1961.

Lawlor, Reed C. The Public Interest: Government Patent Policy and Equity. American Bar Association Journal. October, 1961.

Levin, Harvey J. Regulatory Efficiency, Reform and the FCC. Georgetown Law Journal. Fall, 1961.

Maloney, Walter H., Jr. Racial and Religious Discrimination in Employment and the Role of the NLRB. Maryland Law Review. Summer, 1961.

Mayer, Erwin S. Union Security and the Taft-Hartley Act. Duke Law Journal. Autumn, 1961.

McGregor, Jack E. Broadcast Licensee's Past Conduct as a Determinant of the Public Interest. University of Pittsburgh Law Review. October, 1961.

McGuinn, John A. Injunctive Powers of the Federal Courts in Cases Involving Disputes under the Railway Labor Act. Georgetown Law Journal. Fall, 1961.

Milroy, Robert R., Donald F. Istvan, and Ray M. Powell. The Tax Depreciation Muddle. Accounting Review. October, 1961.

National Transportation Policy and the Regulation of Motor Carriers. Yale Law Journal. December, 1961.

Oppenheimer, Robert H. Insurance and the Antitrust Laws. Insurance Law Journal. December, 1961.

Redford, Emmette S. The Significance of Belief Patterns in Economic Regulation. Western Political Quarterly. September, 1961.

Riesenfeld, Stefan A. Efficacy and Costs of Workmen's Compensation. California Law Review. October, 1961.

Ronan, William J. State Help for Railroads. State Government. Autumn, 1961.

Rothman, Stuart. Judicial Interpretation of the "Bill of Rights" for Union Members. Minnesota Law Review. May, 1961.

Rowe, Frederick M. Mergers and the Law: New Directions for the Sixties. American Bar Association Journal. November, 1961.

Spradin, T. Richard. The Mexican Farm Labor Importation Program—Review and Reform. I. George Washington Law Review. October, 1961.

Sturges, Wesley A. "Compulsory Arbitration"—What Is It? Fordham Law Review. October, 1961.

Summers, Clyde W. Judicial Regulation of Union Elections. Yale Law Journal. July, 1961.

Watkins, Myron W. Electrical Equipment Antitrust Cases—Their Implications for Government and for Business. University of Chicago Law Review. Autumn, 1961.

Whiting, Richard A. Antitrust and the Corporate Executive. Virginia Law Review. October, 1961.

Worsnop, Richard L. Railroad Subsidies. Editorial Research Reports. November 17, 1961.

Zimmerman, Lawrence T. Secondary Picketing and the Reserved Gate: The General Electric Doctrine. Virginia Law Review. November, 1961.

Health, Education, and Welfare

Baumann, Ruth. Facing the '60s—The Public Library in Wisconsin. Bureau of Government, University of Wisconsin. 1961.

Billington, Ray Allen. Government and the Arts: The W. P. A. Experience. American Quarterly. Winter, 1961.

Bressler, Marvin. Meeting Health Needs by Social Action. [Symposium.] Annals. September, 1961.

Burdette, Franklin L., Jerold N. Willmore, and John V. Witherspoon. Political Science: A Selected Bibliography of Books in Print, with Annotations [for Students and Libraries]. Bureau of Governmental Research, University of Maryland. 1961.

Hunt, Thomas C. Behavioral Science for Whom? American Behavioral Scientist. November, 1961.

Trigger for Community Conflict: The Case of Fluoridation. Journal of Social Issues. Vol. XVII, No. 4. 1961.

Military Affairs and National Security

Blair, Richard E. Court-Martial Jurisdiction over Retired Regulars: An Unwarranted Extension of Military Power. Georgetown Law Journal. Fall, 1961.

Civil Defense: Continuity of Government. County Officer. October, 1961.

Gordon, Bernard K. The Military Budget: Congressional Phase. Journal of Politics. November, 1961.

Psychology and Policy in a Nuclear Age. [Symposium.] Journal of Social Issues. Vol. XVII, No. 3. 1961.

Singer, J. David. Deterrence and Shelters. Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists. October, 1961.

Van de Water, John R. Applications of Labor Law to Construction and Equipping of United States Missile Bases. Labor Law Journal. November, 1961.

Government Documents

Congress

House. Committee on Armed Services. Contract-Out Procedures. Hearings before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 1st Sess. 1961.

———. Military Base Closures. Hearings before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 1st Sess. 1961.

———. Overpricing of Government Contracts. Hearings before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 1st Sess. 1961.

———. Sole Source Procurement. Hearings before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 1st Sess. 1961.

———. Committee on Banking and Currency. National Bank Legislation. Hearing before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 1st Sess. 1961.

———. Committee on Education and Labor. Construction Site Picketing. Hearings before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 1st Sess. 1961.

———. Labor-Management Irregularities. Hearings. 87th Cong., 1st Sess. 1961.

———. Mine Safety (Metallic and Nonmetallic Mines). Hearings before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 1st Sess. 1961.

———. School Lunch Program. Hearing before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 1st Sess. 1961.

———. Special Education and Rehabilitation. 87th Cong., 1st Sess. 1961.

———. Committee on Foreign Affairs. To Establish a United States Arms Control Agency. Hearings. 87th Cong., 1st Sess. 1961.

———. Committee on Government Operations. Availability of Information from Federal Departments and Agencies (Telephone Monitoring). House Report No. 1215. 87th Cong., 1st Sess. 1961.

———. Civil Defense—1961. Hearings before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 1st Sess. 1961.

———. Consumer Protection Activities of Federal Departments and Agencies. House Report No. 1241. 87th Cong., 1st Sess. 1961.

———. Executive Branch Practices in Withholding Information from Congressional Committees. Hearing before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 1st Sess. 1961.

———. Health Research and Training. Hearings before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 1st Sess. 1961.

———. Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs. Use and Disposition of Railroad Right-of-Way Grants. Hearings before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 1st Sess. 1961.

———. Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. Crimes on Board Aircraft. Hearings before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 1st Sess. 1961.

———. Intrastate Motor Carriers in Interstate Commerce. Hearings before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 1st Sess. 1961.

———. War Claims and Enemy Property Legislation. Hearings before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 1st Sess. 1961.

———. Committee on the Judiciary. Constitutional Amendments for Continuity of Representative Government during Emergency. Hearing before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 1st Sess. 1961.

———. Increasing the Membership of the House of Representatives and Redistricting Congressional Districts. Hearings before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 1st Sess. 1961.

———. Legislation Relating to Organized Crime. Hearings before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 1st Sess. 1961.

———. Registration and Protection of Trademarks. Hearing before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 1st Sess. 1961.

———. Committee on Post Office and Civil Service. Extending Apportionment Requirement to Temporary Summer Employment. Hearing. 87th Cong., 1st Sess. 1961.

———. Committee on Public Works. Flood Control—1961. Hearings before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 1st Sess. 1961.

———. Miscellaneous Highway Legislation. Hearings before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 1st Sess. 1961.

———. Miscellaneous River and Harbor Legislation. Hearings before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 1st Sess. 1961.

———. Public Buildings Bills—1961. Hearing before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 1st Sess. 1961.

———. Watershed Development—1961. Hearings before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 1st Sess. 1961.

———. Committee on Science and Astronautics. Communications Satellites. Hearings. 87th Cong., 1st Sess. 1961.

———. Establishment of a National Science Academy. Hearings before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 1st Sess. 1961.

———. Patent Policies Relating to Aeronautical and Space Research. Hearings before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 1st Sess. 1961.

———. Committee on Un-American Activities. Hearings Relating to H. R. 4700, to Amend Section 11 of the Subversive Activities Control Act of 1950, as Amended (The Fund for Social Analysis). 87th Cong., 1st Sess. 1961.

———. Hearings Relating to Revision of H. R. 9120 and H. R. 5751, to Amend the Subversive Activities Control Act of 1950. 87th Cong., 1st Sess. 1961.

———. Committee on Ways and Means. Health Services for the Aged under the Social Security System. Hearings. 87th Cong., 1st Sess. 1961.

———. Taxation of Mutual Savings Banks and Savings and Loan Associations. Hearings. 87th Cong., 1st Sess. 1961.

———. Select Committee on Small Business. Small Business Problems in the Poultry Industry. Hearings before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 1st Sess. 1961.

House and Senate. Joint Committee on Atomic Energy. Operations under the Indemnity Provisions of the Atomic Energy Act of 1954. Hearings before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 1st Sess. 1961.

———. Radiation Safety and Regulation. Hearings. 87th Cong., 1st Sess. 1961.

———. Joint Economic Committee. Progress Made by the Department of Defense in Reducing the Impact of Military Procurement on the Economy. Hearing before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 1st Sess. 1961.

———. Review of Report of the Commission on Money and Credit. Hearings. 87th Cong., 1st Sess. 1961.

Senate. Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. Watershed Projects. Hearing before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 1st Sess. 1961.

———. Committee on Armed Services. Miscellaneous Civil Defense Bills. Hearing. 87th Cong., 1st Sess. 1961.

———. Committee on Banking and Currency. Secondary Market for Industrial Mortgages in Redevelopment Areas. Hearings before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 1st Sess. 1961.

———. Truth in Lending Bill. Hearings before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 1st Sess. 1961.

———. Committee on Commerce. Fishery Research and Rehabilitation. Hearing. 87th Cong., 1st Sess. 1961.

———. Space Communications and Allocation of Radio Spectrum. Hearings before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 1st Sess. 1961.

———. Committee on Finance. Distribution of Stock Pursuant to Orders Enforcing the Antitrust Laws. Hearing. 87th Cong., 1st Sess. 1961.

———. Committee on Foreign Relations. Migration and Refugee Assistance Act of 1961. Hearing. Also Senate Report No. 989. 87th Cong., 1st Sess. 1961.

———. Committee on Government Operations. Alleged Threats to Influence Testimony Concerning the Administration's Farm Legislation. Hearing before Subcommittee. Also Senate Report No. 1116. 87th Cong., 1st Sess. 1961.

———. Federal Budgeting for Research and Development. Hearings before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 1st Sess. 1961.

———. Gambling and Organized Crime. Hearings before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 1st Sess. 1961.

———. Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs. Saline Water Conversion. Hearing. 87th Cong., 1st Sess. 1961.

——— and Committee on Public Works. Water Resources Planning Act of 1961. Joint Hearings. 87th Cong., 1st Sess. 1961.

———. Committee on the Judiciary. Design Protection. Hearings before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 1st Sess. 1961.

———. Drug Industry Antitrust Act. Hearings before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 1st Sess. 1961.

———. The Electoral College: Operation and Effect of Proposed Amendments to the Constitution of the United States. Memorandum. Committee Print. 87th Cong., 1st Sess. 1961.

———. Export of Ball Bearing Machines to Russia. Hearings before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 1st Sess. 1961.

———. Government Patent Policy. Hearings before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 1st Sess. 1961.

———. Registration and Protection of Trademarks. Hearings before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 1st Sess. 1961.

———. Wiretapping and Eavesdropping Legislation. Hearings before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 1st Sess. 1961.

———. Committee on Labor and Public Welfare. The Migratory Farm Labor Problem in the United States. Senate Report No. 1098. 87th Cong., 1st Sess. 1961.

———. Select Committee on Small Business. Space Satellite Communications. Hearings before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 1st Sess. 1961.

———. Special Committee on Aging. Retirement Income of the Aging. Hearings before Subcommittee. 87th Cong., 1st Sess. 1961.

Other Federal

Civil Service Commission. Occupations of Federal White-Collar Workers. 1961.

Commission on Civil Rights. 1961 Report, 5 vols.: 1. Voting. 2. Education. 3. Employment. 4. Housing. 5. Justice. 1961.

Department of Commerce. Bureau of the Census. Governments Division. Detail of State Tax Collections in 1961. 1961.

———. Governmental Finances in 1960. 1961.

Department of Health, Education, and Welfare. Office of Education. Placement Services for Personnel in Higher Education. By Lanora G. Lewis. 1961.

———. Trends in Financing Public Education, 1929-30 to 1959-60. 1961.

Federal Aviation Agency. President's Task Force on Air Traffic Control. Report: A Study of the Safe and Efficient Utilization of Airspace. 1961.

President's Task Force on Employee-Management Relations in the Federal Service. A Policy for Employee-Management Cooperation in the Federal Service. 1961.

FOREIGN AND COMPARATIVE GOVERNMENT

The Red Phoenix: Russia Since World War II. BY HARRY SCHWARTZ. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger, Inc., 1961. Pp. xii, 427. $6.00.)

One of America's best known journalist-analysts of the U.S.S.R. has written a book to express and justify his gloom. For a decade he has been reaching the conclusion that the test of history has shown Stalin and Khrushchev more imaginative, wiser planners and more skillful organizers for the cold war than leaders of the United States. He sees only danger in prolonged continuation of the disparity and fears defeat for the United States unless we appreciate his reasons for concern and translate that concern into effective action.

The methodology of this book is disquieting to the reader who is accustomed to a fully reasoned argument written as of a given moment and relying upon carefully and logically organized fact in support of the conclusions. This Dr. Schwartz does not do. He has taken his columns in the New York Times over the past decade and set them forth essentially as they were written, with brief connecting paragraphs in italics to make the necessary transitions. Only at the outset and the end has he written chapters especially for the volume.

For those who have experimented with teaching history and political science by presenting to students who know nothing of the reasons for indecision the issues as they appeared to the statesmen of the time, this book is admirable. It is too easy for students to see the crisis of today and wonder why the men in Washington or elsewhere failed to see the handwriting in time and take appropriate measures. Dr. Schwartz makes it possible to present the feeling of the day when issues emerged and before any one could tell where they might lead. No one now, for example, thinks much of Malenkov's brief interlude of power; but there were mornings when the readers of the Times had reason to wonder with whom the United States would have to contend in another five years. Malenkov is given, consequently, far more space than he would receive if an author were to consider the problems of today.

Dr. Schwartz's method also conveys the constant flux of the Soviet scene better than the analysis that is made at a given moment. He permits his reader to live through Soviet indecision with regard to Tito, the unclear menacing form of China as it loomed upon the horizon long before the open break of the XXII Communist Party Congress, the rise of Khrushchev from relative obscurity to a position of great power. He is able to quote a Soviet doctor he met in 1955 who warned that when the Soviet leaders had power, they would destroy the United States, and that Americans should not underestimate the speed with which that power was growing. From a vantage point in 1961, with the atomic fall-out from the 50 megaton bomb still circling the globe, such advice should have put America on notice, but for many of those who were making policy in 1955, the possibility of such a threat in 1961 seemed remote.

Sources of major change are discerned by Dr. Schwartz in the decision to develop a more rational economic system even if it meant reversing long held views, the shift in generations which in his view is likely to direct attention away from the goal of the international communist movement to purely Russian nationalist aims, the achievement of a substantially improved standard of living, and the impact of an ever stronger China. Soviet policy makers must, he believes, decide whether China should be helped to strength, and here appears the possible conflict between nationalist and internationalist communist goals, for reasons that the author sets forth.

For this reviewer, at least, Dr. Schwartz's warnings at the breakfast table have long been heard, and it has been hard to disagree with his conclusion that in spite of its economic system and its lack of democratic government the U.S.S.R. has been increasing its economic and political power. Even today there is surprise in the United States that so many Soviet citizens have been willing to declare before Stalin's now-empty mausoleum that they revered him, as many assuredly did, whether won over by his propaganda apparatus or by the personal benefit they had gained themselves by appealing to his secretariat for a favor. Assuredly, there has been much underestimation of Soviet strength. Still, it is hard to accept Dr. Schwartz's gloomy view of the future, for it becomes apparent that Soviet leadership can overplay its hand as it has done with excessive atomic testing, or in splitting violently with its Chinese comrades in arms. This book will perform a service if it persuades doubters to take the Russians seriously and prepare for competition of the most bitter kind on every front, but it should not be taken as a blue print of what will happen. There are imponderables on the Soviet side that can change the picture, and at present the chief of these is China.

JOHN N. HAZARD, Columbia University.

Power and Policy in the U.S.S.R.: The Study of Soviet Dynasties. By R. CONQUEST. (New York: St. Martin's Press, 1961. Pp. x, 485. $7.95.)

The primary concern of this volume is dual in nature. It is concerned simultaneously with general theory and with specific application, and is therefore of interest both to the theorist and to the Soviet specialist. On the one hand, Mr. Conquest believes that "this study forms, or should form a separate discipline—'dynasties'" and he hopes "to establish a general method for the interpretation of Soviet events." On the other hand he states that "the main theme of this book is Soviet politics in the decade just past" and clearly aims at presenting a detailed study and interpretation of the struggle for power at the top of the Soviet hierarchy.

Few areas of contemporary politics offer as much temptation to push speculation beyond the available evidence. It is, then, hardly surprising that for the serious student the "Kremlinologist" has, in the author's words "always been a somewhat disreputable figure." Robert Conquest sets out to rescue both Kremlinology and future Kremlinologists from such disrepute. Since he has unquestionably produced a serious, realistic, well-documented, and, by academic standards, eminently respectable study of the Soviet power struggle, it would be hard to deny that he has succeeded in his immediate objective. Whether, however, he can or ought to succeed in his effort to raise Kremlinology or Soviet dynasties to the status of a separate academic discipline is another matter entirely.

The book could hardly have been published at a more appropriate time in view of its stated objectives. The fact that the changes which accompany such events as the XXII Congress tend to push the Soviet specialist into the role of Kremlinologist, even if only temporarily or partially, could indeed lead to a greater appreciation of the utility, and perhaps even the unavoidability of Kremlinology in some form. The appearance of a model of careful Kremlinology like Mr. Conquest's is doubly important at a time like the present because it provides both an example for rasher Kremlinologists to emulate and a set of hypotheses which can now be subjected to further testing. Mr. Conquest's proposal for a specialized journal in the field which would both register relevant facts and compare speculative theory may also be aided by recent events which indicate its utility.

The organization of the book reflects its dual purpose. Part One presents the basic theoretical framework including a detailed treatment of questions of evidence and an attempt to identify the basic forces and pressures in Soviet politics. The remainder of the book involves both the expansion and the testing of the theory in terms of its detailed application to conflicts in the U.S.S.R. since 1949. These include the Leningrad Case, the agricultural disputes, the XIX Congress, the death of Stalin, the fall of Beria, Malenkov's premiership, the XX Congress, the Anti-Party Group, Khrushchev's Ascendancy, and the XX Congress.

It is clearly impossible in a review of this length to deal with even the main lines of a sophisticated interpretation of such a complex series of events. Indeed, if, as the author contends, the main temptation in the field is that of simplifying too much, it is clear not only that he has not succumbed to temptation, but that it would be manifestly unfair for a reviewer to attempt to reduce his elaborate series of hypotheses to some artificial schematic outline.

A few general comments may indicate some of the points most open to criticism. First, Mr. Conquest's self-imposed restriction of relying in principle exclusively upon official evidence does not seem essential for respectable work in the field. Different criteria may have to be developed for evaluating official, quasi-official, and unofficial evidence, but there seems to be insufficient reason to exclude all but purely official evidence. Indeed, Mr. Conquest himself finds it necessary to justify his own acceptance of Khrushchev's Secret Speech as "official." Moreover, the virtually complete exclusion of Communist China from consideration is not, I think, a procedure which future workers in this field will be willing to accept. Again, in view of the book's implicit reliance upon essentially constant patterns of Soviet behavior, the meaning and implications of the author's cryptic remarks near the end of the book about future enormous changes in and possible democratization of the regime certainly need elaboration and clarification.

Nevertheless, the book's merits are substantial. To the theorist it offers a highly sophisticated example of empirical theory—careful, cautious, constantly striving to be aware of its own assumptions and to stress the tentative and hypothetical nature of the inquiry. To the Soviet specialist it offers a wealth of information (some of it in the appendices) combined with informed speculation on its meaning. To all it offers a fascinating attempt to penetrate the mysteries of the Soviet struggle for power.—L. GERALD BURSEY, North-eastern University.

Communism in Czechoslovakia, 1948-1960. By EDWARD TABORSKY. (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1961. Pp. xii, 628. $12.50.)

This book will remain for some time to come the standard work on the postwar Czechoslovak communist regime. It is scholarly, thorough and detailed, with a wealth of information from primary sources.

The Czechoslovak Communist Party, the governmental structure, the economic performance of the regime and "the making of the new communist man" are discussed in the four parts of the book. Despite the breadth of these topics, the author is not overwhelmed by the sheer weight of data amassed. Although Professor Taborsky makes no use of explicit analytical frameworks, his discussion is intuitively structured to present a meaningful panorama of the regime.

His comprehensive discussion of the Party includes its organizational structure, functions and policies, its membership, cohesiveness, partisan roles and motivations. The development of the Party is analyzed, the Great Purge discussed and the pernicious Party isms, ranging from "revisionism" to local "Masarykism," considered. Particularly insightful portraits are drawn of the ruling oligarchs and their relationship to the rank-and-file. Much in this section of the book, as elsewhere, must have a familiar ring for students of the Soviet system, even for those totally unacquainted with the Czechoslovak scene. For the Soviet image casts its long shadow over every aspect of Czechoslovakia's communist regime.

Perhaps the best portion of the book is the discussion of the "communist transmission belts of formal government." Taborsky presents the reader with a thorough picture of the two constitutions, the ever-changing, shapeless machinery of communist government and its operational code. At the same time the empty shell of communist institutional and constitutional devices is exposed: the legislature does not legislate, the executive branch does not make decisions, the voter does not choose the office-holders. One could muse ironically that the state indeed is withering away (as Engels predicted) but is leaving the power monopoly of the Party in its stead.

The third part of the book attempts to evaluate the regime's performance in the economic and social welfare spheres. Czechoslovakia is considered to be Moscow's "showcase of communism." Unravelling the maze of communist statistics, the author is aware of the pitfalls involved in comparing a regimented, totalitarian society with a free Western nation. Nevertheless he makes some assessments: in the industrial sector the regime is not a failure although the claim of "outproducing capitalism" is a myth. In agriculture, a dismal failure has been reaped. This particular section gives a disturbing picture of the human and social cost of a communist experiment: the workers facing the production norms, the kulaks caught in the "class struggle" of the villages, the peasants being regimented into collective farms.

The last portion of the study concentrates on the ways and means of indoctrination. Among the topics discussed, the "sky-high Iron Curtain . . . to serve . . . the purposes . . . of collectivizing the mind of a whole nation" is particularly interesting. However, in comparison to other portions of the book, one might complain that the fascinating topic, "the making of the new communist man," is not given sufficiently intensive treatment. In general, if this book warrants criticism, it is because Taborsky focuses his analysis on the pattern of government rather than on the pattern of politics. The "transmission belts of formal government" are excellently scrutinized but the informal controls and the associational patterns of Czechoslovak society are neglected. The fate of a pluralistic society as remodelled by the Party receives skimpy treatment. Thus also the picture of revolution and social change in Czechoslovakia comes through only in faint colors.

Among Taborsky's findings and conclusions, perhaps the single most striking is the constant emulation of the Soviet model in all spheres of Czechoslovak life. By the end of the twelfth year, Czechoslovakia shows itself as a miniature replica of the Soviet Union. If it rains in Moscow one may count upon the communists in Prague to open their umbrellas. Faithfulness and discipline, of course, are traits of the communist international movement. Furthermore, for the Czechoslovak Communist Party the Kremlin in the last analysis is the supreme guarantee of their rule and totalitarian system. Sycophantism thus becomes the Czechoslovak raison d'état.

In the concluding chapter Taborsky submits that Marx-Leninism has in fact failed in Czechoslovakia. The dynamism of the Party has eroded, the Party as a social movement has become less attractive and there are fewer true communists in the country today than in the past. Party members are opportunist rather than dedicated, fearful rather than activist. The people are resigned or patient but certainly unimpressed, accepting the tyranny of necessity but without conviction. It seems that this very weakness of the regime is also the source of its stability. Czechoslovak stability is the immobilisme of a Party devoid of creative energy, incapable of the revisionism that elsewhere in the satellites brought turmoil, hopeful change and relaxation of the Kremlin's controls. Taborsky feels that for Czechoslovakia such a renaissance is unlikely. Only if fundamental changes occur in the Russian regime may Czechoslovakia show that its communist veneer is but skin deep.—Ivo K. FEIERABEND, San Diego State College.

Growth of Public Expenditures in the United Kingdom. BY ALAN T. PEACOCK AND JACK WISEMAN ASSISTED BY JINDRICH VEVERKA. A Study by the National Bureau of Economic Research. (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1961. Pp. xxxi, 213. $5.00.)

This is an extremely useful book. From it any attentive reader may learn the significant facts about the growth of public expenditures in the United Kingdom from 1890 through 1955. This growth is carefully expressed in money expenditures at current prices, in real cost by conversion to 1900 prices, in percentages of the gross national product, and in several series of index numbers. To give a perspective which runs back of 1890, the authors have prepared figures for selected years as far back as 1792. All series are expressed in per capita figures, as well as in total amounts. Finally, charts and diagrams give a general picture of magnitudes involved, and detailed figures are set forth in tables in the text and an appendix.

Totals are broken down into categories. Tables and charts compare local government expenditures to national, and tables and charts show expenditures on welfare programs, national defense, and nationalized industries. Rates of growth for these categories may therefore be seen as part of the total growth, and all may be compared with the growth of population and national income.

The authors' initial purpose was "the filling of a gap in the existing economic statistics of public expenditures in the United Kingdom during the last sixty years" (Preface, p. xix). The work of assembling and analyzing data, a formidable task, led them to formulate a theory which would explain the increase of expenditures. Total expenditure by 1955 had increased forty-seven times over 1890, reckoned in current prices, and had increased sevenfold in terms of 1900 prices. Expressed as a percentage of gross national product, it had risen from 7 to 37 percent during these years.

Their explanation of this increase depends largely on "the displacement effect" of two world wars. After each war total public expenditure fell from its wartime peak, but did not return to its prewar level. The authors are equally interested in "the concentration process" which put more and more of the total expenditure into the hands of the central government. Having examined the forces which led to the growth of spending, they devote their final chapter to a forecast of probable future trends.

They predict that expenditures on education, the national health scheme, national insurance, and a few other similar services are likely to expand. At the same time, family allowances, national assistance, war pensions, and agricultural and food subsidies will probably contract. Defense, national debt service, housing, and a few other services are likely to remain stationary. The total amount of government expenditure will increase, according to their estimates, by approximately 6 percent in the twenty-five years from 1956 to 1981. The share of the gross national product taken by government, then, is likely to decrease from 37 percent in 1955 to perhaps 21 percent in 1981.

A brief summary cannot do justice to the care and thoroughness which has been expended upon assembling and collating data, and to the caution with which hypotheses have been formulated. Indeed, the authors' caution at one place seems to set a record for academic reserve: "Without straining our thesis too far, however, it is possible to argue that World War II cannot be dismissed as an irrelevance." The tables and charts which they present have a high value for the student of public finance, and the interested citizen—and this includes the interested citizen of other nations than the United Kingdom. What the authors have assessed is the cost of maintaining the services of the modern state.

The interested citizen is entitled to one small complaint. He would be grateful if some of the terms used were explained more fully: such things, for example, as the constituent elements of the gross national product, and something of the structure of the index numbers. This could have been added to the explanation of terms in the Appendix, and would have made the meaning of the analysis more accessible to the average reader.

The great value of this book is the careful examination and analysis of the record since 1890, which makes possible a cautious but informed forecast of future prospects. The authors' forecasts, and any other forecast, are and must be based on the firm foundation of the facts which they have made available by a great deal of painstaking labor. Not only economists, but political scientists and public-spirited citizens can make a great deal of use of the figures, and of the discussion of the meaning of the figures.—PHILIP W. BUCK, Stanford University.

London's Newcomers: The West Indian Migrants.

By RUTH GLASS, ASSISTED BY HAROLD POLINS. (Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1961. Pp. xiii, 278. $4.00.)

In 1958 there was established at University College, London, a Centre for Urban Studies. In addition to the study projects which it initiates or assists, this Centre has the purpose of bringing together the contributions of social scientists and of workers in other fields such as town planning and public health.

London's Newcomers constitutes Report Number 1 of the Centre. Its author, Mrs. Ruth Glass, is the Centre's Director of Research. She gives us a detailed and stimulating study of one segment of the life of a great metropolis.

As the sub-title indicates, the author and her assistant are concerned with one group of migrants only, those coming from the British West Indies. Their problems cannot be kept entirely separate from those of colored migrants to Great Britain from other British dominions. However, West Indians now constitute a majority of Britain's colored residents, they are mostly recent arrivals (since 1953), and for most of them English is the main language. Such considerations motivated and justify this separate treatment.

Further, it was against West Indians that the most publicized racial rioting took place. These were the outbreaks of 1958, first in Nottingham and then in the Notting Dale district of north-western London. They were not the first, or the last, anti-colored riots in England nor, as demonstrated by more recent despatches from Middlesbrough, have the West Indians been the only victims.

The first few chapters of the book are devoted to a careful analysis of the characteristics of the migrants and their distribution in London. In these studies use is made of available figures from the census, records of arrivals in Great Britain, and the reports of the Migrant Service Division of the West Indies Commission. These the author finds in some respects inadequate and incomplete. They are supplemented by extensive personal investigations and by other sources. The usefulness of this study is enhanced by three maps showing the distribution of West Indians in London.

The first section of the book demolishes some of the notions that have been popularized by newspaper headlines and radio commentators. Thus the number of West Indians (or of other colored persons for that matter) in London is small. Most are found in two rather large sections of London, one in northwest London stretching west from Paddington station; the other in the Brixton area of south central London. The concentration is not dense and with the possible exception of a very few blocks in south London nothing resembling even a tiny "Harlem" can be said to exist. Further, only a small minority of the migrants are rated as unskilled labor, although many find themselves downgraded in obtaining work in London.

The two middle sections of the book deal with problems of adjustment and with attitudes. The three main problems considered are those connected with housing, schools, and employment. The nature of these two sections makes a certain amount of repetition inevitable.

Mrs. Glass makes frequent general comparisons with the racial problem in the United States. It is perhaps this which leads to the inclusion of schools among problems of adjustment. In this field the absence of any real discrimination is the salient feature. In connection with the other two problems, the studies of discrimination in employment and especially in housing are carefully developed. The author is obviously keenly aware of the difficulty in determining to what extent discrimination is due to color or to competition for jobs and resentment at the arrival of additional residents in already badly overcrowded sections of the city. The nature of the treatment does tend to magnify the importance of color as a factor.

The last section of the book deals with reactions to the Notting Dale riots of 1958 and to the murder of a West Indian in the same general area in the spring of 1959. These include the reactions in Parliament and in the courts, in the press and among people generally. Attention is given to organizations on both sides—the anti-color groups and the groups actively working for tolerance and mutual respect.

In her preface the author states her definite opposition to racial discrimination and her belief in tolerance in an active, not merely a passive, sense. This has not prevented what is, with rare if any exceptions, an objective marshalling of the facts. Thus, while apparently convinced that the 1959 murder of the West Indian was due to color, she duly lists the facts according to which this must be labelled "not proven." Whether the facts justify all her conclusions is another matter. Racial discrimination has never been accepted by English law nor is it a respectable doctrine for political or trade union leaders. Most persons would accept the conclusion that labor and political leaders should more actively move against color discrimination. To what extent existing law against discrimination by private persons should be strengthened is something else again.

The limited scope of Mrs. Glass's book does not permit the exhaustive study and discussion of certain larger issues suggested by her immediate problem. She does, however, touch briefly upon the big problem of empire migration and the nature of the Commonwealth itself. Citizens of all parts of the Commonwealth are British citizens and as such entitled freely to enter and settle in Great Britain. Discussions so far in Parliament and statements of political leaders as summarized by Mrs. Glass indicated, then, no intention to change this. Whether, considering the vastly changed nature and size of the new British Commonwealth, her belief in this principle is sound is an important subject for future broad investigations and discussion. But this of course could not be included within the limited scope of the work under review.—JAMES Q. DEALEY, University of Toledo.

A Short Introduction to the Economy of Latin America. By F. BENHAM AND H. A. HOLLEY. (London: Oxford University Press for the Royal Institute of International Affairs, 1960. Pp. x, 169. $2.90.)

This work by two British economists is one of a growing series of monographic studies devoted to Latin America under the auspices of the Royal Institute of International Affairs. Each of the others (except for R. A. Humphreys' bibliographical guide to Latin American history) has been an examination of the institutions of an individual state. This latest work, however, attempts a survey of the region as a whole. In common with the earlier monographs the authors of this one have produced a concise and contemporaneous study. In the preface it is stressed that their purpose was to present "a first introduction" to the economy of Latin America for the relatively uninformed reader rather than to deal exhaustively or profoundly with the subject.

The book is divided into two parts. The first, by Frederic Benham, is a descriptive catalogue of the entire region of Latin America under such headings as agriculture, forestry and fisheries, oil and other minerals, transport and power, manufacturing, international trade, and economic prospects. The second part, by H. A. Holley, provides a description and analysis of the economies of seven of the Latin American nations (Argentina, Brazil, Chile, Colombia, Mexico, Peru, and Venezuela). Altogether the authors have managed to compress much useful information between the covers of this small book, though its readability has suffered in the process.

As an "introduction" to the subject no attempt has been made in this work to break new ground in economic research or analysis. The source material consists almost wholly, especially in Part I, of public documents of the United Nations, its Economic Commission for Latin America, and the specialized agencies. The rather considerable domestic economic literature that this tormented and much-probed area of the world has produced appears not to have been consulted except peripherally. The heavy reliance upon the documents of international agencies, records that are notorious for their avoidance of embarrassing political conclusions, has had the effect of leaving some matters relatively untouched, such as the adverse result of heavy military appropriations upon underdeveloped economies, the relationship of the general social structure to the economic ills of the area, or the question of whether broadened participation in the fruits of an economy may help to promote democratic institutions. In general it appeared to a political scientist that much of the potential value of this book was lost by failing to explain why certain political facts of Latin America have caused many of the existing un-economic conditions and continue to act as partial barriers to an economically-rational solution by politically-neutral foreign consultants.

One specific misstatement by Holley in his examination of the Argentine economy needs correction. It was Peron's insistence upon ratification of the Standard Oil of California contract in 1955 that was a factor in his downfall rather than the subsequent symptomatic disapproval of the concession by the peronista Congress. In the study on Brazil it would have been well to have included some mention of the severely depressed north-eastern region as well as the arguments concerning the financial feasibility of the erection of Brasilia at this time. At the same time the most able chapter of the book, in the mind of this reader, was the very incisive explanation by Holley of the fiscal problems peculiar to Chile. The book ends with a statistical appendix on the international trade of the Latin American nations.

In conclusion it should be repeated that this is a very worthwhile work within the limited scope that the authors set for themselves. It is regrettable, however, that they did not attempt a larger frame of reference as a basis for their efforts. Finally, the recent initiation of the inter-American "Alliance for Progress" reveals that the field of comparative economics also suffers from the same hazard of "dating" that exists in our area of comparative politics.—FRANK M. LEWIS, State University of South Dakota.

Sun Yat-sen and Communism. BY SHAO CHUAN LENG AND NORMAN D. PALMER. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger, Inc., 1960. Pp. viii, 234. $6.00.)

Sun Yat-sen's alliance with Soviet Russia in 1923 has often been regarded as a major historical event leading to the conquest of the Chinese mainland by the Communists. Professors Shao and Palmer's illuminating book brings to the fore again this controversial event and its political consequences, naming Sun as the first leader of a nation to fall for the fallacy of the "United Front."

The book contains a concise but comprehensive analysis of Sun's early contact with the West. It builds an impressive defense for his fateful move to befriend the Soviets. However, the discussion still leaves largely unanswered two questions which have often been raised. Was Sun's position before the alliance so desperate that he had to seek Russian help? Could he have been too naive about Communism, viewing Russia more as a champion of equality for oppressed nations than as an apostle of Marx whose advocacy of class struggle he explicitly rejected?

Chapter 4 of the book gives a succinct description of the nature and scope of the Kuomintang-Soviet alliance, the inherent differences between the two, and the extent to which the founder of the Chinese Republic changed his doctrines under the Soviet influence. In evaluating this alliance, the authors agree that Sun did China a great disservice by "giving aid and comfort" to the Communists. In the opinion of the reviewer, the damage the alliance did to China was not so much in helping Communism to become entrenched in that country as it was in making Sun's own party, the Kuomintang, intrinsically incapable of fulfilling his ideals. By revitalizing the Kuomintang with Soviet methods, tactics, and organization, he also made it more authoritarian, thus crippling from the outset its ability to be an effective agent for democracy. The reviewer therefore cannot subscribe to the authors' rather casual remark that the failure of the Nationalists to carry on the revolution "is not due to any deficiencies in Sun's efforts or teachings."

The book has a very interesting account of Chinese Communists' interpretations of Sun's doctrines and policies. In a chapter which compares Sun Yat-senism and Chinese Communism, the authors rightly point out that the latter is a genuine development of Marxism-Leninism (and Stalinism, the reviewer would add), an ideology quite different from the democratic principles of the West, which contributed much to Sun Yat-senism. The reviewer feels however that an adequate understanding of Sun's ideas requires also a study of the interpretations and practice of the Chinese Nationalists, who have always considered themselves as his true followers. Such a study would add depth to the comparison of Sun Yat-senism and Chinese Communism.

Between the two isms, it is not difficult to detect where the sympathy of the authors lie. They are appalled by Red China's new system of communes. Without going into a detailed analysis of this system, they conclude a priori that Dr. Sun envisioned a very different future for his country and that "Communism, and not Sun Yat-senism, may yet prove to be a passing phase, rather than the climax, of the Chinese revolution."—JEFFREY Y. MAO, Central College.

Political Change in Morocco. By DOUGLAS E. ASHFORD. (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1961. Pp. xi, 432. $8.50.)

This is the first detailed study of the internal politics of the newly born state of Morocco written by an American scholar. Dr. Ashford, who is intimately acquainted with the people and the leaders of the country, writes not only from published source material, but also from his own personal experiences. His study may well be regarded as a model for comparable works on other North African countries.

The author's aim, as set forth in the introductory chapter, is to describe and analyze the structure of national politics, the modes of political expression and participation of the people, and the forces acting on the working of political institutions. As an introduction for his study, the author begins by tracing the origins of nationalism and the establishment of the present regime. It seems to the present reviewer that here is where Ashford's treatment of the movement is not quite clear. He is right in stating that Moroccan nationalists (and this is true of all North African nationalists, including Egypt) sought the support of religious movements, Pan-Islamism in particular. Ashford, however, vaguely indicated that this was because nationalism in North Africa emerged as a reaction to Christian powers, not against the domination of a Muslim power (the Ottoman Empire) as in the case of the Eastern Arab World, and therefore sought the support of religious groupings not favorable to Christian domination.

The author's detailed study of the structure and operation of the party system, the Istiqlal (independence) Party in particular, constitutes a real contribution to our knowledge of North African politics. However, Ashford seems to rely in his treatment of this subject largely on French rather than on native Arabic sources. He also followed the French transliteration system rather than that accepted by Arabists. These remarks are of small significance regarding a thorough study which may confidently be recommended as a reliable guide.—MAJID KHADDURI, Johns Hopkins University.

Congo Disaster. By COLIN LEGUM. (Baltimore: Penguin Books, 1961. Pp. 174. 85¢.)

Knowing Colin Legum's professional background—he is a journalist who has spent most of his adult life in and writing about Africa—makes the strengths and weaknesses of his book more understandable. Though it is filled with sharp observations and keen insights, it lacks the organization and analysis which one expects from a trained political scientist.

The thesis of the book is, "The roots of the Congo's tragedy go deep; they belong perhaps, more to the past than to the present." Though Legum does not conceptualize these roots in terms of stylistic and communicative influences upon Congo nationalism, I believe that his material is best viewed in this way.

The style of Congo nationalism has its roots in the brutality of the rule of King Leopold II, 1884–1908, and in the benevolent paternalism of the following Belgian colonial period. Discussing such acts as cutting off laborers' hands or feet for not fulfilling work quotas, Legum writes, "Here was his worst crime; Leopold had replaced the natives' fear of the slaver with a fear of the white man." Legum does not make the explicit connection, but one can see echoes of this fear when later in the book he reports that during the 1959 Leopoldville riots "for the first time hatred of whites came into the open" and during the chaotic days following independence "raping of women was often accompanied by acts intended to humiliate them. Ill-treatment of men was usually calculated to degrade them." (Emphasis supplied.)

A policy of physical welfare for the Congolese was the manifestation of Belgian benevolent paternalism. Food, clothing, housing, and medical care were provided for most workers; elementary and religious education, technical training, and agricultural reforms were widespread. On the other hand, there were few intellectual or emotional satisfactions derived from the Belgian world. Speech, press, and association were restricted. Few students were allowed to attend secondary school and until 1952 none were allowed to attend a university. It was virtually impossible for a Congolese to attain a position of importance within the ruling power triumvirate of the Belgian Colonial Administration, Big Business, and the Catholic Church. In the social sphere the "superior" whites and the "inferior" blacks were kept apart. The assumption upon which this benevolent paternalism rested was that it would create a politically content, vocationally efficient, and spiritually saved population. This was, of course, a misunderstanding of the nature of man.

Legum suggests that the result of this policy was a population inexperienced and therefore unprepared for power. To this I would add that they had not experienced that transformation of the self which comes from being exposed to modern intellectual culture; also, their bases of judgment were too little dependent upon internal mechanisms and too much upon external authority.

I believe that one can, from Legum's material, perceive a communicative influence upon Congo nationalism. First there was isolation which was a corollary of benevolent paternalism; second there were contacts, for which there were increasing opportunities during and after the Second World War. The emergent Congo elites were isolated from each other because of the distances between the country's urban centers and because of colonial restrictions. They were isolated from the Belgians because of class differences and paternalistic and racial attitudes. And they were isolated from the outside world, physically because of administrative and financial restrictions, intellectually because of educational deficiencies.

One can also view the developments in Congo nationalism in terms of increasing contacts. The broadened perspectives gained from service in the war (in South Asia, the Middle East, and North Africa) were in large part responsible for the proliferation of associations from 1946 through 1950. During the 1950-1955 period "the circles of the elite began to voice demands for social, economic, and political reforms." I would maintain that this behavior was essentially pre-national and pre-political, the result of associational contacts. The push "towards open political activities" took place from 1955 through 1958. This politicization may be traced to a change in the Belgian Government which led to the projection of metropolitan politics upon the colony, and to Professor van Bilsen's widely disseminated "radical" publication, Vers l'Indépendance du Congo et du Ruanda-Urundi. Three events took place during 1958 which sped the pace of the Congo's rush to independence: DeGaulle gave a speech in Brazzaville offering the French Congo autonomy or independence; Congolese leaders were invited to the Brussels Exhibition, providing many with a first opportunity to meet their confreres; and the First Pan-African Conference was held in Accra, three Congo leaders attending.

At the January-February 1960 Round Table Conference in Brussels aimed to discuss the future of the Congo, the Belgian Government surprised almost everyone—including the Congo representatives—by granting independence as of June 30. Legum suggests two reasons for this abandonment, certainly a significant part of the Congo's history. First, the Belgians "completely misjudged the speed of events, and the extent to which it was necessary to make concessions." Second, the former "blue chip" colony had become a financial burden to the Belgians because of the 1956 drop in world commodity prices.

The final chapters of Congo Disaster are devoted to internal and international politics during the first months of independence. Legum believes that the "crux" of the country's internal politics is the division between the centralists and the federalists. Lumumba, former leader of the central-ist faction, is described as inexperienced, opportunistic out of political desperation, and "inflexible only on one important issue: the need for a strong central government." An interesting speculation is offered about Kasavubu, who since publication has switched from federalist to centralist: his "passionate Bakongo patriotism might perhaps be his way of compensating for not being pure Bakongo himself. His grandfather was a Chinese labourer." About the United Nations, Legum writes, "If there is neither chaos nor anarchy today, it is solely due to the UN operations." He is most critical of the U.N.'s failure to restore unity in the country and its impartiality towards legal and rebel governments. Presumably Legum hailed the motives behind the U.N.'s recent military effort in the Katanga but suffered during its unfolding.—WILLIAM HANNA, Michigan State University.

The Political Kingdom in Uganda. By DAVID E. APTER. (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1961. Pp. 498. $10.00.)

This work is a highly sophisticated presentation representing a successful blending of accurate historical description, political insight and contemporary sociological theory. Professor Apter approaches his subject from the broad perspective of his previous work on the Gold Coast; as a student of comparative political institutions in Africa he has few peers. Within an over-all historical context he lays bare the intertwining forces that have shaped Buganda's emergence into a restless mid-twentieth century Africa. The mass of data in this study makes it valuable as a reference work. The footnotes provide an extremely valuable source of bibliographic materials and are readable and perceptive adjuncts to the main text. Among the increasing number of American political scientists seriously studying Africa David Apter emerges as one of the few original thinkers.—EUGENE P. DVORIN, Los Angeles State College.

Contemporary Arab Politics: A Concise History. By GEORGE E. KIRK. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger, Inc., 1961. Pp. 231. $1.95.)

George Kirk's new book shares many attributes of his previous writings: it is written in swift-flowing prose, it is never dull, and it attests to the author's mastery of the subject. Both internal and international aspects of the current revolution in the Arab East are treated. Professor Kirk, an established authority on the area and a man known for his outspokenness, presents in this volume his views, his preferences, and his dislikes even more forcefully than usual. The book begins with the discussion of the Arab "Myth of the Fourteenth Century," which, as the author regretfully notes, has repudiated its early liberalism and has instead espoused narrow nationalist radicalism and a megalomania apt to distort facts and values. In the author's eyes this new brand of nationalism, best exemplified by Nasser of Egypt, is destructive and negative. But, according to him, "it was the impatient Zionists, limited in their vision, who played a large part in wrecking the chances for keeping post-war Middle Eastern nationalism at a relatively moderate level." Thus the Palestine war of 1948 constituted a "great divide" of contemporary Middle Eastern history. The "Seven Pillars" of the British-conceived conservatism and stability in the Middle East were irrevocably sapped and the world was exposed to a chain reaction of events, each more catastrophic than its predecessor.

The United States, according to Kirk, bears no small part of the blame for these misfortunes because of its "irresponsibility and sheer ignorance," its courting of Zionism, and above everything, its refusal to stand loyally by Britain on such issues as the Buraimi dispute and the Suez crisis. The author devotes the whole of a chapter to the latter, terming it appropriately, "The Great Divorce." Supporting his argument with copious quotations from Anthony Eden's memoirs, he does not conceal his dismay at the way Secretary Dulles did his utmost first to mislead and then to cajole the British into a virtual surrender to Nasser.

Mr. Kirk is emphatic in his indictment of Nasserism. With a penchant for pithy (and sometimes prophetic) statements, he describes the Cairo-Damascus union as "the smothering of Syria" and follows it by an eloquent account of Egyptian-sponsored subversion in Jordan, Lebanon, and Iraq. Although he avoids the all-too-frequent oversimplification of equating Nasserism with Communism, he points out how in many instances the policies of the Cairo-influenced Pan-Arabists ran parallel to those of the Communists, both trying to upset the conservative and pro-Western regimes in the area.

Although the principal "devils" in the Middle Eastern political game are, according to the author, the Zionists, the Nasserists, and the confused-plus-perfidious Americans, he has hardly any kind words to say about the British liberals and Labourites (except, perhaps, Ernest Bevin) whose "progressive irresponsibility" and "half-informed emotionalism" have also contributed to the weakening, if not a collapse, of British supremacy in the Arab East.

To conclude: this is a highly informative, well written, and well documented book by an author who has a discerning eye for what is politically relevant and interesting. But it is at the same time a strong and bitter indictment of men and policies responsible for what the author believes to be the present sad plight of the Middle East and its unpromising future.—GEORGE LENCZOWSKI, University of California (Berkeley).

History of the Islamic Peoples. By CARL BROCKELMANN. Translated by Joel Carmichael and Moshe Perlmann. (New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons, 1960. Pp. v, 582. $1.95.)

Professor Brockelmann's Syriac dictionary and his work in Semitic comparative grammar and comparative Arabic literature made him one of Germany's foremost Semitic (particularly Arabic) scholars. Many were surprised at his writing of a history of the Islamic peoples, not only because of his background, but also because of its late occurrence.

The author has attempted what is essentially a political history of the Islamic peoples from their beginning until 1939. This is not an easy task, for the history of Islam suffers from a lack of original and critical data. More important, this history unfolded so rapidly and over such a wide and heterogeneous area as to appear to be not one but many parallel histories connected by the one tenuous link of a common religion. For the most part Professor Brockelmann has overcome these difficulties and in so doing has given the contemporary reader an excellent one-volume account of the political history of the major Islamic peoples.

The book is divided into five sections. The first opens with a brief chapter dealing with the Arabian Peninsula prior to the rise of Islam, followed by a chapter on the life of Muhammad. Chapter 3 attempts a summary of the tenets of Islam. Part I continues with the founding and expansion of the Islamic Empire, the rise and fall of the Umayyad Caliphate, the origin of the Shi'ha, and the founding of the Abbasid Caliphate. Part II describes the Abbasid Caliphate, its decay, and the rise of the numerous and ephemeral dynasties throughout the empire. Following this is a chapter dealing with the origins of the Turks and Persians. Chapter 4 deals with Islam in North Africa, and its revitalization in Spain under the Umayyads and Almohads. The remaining two chapters deal with the Crusades, the rise of the Mamluks in Egypt, and the Mongol invasions. The third section of the book deals with the rise and decay of the Ottoman Empire to the end of the eighteenth century. There is also a short chapter on the origin and decline of the Persian Empire. Part IV concerns Islam in the nineteenth century and thus is primarily taken up with the decay of the Ottoman position in Egypt and North Africa. The last chapter of this section takes up Persia from the late eighteenth century through World War I. The last section of the book examines Turkey, Egypt, the Fertile Crescent, the Arabian Peninsula, Persia and Afghanistan following the war and through the 1930's. Professor Perlmann has added a supplementary review of events for the period 1939-1947. This is followed by a chronological table and an index.

The History of the Islamic Peoples, rather than being an original contribution to the field, is a summary of the available literature. The translators have added footnotes indicating more recent sources. The arts and sciences are given scant coverage in this volume. When they are discussed it appears to be on an almost ad hoc basis. The maps in this edition are quite poor. A major but perhaps inevitable criticism of Professor Brockelmann's work is that at times it shifts from person, to battle, to tribe, to dynasty, to location, to year with such rapidity as to render the period unintelligible to the non-specialist. This is most evident in those chapters dealing with the Abassid Caliphate and its dissolution. There are a number of other minor criticisms that might be made—e.g., geographical errors, inconsistencies, and the often stilted English of the translators,—but despite these and other criticisms this volume offers the general reader a sound and complete account of a most difficult history.—JOHN A. FITZGERALD, Whitman College.

Storm Over Laos—A Contemporary History. By SISOUK NA CHAMPASSAK. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger, Inc., 1961. Pp. x, 202. $5.00.)

Considering the paltry amount of information available on Laos, Prince Sisouk's thin volume should be a welcome addition to the bibliography of the average student of Southeast Asian affairs. The specialist, on the other hand, who will try to find in Storm Over Laos a rational explanation of the horrible mess which at present prevails in that remote corner of the world, will unfortunately have to look elsewhere, for the present book gives no sources, deals only in generalizations, cites only facts (many of them dubious) which already have been reported in the world press, and does not even have an index or a bibliography. It is little else but a plea pro domo for the official viewpoint of the Laotian regime of Prince Boun Oum and of pro-American strongman Gen. Phoumi Nosavan.

And it could not have been otherwise, since the author is a noble relative of Prince Boun Oum Na Champassak and for the past two years the United Nations delegate of his country. The book thus represents a more or less official viewpoint—and that is what makes its reading worthwhile after all. Another interesting aspect of the book is a comparison with its French edition Tempête Sur Le Laos, an operation that in many political books seems to become increasingly necessary if one does not wish to fall victim to brainwashing by deliberate mistranslation.* The French edition is dedicated to the author's family and to "a neutral and independent Laos," i.e., along the policy lines dear to the Quai d'Orsay. The United States edition is dedicated to the above plus the late Dr. Tom Dooley!—a sure-fire "tear-jerker" item probably included to counter-balance whatever upsetting effect the word "neutrality" may have had. Other changes may have been due to accidental mistranslations [e.g., the French métropole (homeland) into "capital" on p. 26], but it can be said in all fairness that the French text has a slightly less americanophile flavor to it than the U.S. edition, while the latter, conversely, manages to be slightly more critical of the French.

The best parts of the book are those in which the author gives the reader the benefit of his own personal experience, such as his voyage to Red China as part of a Lao government delegation or while acting in a ministerial capacity in Vientiane during the 1959 crisis; or those in which the author quite involuntarily gives us the views of a lowland Laotian on his own compatriots from the jungle hills. Yet even those parts, if read without any background knowledge of what went on, will do little but confuse the issues involved. For example, the 1956 trip of then Premier Souvanna Phouma to Red China is described in a series of little anecdotes in which not one cliché on the (admittedly) Big Bad Chinese Wolf is missing—including the assertion that it was to the Lao delegation that Peng Te-Huai had declared that China could afford to lose 400 million people in a nuclear war. Nowhere, however, does Sisouk mention what real and unique victories the trip to Peking had achieved: temporary isolation of the Pathet-Lao from their Communist backers and a formal, written, assurance that Red China had no objection to the two French bases in Laos permitted under the 1954 Geneva Agreements—the only case on record in which Peking subscribed to the existence of Western bases in its backyard. Considering the situation in Laos then and what is likely to be achieved by the West at Geneva now on the same subject, one could have rightfully rejoiced at those well-earned fruits of Lao diplomacy. But as Sisouk quite forthrightly notes, Washington was distinctly unhappy with that turn of events and expressed its unhappiness in a statement which, "reaching Vientiane in the midst of her rejoicing, [. . .] created the worst possible effect for the U.S., one of selfish ill-temper."

Sisouk also does not hesitate to speak, although in most general terms, of the shameless squander-

* A typical example of this is the recent translation of the French anthropologist and Algeria expert Germaine Tillon's book France and Algeria: Complementary Enemies, in which "partage de l'Algérie" (the partitioning of Algeria) is being rendered as "the segregation (!) of the Algerians."

ing of American aid which "reached such proportions that the Pathet-Lao needed no propaganda to turn the rural population against the townspeople." This is one clue to what went wrong in Laos. Another clue is given a few pages later, again unintentionally, when Sisouk describes the ethnic composition of the Pathet-Lao troops: "a strange mixture of Thai, Meo, Kha, and a minority of Lao . . . they compensated for their disparate dialects and customs with an iron discipline and an absolute faith in their leaders." To Sisouk, a lowland Lao from the deep south of his country, his own countrymen from the hills were "a strange mixture;" he describes the proto-Malay tribesmen who make up nearly one-half of his country's population and, in any case, occupy two-thirds of its land, as Kha—the pejorative lowland Lao term meaning "slave."

Between the "city-country gap" and the "lowland-upland gap" lie 90 per cent of the causes of why both the Vientiane government and its American backers never quite came to grips with what made Laos "go Communist" right under their own feet. Theoretical Marxism had nothing to do with Communist penetration in Laos. By completely ignoring the mountaineers until a forlorn attempt was made as of May 1961 (when all else had failed) to set up Meo-U.S. guerrilla maquis behind Pathet-Lao lines, we simply delivered Laos to the Communists on a silver platter. This Sisouk does not say—because he does not understand it himself and because, as a lowland Lao, he is committed to the predominance of his ethnic group even if it means losing all that is strategically worthwhile in Laos (the mountain areas) while holding on to what is militarily useless (the Mekong valley).

Once this essential gap in the author's thinking is clearly understood, all else becomes perfectly clear—including the author's and the United States' misreading of the non-proven "invasion" of 1959 and the complete botching of policies in Laos in 1960-62. Since the mountaineers counted for naught in Washington's policy calculations, their military effect was blithely discounted; thus, when the Laotian Army was almost hacked to pieces in a series of swift guerrilla operations, the only sane explanation seemed to be a "foreign invasion" . . . quod eram demonstrandum. The failure on the part of the Laotians to prove that invasion even to a U.N. commission that was pro-Western slanted (Italy, Argentina, Japan and Tunisia) leaves Sisouk with a tough propaganda nut to crack: after announcing fantastic totals of North Vietnamese prisoners as proof of invasion, the number of those prisoners, like the proverbial little Indians or the alleged Communists in a certain Government department, diminished steadily. In fact there were none at all.

Undaunted, Sisouk explains this by stating that the Lao soldiers usually "liquidated" the Viet-Minh whom they had captured. This is one case of Oriental face-saving in which a Free World government rather admits to a war crime than to a fib. Coming from a high Lao official, it is surprising that the Communists have not yet made propaganda hay out of the whole affair.

Thus, Prince Sisouk's book, while valuable at short range, cannot be considered a contemporary history in the strict sense of the term; but as a modest contribution to contemporary history it should not be overlooked altogether.—BERNARD B. FALL, Howard University.

A Comparative Study of the Indian Constitution, Volume One: General Principles of Organization. By SIRDAR D. K. SEN. (Calcutta: Orient Longmans. 1960. Pp. xxiii, 382. $7.50.)

Sirdar Sen, in his study of the Indian Constitution, has endeavored to set forth the basic principles which underlie this complex and lengthy document and then to examine them in the light of the constitutional laws and practices of other states. He has served both as a teacher and a practitioner of the law, the latter experience being largely for the rulers of several of the Indian princely states before independence. What Mr. Sen has produced is a most curious volume, marked by evidences of considerable scholarship, but often sterile in character, laboring long yet adding little to our knowledge of Indian constitutionalism.

The works of some scholars in the newly independent nations are at times colored by chauvinistic considerations. Not so that of Mr. Sen. With a remarkable display of impartiality he has chosen virtually to ignore the very considerable body of existing commentary on the Indian Constitution by both Indian and Western scholars. Ivor Jennings is refuted on four brief occasions, Das Basu is dismissed in two minor notes, and the writings of Alexandrowicz, Gledhill, Pylee, etc. are mentioned neither in the text nor the bibliography. We are also left without any understanding of whether he has consulted the major documentary sources on Indian constitutionalism, such as the Constituent Assembly debates and committee reports. Nor is there any evidence that he has sought out the writings of the more important founding fathers.

His failure to consult this considerable body of literature is reflected in his treatment of center-state relations, a major theme which runs through this volume on general principles of organization. Sen's contention that India is "not only a federation but also a decentralised unitary State" is in sharp contrast to the generally accepted interpretations in this regard, and the evidence he offers in support of his view is weak.

Sen takes Ivor Jennings to task for making "ex cathedra observations," yet on the very next page we find: "There has so far been no occasion on which the Government of the Republic have had to take any important decision in connection with the working of the Constitution." Presumably such actions as the amendment of Article 31, the Union Government's decision to invoke President's Rule in Kerala where the existing State Government still controlled a majority in the State Legislature, and the creation of the Planning Commission and the National Development Council are minor matters, since their implications for Indian constitutionalism receive little or no comment in Sirdar Sen's work.

His estimation of the extent to which the Indian princely states exercised sovereign powers, and his judgment that with the transfer of power India ceased to exist in international law and her place was taken by the two new Dominions of India and Pakistan, are contentions which will be strongly disputed by scholars.

In summary, Sirdar Sen has given us a most disappointing volume which adds little to our knowledge of Indian constitutionalism.—RALPH H. RETZLAFF, University of California (Berkeley).

Modern Swedish Government. BY NILS ANDRÉN. (Stockholm: Haeggström, 1961. Pp. 252. Paper-back: 15 Sw.kr.; bound: 19.50 Sw.kr.)

Danmarks Folketing: om dets hus og historie. BY SVEND THORSEN. (Copenhagen: Schultz, 1961. Pp. 189. 65 D.kr.)

Stortinget på naert hold. BY PER ØISANG. (Oslo: Fabritius, 1961. Pp. 56. 7.50 N.kr.)

Modern Swedish Government is a textbook well-described by its title. The qualification of modernity means that there is little emphasis on historical development. Consistently with the title, no comprehensive exposition of local government is attempted. As an introduction to the contemporary national government of Sweden, then, the following topics are treated: political parties, the electoral system, the legislature, the executive, administrative organs, and legislative-executive relations. The courts are mentioned only in passing.

The most recent of the English-language multi-nation surveys of Scandinavian government and politics are now at least ten years old. These surveys are Arneson, The Democratic Monarchies of Scandinavia (1949), Scott, The United States and Scandinavia (1950), and the Royal Institute of International Affairs' The Scandinavian States and Finland (1951). (In the Selected Bibliography to Andrén's book, the first of these is incorrectly dated and the latter two are not included.) The availability of more up-to-date works on Sweden—Gunnar Heckscher, Elis Håstad, Dankwart Rustow and Douglas Verney have also published in English—may result in disproportionate attention being paid that country. However, it would be unkind to complain of the addition of this good general text on Swedish political institutions. Dr. Andrén is on the political science faculty at Stockholm University.

Denmark and Norway are underdeveloped lands in their own languages as well, as far as the literature of government and politics is concerned. Nor have the books here under review remedied that situation. The title of Thorsen's book, "Denmark's Parliament," might lead one to hope the contrary, but the sub-title, "its house and history," is language of strict limitation. Danmarks Folketing is concerned with the buildings in which the Danish parliament has met. There are 80 pages of pictures. Many discursive details of parliamentary life are incidentally included. Per Øisang has written a handbook on the Norwegian parliament, meant to serve as a guide to those who visit the Storting. The basic information contained in this booklet is of interest to political scientists.

Øisang and Thorsen are journalists, and should hardly be blamed for not having written as political scientists. Each has done well what he set out to do. But the studies on Denmark and Norway comparable to those on Sweden have yet to be written—in any language.—STANLEY V. ANDERSON, University of California, (Santa Barbara).

SELECTED ARTICLES AND DOCUMENTS ON FOREIGN AND COMPARATIVE GOVERNMENT

HIRAM M. STOUT
Washington, D. C.

General

Pearcy, G. Etzel. Forty Newly Independent States: Some Politicogeographic Observations.

Department of State Bulletin. October 9, 1961.

Peschel, Kurt. Council Chambers of the Great Parliaments. Parliamentary Affairs. Autumn, 1961.

United Kingdom and Commonwealth

Abrams, Mark. Class and Politics: Another Look at the British Electorate. Encounter. October, 1961.

Abrams, Mark. Social Class and British Politics. Public Opinion Quarterly. Fall, 1961.

Berrington, Hugh. The Conservative Party: Revolts and Pressures—1955–1961. Political Quarterly. October–December, 1961.

Bromhead, Peter. Mr. Wedgwood Benn, the Peerage and the Constitution. Parliamentary Affairs. Autumn, 1961.

Buck, Philip W. M.P.'s in Ministerial Office, 1918–55 and 1955–9. Political Studies. October, 1961.

Catlin, George E. Gordon. Political Parties: Democratic Instruments or Religious Conventicles? Contemporary Review. October, 1961.

Craig, J. T. The Working of the Statutory Instruments Act, 1946. Public Administration. Summer, 1961.

Fairlie, Henry. On the Monarchy. Encounter. October, 1961.

Harries, O. Faith in the Summit: Some British Attitudes. Foreign Affairs. October, 1961.

Johnson, Nevil. Parliamentary Questions and the Conduct of Administration. Public Administration. Summer, 1961.

Miller, Bruce. The Colonial Office and the Estimates Committee. Public Administration. Summer, 1961.

Platt, D. C. M. The Commercial and Industrial Interests of Ministers of the Crown. Political Studies. October, 1961.

Political Advance in the United Kingdom Dependencies. Rev. Central Office of Information. Reference Division. London, 1961. (R.F. P. 4805).

Rothman, Stanley. British Labor's "New Left." Political Science Quarterly. September, 1961.

Rothman, Stanley. Modernity and Tradition in Britain. Social Research. Autumn, 1961.

Schneider, Fred D. The Study of Parliamentary Government in the Commonwealth. Parliamentary Affairs. Autumn, 1961.

Simmons, Robert H. The Role of the Select Committee on Nationalized Industry in Parliament. Western Political Quarterly. September, 1961.

Strutt, Sir Austin. The Home Office: an Introduction to Its Early History. Public Administration. Summer, 1961.

The British Civil Service. Central Office of Information. Reference Division. London, 1961. (R. 4985).

Western Europe

Arrowsmith, William, ed. Image of Italy; a Special Issue. Texas Quarterly. Summer, 1961.

Atlantic Report on France. Atlantic. December, 1961.

Atlantic Report on Portugal. Atlantic. October, 1961.

Bexelius, Alfred. The Swedish Institution of the Justitieombudsman. International Review of Administrative Sciences. No. 3, 1961.

Braunthal, Gerard. European Socialism at the Crossroads. Massachusetts Review. Summer, 1961.

Cappadocia, Ezio. The Christian Democratic Party in Italian Politics. International Journal. Autumn, 1961.

Chileote, Ronald H. Politics in Portugal and her Empire. World Today. September, 1961.

Hughes, H. Stuart. The Socialist Dilemma in Europe. Dissent. Autumn, 1961.

Kelly, George A. The French Army Re-enters Politics, 1940–1955. Political Science Quarterly. September, 1961.

Kerr, Walter. The French Army in Trouble. Foreign Affairs. October, 1961.

McWhinney, Edward. Judicial Restraint and the West German Constitutional Court. Harvard Law Review. November, 1961.

Parker, Reginald. Administrative Law Through Foreign Glasses: the Austrian Experience. Rutgers Law Review. Summer, 1961.

Reich, Nathan. The Political 'Dilemma' of German Trade Unionism. American Journal of Economics and Sociology. July, 1961.

Rothman, Stanley. The Future of German Politics: An Analysis. The South Atlantic Quarterly. Autumn, 1961.

Schneider, Fernand. L'Allemagne a Voté . . . Revue de Défense Nationale. November, 1961.

The Constitution of the Italian Republic: Its Juridical Structure. Italian Affairs. May–June, 1961.

Velen, Victor A. The New Left in France. Foreign Affairs. October, 1961.

Soviet Union and Eastern Europe

Akhminov, Herman. Internal Tension Grows. Bulletin of the Institute for the Study of the USSR. September, 1961.

Akhminov, Herman. Obituaries as a Key to the Soviet Elite. Bulletin of the Institute for the Study of the USSR. July, 1961.

Atlantic Report on East Germany. Atlantic. October, 1961.

Atlantic Report on Poland. Atlantic. November, 1961.

Balinky, Alexander S. The Proclaimed Emergence of Communism in the USSR. Social Research. Autumn, 1961.

Biddleford, James. Deadlock in the Party Presidium. New Leader. October 16, 1961.

Brinkley, George. Foreign Policy and the Transition to Communism. Survey: A Journal of

- Soviet and East European Studies*. October, 1961.
- Bromke, Adam. From 'Falanga' to 'Pax.' Survey: A Journal of Soviet and East European Studies. December, 1961.
- Brown, J. F. et al. Bulgaria. A symposium. Survey: A Journal of Soviet and East European Studies. December, 1961.
- Brzezinski, Zbigniew. The Nature of the Soviet System. Slavic Review. October, 1961.
- Clubb, O. Edmund. Soviet Communism vs. Chinese. Military Review. November, 1961.
- Dallin, David J. Methods of Soviet Diplomacy. Modern Age. Fall, 1961.
- Directory of Soviet Officials. Department of State. Division of Biographic Information. Washington, 1961. (Biographic Directory No. 278).
- Fejtő, Francois. La Hongrie, Cinq Ans Après. Preuves. November, 1961.
- From the Public Discussion of the Party Program. Current Digest of the Soviet Press. October 4, 1961.
- Hulicka, Karel. The Judicial System in the U.S.S.R. Southwestern Social Science Quarterly. September, 1961.
- Jacobs, Walter Darnell. The Red Army's Role in Building Communism. Military Review. September, 1961.
- Jasny, Naum. Plan and Superplan. Survey: A Journal of Soviet and East European Studies. October, 1961.
- Labeledz, Leopold. The new CPSU Programme. Survey: A Journal of Soviet and East European Studies. October, 1961.
- Marin, Yuri. The New Party Program and Statutes. Bulletin of the Institute for the Study of the USSR. September, 1961.
- May, Ernst. Cities of the Future. Survey: A Journal of Soviet and East European Studies. October, 1961.
- Meyer, Alfred G. Twenty Years On. Survey: A Journal of Soviet and East European Studies. October, 1961.
- Party Congress: Central Inspection Commission Report. The Current Digest of the Soviet Press. November 22, 1961.
- Ramm, Thilo. The Utopian Tradition. Survey: A Journal of Soviet and East European Studies. October, 1961.
- Regulations and Norms for the Planning and Construction of Cities. Washington, Joint Publications Research Service, 1961. (JPRS: 9891).
- Ritvo, Herbert. Twenty-first Party Congress—Before and After (Part two). Slavic Review. October, 1961.
- Russia and China. I. Two Roads to Communism by Donald S. Zagoria; II. A Study in Economic Strategy by Alexander Eckstein; III. The Roots of Social Policy by H. F. Schurmann. Survey: A Journal of Soviet and East European Studies. October, 1961.
- Schapiro, Leonard. The Party and the State. Survey: A Journal of Soviet and East European Studies. October, 1961.
- Sosnovy, Timothy. Town Planning and Housing. Survey: A Journal of Soviet and East European Studies. October, 1961.
- Staar, Richard. The Communist Party Leadership in Poland; a Study in Elite Stability. Washington, Institute of Ethnic Studies, Georgetown University, 1961.
- The Central Committee Report by Khrushchev—I–IV. The Current Digest of the Soviet Press. November 1, 8, 15, 22, 1961.
- The Opening of the 22nd Party Congress. The Current Digest of the Soviet Press. November 1, 1961.
- The Withering Away of the State. I. Philosophy and Practice by George L. Kline; II. The Function of Law by John Hazard; III. The Role of Social Institutions by Robert Osborn. Survey: A Journal of Soviet and East European Studies. October, 1961.
- Tomasie, D. A. The Rumanian Communist Leadership. Slavic Review. October, 1961.
- Utechin, S. V. Educating the New Man. Survey: A Journal of Soviet and East European Studies. October, 1961.
- Wiles, Peter. Man and the Ideal Economy. Survey: A Journal of Soviet and East European Studies. October, 1961.
- Zalar, Charles. Yugoslav Communism; a Critical Study. Prepared for the Subcommittee to Investigate the Administration of the Internal Security Act and Other Internal Security Laws of the Committee on the Judiciary, United States Senate, 87th Cong., 1st sess. October 18, 1961. Washington, G.P.O., 1961.
- Middle East and Arab North Africa
- Atlantic Report on Iran. Atlantic. September, 1961.
- Atlantic Report on Morocco. Atlantic. November, 1961.
- Barbour, Nevill. Two Problems in Modern Morocco. Civilisations. No. 3, 1961.
- Crow, Ralph E., and Iskandar, Adnan. Administrative Reform in Lebanon, 1958–1959. International Review of Administrative Sciences. No. 3, 1961.
- Cyprus. Central Office of Information. Reference Division. London, 1961. (No. R 4931).
- Devereux, Robert. Society and Culture in the Second Turkish Republic (The New Constitution). Middle Eastern Affairs. October, 1961.
- Eren, Nuri. Turkey: Problems, Policies, Parties. Foreign Affairs. October, 1961.
- Gutmann, Emanuel E. Some Observations on Politics and Parties in Israel. India Quarterly. January-March, 1961.

Harvey, Donald J. Algeria: Tiger by the Tail. Current History. October, 1961.

Israel; a Special Supplement. Atlantic. November, 1961.

Lacouture, Jean. Morocco—Monarchy and Revolution. Africa South in Exile. October-December, 1961.

Lewis, Geoffrey. Democracy—by Order. Listener. September 14, 1961.

Luft, Gerda. Israel's Conservative Voters. Commentary. November, 1961.

Mackay, Mercedes. Cyprus: the First Year. New Commonwealth. October, 1961.

Pickles, Dorothy. The Seven-year Struggle in Algeria; Retrospect and Prospect. World Today. November, 1961.

Rondot, Pierre. La Crise Syrienne: Causes et Conséquences. Revue de Défense Nationale. November, 1961.

Seale, Patrick. The Break-up of the United Arab Republic. World Today. November, 1961.

Africa

Austin, Dennis. Ghana since Independence. World Today. October, 1961.

Bertola, Arnaldo. Religion et Droits de l'Homme dans la Constitution de la Somalie. Civilisations. No. 3, 1961.

Blondel, J. Constitutional Changes in Former French Black Africa. Parliamentary Affairs. Autumn, 1961.

Church, R. J. Harrison. The Islamic Republic of Mauritania. Focus. November, 1961.

Crozier, Brian. Six Africans in Search of a Personality. Encounter. May, 1961.

Devernois, Guy. The Evolution of the African Countries of French Civilisation. Civilisations. No. 2, 1961.

Hamon, Léo. Formes et Perspectives de la Démocratie en Afrique. Civilisations. No. 3, 1961.

Hodgkin, Thomas, and Huxley, Elspeth. What Future for Africa? Encounter. June, 1961.

Horrell, Muriel. La Politique de l'Union Sud-Africaine à la Lumière de l'Opinion Mondiale. Civilisations. No. 2, 1961.

Irvine, Keith. The Franco-African Community in Transition. Current History. October, 1961.

Jones, Edward A. Togo, West Africa—an Appraisal by an Afro-American. Phylon. Fall, 1961.

Jésman, Czeslaw. Ruanda and Urundi in Transition. British Survey. Main Series, n.s., No. 149. August, 1961.

Jung, Hermann. Schwarz oder Weiss in Angola? Aussenpolitik. August, 1961.

Land, Harry. Nigeria Puts First Things First. New Commonwealth. October, 1961.

Landis, Elizabeth S. South African Apartheid Legislation; I: Fundamental Structure. Yale Law Journal. November, 1961.

La Sierre Leone. Paris, Documentation Française, 1961. (Notes et études documentaires, No. 2809).

Leys, Colin. Evolution in British Africa. Current History. October, 1961.

Logan, Rayford W. Will African Federalism Work? Current History. October, 1961.

Lovell, Colin Rhys. Winds of Change in Southern Africa. Current History. October, 1961.

Merriam, Alan P. The Congo's First Year of Independence. Current History. October, 1961.

Milsome, J. R. Liberia—Africa's Veteran Republic. West African Review. November, 1961.

Olympio, Sylvanus E. African Problems and the Cold War. Foreign Affairs. October, 1961.

Perin, Francois. La Crise Congolaise et les Institutions Politiques Africaines. Civilisations. No. 3, 1961.

Pierson-Mathy, P. L'Évolution Politique de l'Afrique. Chronique de Politique Étrangère. January-May, 1961.

Post, Ken. Nigeria—the First Decade. Africa South in Exile. October-December, 1961.

Report of the Gambia Constitutional Conference, 1961. London, H.M.S.O., 1961. (Cmd. 1469).

Schwarz, Walter. Houphouët's Ivory Tower. West African Review. November, 1961.

Shepperson, George A. External Factors in the Development of African Nationalism, with Particular Reference to British Central Africa. Phylon. Fall, 1961.

Stauffer, Robert B., and Colebrook, Mulford J. Economic Assistance and Ethiopia's Foreign Policy. Orbis. Fall, 1961.

Tanganyika: the Making of a Nation. British Information Services. Reference Division. London, 1961. (R.F. P. 5074).

Wallis, L. G. Coke. The Public Service Commission: Its Role and Development in Western Nigeria. African Affairs. October, 1961.

South and Southeast Asia

Atlantic Report on Indonesia. Atlantic. December, 1961.

Atlantic Report on Singapore. Atlantic. November, 1961.

Atlantic Report on South Vietnam. Atlantic. October, 1961.

Atmosudirdjo, Prajudi. Central Services to Local Governments. Eropa Review. June, 1961.

Authoritarianism in Ceylon: Government by Emergency Powers. Round Table. September, 1961.

Chi-ch'ing Yao. Local Self-government in Southeast Asia. Eropa Review. June, 1961.

- Corley, Francis J. The President in the Constitution of the Republic of Viet-Nam. Pacific Affairs. Summer, 1961.
- Egger, Rowland A. Ministerial and Departmental Organization and Management in the Government of Pakistan. Public Administration. Summer, 1961.
- Ennis, Thomas E. Lights and Shadows on Vietnam. Current History. December, 1961.
- Gross, Ernest A. Tibetans Plan for Tomorrow. Foreign Affairs. October, 1961.
- Harrison, Selig S. Wird die Indische Union Halten? Aussenpolitik. September, 1961.
- Hollstein, Milton. The Press in Burma: Its Hopes and Problems. Journalism Quarterly. Summer, 1961.
- Huvanandana, Mailai. Public Administration in Thailand. Eropa Review. June, 1961.
- Katrak, Savak. India's Communist Party Split. China Quarterly. July-September, 1961.
- Lynch, C. J. Constitutional Developments in Papua and New Guinea 1960-61. Australian Outlook. August, 1961.
- Mayer, Adrian C. Rural Leaders and the Indian General Election. Asian Survey. October, 1961.
- Mellema, R. L. The Basic Democracies System in Pakistan. Asian Survey. August, 1961.
- Pauker, Guy J. Indonesia's Eight-year Development Plan. Pacific Affairs. Summer, 1961.
- Purcell, Victor. Notes sur la Fédération de Malaisie et Singapour. Civilisations. No. 2, 1961.
- Sayeed, Khalid B. How Goes Democracy in South-east Asia? New Commonwealth. October, 1961.
- Sayeed, Khalid B. Pakistan's Basic Democracy. Middle East Journal. Summer, 1961.
- Singhal, D. P. The United States of Malaysia. Asian Survey. October, 1961.
- Vandenbosch, Amry. "Guided Democracy" in Indonesia. Current History. December, 1961.
- Van der Kroef, Justus M. Nasution, Sukarno and the West New Guinea Dispute. Asian Survey. August, 1961.
- Van der Kroef, Justus M. The West New Guinea Problem. World Today. November, 1961.
- Williams, L. F. Rushbrook. "Grass-Roots" Democracy in Pakistan. Quarterly Review. October, 1961.
- mentation Française, 1961. (Notes et études documentaires, No. 2815.)
- Dore, R. P. The Japanese Socialist Party and "Structural Reform." Asian Survey. October, 1961.
- Fukuda, Takeo. New Policy of Liberal-Democratic Party. Contemporary Japan. May, 1961.
- Ginsburgs, George. Local Government in the Mongolian People's Republic, 1940-1960. Journal of Asian Studies. August, 1961.
- Ginsburgs, George. Mongolia's "Socialist" Constitution. Pacific Affairs. Summer, 1961.
- Handbook on Administrative Divisions of the People's Republic of China. Washington, Joint Publications Research Service, 1961. (JPRS: 10342).
- Ikematsu, Fumio. 29th General Election and the Second Ikeda Cabinet. Contemporary Japan. May, 1961.
- Jacobini, H. B. Western Political Forms: Their Adaptation to the Philippines. Southwestern Social Science Quarterly. September, 1961.
- Klein, Donald W. Peking's Leaders: a Study in Isolation. China Quarterly. July-September, 1961.
- Lange, William. Das Pak-Regime in Südkorea. Aussenpolitik. September, 1961.
- Larsen, William F. Government Administration in the Republic of Korea: Problems of Organization, Methods, and Personnel. International Review of Administrative Sciences. No. 3, 1961.
- Linebarger, Paul M. A. The New Japan in a Troubled Asia. Current History. December, 1961.
- Meadows, Martin. An Interpretation of Philippine Politics. India Quarterly. January-March, 1961.
- Nishio, Suehiro. Democratic-Socialist Party: Its Status and Policy. Contemporary Japan. May, 1961.
- Padover, Saul K. Japan Puts Democracy to the Test. New York Times Magazine. August 20, 1961.
- Park, No-Yong. Should We Impose Democracy on Korea? Current History. December, 1961.
- Steck, Fritz. Questionable Stabilization in South Korea. Swiss Review of World Affairs. October, 1961.
- Wagner, Edward W. Failure in Korea. Foreign Affairs. October, 1961.
- Wordsworth, K. C. The Legal System of the Republic of China. Canadian Bar Journal. August, 1961.

Far East

- Atlantic Report on North Korea. Atlantic. September, 1961.
- Chandrasekhar, S. Red China's Population Problem. Atlantic. December, 1961.
- Chiu, S. M. Political Control in the Chinese Communist Army. Military Review. August, 1961.
- Constitution de la République de Corée (17 Juillet 1948-29 Novembre 1960). Paris, Docu-

Australia and New Zealand

- Downer, Alexander R. The Influence of Migration on Australian Foreign Policy. Migration. January-March, 1961.

Linge, G. J. R. Canberra after Fifty Years. Geographical Review. October, 1961.

Latin America and West Indies

Alisky, Marvin. The End of Nicaragua's Radio Freedom. Journal of Broadcasting. Fall, 1961.

Constitution de la République Dominicaine (2 Décembre 1960). Paris, Documentation Française, 1961. (Notes et études documentaires, No. 2831.)

Cosío Villegas, Daniel. Change in Latin America; the Mexican and Cuban Revolutions. Lincoln, University of Nebraska, 1961.

Drayton, Geoffrey. Venezuela's Uneasy Revolution. Listener. September 28, 1961.

Fitzgibbon, Russell H. Colombia as a Laboratory for Change. Civilisations. No. 2, 1961.

Geiger, Theodore. Social Reform and Revolution. Foreign Service Journal. September, 1961.

Glick, Edward B. Castro and the Church. The Commonweal. October 13, 1961.

Goldenberg, Boris. Die Fata Morgana eines Kubanischen Sozialismus. Aussenpolitik. August, 1961.

Lieuwen, Edwin. The Changing Role of the Military in Latin America. Journal of Inter-American Studies. October, 1961.

Potash, Robert A. The Changing Role of the Military in Argentina. Journal of Inter-American Studies. October, 1961.

Quadros, Jânio. Brazil's New Foreign Policy. Foreign Affairs. October, 1961.

Villanueva del Campo, Armando. Partidos Democrático-Revolucionarios en Indoamérica. Combate. September-October, 1961.

Canada

Keith-Lucas, B. Metropolitan Local Government in Canada. Public Administration. Autumn, 1961.

McWhinney, Edward. The New Canadian Bill of Rights. American Journal of Comparative Law. Winter-Spring, 1961.

INTERNATIONAL POLITICS, LAW, AND ORGANIZATION

Europe's Needs and Resources. By J. FREDERIC DEWHURST, JOHN O. COPPOCK, P. LAMARTINE YATES and ASSOCIATES. (New York: Twentieth Century Fund, 1961. Pp. xxvi, 1198. $12.00.)

This massive volume of double-columned material represents five years of study, by a staff headquartered at Geneva, of the economic life and related activities of eighteen countries of Western Europe and their projected development to 1970. The area corresponds to that of the O. E. C. D. including Finland and excluding Turkey.

The format of the present volume generally corresponds to that of Dewhurst's 1947 and 1955 studies of America's Needs and Resources (also for the Twentieth Century Fund) and like the earlier studies represents a considerable contribution to social scientists, members of the business community and the informed public. Probably no other single and conveniently arranged source exists covering this area so thoroughly. Even if one happens to have such relatively specialized interests as the number of tractors per thousand hectares of Ireland's agricultural land or what proportion of the fish marketed for human consumption in Iceland is (deliberately) frozen, this is the place where he can be satisfied.

"Resources" include both human (population, manpower and education) and physical (land, agricultural, forest, ocean, energy, mineral . . .) "Needs" are taken—at least at an articulate level—in the non-normative sense of what people actually choose to consume. This explicitly excludes the question of what they "ought to consume in terms of their physiological, mental or spiritual requirements." However, it does not seem to be the case that concern for human physiological needs in the normative sense is absent. It is unlikely that the principal authors' enthusiasm for a more responsible and restrained capitalism, their approval of a trend away from sharp differences in distribution of income and services, etc., represents only the traditional economic desire to maximize productive levels and to attain the most efficient economic distribution. Rather it suggests more than this: the desire to satisfy basic and minimal human wants. In other words, I am not certain that the definition of "needs" in non-normative terms really represents the authors' basic position, especially as the earlier study of America's economy was based explicitly on a normative definition of "needs." This, of course, is not a crucial objection, but the 1955 formulation does seem more accurate.

The analysis of these needs and resources is designed primarily in terms of the eighteen states taken as an economic entity rather than in terms of the various component national economies. This approach seems justified in terms of the emerging economic integration of the area and the importance of trans-national regional similarities and problems. This integrated or inter-national approach, and the vast scope of the volume, prevent it from being (nor is it intended to be) a substitute for the more intensive studies existing of several of the national economies. However, through judicious use of the index and lists of tables and charts a good picture of the various national economies is obtainable.

The projections made to 1970 from the base year 1955 (=100) indicate the population will stand at 108.4, output per worker hour 149.4, total G. N. P. 154.8, and the per capita G. N. P. 142.8. The projections are accompanied by the usual hedges and disclaimers, but even so the awe of the reader is aroused when the forecasts are made concerning a politically complex area in which several of the larger elements are unstable politically. Be that as it may, the projections convey the general confidence in the area's economic structure which permeates the study. This confidence rests on the principal authors' evaluation of certain fundamental trends which they discern in the socio-economic structure of the area, the weakening of economic stratification, the growth of "managerial capitalism," a more favorable attitude towards economic competition, the economic integration of the area, etc. This confidence is, in the words of August Heckscher's foreword, the "chief message to be drawn from this book."

The project is marked by an admirable breadth. Few economic surveys have devoted such attention to political and social developments. In execution, however, the consideration given these non-economic matters falls somewhat short of the mark. For the specialist at least, much of this could be excluded without significant loss and certainly one could wish for a more compact study. However, this stricture probably represents a parochial interest and is not meant to detract from what is a splendid accomplishment.—
WILLIAM A. RITCHIE, University of Delaware.

The International Status of the United Nations. By GUENTER WEISSBERG. (New York: Oceana Publications, and London: Stevens and Sons Ltd., 1961. Pp. xii, 228. $7.50.)

That the United Nations is in some sense and to some degree an international legal personality will strike most readers as neither a surprising nor a controversial proposition. The contribution of Weissberg's book is to provide a meticulously documented account of "the foundation, connotation and development of this characteristic." The author describes the breaking down of the dogma that states alone can be subjects of international law, and examines the status which international organizations have gradually acquired within the international legal system, with particular emphasis upon the position of the United Nations. Beginning with an analysis of the provisions and implications of the Charter, he then devotes chapters to the treaty-making capability of the United Nations, the organization's operative role in the Korean and Suez cases, the privileges and immunities of the United Nations, and its capacity to espouse international claims.

Within this framework, Weissberg ably mobilizes the scattered evidence that international agencies, and most notably the United Nations, have come to share with states many of the attributes of international legal entities. He is aware that the status of international organizations is not identical with that of states, and that the former have a relatively limited claim to subjecthood in the international legal system. Nevertheless, he contends that international organizations are sufficiently endowed with the basic characteristic of international personality, "the ability to undertake international legal relations," to justify the International Court of Justice in regarding them as states for the purposes of Article 34 (1) of its statute. That is to say, his reaction to the regrettable provision that only states may be parties in cases before the Court is to suggest revision by judicial expansion of the concept of the state rather than by formal amendment.

The author clearly regards the international legal personality of the United Nations as something more than the sum of the manifestations of status and competence to which he draws attention. He considers that personality as the basis for creative potential—the foundation upon which an increasingly significant institutional structure can be erected. In this sense, Weissberg goes beyond legal analysis to the consideration of political potentiality.

In general, however, the book exhibits the limitations of the "purely legal" approach; it largely neglects the considerable part of reality which is customarily described as political. The author serves us well by demonstrating that the United Nations is "somebody" in the legal sense. He contributes little to our understanding of "who," in the political sense, that new-style "somebody" is now, or may become. Legal analysis is a useful tool for establishing the fact that the United Nations has an identity of its own. The more fascinating and important task of the identification of the United Nations evidently demands an analytical approach of a different order.—INIS L. CLAUDE, University of Michigan.

Financing International Organization: The United Nations Budget Process. By J. DAVID SINGER. (The Hague: Martinus Nijhoff, 1961. Pp. xvi, 185. 14.50 guilders.)

A major cause of the breakdown of the American Confederation was its inability to raise by assessments the money needed to pay its obligations. As a result the Confederation had to borrow to keep going, and its credit soon reached the vanishing point. The Federal Constitution met this difficulty by giving the new government direct power of taxation. The League of Nations had a somewhat similar financial problem, though it was not comparable in degree. Most of the members paid their dues fairly promptly, and the working capital funds the League built up were usually sufficient to take care of the arrears in dues. But the unwillingness of its members to pay from their own treasuries a fair share of the reasonable cost of adequate international cooperation was always a serious handicap to the League's work.

This being the case, a book describing the United Nations Budget process is important, for it enables us to compare the present situation with past difficulties. Mr. Singer's book discusses in detail how the financial problems were handled in writing the Charter and setting up the Organization, and then traces the process by which the Budget is formed—the departmental planning in the Secretariat (based on policy decisions in the other U. N. organs); the coordination, consolidation, and cutting by the Secretary General and his financial officers; further cutting by the Advisory Committee (which roughly corresponds to our Appropriations Committee in Congress); and consideration by the Fifth Committee of the General Assembly. There are also chapters on how the revenues are raised, and the actual execution of the Budget and the auditing procedures.

As Mr. Singer says, the book is a reference work as well as a discussion of U. N. Budget procedures. Considering the subject matter, it is surprisingly readable, perhaps largely because the author does not hesitate to bring out the political considerations which frequently influence the actions of the delegates. The Communists always try to cut the Budget substantially. The members of the Advisory Committee are supposed to be financial experts appointed in their individual capacities, but in practice they often act merely to protect their countries' immediate interests. Mr. Singer gives the impression that he thinks most of the delegates in the Fifth Committee are much more interested in cutting a half cent per capita off their assessments than they are in seeing that the U. N. as a whole does a good job. And this despite the fact that the United States' annual assessment is about 12 cents per capita, the Soviet Union's about 4 cents, and India's under half a cent. (U. S. per capita military expenditures are over $235.)

This reviewer would have liked a few changes.

He wishes the author had given more definite information on the League of Nations experience; there are several tantalizing references without any of the details. Mr. Singer emphasizes how much the Fifth Committee tends to cut the Budget presented by the Secretary General and the Advisory Committee, but he does not explain how it happens that in thirteen years out of sixteen the General Assembly has appropriated more money than the Advisory Committee recommended. Possibly this is due to some supplementary expenditures getting into the regular Budget between the time of the Advisory Committee Report and the final passage of the Budget by the General Assembly. Lastly, there might have been some discussion of how special funds or voluntary contributions (such as the Congo, the Emergency Force, or technical assistance) fit into the Budget, and how the decision is made whether an item is to be part of the regular Budget or of some special fund.

However, despite these criticisms, Mr. Singer has done a good job, and the student of international organization is greatly indebted to him for this study.—CHASE KIMBALL, Suffolk University.

A Forward Strategy for America. BY ROBERT STRAUSS-HUPE, WILLIAM R. KINTNER, AND STEFAN T. POSSONY. (New York: Harper & Brothers, 1961. Pp. xii, 450. $5.95.)

This is a "prescriptive treatment of the problems posed" in the authors' 1959 analysis of communist strategy, Protracted Conflict. It starts from the same premises, that "the United States and the Free World have steadily lost ground in the international struggle with communism . . . and that the struggle hangs in the balance." Since it covers a broad range of our foreign policy problems (though not the "full" range as claimed by the authors in the preface), the study is essentially a synthesis with prefatory credit given to important contributions. The result is a complex, coordinated though somewhat unbalanced survey of factors and problems in foreign policy making and implementation. The range is indicated by the titles of chapters 3 through 11: Building the Free World; The Technological Factor; Military Strategy, Power and Policy; Economic Framework of Strategy; Diplomatic Arm of Strategy; Psychological Operations; Security Through Arms Control?; Strategy of Ways and Means; and Structure for Strategy.

Within their frame of reference the authors have done a job which will be hailed by many in superlatives. However, their view of the world situation as a "systemic (sic) revolution" complicated primarily by an irreconcilable Communist vs. Free World conflict is an inadequate statement of our country's strategic problem today. Were the situation as simple as that, the authors' prescription could be applied, and free man would be saved.

"Three distinct but related strategic tasks confront the United States: (1) to seek a more effective partnership with those nations in Europe and elsewhere who share its political values and cultural heritage; (2) to find a new basis for mutual respect and cooperation with nations of Asia, the Middle East, Africa and Latin America; and (3) to frustrate communist plans to establish the emerging world order in the image of communist society . . . the success of the first two tasks requires the successful conduct of the third . . ." (italics supplied).

But doesn't the achievement of the third require the successful achievement of the first two? In the authors' view the prevention of communist expansion comes first and whatever helps to achieve it must be done even if it interferes with achievement of the others. However, the actual strategic problem facing the country is much more complicated, since a variety of goals in addition to stopping communist expansion must be pursued simultaneously.

The fundamental value of the book, and it is fundamentally valuable, lies in the studies of the separate factors and aspects of national strategy. To be sure, the authors' offering of the federative principle and freedom of the individual, as the two universally applicable principles on which to organize the free world, is wishful in the face of actual institutional systems in the world and in the light of social value systems in which status interrelationships rather than individualism provide man's anchor. But there is desperate need for "Building the Free World" into a more viable, mutually integrated human system. This is necessary, and not only to beat the Communists.—H. ROWLAND LUDDEN, George Washington University.

Strategic Intelligence and the Shape of Tomorrow.

By WILLIAM M. MCGOVERN. (Chicago: Henry Regnery Co., 1961. Pp. vi., 191. $4.00.)

In the September 1961 issue of this REVIEW, Robert McCloskey wrote, "Publishers these days are increasingly prone to ornament books with titles more cosmic than their contents." The McCloskey Principle of Titular Inflation applies to this book. Instead of a rigorous analysis of the requirements or the problems of contemporary intelligence, the reader is given a smorgasbord of miscellaneous facts and unsupported opinions—all very interesting, but not very edifying to the serious student. The informal style, with its sweeping generalizations and its constant use of the first person singular, evokes the image of the expert-turned-home who offers impromptu observations to an admiring audience.

At the outset, to be sure, one gains quite the opposite impression. The dust jacket announces a

Do-It-Yourself CIA Kit: "To determine how any country will react in a given set of circumstances, it is only necessary to understand: first, the nation itself; and second, its relationships with other countries. When evaluating the individual nation, the three important areas to consider are its economics, ethnology, and ideology. Dr. McGovern explores each area, and enumerates the salient characteristics to be observed."

Accordingly, Part I of the book is entitled "Strategic Intelligence," and its chapters deal respectively with secret, economic, ethnological and ideological intelligence. These chapters, which form the main body of the book, indicate the wide range of data relevant to the intelligence enterprise. They are spiced with innumerable tidbits of information gleaned in the course of an active life (McGovern spent many years abroad, and served as intelligence officer for the Joint Chiefs of Staff in World War II, before joining the faculty of Northwestern University). Surely every reader will learn something here that he had not known before: about the Nazi attempt to cut off the United States' supply of bauxite in 1942, for example; the unheeded warning sent by Allen Dulles, from Switzerland, presaging the Battle of the Bulge; China's economic dependence on Southeast Asia; the love not lost between Northern and Southern Italians; the similarities and differences among certain languages; the place where the world's worst-tasting beverage is brewed; numerous occasions in which the author's predictions were borne out by events. One can learn all this and much, much more. But it adds up to a fireside chat on One Hundred and One Interesting Things to Know, not a systematic treatise on the making of estimates. Nor is there any analysis of the present state of our intelligence system.

In addition to assorted facts, the McGovern smorgasbord offers a potpourri of conclusions and speculations which the reader may take or leave. Thus: "The same amount of drink which would put the average Japanese under the table would scarcely make the average Chinese merry. Again I do not know the reason for this fact. Possibly it has something to do with the small stature of the Japanese (p. 84). . . . Speaking in general terms, we may say that the Asiatic nationalist is four or five times as fanatical as the ordinary European nationalist (p. 116). . . . I do not believe that Nehru wishes to see the United States completely destroyed, but he would thoroughly enjoy the spectacle of our losing a great deal of prestige. If I may be permitted to use a rather vulgar phrase, I would say that he would be delighted to see us soundly kicked in the rear end—especially if some Asiatic people, such as the Chinese, were to do the kicking (p. 129). . . .

The only reason that Sukarno does not definitely place his country in the Communist camp is that many of the officers of the Indonesian army are opposed to such a step (p. 156). . . . For various reasons which I cannot go into here, the National Security Council has never performed as well as had been hoped. I sincerely trust that in the next few years the National Security Council will be permitted and required to function more effectively (p. 169)."

Part II, "The Shape of Tomorrow," does not represent a disciplined, systematic application of the principles of Part I. Given the casual nature of Part I, this is hardly surprising. But the book may be satisfactory to the Foundation for Foreign Affairs, which sponsored it in the interest of "public information and debate." Undoubtedly one finds here a great deal of information as well as many topics for debate.—GORDON L. SHULL, College of Wooster.

Military Policy and Economic Aid: The Korean Case, 1950-1953. By GENE M. LYONS. (Columbus: Ohio State University Press, 1961. Pp. 298. $4.50.)

A year or so ago an economist observed that the intention of the United States aid program in Korea seemed to have been to produce "an agricultural country with a huge standing army and a first class railway system." Although this is a caricature of the results of Korean-American economic cooperation and conflict, there is more than enough recognizability in the sketch to excite curiosity about the antecedent policies (both Korean and American) which helped to create today's military, political, and economic patterns in Korea and their consequences. In this book Professor Lyons has made a solid contribution to the satisfaction of such curiosity.

In what is essentially a case study of the attempt to develop the field operations of the United Nations Korean Reconstruction Agency (UNKRA), the book provides massive documentation of an early and consistent subordination of economic rehabilitation efforts to military objectives. The issue for American policy, so carefully and insightfully posed by Professor Lyons, was the question of how to reconcile Defense Department insistence on the principle of command responsibility for all matters within the Korean theater of operations and less vigorous State Department insistence that the maintenance of the principle of international responsibility for Korea, which had been one of the bases of American Korean policy since 1947, required an autonomous sphere of UNKRA action. For UNKRA the resolution of this issue was a matter of life and death since "what UNKRA was, was essentially what the United States wanted it to be."

By the time of the Korean Armistice in 1953, less than three years after its establishment, UNKRA had begun to "wither away." The fate of the international agency as the vehicle of Korean postwar reconstruction was sealed by the American decision—which was taken after the assumption of the presidency by Dwight D. Eisenhower and which was part of the price for obtaining the acquiescence of Syngman Rhee in the cessation of hostilities—to follow a concept of bilateral defense support aid. The chapter in which Professor Lyons describes the shift to a bilateral policy is a brilliant essay on American policy toward Korea from the presidential election of 1952 to the Korean Armistice. The preceding chapters which describe the partially successful attempt to build an effective international agency for economic assistance to Korea reveal the UNKRA Agent General balancing precariously between and negotiating with the Secretary-General of the United Nations, the Advisory Committee established by the General Assembly, the United Nations Commission on the Unification and Rehabilitation of Korea, the Department of State, the Department of Defense, the Unified Command in Washington, the United Nations Command in Tokyo, the Eighth United States Army in Korea, and the Government of the Republic of Korea.

This book is first rate reading for students of international administration. It owes its "feel" for problems of policy and administration both to the author's five years of experience with UNKRA (from 1951 to 1956) and to the fact that it is based to a considerable extent on the personal papers of J. Donald Kingsley who served as the first Agent General from 1951 to 1953. Political scientists are indebted to Mr. Kingsley for his cooperation in this scholarly endeavor, although they may not all agree with his concept, as Agent General, of UNKRA as "an instrument of American policy."

Something needs to be said about what the book is not. It is not an analysis of the impact of military policy and economic aid upon the Korean economy. Such a study remains to be made, hopefully in conjunction with research on the nature and results of Sino-Soviet bloc aid to North Korea. The book does, however, contain materials which are relevant for such an analysis; e.g., a discussion of the perennial problem of the exchange rate to which many Koreans continue to attribute most of their economic ills, and a discussion of anti-inflationary military policies which discouraged investment in industrial development at an early stage. Professor Lyons' purposes are "to analyze the roots of [the] twin forces [of commitment to the principles of command and international responsibility], to isolate and study the principal factors in the formulation of policies to meet the conflict of these two forces, and, finally, to judge whether the outcome has been in the interests of the United States." The book does not really do the latter; nor does it specify the criteria by which such a judgment could be made. It raises important issues, however.

The book can serve as a source for the derivation or the partial confirmation of propositions in several areas of political science concern: e.g., in international organization (The longer the delay in implementing an economic aid program by an international agency, the greater the divergence of the interests of the contributing states, the less their financial contributions, and the greater the discrepancy between actual and potential agency accomplishments), in American foreign policy (Given the goal of keeping allies out of the Communist bloc: the weaker an ally and the more chauvinistic its leaders, the less stringent the measures which can be employed to influence its decisions, and the greater its influence upon American policy), and in civil-military relations (The more the international situation is defined in terms of combat conditions the broader the definition of environmental aspects as relevant to the principle of command responsibility, and the stronger the military resistance to civilian efforts to define spheres of autonomous action).

The book will be of great interest in Korea and, unless suppressed by someone as being "too controversial," may well be translated into Korean. It is to be hoped that a Korean scholar might be permitted and encouraged to undertake a companion study of the decisions of the Republic of Korea Government with respect to military policy and economic aid from 1950 to 1953. Perhaps such a project would interest the faculty of the Graduate School of Public Administration at Seoul National University.—GLENN D. PAIGE, Princeton University.

Grants, Loans, and Local Currencies: Their Role in Foreign Aid, By ROBERT E. ASHER. (Washington, D. C.: The Brookings Institution, 1961. Pp. ix, 142. Paper $1.50; cloth $2.50.)

Not the capacity nor the misgivings of the country giving aid but the need of the receiving country is the main point of emphasis in the present study. Assuming, of course, that the recipient country can discipline its economy sufficiently to justify outside aid—and that it has absorptive capacity in terms of technical and administrative skills—the need is that which is required to sustain a progressive increase in national output. To that end, the author feels that the United States can afford to do its part, uninhibited by doubts about its capacity or by cautious restrictions imposed by Congress. Published in May, 1961, the study supports the Administration's comprehensive proposals for revising the machinery and procedures of United States foreign aid. Through clarification of what is involved in the various types of aid, it seeks to clear the way for a more dynamic prosecution of a policy, which, in shifting contexts, has been pursued for more than fifteen years and which seems likely to continue indefinitely.

It is interesting that even in absolute terms the volume of American aid has been declining: from $5.7 billion in 1949 to $3.7 billion in 1959 (these figures being "net" after subtraction of any returns in interest and principal). Moreover, the ratio of foreign aid expenditure to gross national product declined from 2.5 percent in 1946 and 1947 to 2 percent in 1950, 1 percent in 1955, and 0.8 percent in 1959.

Nevertheless, the total volume of foreign grants and credits provided by the United States government from July 1, 1945 to December 21, 1960 is not inconsiderable, amounting to a gross of $85 billion. The net over-all figure—after adjustment for returns—is $75 billion. But because of various exclusions—notably the investment of the United States in certain international institutions—this total is an understatement of about $7 billion. On the other hand, "the inclusion of expenditures that would almost certainly have been made by the Government for military equipment and agricultural commodities, even if there were no foreign aid programs, probably inflates the burden by $10 to $20 billion."

The author is not persuaded that grants as compared with loans are demoralizing and he makes a good case in support of his contention. He strongly opposes the shift in American policy in the past few years which favors, as a matter of principle, loans over grants. Preferring that the form of aid be determined by the circumstances of each recipient country, he recognizes that in not a few instances exclusion of the grant would mean abandonment of any prospect of significant growth in the national output, for him the touchstone of a defensible policy.

There is delusion, the author feels, in payment by the foreign government for our agricultural surpluses in its own currency and also in use of its own currency in repayment of "soft" loans. This dodge merely gives what is essentially a grant the appearance of a loan and has the added disadvantage of placing in American hands ever mounting sums within foreign countries (for example, in India by 1963 rupees the equivalent of $2.5 billion), which can only result in serious political embarrassment.

The author treats foreign aid primarily from the economic point of view. Our sister discipline has made impressive progress in coping with the complexities of moving the underdeveloped countries into the stream of modernity. Aid, however, is not defensible merely in economic terms. Many of us feel, like the author, that there is a connection between foreign aid and a stable world: that ultimately such a policy can and must be justified in terms of the political interest of the United States. The reviewer, however, knows of no successful endeavor to spell out the precise nature of the connection. To assert, as the author does, that democracy is the goal is overly simple. At the very least it is still far off in most underdeveloped countries; nor would its achievement seem to be an absolute prerequisite to stability. The political scientist has yet to chart the devious paths and pitfalls of foreign aid as it relates to ultimate political consequences.—EDWARD H. BUEHRIG, Indiana University.

The St. Lawrence Waterway: A Study in Politics and Diplomacy. BY WILLIAM R. WILLOUGHBY. (Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1961. Pp. xiv, 381. $6.00.)

The St. Lawrence-Great Lakes water system has always had a peculiar fascination for historians who have been prompted by the same urge as the early explorers to pursue the long trail of romance and adventure up its waters into the very heart of a gigantic continent. But for the student of economics and politics it has added attractions. The system by no means provides the easy, natural admission to the centre of the continent which a superficial glance at the map might suggest. Many obstructions block the path and become more, rather than less, serious as technological advances bring ever larger ships and introduce competing forms of transportation. For the economic historian these constitute the interesting facts of life surrounding the St. Lawrence system. But, for the student of politics, the most significant feature is that the system happens, also, to form a large part of the boundary line between two nations; and, thereby, as Professor Willoughby's detailed study shows, hangs a long and complex tale.

Many scholars have dealt with specific aspects of this story, but Professor Willoughby has now given us for the first time a full panorama sweeping over a century-and-a-half, the focus shifting now to the American and now to the Canadian side of the border. The rigorous chronological approach tends to produce considerable repetition but the tale, nevertheless, is one of sustained interest and even (although we now know the denouement) of suspense over the eventual outcome. The author has ransacked the archives and other unplumbed sources on both sides of the border in order to follow the intricate diplomatic and political maneuvering associated with the negotiations which always accompanied any joint or even unilateral undertaking on each stretch of the great waterway. He provides ample documentation for Franklin Roosevelt's succinct commentary on the difficulties inherent in these projects: "we have not been able to arrange matters so that both peoples have had the same idea at the same time."

After-dinner orators, American and Canadian patriots alike, have been wont to sing the praises of the "great undefended border" of which the St. Lawrence waterway makes up a major part. But what is clear from Professor Willoughby's analysis is that this has been a border along which a variety of deeply-entrenched economic interests have developed and where fierce partisan and patriotic emotions have had free play. When we add to this picture of sensitive nationalism and opposing economic interests the further features of two federal systems having to contend with states' rights or provincial politicians and, over the course of time, a variety of domestic regulatory bodies and international commissions, we have a political "mix" which lends itself to almost infinite permutations and combinations. These have provided the off-set balance wheels which have responded so differently at particular points of time to what Professor Willoughby (making effective use of a phrase employed by John Gaus) calls the "coercive" forces in society. The wonder is that all of these disjunctive forces have, from time to time, been brought into phase and that cooperative action has been possible.

As an experiment in international regional planning for a great waterways basin, along the lines of the T. V. A., for example, the record is far from reassuring. Undoubtedly, narrow, nationalistic considerations and even military precautions contributed to the repeated failures recorded in this study. Perhaps, too, if the basin had divided two unitary, rather than two federal, states the achievements would have come sooner and more sensibly. But, the more one examines this story the clearer it becomes that the international political machinery for dealing with the issues arising between the two countries was seldom at fault. One might even hazard the guess that if this basin, rather than dividing two nations, had fallen completely within the boundaries of one country, the development of its transportation and power potential would probably not have been accomplished much sooner than it, in fact, was. The economic forces lined up on each side of the river system were frequently in complete agreement; the difficulties were being created by competing domestic forces lying behind and around them. One of the most useful features of Professor Willoughby's study is the manner in which he has brought all these contradictory elements into the open and revealed their true part in prolonging or blocking decisions about the waterway.

The two national protagonists in Professor Willoughby's epic may derive a moral and a lesson from his story. The tensions and conflict of interests between—and within—nations, even under what must be considered promising conditions in this far from ideal world, are not easily or quickly resolved. The patience, persistence and dedication of political leaders will always be strained by the intransigent forces of self-interest, pride and fear seeking to resist the logical coercive forces of society. And, if this be true of two old national friends, how much more is this the case in the larger family of nations now seated uneasily around the tables of the United Nations!—J. E. HODGETTS, Queen's University (Kingston, Ontario).

France, Europe, and the Two World Wars. By RENÉ ALBRECHT-CARRIÉ, (New York: Harper & Brothers, 1961. Pp. 346. $7.00.)

This useful book retells in summary form the events which led to World War I and then concentrates on the period between the two wars. In this it produces no new discoveries and the author had no such intentions, as is indicated by his use of primarily secondary sources. What he actually attempts is to place the relationship of France and Germany, as well as the internal evolution in both countries, into the context of the search for a method to stabilize and to organize Europe. This book is the story of the failure of this search.

In zeroing in on the Franco-German conflict, the author does not just select a detail. He sees in the twentieth century a great transitional passage comparable to the sixteenth. It followed a century which, while far from static, was rather stable, and whose stability appeared even greater in comparison to what followed. It was characterized by the unleashing of popular forces furthered by the French and the Industrial Revolutions. But this phenomenon was virtually confined to Europe (and to the United States which remained long concerned with her own and the hemisphere's development) and hence Europe became virtually the mistress of the world outside the Western Hemisphere. This mastery was achieved, not by Europe working in concert, but by individual European states locked in intense competition with one another. Thus the conflict for the mastery of Europe had as its prize the claim for the mastery of most of the world. With so much power concentrated in so small an area the seeds of deadly conflict were laid, despite the very real consciousness of a common heritage which existed among the combatants, at least those of World War I.

Because the nineteenth century had been so relatively peaceful the Powers had perhaps thought that they had learned how to accommodate their differences: 1914 destroyed that illusion. What followed then was an attempt to return to the interrupted normalcy of the pre-World War I period, a futile attempt as the author shows, because there had been more than a great war. An order had died and nothing could revive it. The participants in this drama were too close to it to understand this and their inability to deal with this situation marked the uneasy twenty years which ended in 1939. World Wars I and II therefore constitute, in the opinion of the author, a single period.

World War I was not just a Franco-German quarrel. But it showed the potential of German power and thus made the issue of the control of that power the central problem of the interwar period. France, on the other hand, had not been the sole belligerent of World War I on the allied side, but geography decreed that the war should primarily be fought on her territory. This caused France's main preoccupation with security from Germany. Moreover, the revolution in Russia as well as Britain's and America's limited objectives made France the principal executor of the policy of containing Germany.

The author, whose familiarity with French events is quite evidently greater than his penetration into the intricacies of German politics, has come to the conclusion that France's fears were well founded but that her policy appeared to Britain and even more to America as if it were solely dictated by the will to keep the fruits of victory. In reality, says the author, France had neither the power, nor even the will to carry out such a role; in fact she flexed her muscles only when it was safe to do so, as for instance in the Ruhr episode, but recoiled when it was really necessary but risky. The result was surrender to the incompetent British leadership of 1936.

This thesis is well and persuasively presented in a readable manner. Evidently the author intended to cover a wide range of audience because this book contains both quite technical passages and explanations which could be considered necessary only for the total neophyte. This is sometimes irritating but does not otherwise detract from the work.

In a book of this sort it is easy enough to point out differences of interpretations, especially in the sections on Germany. But they are more than outweighed by a generally fair and dispassionate treatment interspersed with passages of considerable insight, like the statement that the peace treaties which closed World War I were instruments that could have been used in a variety of ways and that it was their use, rather than the nature of the treaties themselves which were of such pivotal importance.

The book ends with a brief essay on France since 1945, the value of which does not measure up to the main body of the book. It touches on far more issues than can be accommodated in so few pages, and would perhaps have been better omitted.

In general, however, this book is challenging and interesting. For a political scientist it is difficult to read this narrative without emotion; 1939 is not so long ago and this reviewer belongs to the generation which fought in World War II. Yet, so fast is the pace of our times that it seems very remote and the account of the struggle for hegemony in Europe and by European powers seems curiously unreal. But that is certainly not the fault of the author.—ROBERT G. NEUMANN, University of California (Los Angeles).

Mr. Europe, A Political Biography of Henri Spaak.

By J. H. HUIZINGA. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger, Inc., 1961. Pp. 248. $6.50.)

This book is a fast-moving and readable biography of Paul Henri Spaak by an experienced Dutch journalist. Mr. Huizinga very perceptively suggests that Spaak continued in the Jacobin tradition of Paul Janson, his maternal grandfather, who was Belgium's most distinguished tribune of the last third of the nineteenth century. Eventually Spaak also became his country's leading tribune. However, whereas Janson practiced politics in a time of relative calm, his grandson's political career unfolded during Europe's fifty years' crisis.

In spite of himself, Huizinga is forced to record that Spaak's success as a politician was largely due to his ability to set his political sails to rapidly changing political winds. Without moral qualms or psychic strains Spaak changed from a radical Liberal to a moderate Socialist in the twenties; from a moderate to a radical Socialist in the early thirties; from an extreme anti-ministerial Socialist to a Cabinet member in an overwhelmingly anti-Socialist ministry in the second half of the thirties; from an ardent champion of the League of Nations into an eloquent neutralist and Munichite; from an appeaser to an ardent opponent of Hitler soon after the fall of France; from a close friend of King Leopold into the King's enemy; and from an expedient cooperator with the Communists in the early thirties to a flaming anti-Bolshevik after World War Two.

On two occasions Spaak actually came close to missing out. In a chapter significantly entitled "Saved by the King" the author shows that Leopold's refusal to accept his Cabinet's bid for an accommodation rather than fundamental opposition to Nazism drove Spaak and his colleagues into exile after the fall of France. And in 1949-50 Spaak pressed for Leopold's abdication only after his own Socialist party threatened direct, extra-parliamentary action. In this instance Spaak decided to take the leadership of the anti-Leopold movement not only in order to prevent it from getting out of hand but also so as not to be left without a political following.

Spaak emerges from this narrow political biography as an expert politician whose major assets are his oratorical skills and his sharp sense of the possible and the expedient, and whose underlying motivation is a passion for political action and power. Perhaps he became the first president of the U. N. General Assembly, the Ministerial Committee of OEEC, and the European Assembly in Strasbourg not so much because his talents and achievements were recognized both inside and outside Belgium, but rather because the major powers desperately need politicians from small nations who will deftly preside over inter-allied and inter-coalition organizations.

Since Huizinga does not claim to have written a scholarly book there is no need to take him to task for his inadequate documentation and his pedestrian political and social analysis. On the other hand, the publisher should be criticized for calling this book Mr. Europe when the author devotes only a bare fifteen pages to Spaak's all-European activities.—ARNO J. MAYER, Princeton University.

Population Control—The Imminent World Crisis.

EDITED BY MELVIN G. SCHIMM. New York: Oceana Publications, Inc., 1961. Pp. 253.

Preoccupation with the drag exerted by the population explosion in economically underdeveloped areas upon their prospects for escape from age-old scourges of poverty, disease, and illiteracy, has in recent years been yielding a rising tide of publications concerning various aspects of the population problem.

Every reader of Schimm's symposium will remain indebted to him and the seventeen contributors for the successful accomplishment of their assignment. As the editor stated, this book is directed "to the end that we may perceive the full dimensions of this momentous impending challenge and be prepared to respond appropriately to it."

Statistical data concerning current rates of growth and aggregate increments in human numbers are reviewed by Robert C. Cook, director of the Population Reference Bureau, in the opening chapter "World Population Growth," while A. J. Jaffe's contribution bears upon "Population Trends and Controls in Underdeveloped Countries." Both bring out the historically unprecedented nature of contemporary demographic phenomena. Drawing on his research findings in Puerto Rico, Jaffe stresses the ability of an economy launched upon the path of modernization to raise output without requiring additional labor. In attempting to explain this seeming paradox, Jaffe provides an incomplete answer: he considers only the effect upon employment resulting from transfer of labor out of traditional, low productivity sectors of the economy into "newly-opened factory" employment characterized by high levels of productivity; his explanation thus fails to include the displacement effect, caused by continuous improvements in productivity in modern sectors of the economy, which further stems the absorptive capacity for labor.

After pointing out that output of food in developed continents increased from the mid-30's to the mid-50's more rapidly than the growth of their populations, while in underdeveloped continents the picture, with insignificant exceptions, was the reverse, Jaffe concludes that "the people in underdeveloped areas consume, on a per capita basis, between one quarter and one third less food than do the people of the developed areas." As such, the statement is misleading for it disregards the difference in caloric origin of the respective diets—if the high proportion of our food consumption derived from secondary calories were translated back into primary calories the differential in per capita consumption would not be of an order of merely 30 per cent but closer to a ratio of 3:1 in our favor.

The broad foundations laid by Cook and Jaffe support individual country studies dealing with population control in Japan, Puerto Rico and India.

No symposium on population control could fail to come to grips with the dominant religious viewpoints within Western Society. "A Roman Catholic View of Population Control" is presented by Norman St. John-Stevás. As spokesman of a relatively conciliatory stand on a number of side issues, he concedes, for instance, that "an almost universal skepticism [with respect to the Roman Catholic concept of natural law] should be treated as relevant when a policy of enforcing the precept by means of civil legislation [e.g., the Connecticut statute] is considered," and advances the claim that "the practice of family planning is enjoined [by the Roman Catholic Church] as a duty, the dispute with contemporaries being confined to the means employed." Yet, although the risk of pregnancy, according to the data he quotes, may be five times as great for women who follow the rhythm method as compared to those using contraceptives, St. John-Stevás reiterates that "the methods of family planning acceptable to the Roman Catholic Church are limited to abstinence and use of the safe period" and that "the medical experiments now in progress to develop a contraceptive pill, even if successful, will not lessen Roman Catholic-Protestant conflict over birth control, since such a pill is subject to the same condemnation by Roman Catholic theologians as other forms of contraception."

As for emigration as a solution for over-population problems, St. John-Stevás quotes Pius XII: "If then, in some locality the land offers the possibility of supporting a large number of people, the sovereignty of the state, although it must be respected, cannot be exaggerated to the point that access to this land is, for inadequate or unjustified reasons, denied to needy and decent people from other nations. . . ." In the decade of the 60's, in the course of which China's population alone will increase by as many people as the total population of the United States, more specific operational guidance seems to be required for statesmen both in Washington and Moscow.

On the recently made recommendation [Draper Report] calling for aid in birth control techniques upon request of the recipient government, St. John-Stevás states: ". . . nor should foreign aid funds be used to implement such a program, even at the request of the designated state."

Richard M. Fagley, author of the well-known Population Explosion and Christian Responsibility, presents the Protestant viewpoint on "responsible parenthood." Salient Protestant teaching is summed up as follows: "The implication is that the medical knowledge that enables a couple to avert conception is no more 'artificial' or 'unnatural' than the medical knowledge vouchsafed for the reduction of disease and premature death."

Readers of this journal may find of greatest interest to them the last chapter of the symposium—"Some Observations on the Political Economy of Population Growth" contributed by Arthur S. Miller. He formulates his central thesis as "the relatively simple proposition that population growth will create the need for more organization, which, in turn, will result in further enhancement of group (including societal), rather than individual, values." For an illustration of his reasoning: ". . . if the time ever comes when saturation of population exists and . . . satellites are pressed into use to siphon off some of the pressure, that, too, would require governmental control, both to produce the satellites and to choose those who would be banished (or allowed to escape, depending on one's viewpoint) to live on an orbiting mechanical planet. The end is more control, whichever way the knife cuts." Being pessimistic about the survival of individual freedoms in a world of mass population and greatly increased organization, Miller advocates a conscious American policy directed toward "attainment of the size of population that would be reasonably likely to produce the conditions (economic, political, and social) enabling the maintenance of a society in which democratic values are maximized."

To sum up, this is an excellent book dealing with one of the gravest problems of our time.—STOMA KAGAN, University of Oregon.

The Relation Between International Law and Municipal Law in the Netherlands and in the United States. By L. ERADES AND WESLEY L. GOULD. (New York: Oceana Publications, Inc., 1961. Pp. 510. $11.00.)

This book is the first of two projected volumes on the subject, and it is therefore difficult to evaluate its contribution and the extent to which it fulfills its ambitious title. It is built around the proposition that international law is more subject to change by the decisions of national courts than by those of international tribunals. Since the decisions of national courts are inevitably influenced by the constitutions, institutions, laws and traditions of each country, the main body of the work is prefaced by a long discussion of the national and municipal institutions and legal framework of the Netherlands and the United States.

This introduction is followed by chapters dealing with the extent to which domestic courts are bound to apply treaties and other international agreements. Then follows a similar section dealing with customary international law. There is also a discussion of the conflict between municipal law and international law, and two chapters dealing with the effect of antecedent and subsequent legislation upon treaties. The final section deals with conflicts between constitutions and international law. In each instance, the topics are discussed from a historical point of view. Thus we are told, for example, what various courts, judges and other legal authorities have said at various times on a particular subject. These many citations, quotations and dicta occasionally make it difficult to find out what the contemporary practice is in each country. The index is not sufficiently detailed to remedy this situation.

Judge Erades, who contributes most of the sections dealing with the Netherlands, is more of a legalist than his confrere Professor Gould. His point of departure is usually the relevant articles of the present, or of some past constitution of the Netherlands. Mr. Gould, while maintaining high standards, is a trifle less cautious, and happily is not afraid to raise certain questions that he is not always able fully to answer.

Throughout the book, the authors attempt to go beyond the "comparative approach" of yesteryear. Thus, this is not a series of unconnected essays. Although each topic is discussed separately, country by country, the section is invariably terminated by an attempt to synthesize, to compare, to contrast the relevant findings. Impressive though they be, one is bound to ask whether Professor Gould's "comparative summaries" go far enough. Unless and until comparative studies of this kind come to some tentative theoretical conclusions, which may in due course facilitate the formulation of more explicit hypotheses, research in international law will not keep pace with the important work now firmly under way in other branches of public law.

Perhaps because this is a trans-atlantic undertaking, the style is often complex, and sometimes verbose. Both authors have obviously done a great deal of research. With the exception of the first few chapters, where it is uneven and inadequate, the documentation is profuse. An English translation has thoughtfully been provided to the titles of the Dutch works cited in the footnotes. The text is unfortunately marred by an unusually large number of typographical errors.

Students of public law in the United States, the Netherlands and elsewhere owe a considerable debt to Messrs. Erades and Gould for having undertaken this work. A reasonable expectation is that the second volume, which will deal with case law on substantive issues of international law in both countries, will complete the picture, and thus lay a solid foundation for similar studies in this area.—DAVID A. BOOTH, Michigan State University.

SELECTED ARTICLES AND DOCUMENTS ON INTERNATIONAL LAW AND RELATIONS

WILLIAM H. ROBERTS

Catholic University of America

ARTICLES

International Politics and National Policies

General

Bell, H. H. Modern Analytical Techniques. Foreign Service Journal. October, 1961.

Bennett, J. C. The Nuclear Dilemma—a Discussion. Christianity and Crisis. November, 1961.

Engelhardt, H. Der Ökumenische Rat der Kirchen. Archiv des Völkerrechts. September, 1961.

Fuller, J. F. C. World Revolution and War. Ordnance. November, 1961.

The Future of the Cold War; after Berlin—. Nation's Business. October, 1961.

Galkin, A. Some Aspects of the Problem of Peace and War. International Affairs (Moscow). November, 1961.

Guiron, R. J. Das Zustandekommen der Afro-Asiatischen Zusammenarbeit. Europa Archiv. June 25, 1961.

Gyorgy, A. Nationalism as a Factor in International Relations. JAG Journal. June, 1961.

Henle, G. Grundfragen der Aussenpolitik Heute. Ein Weltpolitischer Rundblick. Europa Archiv. August 10, 1961.

Hull, W. J. Growing Pains of International Technical Co-operation. International Labour Review. October, 1961.

Inozemtsev, N. Results and Prospects of the Development of International Relations. International Affairs (Moscow). November, 1961.

Jack, H. A. The Belgrade Conference. Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists. November, 1961.

Knorr, K. The International System; Theoretical Essays. World Politics. October, 1961.

Korovin, Y. Semantic Camouflage of Imperialistic Politics. International Affairs (Moscow). November, 1961.

Lowenthal, R. The Points of the Compass. Encounter. September, 1960.

Maresca, A. La Convenzione di Vienna sulla Relazioni Diplomatiche. La Comunità Internazionale. April, 1961.

Peters, R. The Future of International Science. New Scientist. September, 1961.

Rabinowitch, E. The Stowe Conferences. Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists. November, 1961.

S., R. La Conférence des Pays Non-Alignés à Belgrade. Revue de Défense Nationale. November, 1961.

Scheel, W. Weltpolitische Perspektiven der Europäisch-Afrikanischen Zusammenarbeit. Europa Archiv. October 25, 1961.

Schleicher, H. Sozialismus und Krieg. Betrachtungen über die Ideologische Auseinandersetzung der Jugoslawischen und Chinesischen Kommunisten. Europa Archiv. May 25, 1961.

Von Imhoff, C. Die Russische Orthodoxie beim Ökumenischen Rat. Aussenpolitik. November, 1961.

Weaver, G. The International Labor Conference of 1961. Monthly Labor Review. September, 1961.

Wheeler, G. E. Propaganda and Counter-Propaganda in Asia. Royal Central Asian Journal. July, 1961.

Worsnop, R. L. East-West Negotiations. Editorial Research Reports. October 11, 1961.

Military and Functional Questions

Coser, L. A. The Termination of Conflict. Journal of Conflict Resolution. December, 1961.

Dougherty, J. E. The Disarmament Debate: a Review of Current Literature (Part One). Orbis. Fall, 1961.

Dudley, P. L. Views on Arms Control. JAG Journal. June, 1961.

Frank, J. D. Atomic Arms and Pre-Atomic Man. Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists. November, 1961.

Harrigan, A. Seapower in the Sixties: Deterrent and Determinant. United States Naval Institute Proceedings. June, 1961.

Kecskemeti, P. Disarmament, Arms Control, and Strategic Analysis. Science. December, 1961.

Lindsay, F. A. Unconventional Warfare. Foreign Affairs. January, 1962.

Miksche, F. O. The Case for Nuclear Sharing. Orbis. Fall, 1961.

Ney, V. Guerrilla Warfare: Annotated Bibliography. Military Review. November, 1961.

Read, T. Command and Control. Princeton, Center of International Studies, 1961.

Problems of Anti-Bacteriological Defense: According to Data from Foreign Literature—USSR. Washington, U. S. Joint Publications Research Service, 1961.

Rothschild, J. H. Can Peace Be Guaranteed? Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists. November, 1961.

Schelling, T. C. The Future of Arms Control. Operations Research. September, 1961.

Schuman, F. L. The Impasse of Disarmament. Current History. November, 1961.

Sheynin, Y. Disarmament or 'Balance of Terror'. Survival. November, 1961.

Singer, J. D. Weapons Technology and International Stability. Centennial Review. Fall, 1961.
 ———. From Deterrence to Disarmament. International Journal. Autumn, 1961.

Watkins, T. H. The Congo Airlift. Air University Quarterly Review. Summer, 1961.

Wohlstetter, A. Über die Teilnahme an der Nuklearen Rüstung. Europa Archiv. June 10, 1961.

Yeager, P. B. The New Age of the Sea. United States Naval Institute Proceedings. June, 1961.

Zuckerman, S. Judgment and Control in Modern Warfare. Foreign Affairs. January, 1962.

United States

Emerson, R. American Policy in Africa. Foreign Affairs. January, 1962.

Eliot, T. L., Jr. Schooling for Foreign Economic Policymakers. Foreign Service Journal. December, 1961.

Foreign Trade and the National Interest. Washington, Committee for a National Trade Policy, 1961.

Haskins, C. P. Technology, Science and American Foreign Policy. Foreign Affairs. January, 1962.

Hester, H. B. Our Foreign Policy and Propaganda. Journal of Human Relations. Autumn, 1961.

Huntington, S. P. Equilibrium and Disequilibrium in American Military Policy. Political Science Quarterly. December, 1961.

Jones, R. W. Administration in a Changing World. Foreign Service Journal. December, 1961.

Kaplan, M. A. United States Foreign Policy in a Revolutionary Age. Princeton, Center of International Studies, 1961.

Kraft, J. The Comeback of the State Department. Harper's Magazine. November, 1961.

Mathews, E. G. The FSO and High Policy. Foreign Service Journal. November, 1961.

Miller, F. P. The Role of the Department of State in Educational and Cultural Affairs. Department of State Bulletin. November 13, 1961.

Montgomery, J. D. Aid to Africa: New Test for U. S. Policy. New York, Foreign Policy Association—World Affairs Center, 1961.

Rivkin, A. Principal Elements of U. S. Policy towards Under-Developed Countries. International Affairs (London). October, 1961.

Schilling, W. R. The H-Bomb Decision. Political Science Quarterly. March, 1961.

Smith, P. A. Opinions, Publics, and World Affairs in the United States. Western Political Quarterly. September, 1961.

Templin, R. T. American Foreign Policy in Our World Today. Journal of Human Relations. Autumn, 1961.

Latin America

Doeker, G. The Montevideo Treaty and the European Economic Community: a Comparative Legal Analysis. Australian Outlook. August, 1961.

Draper, T. Cubans and Americans; a Report from New York. Encounter. July, 1961.

Feder, E. Some Reflections on Latin America's "Common Market." American Journal of Economics and Sociology. July, 1961.

Harbron, J. D. Castro in the Americas. Toronto, Canadian Institute of International Affairs, 1961.

Vallet, R. L'Amérique Latine après la Conférence de Punta-del-Este. Revue de Défense Nationale. November, 1961.

X. Autour de la Mer des Antilles. Revue Militaire Générale. October, 1961.

United Kingdom

The Common Market and the United Kingdom. London, Westminster Bank, 1961.

Day, A. The Economic Case for Britain Joining the Common Market. Listener. October 19, 1961.

Kitzinger, U. Für und Wider den Beitritt Grossbritanniens zur EWG. Europa Archiv. July 25, 1961.

Merigot, J. G. La "Conversion" de la Grande-Bretagne à la Communauté Économique Européenne. Revue de Défense Nationale. November, 1961.

Western Europe

Erler, F. Probleme und Perspektiven der Europäischen Sicherheitspolitik nach dem 13. August 1961. Europa Archiv. November 25, 1961.

Furniss E. G., Jr. De Gaulle's France and NATO: an Interpretation. International Organization. Summer, 1961.

Schütze, W. Die Französische Atombewaffnung im Spiegel der Parlamentarischen Debatten. Europa Archiv. May 10, 1961.

Central Europe

Bentzien, J. Die Luft-Korridore von und nach Berlin. Aussenpolitik. October, 1961.

Cornides, W. Berlin—und Was Dann. Europa Archiv. July 25, 1961.

Dalma, A. The Third Berlin Offensive of the Cold War. Military Review. December, 1961.

Hottelet, R. C. Berlin and Beyond. Orbis. Fall, 1961.

Rauschming, D. Die Berlin-Frage im Neueren Schrifttum (Review Article). Europa Archiv. November 25, 1961.

Vernant, J. Berlin: les Rouages de l'Affaire. Revue de Défense Nationale. November, 1961.

Von Studnitz, H. G. Zur Inventur der Deut-schen Aussenpolitik. Aussenpolitik. November, 1961.

Zemanek, K. Neutral Austria in the United Nations. International Organization. Summer, 1961.

Southern Europe and Mediterranean

Austria in the South Tyrol Conflict. Swiss Review of World Affairs. September, 1961.

Issawi, C. The Christian-Muslim Frontier in the Mediterranean: a History of Two Peninsulas. Political Science Quarterly. December, 1961.

Savory, D. Crisis in South Tyrol—the Cause. Contemporary Review. October, 1961.

Nobre de Mello, M. Aspects Juridiques Fondamentaux de la "Question Portugaise" à l'O.N.U. Revue de Droit International, de Sciences Diplomatiques et Politiques. January, 1961.

Von Zitzewitz, H. Spanien zwischen NATO und Neutralität. Aussenpolitik. October, 1961.

Soviet Union and Eastern Europe

Balinky, A. S. The Proclaimed Emergence of Communism in the USSR. Social Research. Autumn, 1961.

Barker, C. N. An Assessment of Soviet Communist Aims Viewed from "the Enemy's Position." Army Quarterly and Defence Journal. October, 1961.

Berkes, R. N. The Soviet Union in the United Nations. Current History. November, 1961.

Brinkley, G. Foreign Policy and the Transition to Communism. Survey. October, 1961.

Gapanovich, J. J. Russian Diplomacy, Old and New. Australian Outlook. August, 1961.

Hayter, W. Totalitarian Approaches to Diplomacy. Listener. November 9, 1961.

Höpker, W. The Black Sea an Inland "Red" Sea? NATO's Fifteen Nations. October, 1961.

Kertesz, S. D. The U.S.S.R. and the Communist Bloc. Current History. November, 1961.

Kordt, E. Zur Kommunistischen Weltpolitik und Ihren Inneren Voraussetzungen. Hinweise auf Neuerscheinungen seit dem 20. Parteikongress. Europa Archiv. May 10, 1961.

Labin, S. La Technique de la Propagande Communiste. La Guerre Politique Soviétique. Revue de Droit International, de Sciences Diplomatiques et Politiques. April, 1961.

Morris, B. Sino-Soviet Relations; a Summing Up. Survey. December, 1961.

Moseley, P. E. Khrushchev's Party Congress. Foreign Affairs. January, 1962.

Ray, H. Das Geheimnis der Sowjetfolge in Asien-Afrika. Aussenpolitik. October, 1961.

Russia and China. Survey. October, 1961.

Russia and the Western Powers: a Chronology since the Vienna Meeting of 3 and 4 June. World Today. December, 1961.

Sojak, V. Peaceful Coexistence—the Only Way to European Security. International Affairs (Moscow). July, 1961.

Soviet-American Bilateral Disarmament Negotiations. New Times (Moscow). October, 1961.

Stackelberg, G. A. Renewed Attacks on the National Bourgeoisie. Bulletin of the Institute for the Study of the USSR. August, 1961.

St. John, A. Russia and Red China—Mutual Nemeses. United States Naval Institute Proceedings. August, 1961.

On Thermonuclear Coexistence. Survey. December, 1961.

Valluy, J. Au Sujet du Manifeste des 81. Revue Militaire Générale. October, 1961.

USSR Technical Assistance to Foreign Countries. Washington, U. S. Joint Publications Research Service, 1961.

Von Huebbenet, G. Polen als Statist der Weltpolitik. Aussenpolitik. October, 1961.

Zagoria, D. S. The 1957 Moscow Conference and the Sino-Soviet Dispute. China Quarterly. July, 1961.

Middle East and Africa

Alexandre, P. L'Afrique Noire et le Mythe Chinois. Revue de Défense Nationale. November, 1961.

Arden-Clarke, C. The West and Africa's Challenge. African Affairs. October, 1961.

Clinton, E. J. The United Nations and the Congo. American Bar Association Journal. November, 1961.

Cohen, A. The New Africa and the United Nations. African Affairs. October, 1961.

Cox, I. Crisis of Colonialism in Central Africa. International Affairs (Moscow). July, 1961.

Grandchamp, R. Les Méandres de la Politique Soviétique au Moyen-Orient. Revue Militaire d'Information. October, 1961.

Guiton, R. J. Die Auswärtige Politik Tunesiens. Europa Archiv. November 25, 1961.

Keita, M. The Foreign Policy of Mali. International Affairs (London). October, 1961.

Kuwait-Iraq Dispute, 1961. New York, International Review Service, 1961.

Mohan, J. South Africa and the Suez Crisis. International Journal. Autumn, 1961.

Stauffer, R. B. Economic Assistance and Ethiopia's Foreign Policy. Orbis. Fall, 1961.

Tunisian-French Dispute; Bizerta; Sahara; UN Action. New York, International Review Service, 1961.

Woodhouse, C. M. Middle Eastern Prospects: a Confession of Cautious Optimism. Encounter. April, 1961.

South and Southeast Asia

Caroe, O. The North-West Frontier, Old and New. Royal Central Asian Journal. July, 1961.

Crozier, B. Peking and the Laotian Crisis: an Interim Appraisal. China Quarterly. July, 1961.

Labin, S. Entretiens en Asie. Revue Militaire Générale. October, 1961.

Roll, C. Thailand. Aussenpolitik. October, 1961.

Far East and Pacific

Bishop, P. V. Anzus: Shield or Shroud? International Journal. Autumn, 1961.

Contemporary China: a Bibliography. New York, U. S. Joint Publications Research Service, 1961.

Dorsey, G. L. Chinese Recognition: Law and Policy in Perspective. University of Pittsburgh Law Review. October, 1961.

Eitner, H. J. China als Künftige Militärmacht. Aussenpolitik. November, 1961.

Falk, S. L. Organization and Military Power: the Japanese High Command in World War II. Political Science Quarterly. September and December, 1961.

Halpern, A. M. The Foreign Policy Uses of the Chinese Revolutionary Model. China Quarterly. July, 1961.

Jacobini, H. B. Main Patterns of Philippine Foreign Policy. Review of Politics. October, 1961.

Kindermann, G. K. Paradoxien der Inneren und Auswärtigen Politik Japans. Europa Archiv. July 10, 1961.

Levi, W. Formosa and "the China Issue." Current History. December, 1961.

McConaughy, W. P. The American Image of Japan. Department of State Bulletin. October 23, 1961.

Passin, H. Sino-Indian Cultural Relations. China Quarterly. July, 1961.

Seidensticker, E. Will Japan Turn to Neutralism? Life International. October 9, 1961.

Steiner, H. A. Communist China in the World Community. International Conciliation. September, 1961.

Warnbrunn, W. Observations of Education and International Exchange in Asia. A Report of a Study Trip, September to December, 1960. New York, National Association of Foreign Student Advisers, 1961.

International Economic Policy and Relations

Frank, I. The OECD and Aid to the Lesser Developed Countries. SAIS Review. Autumn, 1961.

Gilbert, R. S. World Payments and the IMF: —the Problem for Vienna. Banker. September, 1961.

Grotewold, A. Some Aspects of the Geography of International Trade. Economic Geography. October, 1961.

Hultman, C. W. Agricultural Disposals as Foreign Aid: an Appraisal. Journal of Inter-American Studies. October, 1961.

Ködderitzsch, W. Entwicklungsländer und Wirtschaftswachstum. Europa Archiv. June 25, 1961.

New Thinking at the Fund. Banker. October, 1961.

International Law

Accioly, H. Das Asylrecht. Archiv des Völkerrechts. September, 1961.

Air and Space Law. Report of the Forty-Ninth Conference. London, International Law Association, 1961.

Andrassy, J. L'Utilisation des Eaux des Bassins Fluviaux Internationaux. Egyptian Review of International Law, 1960.

Aversa, A. As Determined by the United States of America. American University Law Review. June, 1961.

Azzam, I. A. The Justiciability of International Disputes. Egyptian Review of International Law, 1960.

B., G. Sulla Personalità delle Organizzazioni Internazionali. Diritto Internazionale. January, 1961.

Baade, H. W. The Eichmann Trial: Some Legal Aspects. Duke Law Journal. Summer, 1961.

Bains, J. S. The Diversion of International Rivers. Indian Journal of International Law. July, 1960.

Baxter, R. R. The Definition of War. Egyptian Review of International Law, 1960.

Bierzanek, R. La Nature Juridique de la Haute Mer. Revue Générale de Droit International Public. April, 1961.

Bracht, H. W. Die Auslegung Internationaler Verträge in der Sowjetischen Völkerrechtslehre. Osteuropa Recht. June, 1961.

Byrd, E. M., Jr. Constitutional Limits on International Agreements in the Space Age. Northwestern University Law Review. March, 1961.

Christol, C. Q. Remedies for Individuals under World Law. Northwestern University Law Review. March, 1961.

Connell, H. P. United States Protection of Private Foreign Investment through Treaties of Commerce and Navigation. Archiv des Völkerrechts. September, 1961.

Cooper, J. C. Outer Space and the Law: an Engineering Problem. Astronautics. October, 1961.

De Visscher, C. L'Affaire du Droit de Passage sur Territoire Indien devant la Cour Internationale de Justice. Revue Générale de Droit International Public. October, 1960.

Current Developments in Air Space and Outer Space: Law, Science and Policy. Symposium.

Proceedings of the American Society of International Law, 1961.

Dietze, G. The Disregard for Property in International Law. Northwestern University Law Review. March, 1961.

Duclos, P. Exploration d'Une Catégorie Juridique Naissante. Revue Générale de Droit International Public. April, 1961.

Gasteyger, C. Theorie und Praxis im Sowjetischen Völkerrecht. Europa Archiv. August 10, 1961.

Harris, D. J. European Court of Human Rights—the Lawless Case. International and Comparative Law Quarterly. July, 1961.

Hartwig, B. Der Israelisch-Ägyptische Streit um den Golf von Akaba. Archiv des Völkerrechts. January, 1961.

The IMCO Opinion: A Study in Treaty Interpretation. Duke Law Journal. Spring, 1961.

Jessup, P. C. Trends and Developments in International Law in the Twentieth Century. Indian Journal of International Law. October, 1960.

Juridical Aspects of Co-existence. Report of the Forty-Ninth Conference. London, International Law Association, 1961.

Juridical Aspects of Nationalization and Foreign Property. Report of the Forty-Ninth Conference. London, International Law Association, 1961.

Kipp, H. Das Verbot der Diskriminierung im Modernen Friedensvölkerrecht. Archiv des Völkerrechts. April, 1961.

Korovin, Y. International Law Today. International Affairs (Moscow). July, 1961.

Kunz, J. L. Natural-Law Thinking in the Modern Science of International Law. American Journal of International Law. October, 1961.

Lauterpacht, E. The Contemporary Practice of the United Kingdom in the Field of International Law—Survey and Comment. International and Comparative Law Quarterly. July, 1961.

Law of International Waterways. Report of the Forty-Ninth Conference. London, International Law Association, 1961.

Legal Aspects of Reconnaissance in Airspace and Outer Space. Columbia Law Review. June, 1961.

Legal Problems of a United Nations Force. Report of the Forty-Ninth Conference. London, International Law Association, 1961.

Leifer, M. Human Rights in the European Community. Australian Outlook. August, 1961.

Lombard, L. M. African Conference on the Rule of Law Held at Lagos, Nigeria, in January. American Bar Association Journal. June, 1961.

Münch, I. Zur Objektivität in der Völkerrechtswissenschaft. Archiv des Völkerrechts. January, 1961.

Opsahl, T. An "International Constitutional Law?" International and Comparative Law Quarterly, October, 1961.

P. G. B. La Prima Sentenza della Corte Europea di Diritto dell'Uomo. Diritto Internazionale. January, 1961.

Pallieri, G. B. La Comunità Europea e gli Ordinamenti Interni degli Stati Membri. Diritto Internazionale. January, 1961.

Panhuy, H. F. Regional or General International Law? A Misleading Dilemma. Nederlands Tijdschrift voor Internationaal Recht. April, 1961.

Rao, K. K. The Advisory Jurisdiction of the International Court of Justice. Indian Journal of International Law. July, 1960.

Die Rechtsfragen der Europäischen Einigung. Europa Archiv. October 25, 1961.

Richardson, G. L. A State of War and the Uniform Code of Military Justice. American Bar Association Journal. August, 1961.

Rosenne, S. Sir Hersch Lauterpacht's Concept of the Task of the International Judge. American Journal of International Law. October, 1961.

Roy, S. N. G. Is the Law of Responsibility of States for Injuries to Aliens a Part of Universal International Law? American Journal of International Law. October, 1961.

Satterfield, J. C. The San Jose Conference on World Peace through Law. American Bar Association Journal. October, 1961.

Schick, F. B. Space Law and Space Politics. International and Comparative Law Quarterly. October, 1961.

Simmonds, K. R. The Interhandel Case. International and Comparative Law Quarterly. July, 1961.

Smit, H. International Aspects of Federal Civil Procedure. Columbia Law Review. June, 1961.

Sottile, A. Ideological and Economic Aggression. Revue de Droit International, de Sciences Diplomatiques et Politiques. January, 1961.

Sovereignty and International Responsibility, 1960. Symposium. Proceedings of the American Society of International Law, 1961.

Stein, E. Ist die "Deutsche Demokratische Republik" ein Staat? Archiv des Öffentlichen Rechts. April, 1961.

Taylor, T. Large Questions in the Eichmann Case. Revue de Droit International, de Sciences Diplomatiques et Politiques. January, 1961.

Timberg, S. Sovereign Immunity, State Trading, Socialism and Self-Deception. Northwestern University Law Review. March, 1961.

Váli, F. A. The Santa Maria Case. Northwestern University Law Review. April, 1961.

Verzijl, J. H. W. La Cour Internationale de Justice en 1960. Affaire de la Sentence Arbitrale Rendue par le Roi d'Espagne le 23 Decembre 1906 (Honduras c. Nicaragua). Nederlands Tijdschrift voor Internationaal Recht. April, 1961.

Von der Heydte, F. A. Atomare Kriegführung und Völkerrecht. Archiv des Völkerrechts. April, 1961.

Webb, J. E. International Relations and Space. Vital Speeches of the Day. October 1, 1961.

Wright, Q. Some Legal Aspects of the Berlin Crisis. American Journal of International Law. October, 1961.

International Organizations

United Nations and Specialized Agencies

Alexy, H. Die Inanspruchnahme des IGH durch die Organe der Vereinten Nationen. Zeitschrift für Ausländisches Öffentliches Recht und Völkerrecht. July, 1961.

Castrén, E. Some Aspects of the Future Activity of the United Nations. Indian Journal of International Law. October, 1960.

Claude, I. L. The Management of Power in the Changing United Nations. International Organization. Spring, 1961.

Delmas, C. Les Nations-Unies: Rêves et Réalités. Revue de Défense Nationale. November, 1961.

Goldstein, W. The Price of Keeping the U.N. Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists. October, 1961.

Holmes, J. The United Nations in the Congo. International Journal. Winter, 1960-61.

Jennings, R. Y. The United Nations, Force, and the Congo. Listener. October 19, 1961.

Johnson, D. H. N. The United Nations Conference on Diplomatic Intercourse and Immunities. International and Comparative Law Quarterly. July, 1961.

Kerley, E. L. The Powers of Investigation of the United Nations Security Council. American Journal of International Law. October, 1961.

Kunzmann, K. H. Die Generalakte von New York und Genf als Streitschlichtungsvertrag der Vereinten Nationen. Friedens-Warte, 1961.

Pedersen, R. J. National Representation in the United Nations. International Organization. Spring, 1961.

Sharp, W. R. Trends in United Nations Administration. International Organization. Summer, 1961.

Steinitz, H. Mitarbeit und Mitsprache Deutschlands bei der UNO. Aussenpolitik. October, 1961.

Vershinin, V. U. N.: Its Possibilities and Prospects. International Affairs (Moscow). November, 1961.

Virally, M. Vers Une Reforme du Secretariat des Nations Unies? International Organization. Spring, 1961.

Regional and Collective Security Organizations

Allardt, H. Praktische Möglichkeiten der Ent-wicklungshilfe in Africa. Europa Archiv. July 25, 1961.

Buchan, A. The Reform of NATO. Foreign Affairs. January, 1962.

Grayson, L. E. Coordinated Energy Policy in the Common Market: the Guidance-Price Plan. Social Research. Autumn, 1961.

Haas, E. B. International Integration; the European and the Universal Process. International Organization. Summer, 1961.

Hamlin, F. NATO's Technical Centers: International Cooperation for the Free World's Technical Problems. Armed Forces Management. October, 1961.

Husemann, H. Defense of the British Commonwealth in North America and Europe. Military Review. December, 1961.

Kahn-Freund, O. Social Policy and the Common Market. Political Quarterly. October, 1961.

Kaplan, L. S. NATO Retrospect. Review of Politics. October, 1961.

Kohlhase, N. Zum Politischen Charakter der Europäischen Wirtschaftsgemeinschaft. Europa Archiv. July 10, 1961.

———. Die Erweiterung der Europäischen Wirtschaftsgemeinschaft. Europa Archiv. November 10, 1961.

Mora, J. A. The Role of the Organization of American States. Record. May, 1961.

Schneider, H. Die Haltung der Commonwealth-Länder zur Europäischen Integration. Europa Archiv. May 10, 1961.

Valentine, D. G. The Agreement Creating an Association between the European Free Trade Association. International and Comparative Law Quarterly. July, 1961.

DOCUMENTS

General and Miscellaneous

Disarmament. Probleme der Allgemeinen Abrüstung. Europa Archiv. November 10, 1961.

EWG. Die Zusammenarbeit Afrikanischer Staaten mit der EWG. Europa Archiv. October 25, 1961.

United Kingdom. Central Office of Information. Reference Division. Fact Sheets on the Colombo Plan. London, 1961.

———. The Pattern of Commonwealth Trade. London, 1961.

United States

Unless otherwise indicated, all entries under this heading bear the imprint: "Washington, Government Printing Office."

Congress

House. Committee on Science and Astronautics. Report on the Activities of the Committee on . . . 87th Cong., 1st sess.

———. Research and Development in Aeronautics. Report (House Rep. No. 1277.) 87th Cong., 1st sess.

———. Commercial Applications of Space Communications Systems. Report. (House Rep. No. 1279.) 87th Cong., 1st sess.

———. Subcommittee No. 3. Establishment of a National Science Academy. Hearings. March 28 . . . May 25, 1961. 87th Cong., 1st sess.

Senate. Committee on Government Operations. Subcommittee on National Policy Machinery. Organization for National Security. The Bureau of the Budget and the Budgetary Process. Study. 87th Cong., 1st sess.

———. Final Statement of Senator Henry M. Jackson. 87th Cong., 1st sess.

———. Committee on Judiciary. Subcommittee to Investigate the Administration of the Internal Security Act and Other Internal Security Laws. The Bang-Jensen Case. Hearing. September 14, 1961. 87th Cong., 1st sess.

Joint Economic Committee. Subcommittee on Foreign Economic Policy. Economic Policies Toward Less-Developed Countries. Study. 87th Cong., 1st sess.

Executive

Department of State. The Threat of Soviet Economic Policy. (Publication No. 7234.) 1961.

President. Task Force on Foreign Economic Assistance. The Act for International Development; a Program for the Decade of Development—Objectives, concepts, and Proposed Program. 1961.

OTHER BOOKS RECEIVED

ADAIR, DOUGLASS AND SCHUTZ, JOHN A. Editors. Peter Oliver's Origin and Progress of the American Rebellion: A Tory View. (San Marino: The Huntington Library. 1961. Pp. xxi, 171. $5.00.)

ADAMS, ARTHUR E. Editor. Readings in Soviet Foreign Policy. (Boston: D. C. Heath and Co. 1961. Pp. v, 420. $3.85.)

ALLEN, SIR C. K. Law in the Making. (New York: Oxford University Press. 1961. Pp. xxxix, 645. Paper $2.50.)

ALLEN, H. C. The Anglo-American Predicament. (New York: St. Martin's Press. 1960. Pp. xiv, 241. $6.75.)

ASSOCIATION FRANCAISE DE SCIENCE POLITIQUE. Le Referendum de Septembre et les Elections de Novembre 1958. (Paris: Librairie Armand Colin. 1960. Pp. xxiii, 390.)

AUBREY, HENRY G. WITH ASSISTANCE OF DARMSTADTER, JOEL. Coexistence: Economic Challenge and Response. (Washington, D. C.: National Planning Association. 1961. Pp. xiv, 324. $5.00.)

BABEAU, ANDRÉ. Les Conseils Ouvriers en Pologne. (Paris: Librairie Armand Colin. 1960. Pp. xiv, 308.)

BARKER, SIR ERNEST. Principles of Social and Political Theory. (New York: Oxford University Press. 1961. Pp. viii, 284. Paper $1.85.)

BARNES, WILLIAM AND MORGAN, JOHN HEATH. The Foreign Service of the United States. (Washington: U. S. Government Printing Office. 1961. Pp. xiii, 430. $3.50.)

BARNETT, GEORGE AND OTIS, JACK. Corporation, Society and Education: The Philosophy of Elijah Jordan. (Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press. 1962. Pp. x, 297. $7.50.)

BAYLEY, C. C. War and Society in Renaissance Florence. (Toronto: University of Toronto Press. 1961. Pp. 440. $8.00.)

BEARCE, GEORGE D. British Attitudes towards India 1784-1858. (New York: Oxford University Press. 1961. Pp. viii, 315. $5.60.)

BECKER, JOSEPH M., S.J. The Adequacy of the Benefit Amount in Unemployment Insurance. (Kalamazoo, Michigan: The W. E. Upjohn Institute for Employment Research. 1961. Pp. 64. Paper.)

BEER, KENNETH E. Editor. The U.S.A. Answers: A Guide to Understanding. (New York: U. S. and World Publications, Inc. [Guide to U. S. for Foreigners] 1961. Pp. vii, 248. Paper $2.50. Cloth $5.00.)

BERG, IRWIN A. AND BASS, BERNARD M. Editors. Conformity and Deviation. (New York: Harper and Brothers. 1961. Pp. viii, 449. $6.50.)

BERGSON, ABRAM. The Real National Income of Soviet Russia Since 1928. (Cambridge: Harvard University Press. 1961. Pp. xix, 472. $8.75.)

BERGSTRAESSER, ARNOLD. Führung in des Modernen Welt. (Freiburg: Verlag Rombach. 1961. Paper 5.80 DM.)

BIBBY, CYRIL. Race, Prejudice and Education. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger, Inc. 1961. Pp. 90. Paper $1.25. Cloth $2.50.)

BLANCHARD, ROBERT, MEYER, RICHARD, AND MORLEY, BLAINE. Presidential Elections 1948-1960. Research Monograph No. 4. (Salt Lake City: Institute of Government, University of Utah. 1961. Pp. 58. $1.50.)

BLETON, PIERRE. le Capitalisme en Pratique. (Paris: Economie et Humaines, Les Editions Ouvrières. Pp. 302. 12,90 N.F. Paper.)

- BLUM, JEROME. Lord and Peasant in Russia from the 9th to 19th Century. (Princeton: Princeton University Press. 1961. Pp. x, 656. $12.50.)
- BOYD, JULIAN P. Editor. The Papers of Thomas Jefferson—Nov. 1789 to July 1790. Vol. 16. (Princeton: Princeton University Press. 1961. Pp. x/iii, 675. $12.50.)
- BROOKINGS INSTITUTION. The Study of Public Problems (A Report on Activities of the Brookings Institution 1954-1961). (Washington: The Brookings Institution. 1961. Pp. xiii, 154.)
- BROWNE, ROBERT S. Race Relations in International Affairs. (Washington, D. C.: Public Affairs Press. 1961. Pp. iv, 62.)
- BUNYAN, JAMES AND FISHER, H. H. The Bolshevik Revolution, 1917-1918. (Stanford: Stanford University Press. 1961. Pp. 735. $10.00.)
- BURKS, ARDATH. The Government of Japan. (New York: Thomas Y. Crowell Co. 1961. Pp. xvi, 269. Paper $1.95.)
- BURN, DUNCAN. The Steel Industry 1939-1959. (New York: Cambridge University Press. 1961. Pp. 728. $14.50.)
- CAMPAIGNE, JAMESON G. Check-Off. (Chicago: Henry Regnery Co. 1961. Pp. 248. $4.95.)
- CARNEGIE ENDOWMENT FOR INTERNATIONAL PEACE. Issues before the 16th General Assembly. (New York: Taplinger Publishing Co. 1961. Pp. 224. Paper $0.50.)
- CARNEGIE ENDOWMENT FOR INTERNATIONAL PEACE. Perspectives on Peace 1910-1960. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger. 1960. Pp. viii, 202. $3.00.)
- CARRIEL, MARY TURNER. The Life of Jonathan Baldwin Taylor. (Urbana: University of Illinois Press. 1961. Pp. xviii, 267. $5.50.)
- CENTER FOR INTERNATIONAL STUDIES, MIT. Investment Criteria & Economic Growth. (New York: Asia Publishing House. 1961. Pp. 161. $5.00.)
- CH'EN, JEROME. Yuan Shih-K'ai 1859-1916. (Stanford: Stanford University Press. 1961. Pp. 290. $6.00.)
- CHEVALIER, MICHAEL. Society, Manners and Politics in the United States. (New York: Doubleday & Company. 1961. Pp. 419. $1.45.)
- CHRISTMAN, HENRY M. Editor. Walter P. Reuther: Selected Papers. (New York: The Macmillan Co. 1961. Pp. xi, 330. $5.95.)
- COHEN, FELIX I. Edited and selected by Lucy Kramer Cohen. The Legal Conscience. (New Haven: Yale University Press. 1960. Pp. xvii, 505. $12.50.)
- COHEN, MORRIS RAPHAEL. Reason and Law. (New York: Collier Books. 1961. Pp. 224. Paper $1.50.)
- COMMISSION ON MONEY AND CREDIT. Money & Credit: Their Influences on Jobs, Prices & Growth. (Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey: Prentice-Hall, Inc. 1961. Pp. xiv, 285. Paper $2.00. Cloth $3.95.)
- CONTEMPORARY CIVILIZATION STAFF OF COLUMBIA COLLEGE. Editors. Chapters in Western Civilization Vol. 1, Third Edition. (New York: Columbia University Press. 1961. Pp. x, 591. $6.00.)
- COOKE, HELEN J. The Role of Debt in the Economy. (Washington, D. C.: Public Affairs Press. 1961. Pp. ix, 115. $3.25.)
- COUNCIL OF EUROPE. Statistical Data 1960. (Strasbourg: Council of Europe. Pp. 459. Paper.)
- CREIGHTON, T. R. M. Southern Rhodesia and the Central African Federation. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger, Inc. 1961. Pp. 258. $5.75.)
- DARRAH, EARL L. AND POLAND, ORVILLE F. The Fifty State Governments: A Compilation of Executive Organization Charts. (Berkeley: Bureau of Public Administration, University of California, Paper $3.00.)
- DERAN, ELIZABETH Y. Financing Capital Improvements: The "Pay-As-You-Go" Approach. 1961 Legislative Problems Series: No. 4. (Berkeley: University of California, Bureau of Public Administration. 1961. Pp. iii, 62. $2.00.)
- DILLON, MERTON L. Elijah P. Lovejoy. (Urbana: University of Illinois Press. 1961. Pp. ix, 190. $4.75.)
- DISHMAN, ROBERT B. State Constitutions: The Shape of the Document. (New York: National Municipal League. 1960. Pp. viii, 48. Paper $1.50.)
- DODGE, DOROTHY. Internationalism-Isolationism in Minnesota. A Study of the Roll Call Votes of the Minnesota Congressional Delegation 1940-1960. (Minneapolis: University of Minnesota World Affairs Center. Pp. 47. Paper $1.00.)
- DOWNS, ROBERT B. Moulders of the Modern Mind. (New York: Barnes & Noble. 1961. Pp. xx, 396. Paper $2.25. Cloth $6.00.)
- DUBIN, ROBERT. Human Relations in Administration. 2nd edition. (Englewood Cliffs: Prentice-Hall, Inc. 1961. Pp. xix, 635. $8.75.)
- DURKHEIM, EMILE. Edited by Kurt H. Wolff. Emile Durkheim 1858-1917. (Columbus: The Ohio State University Press. 1960. Pp. xiv, 463. $7.50.)
- DUROSELLE, JEAN-BAPTISTE. de Wilson à Roosevelt 1913-1945. (Paris: Librairie Armand Colin. 1960. Pp. 495.)
- EELLS, RICHARD AND WALTON, CLARENCE. Conceptual Foundations of Business. (Homewood, Illinois: Richard D. Irwin, Inc. 1961. Pp. x, 533. $7.00.)
- EHMKE, HORST. Wirtschaft und Verfassung. (Karlsruhe: Verlag C. F. Hüller. 1961. Pp. xix, 829. 71 D.M.)
- EISENSTEIN, LOUIS. The Ideologies of Taxation.

- (New York: The Ronald Press Company. 1961. Pp. vii, 263. $5.00.)
- EMME, EUGENE M. Aeronautics & Astronautics. (Washington: National Aeronautics and Space Administration. 1961. Pp. ix, 240. $1.75.)
- ENTERRIA, EDUARDO GARCIA DE. La Administracion Espanola. (Madrid: Instituto de Estudios Politicos. 1961. Pp. 239. Paper.)
- EVANS, M. STAUFER. Revolt on the Campus. (Chicago: Henry Regnery Co. 1961. Pp. 248. $4.50.)
- FALLS, CYRIL. The Art of War. (New York: Oxford University Press. 1961. Pp. viii, 240. $1.50.)
- FARNSWORTH, HELEN C. American Wheat Exports: Policies & Prospects. (Stanford: Food Research Institute Studies. Reprinted from Vol. I, No. 2. May, 1960. Pp. 59. Paper $1.00.)
- FAUSOLD, MARTIN L. Giffort Pinchot. (Syracuse: Syracuse University Press. 1961. Pp. 270. $4.50.)
- FERGUSON, LERNER, MCGEE et al. The Economic Value of the U. S. Merchant Marine. (Evanston: The Transportation Center at Northwestern University. 1961. Pp. xxii, 545.)
- FOOD RESEARCH INSTITUTE STUDIES. (Stanford University. Vol. I, May 1960. No. 2. Paper $2.50.)
- FORNELL, EARL WESLEY. The Galveston Era: The Texas Crescent on the Eve of Secession. (Austin: The University of Texas Press. 1961. Pp. xiv, 355. $5.00.)
- FOX, SANFORD. The Era of Continuous Prosperity. (New York: The William-Frederick Press. 1961. Pp. 128.)
- FRANK, ISAIAH. The European Common Market: An Analysis of Commercial Policy. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger, Inc. 1961. Pp. 324. $8.50.)
- FRANK, JOHN P. Lincoln as a Lawyer. (Urbana: University of Illinois Press. 1961. Pp. x, 190. $4.75.)
- FREEDMAN, LEONARD AND COTTER, CORNELIUS P. Editors. Issues of the Sixties. (San Francisco: Wadsworth Publishing Co., Inc. 1961. Pp. xiv, 412. Paper.)
- FRIEDRICH, CARL J. AND BRZEZINSKI, ZBIGNIEW K. Totalitarian Dictatorship and Autocracy. Reissue. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger, Inc. 1961. Pp. xii, 346. Paper $1.95.)
- FULLER, MAJOR GENERAL J. F. C. The Conduct of War 1789-1961. (New Brunswick: Rutgers University Press. Pp. 352. $6.00.)
- GALLAHER, ART JR. Plainville Fifteen Years Later. (New York: Columbia University Press. 1961. Pp. xvi, 301. $5.00.)
- GALVAO, HENRIQUE. Santa Maria: My Crusade for Portugal. (Cleveland: The World Publishing Co. 1961. Pp. 246. $4.50.)
- GEIGER, THEODORE. The Premium Gold Controversy in the International Monetary Fund. (University: University of Alabama Press. Inter-University Case Program #63. 1961. Pp. 59. Paper $1.50.)
- GERMAN POLITICAL SCIENCE ASSOCIATION. Political Quarterly. Vol. 1, No. 1. (Cologne: West German Publishing House. 1960.)
- GHOBASHY, OMAR Z. The Caughnawaga Indians and the St. Lawrence Seaway. (New York: The Devin-Adair Co. 1961. Pp. xi, 137. $3.00. Paper $2.00.)
- GODFREY, E. DREXEL, JR. The Government of France. (New York: Thomas Y. Crowell Co. 1961. Pp. vi, 186. Paper $1.95.)
- GOODRICH, CARTER. Canals and American Economic Development. (New York: Columbia University Press. 1961. Pp. vi, 303. $7.50.)
- GOODRICH, NORMA L. The Medieval Myths. (New York: New American Library. 1961. Pp. 224. $0.50. Paper.)
- GOVERNOR'S COMMISSION ON METROPOLITAN AREA PROBLEMS. Metropolitan California. (Sacramento: Governor's Commission on Metropolitan Area Problems. 1961. Pp. vii, 180. Paper $5.00. Cloth $6.00.)
- GRAEBNER, NORMAN A. Editor. Politics and the Crisis of 1860. (Urbana: University of Illinois Press. 1961. Pp. xii, 156. $3.00.)
- GREENHUT, MELVIN L. Full Employment, Inflation and Common Stock. (Washington: Public Affairs Press. 1961. Pp. vi, 87. $3.25.)
- GRIFFITH, BRIG. GENERAL SAMUEL B. Translation and Introduction. Mao Tse-Tung on Guerrilla Warfare. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger, Inc. 1961. Pp. 114. $4.50.)
- GROSECLOSE, ELGIN. Money and Man. (New York: Frederick Ungar Publishing Co. 1961. Pp. viii, 305. Paper $1.75.)
- GRUMM, JOHN G. A State Agency for Local Affairs? (Berkeley: Bureau of Public Administration, University of California. 1961. Pp. viii, 48. Paper $2.00.)
- GUEVARA, CHE. Guerrilla Warfare. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger, Inc. 1961. Pp. xxxiii, 85. $3.95.)
- HANCOCK, SIR W. KEITH. Four Studies of War and Peace in this Century. (New York: Cambridge University Press. 1961. Pp. vii, 129. $3.75.)
- HANDLIN, OSCAR et al. Education and American History. Vol. 31, No. 2. (Cambridge: Harvard Educational Review. 1961. Pp. 232. Paper $1.10.)
- HARRIS, H. S. The Social Philosophy of Giovanni Gentile. (Urbana: University of Illinois Press. 1960. Pp. ix, 387. $5.75.)
- HARRIS, SEYMOUR E., Editor. The Dollar in Crisis.

- (New York: Harcourt, Brace & World, Inc. 1961. Pp. x, 309. Paper $3.75.)
- HARRISON, JOHN P. Guide to Materials on Latin America in the National Archives. (Washington: The National Archives. 1961. Pp. x, 246. Paper.)
- HAYS, DENYS. The Italian Renaissance. (New York: Cambridge University Press. 1961. Pp. xii, 218. $5.50.)
- HEARINGS BEFORE SUBCOMMITTEE ON CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHTS OF THE COMMITTEE ON JUDICIARY. U. S. Senate. Constitutional Rights of the Mentally Ill. (Washington: U. S. Government Printing Office. 1961.)
- HEIDENHEIMER, ARNOLD J. The Governments of Germany. (New York: Thomas Y. Crowell Co. 1961. Pp. xii, 224. Paper $1.95.)
- HEILBRONER, ROBERT L. The Future as History. (New York: Grove Press Inc. 1961. Pp. 217. Paper $1.75.)
- HERMET, GUY AND MARQUET, JACQUELINE. Emigrants Saisonniers Espagnols en France. (Paris: Centre D'Etude des Relations Internationales. 1961. Pp. 60. Paper.)
- HERRING, FRANCES W. Editor. Regional Parks and Open Space. (Berkeley: University of California. 1961. Pp. 142. Paper $2.50.)
- HIGHAM, ROBIN. Britain's Imperial Air Routes. (Hamden, Conn.: The Shoe String Press. 1961. Pp. 407. $10.00.)
- HILBERG, PAUL. The Destruction of the European Jews. (Chicago: Quadrangle Books, Inc. 1961. Pp. x, 788, $17.50.)
- HILL, HENRY BERTRAM. Translator. The Political Testament of Cardinal Richelieu. (Madison: University of Wisconsin Press. 1961. Pp. xx, 128. $3.75.)
- HINDUS, MAURICE. House without a Roof. (New York: Doubleday & Co. Inc. 1961. Pp. xiv, 562. $6.95.)
- HOOS, IDA R. Automation in the Office. (Washington: Public Affairs Press. 1961. Pp. 138. $4.50.)
- HOWARD, JOHN EDRED. Translator. Letters and Documents of Napoleon: Vol. I. (New York: Oxford University Press. 1961. Pp. 540. $8.80.)
- HUCKER, CHARLES O. The Traditional Chinese State in Ming Times (1368-1644). (Tucson: University of Arizona Press. 1961. Pp. 85. Paper $1.75. Cloth $3.50.)
- HUNT, ELGIN F. Social Science—An Introduction to the Study of Society. 2nd edition. (New York: The Macmillan Co. 1961. Pp. 857. $8.50.)
- HURSTFIELD, JOEL. Elizabeth I and the Unity of England. (New York: The Macmillan Co. 1961. Pp. ix, 226. $2.50.)
- HUSS, JOHN E. Senator for the South: A Biography of Olin P. Johnston. (New York: Doubleday and Company, Inc. 1961. Pp. 238. $4.95.)
- INSTITUTE OF ELECTORAL RESEARCH. A Review of Elections. (Northwood, Middlesex: The Scorpion Press. 1961. Pp. 28. Paper 4 shillings.)
- INSTITUTE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS. Organization Chart: The State Government of Texas. (Austin: University of Texas, Institute of Public Affairs. 1961. $1.00.)
- INSTITUTE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS. Proceedings of the Seventh Governmental Accounting and Finance Institute. (Austin: University of Texas. 1961. Pp. v, 72.)
- INTERNATIONAL SOCIAL SCIENCE JOURNAL. Recent Research on Racial Relations. Vol. XIII No. 2. (Paris: UNESCO. 1961. Pp. 374. $2.00 Quarterly.)
- JAPAN SCIENCE REVIEW. Law and Politics: List of Articles 1958-59. (Tokyo: Maruzen Co., Ltd. 1961. Pp. 105. $1.50.)
- JOHANNSEN, ROBERT W. Editor. Letters of Stephen A. Douglas. (Urbana: University of Illinois Press. 1961. Pp. xxxi, 558. $10.00.)
- JOHNSON, A. C., COLEMAN-NORTON, P. R., AND BOURNE, F. C. Ancient Roman Statutes. (Austin: University of Texas Press. 1961. Pp. xxxi. $15.00.)
- KAMENETSKY, IHOR. Secret Nazi Plans for Eastern Europe. (New York: Bookman Associates, Inc. Pp. 263. $5.00.)
- KEDOURIE, ELIE. Nationalism. (Revised Edition.) (First Publication in 1960.) (New York: Frederick A. Praeger, Inc. 1961. Pp. 151. $1.65.)
- KEETON, G. W. AND SCHWARZENBERGER, GEORGE. Yearbook of World Affairs. Vol. 15 (London Institute of World Affairs). (New York: Frederick A. Praeger. 1961. Pp. xviii, 435. $12.50.)
- KAMPNER, ROBERT M. W. Eichmann und Komplizen. (Zurich: Europa Verlag. 1961. Pp. 452.)
- KENRICK, JOHN W. Productivity Trends in the U. S. (Princeton: Princeton University Press. 1961. Pp. lii, 630. $12.50.)
- KERNODLE, R. WAYNE. Editor. Values, Decisions and the American Economy. (Williamsburg, Va.: The College of William and Mary. 1961. Pp. 92. Paper.)
- KHAN, M. A. India's Economic Development and International Economic Relations. (New York: Taplinger Publishing Co. 1961. Pp. 163. $5.00.)
- KIRWIN, HARRY W. Editor. The Search for Democracy—A Documentary Record of The American Republic. (New York: Doubleday & Co. 1959. Paper $1.45.)
- KOHN, CLYDE F. Editor. Urban Responses to Agricultural Change. (Iowa City: State University of Iowa. 1961. Pp. viii, 207. $4.00.)
- KOHN, HANS. The Idea of Nationalism. (New York: The Macmillan Co. 1961. Paper $2.95.)
- KOVNER, MILTON. The Challenge of Coexistence. (Washington: Public Affairs Press. 1961. Pp. vi, 130. $3.25.)
- KRENZ, FRANK E. International Enclaves and

- Rights of Passage*. (Geneva: Librairie E. Droz. 1961. Pp. 197.)
- KUHN, JAMES W. Bargaining in Grievance Settlement. (New York: Columbia University Press. 1961. Pp. xii, 206. $4.50.)
- LANG, KIRT AND LANG, GLADYS ENGEL. Collective Dynamics. (New York: Thomas Y. Crowell Co. 1961. Pp. xii, 563. $7.25.)
- LATHAM, ATKESON, HARDING, et al. Management's Stake in Tax Administration. (Princeton: Princeton Tax Institute. 1961. Pp. 260. $6.00.)
- LAURENT, FRANCIS W. The Business of a Trial Court—100 Years of Cases. (Madison: University of Wisconsin Press. 1959. Pp. xxxiv, 314. $6.00.)
- LEE, LUKE T. Consular Law and Practice. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger, Inc. Pp. xxii, 431. $17.50.)
- LEGISLATIVE RESEARCH COMMISSION, COMMONWEALTH OF KENTUCKY. Veterans Bonus: Estimated Cost. (Frankfort, Ky.: Legislative Research Commission. 1960. Pp. 34.)
- LEVIN, HARVEY J. Broadcast Regulation and Joint Ownership of Media. (New York: New York University Press. 1960. Pp. xviii, 219. $4.50.)
- LEVIN, JONATHAN V. The Export Economies. (Cambridge: Harvard University Press, Harvard Law School. 1960. Pp. xv, 347. $6.75.)
- LINDER, STAFFAN BURENSTAM. An Essay on Trade and Transformation. (New York: John Wiley & Sons, Inc. 1961. Pp. 167. $5.00.)
- LIPPMAN, WALTER. Drift and Mastery. (Englewood Cliffs: Prentice-Hall, Inc. 1961. Pp. x, 177. Paper $1.95. Cloth $3.95.)
- LONDON INSTITUTE OF WORLD AFFAIRS. Yearbook of World Affairs. (London: Stevens & Sons, Ltd. 1961. Pp. vii, 481. L3, 3s.)
- MACE, RUTH L. Municipal Cost-Revenue Research in the U. S. (Chapel Hill: Institute of Government, University of North Carolina. 1961. Pp. xiv, 201. Paper $3.00.)
- MACLURE, MILLAR AND ANGLIN, DOUGLAS. Editors. Africa: The Political Pattern. (Toronto: University of Toronto Press. 1961. Pp. 124. $2.50.)
- MADDOK, RUSSELL W. JR., AND FUQUAY, ROBERT F. State and Local Governments. (Princeton: D. Van Nostrand Co., Inc. 1961. Pp. x, 712. $7.75.)
- MAGDA, JARO. Editor. Atomic Energy and Law: Inter-American Symposium. (San Juan: University of Puerto Rico School of Law. 1960. Pp. xi, 258.)
- MALIN, JAMES C. Confounded Rot about Napoleon. (Lawrence, Kansas: The author. 1961. Pp. viii, 254. $3.00.)
- MALONE, DUMAS. The Public Life of Thomas Cooper 1783-1839. (Columbia: University of South Carolina Press. 1961. Pp. xv, 434. $5.00.)
- MANSSELL, GERARD. Tragedy in Algeria. (London: Institute of Race Relations, Oxford University Press. 1961. Pp. 76. Paper $1.00.)
- MARKMANN, CHARLES LAIN AND SHERWIN, MARK. John F. Kennedy: A Sense of Purpose. (New York: St. Martin's Press. 1961. Pp. 346. $4.95.)
- MARSTON, THOMAS E. Britain's Imperial Role in the Red Sea Area 1800-1878. (Hamden, Conn.: The Shoe String Press. 1961. Pp. xiii, 550. $10.00.)
- MARTIN, JAMES W. Administrative Action for Efficient Debt Management: The Kentucky Case. (Kentucky Law Journal Vol. 49. Summer 1961. No. 4. Pp. 13. Paper.)
- MASON, PHILIP. Common Sense about Race. (New York: The MacMillan Co. 1961. Pp. 173. $2.95.)
- MASUR, GERHARD. Prophets of Yesterday: Studies in European Culture 1890-1914. (New York: The MacMillan Co. 1961. Pp. x, 481. $7.50.)
- MCCRACKEN, HARLAN L. Keynesian Economics in the Stream of Economic Thought. (Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press. 1961. Pp. xv, 201. $5.00.)
- McKINNEY, FRANCIS F. Education in Violence: The Life of George H. Thomas and the History of the Army of the Cumberland. (Detroit: Wayne State University Press. 1961. Pp. 544. $9.50.)
- MCLAUGHLIN, KATHLEEN. What's the U.N. Doing There? Some Success Stories of U.N. Technical Assistance. (New York: Institute for International Order. 1961. Pp. 80.)
- MEERLOO, JOOST A. M. The Difficult Peace. (Great Neck, New York: Channel Press. 1961. Pp. 190. Paper $1.95. $3.50.)
- MERIDIAN PERIODICAL. History 4. (Cleveland: The World Publishing Co. 1961. Pp. 167. Paper $1.50.)
- MOODIE, GRAEME. The Government of Great Britain. (New York: Thomas Y. Crowell Co. 1961. Pp. x, 207. Paper $1.95.)
- MORRAY, J. P. From Yalta to Disarmament: Cold War Debate. (New York: Monthly Review Press. 1961. Pp. xii, 368. $8.50.)
- MORRIS, RUBY TURNER. Student Workshop for Fundamentals of Economics. (New York: The Ronald Press. 1961. Pp. 28. Paper $2.75.)
- MORRIS, RUBY TURNER. Fundamentals of Economics Instructor's Manual. (New York: The Ronald Press. 1961. Pp. 207. Paper.)
- MORRIS, RUBY TURNER. Fundamentals of Economics. (New York: The Ronald Press. 1961. Pp. xvi, 859. $7.00.)
- MORTON, W. L. The Canadian Identity. (Madison: The University of Wisconsin Press. 1961. Pp. ix, 125. Paper $1.50. Cloth $3.50.)
- MOSHER, FREDERICK C. Recent Trends in Governmental Finances in the U. S. (Berkeley: Bureau of Public Administration, University of California. 1961. Pp. 76. $2.00.)

- NOVE, ALEC. The Soviet Economy. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger, Inc. 1961. Pp. 328. $6.75.)
- NUCHTERLEIN, DONALD E. Iceland: Reluctant Ally. (Ithaca: Cornell University Press. 1961. Pp. xiii, 213. $4.50.)
- ODEGARD, PETER H. Structure & Functions of American Government. (New York: Holt, Rinehart and Winston Co. 1961. Pp. 60. Paper $1.00.)
- ODEGARD, CARR, BERNSTEIN, MORRISON. American Government. (New York: Holt, Rinehart & Winston, Inc. 1961. xi, 468. Paper $4.00.)
- ODEGARD, PETER H. AND ROSENBLUM, VICTOR. American Government—Documents and Readings. (New York: Holt, Rinehart & Winston, Inc. 1961. Pp. viii, 246. Paper $2.50.)
- PANAGAPoulos, E. P. Editor. Alexander Hamilton's Pay Book. (Detroit: Wayne State University Press. 1961. Pp. xii, 128. $3.00.)
- PARKER, REGINALD. A Guide to Labor Law. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger, Inc. 1961. Pp. x, 134. Paper $1.75. Cloth $4.50.)
- PEFFER, E. LOUISE. The Argentine Cattle Industry under Peron. (Stanford: Food Research Institute Studies—reprinted from Vol. I. May 1960. No. 2. Pp. 33. Paper $1.00.)
- PENDLE, GEORGE. Argentina—2nd edition. (New York: Oxford University Press. 1961. Pp. 208. $4.00.)
- PERHAM, MARGERY. Lugard: The Years of Authority, Maker of Modern Nigeria. (London: Collins. 1960. Pp. xx, 748. $8.00.)
- PERKINS, BRADFORD. Prologue to War: England and the U. S., 1805–1812. (Berkeley: University of California Press. 1961. Pp. x, 457. $7.95.)
- PETERSEN, WILLIAM. Population. (New York: The Macmillan Co. 1961. Pp. xx, 652. $7.95.)
- PETROV, VLADIMIR. What China Policy? (Hamden: The Shoe String Press, Inc. 1961. Pp. x, 141. $4.50.)
- PHILADELPHIA ECONOMY LEAGUE. Philadelphia's Capital Programming Procedures. (Philadelphia: Economy League. Bureau of Municipal Research. 1961. Pp. xi, 76. Paper $2.00.)
- POLAK, FRED L. The Image of the Future. 2 vols. (New York: Oceana Publications. 1961. Pp. 456, 376. $12.50.)
- POWICKE, SIR MAURICE. The Loss of Normandy: Studies in the History of the Angevin Empire, 1189–1204. (New York: Barnes & Noble, Inc., 1961. First pub. in 1913. Pp. xv, 424. $9.00.)
- PUTNAM, CARLETON. Race and Reason. A Yankee View. (Washington: Public Affairs Press. 1961. Pp. viii, 125. $3.25.)
- RANKIN, ROBERT S. State Constitutions: Bill of Rights. (New York: National Municipal League. 1960. Pp. v, 20. Paper $0.75.)
- REDFORD, EMMETTE S. Congress Passes the Federal Aviation Act of 1958. (University: University of Alabama Press, Inter-University Case Program. 1961. Pp. 35. $0.50.)
- REUTER, PAUL. International Institutions. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger, Inc. 1961. Pp. 316. Paper $2.25. Cloth $5.50.)
- RICE, MADELEINE HOOKER. Federal Street Pastor: The Life of W. E. Channing. (New York: Bookman Associates, Inc. 1961. Pp. 360. $6.00.)
- RICH, BENNETT W. State Constitutions: The Governor. (New York: National Municipal League. 1960. Pp. iv, 33. Paper $1.00.)
- RIENOW, ROBERT. Contemporary International Politics. (New York: Thomas Y. Crowell Co. 1961. Pp. xvi, 431. $5.75.)
- RODENHAUSER, REINER AND RALPH R. NAPP. Breaking Down the Barrier. (Durham: The Seeman Printery, Inc. 1961. Pp. 145. $3.95.)
- ROOSEVELT, THEODORE. The New Nationalism. (Englewood Cliffs: Prentice-Hall, Inc. 1961. Pp. 173. Paper $1.95. Cloth $3.95.)
- RUBIN, SOL. Crime and Juvenile Delinquency: A Rational Approach to Penal Problems. 2nd edition. (New York: Oceana Publications, Inc. 1961. Pp. xix, 248. Paper $1.85. Cloth $5.00.)
- SALANT, WALTER S. AND VACCARA, BEATRICE N. Import Liberalization and Employment. (Washington, D.C.: The Brookings Institution. 1961. Pp. xix, 388. $6.75.)
- SAMUELSSON, KURT. Religion and Economic Action. (New York: Basic Books, Inc. 1961. Pp. xi, 156. $3.75.)
- SANFORD, CHARLES L. The Quest for Paradise. (Urbana: University of Illinois Press. 1961. Pp. 282. $5.00.)
- SCHNAPPER, M. B. Editor. New Frontiers of the Kennedy Administration: The Texts of the Task Force Reports Prepared for the President. (Washington, D.C.: Public Affairs Press. 1961. Pp. iv, 170. $3.75.)
- SCHUMAN, FREDERICK L. Government in the Soviet Union. (New York: Thomas Y. Crowell Co. 1961. Pp. xi, 190. Paper $1.95.)
- SCHUTZ, JOHN A. William Shirley—King's Governor of Massachusetts. (Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press. 1961. Pp. vii, 292. $6.00.)
- SCOTT, DEREK J. R. Russian Political Institutions. 2nd edition. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger. 1961. Pp. 205. Paper $2.25. Cloth $6.25.)
- SEIDENBERG, RODERICK. Anatomy of the Future. (Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press. 1961. Pp. 173. $3.50.)
- SETON-WATSON, HUGH. The East European Revolution. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger, Inc. 1961. Pp. xix, 435. Paper $2.25. $6.00.)
- SHACKLE, G. L. S. Decision, Order and Time in Human Affairs. (New York: Cambridge Uni- versity Press. 1961. Pp. xiv, 302. $6.50.)

- SHADOAN, A. T. Organization, Role and Staffing of State Budget Offices. (Lexington: Bureau of Business Research. University of Kentucky. 1961. Pp. vii, 172. Free. Paper.)
- SHENTON, JAMES P. Robert John Walker—A Politician from Jackson to Lincoln. (New York: Columbia University Press. 1961. Pp. xviii, 288. $6.00.)
- SLICHTER, SUMNER H. Economic Growth in the United States. (Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press. 1961. Pp. xi, 195. $5.00.)
- SMITH, ADAM. The Wealth of Nations. (New York: The Liberal Arts Press. 1961. Pp. xxviii, 310. Paper $1.45.)
- SMITH, T. V. AND DOBBINS, WILLIAM. Constructive Ethics. (Englewood Cliffs: Prentice-Hall, Inc. 1961. Pp. vi, 118. Paper $1.95.)
- SOREL, GEORGES. Reflections on Violence. (New York: Collier Books. 1961. Pp. 287. Paper $1.50.)
- SPILLER, ROBERT E. AND LARRABEE, ERIC. American Perspectives. (Cambridge: Harvard University Press. 1961. Pp. 211. $4.75.)
- SAHL, WALTER. Education for Democracy in West Germany. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger, Inc. 1961. Pp. xi, 356. $4.50.)
- STALEY, EUGENE. The Future of Underdeveloped Countries. (New York: Harper & Bros. 1961. Pp. xx, 483. Paper $2.50. Cloth $5.50.)
- STANTON, ROBERT. Forces For Freedom. (Washington: Public Affairs Press. 1961. Pp. 111. $3.25.)
- STAUDENRAUS, P. J. The African Colonization Movement 1816-65. (New York: Columbia University Press. 1961. Pp. ix, 323. $6.00.)
- STEBBINS, RICHARD P. The United States in World Affairs 1960. (New York: Harper & Bros. 1961. Pp. vii, 344. $6.00.)
- STEWART, MICHAEL. Modern Forms of Government. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger, Inc. 1961. Pp. 284. Paper $2.25. Cloth $5.75.)
- STILLINGER, JACK. Editor. Early Draft of John Stuart Mill's Autobiography. (Urbana: University of Illinois Press. 1961. Pp. 218. $5.50.)
- STRANG, LORD WILLIAM. Britain in World Affairs: The Fluctuation in Power and Influence from Henry VIII to Elizabeth II. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger, Inc. 1961. Pp. 416. Paper $2.25.)
- TANHAM, GEORGE K. Communist Revolutionary Warfare—The Vietminh in Indo-China. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger, Inc. 1961. Pp. x, 166. $5.00.)
- TAYLOR, A. J. P. Lloyd George (The Leslie Stephens Lecture). (New York: Cambridge University Press. 1961. Pp. 39. Paper $0.75.)
- TILLMAN, SETH P. Anglo-American Relations at the Paris Peace Conference of 1919. (Princeton: Princeton University Press. 1961. Pp. 442. $8.50.)
- TOMPKINS, DOROTHY CAMPBELL. Water Plans for California: A Bibliography. (Berkeley: University of California Bureau of Public Administration. 1961. Pp. vi, 180. $4.50.)
- TÖRNÜDD, KLAUS. Soviet Attitudes Towards Non-Military Regional Cooperation. (Copenhagen: Ejnar Munsgaards Forlag. 1961. Pp. 301. Mk 1500.)
- TOYNBEE, ARNOLD J. Between Oxus and Jumna—Journey in India, Pakistan, and Afghanistan. (New York: Oxford University Press. 1961. Pp. xii, 211. $5.00.)
- TRUMAN, HARRY S. Public Paper of the Presidents, Harry S. Truman, 1945. (Washington: United States Government Printing Office. 1961. Pp. 668. $5.50.)
- TURNER, FREDERICK JACKSON. Selected Essays: Frontier and Section. (Englewood Cliffs: Prentice-Hall, Inc. 1961. Pp. 171. Paper $1.95. Cloth $3.95.)
- UNESCO. International Bibliography of Political Science. (Paris: UNESCO; New York: Columbia University Press. 1961. Pp. 310. Paper $2.00.)
- UNION INTERPARLEMENTAIRE. Parlements. (Paris: Presses Universitaires de France. 1961. Pp. 318. Paper NF 18.)
- UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE, BUREAU OF THE CENSUS. Statistical Abstract of the United States, 1961. (Washington: United States Government Printing Office. 1961. Pp. xii, 995. $3.50.)
- VAN ALSTYNE, RICHARD. The Rising American Empire. (New York: Oxford University Press. 1960. Pp. ix, 215. $6.00.)
- VILLARI, SALVATORE. L' Elezione Del Presidente. (Milan: Dott. A. Giuffrè-Editore. 1961. Pp. 455. Paper)
- VOEGELIN, ERIC. Israel and Revelation. Vol. 1 xiv, 533. The World of the Polis. Vol. 2 xviii, 389. Plato and Aristotle. Vol. 3. Pp. xvii, 383. (Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press. 1958. $6.00 each.)
- VOSS, EARL. et al. The New Frontiersmen: Profiles of the Men Around Kennedy. (Washington, D. C.: Public Affairs Press. 1961. Pp. xix, 254. $4.50.)
- WADE, MASON. Editor. Canadian Dualism: La Dualité Canadienne. (Toronto: University of Toronto Press. 1960. Pp. xxv, 417. $8.50.)
- WALSH, VIVIAN CHARLES. Scarcity and Evil. (Englewood Cliffs: Prentice-Hall, Inc. 1961. Paper $1.95. Cloth $3.95.)
- WHITAKER, URBAN G. Editor. Democracies and International Relations: Can Ours Survive? 1961. (San Francisco: Chandler Publishing Co. Pp. xiv, 223. Paper $1.75.)

- WHITAKER, URBAN G. Editor. Nationalism and International Progress. (San Francisco: Chandler Publishing Co. 1961. Pp. xiv, 218. Paper $1.75.)
- WHITTEMORE, CHARLES P. A General of the Revolution—John Sullivan of New Hampshire. (New York: Columbia University Press. 1961. Pp. viii, 317. $6.00.)
- WILSON, THOMAS. Inflation. (Cambridge: Harvard University Press. 1961. Pp. 280. $5.50.)
- WILSON, WOODROW. The New Freedom. (Englewood Cliffs: Prentice-Hall, Inc. 1961. Pp. 173. Paper $1.95. Cloth $3.95.)
- WINTER, WILLIAM O. Director. Organization and Management of the Government of East St. Louis. (Carbondale: Local Government Center, Southern Illinois University. 1961. Pp. x5. Paper $2.00.)
- YAUKEY, DAVID. Fertility Differences in a Modernizing Country—A Survey of Lebanese Couples. (Princeton: Princeton University Press. 1961. Pp. xviii, 204. $4.00.)
- YESININ-VOLPIN, ALEKSANDR SERGEYEVICH. A Leaf of Spring. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger, Inc. 1961. Pp. 173. $3.00.)
- YOUNG, JAMES HARVEY. The Toadstool Millionaires. (Princeton: Princeton University Press. 1961. Pp. 282. $6.00.)

NEWS AND NOTES

ATHERTON PRESS PRIZE

The American Political Science Association announces the Atherton Press Prize of $1000 for the best original manuscript in the field of political science submitted in an annual competition.

Manuscripts must be no longer than 200,000 words, must be submitted this year prior to June 1, 1962, and are to be mailed to:

The American Political Science Association
Atherton Prize Committee
1726 Massachusetts Avenue, N.W.
Washington 6, D.C.

The manuscripts will be judged by an APSA Committee and the winner will be announced at the Annual Meeting of the Association in September, 1962. The Atherton Press will have first option on publication of manuscripts submitted for the prize. The American Political Science Association reserves the right to withhold the prize in 1962 if, in the opinion of the judges, no sufficiently meritorious manuscript is submitted.

PROGRAM NOTICE

Two special sessions for graduate students and younger instructors will be held at the annual meetings of the American Political Science Association in Washington, September 5-8, 1962. Harold D. Lasswell, Professor of Law and Political Science, Yale University, and Arnold Brecht, emeritus Professor of Political Science, New School for Social Research, will lead discussions and answer questions at sessions scheduled September 6 and 7.

The meetings will be restricted to younger political scientists in order that they may have a fuller opportunity to meet and talk with these leading members of the profession.

PROFESSIONAL CONFERENCES

The Eastern Regional Organization for Public Administration held the first meeting of its executive council in Tokyo in October, 1961, with a concurrent seminar on urban administration and economic and social development. Eleven states in the Asian region were represented: Australia, Republic of China, Japan, Republic of Korea, Laos, India, Indonesia, the Philippines, Thailand, UAR, Republic of Vietnam. The Vice-Minister of Home Affairs, Yosoji Kobayashi of Japan, chaired the seminar. The United Nations was represented by Brigadier S. T. Divers (on duty in Nepal). Some twenty national and international associations were represented, including the International Institute of Administrative Sciences, International Union of Local Authorities, International Federation for Housing and Planning and American Society for Public Administration. Dr. Luther H. Gulick, chairman of the institute of public administration, was an active participant.

Working papers were debated in some seven sessions, on Metropolitan Administration (Australia), City Administration and Citizen Participation (India), and Local Government and Economic Development (Japan).

EROPA hopes to present in one volume the papers and debates of this Seminar and of the First General Assembly (Manila, 1960) on Strengthening Local Government for Social and Economic Development.

The theme for the Second General Assembly (October, 1962, probably in Thailand) will be Personnel. Working papers commissioned are: "Organization for Civil Service" (Philippines); "Training of Government Officials for Economic Development" (Thailand); "Academic Preparation of Government Officials" (Republic of China).

EROPA resolved to express its continuing interest in Asian local government by seeking to establish a Local Government Center in conjunction with the Local Autonomy College in Tokyo.

Individuals outside the Asian Region are eligible for corresponding membership. Dues of U.S. $2.50 may be sent to the Secretary General, Dr. Carlos Ramos, Box 474, Manila, Philippines.

The Council Meeting of the International Federation for Housing and Planning attracted over 130 delegates from more than 20 countries to Santiago de Compostela, Spain, 2-9 September. This shrine of pilgrimage was the appropriate setting for debate of one of the principal themes: The Preservation and Use of Urban Monuments and Historic Areas. Prof. W. Ostrowski, Poland, presented a wide-ranging general report; excellent country reports were presented from Italy, Spain and Yugoslavia. The Federation set up a standing committee on Historic Buildings, with Prof. Ostrowski as chairman, to focus continuing international attention upon the problem.

The other theme: The Modernization of Existing Housing—Technical and Financial Limitations, was introduced by Dr. Ing. Bernhard Düttmann, of Düsseldorf. The recommendations resulting from the debates were referred to a newly created standing committee on urban renewal, of which Dr. George S. Duggar of the University of Pittsburgh is chairman. Members from 18 countries were identified during the meeting; others will be added.

Other standing committees had profitable sessions, including those on Professional Planners (S. J. van Embden, Netherlands, chairman); Rent and Family Income (L. Wynen, Belgium, chairman); Regional Planning (E. Parent, Belgium, chairman); Planning Education (F. Violich, acting chairman); International Glossary (H. Calsat, France, chairman); Housing Societies (M. Langlet, France, acting chairman); Traffic, (S. Dziewulski, Poland, chairman).

The Council heard reports of progress in preparation for the 26th Congress, to be held in Paris, 2-8 September, 1962, for which the American Institute of Planners is organizing two charter flights. The Council accepted the invitation of Israel to be host to the 27th Congress in 1964.

Participants from the U.S.A. were Francis Violich, University of California; Charles S. Ascher, representative of IFHP at U.N.; Miss Cynthia Gubernick, who will serve an internship at IFHP headquarters as a Fulbright fellow; and Miss Constance Perin of Cambridge, Mass. Carlos Contreras, vice-president of IFHP from Mexico also attended.

The Round Table of the International Institute of Administrative Sciences in Lisbon, 11-16 September, attracted over 120 participants from 40 countries and 5 international organizations. The stated purpose of the debates was to help the General Reporters perfect their reports for the Congress to be held in 1962. For the theme, "Government Organization for Economic Development," the General Reporter, Professor G. Treves (Italy) had reports from the U.S.A. drafted by Gerhard Colm, National Planning Association, and Harvey Perloff, Resources for the Future, Inc., and from Puerto Rico drafted by Martin Clapp and Juan Labadie Eurite of the Puerto Rico Chapter of the American Society for Public Administration. Both of these reports had been subjected to critical review by special panels at the ASPA Conference at Philadelphia in April.

On the theme, "Experience with Technical Cooperation," the General Reporter, M. Vranken (Belgium) had a report from U.S.A. prepared by G. Wm. Lawson and associates at I.C.A., similarly reviewed at Philadelphia. The third theme, "Government Publications as an Element of Public Relations" had no report from U.S.A. Sir John Simpson (U.K.) served as chairman, Mme. Suzanne Honoré (France) as Reporter.

The standing Committee on Administrative Practices met under the chairmanship of G. W. Lawson, in place of Wm. F. Finan. The Scientific Committee, chaired by Henry Puget (France) had Dwight Waldo as U.S.A. member in place of Rowland Egger. Both Committees made proposals to strengthen the work of the Institute. Other committees meeting during the crowded working days included the Editorial Board of the International Review of Administrative Sciences, L. Lopez Rodó (Spain) chairman; the Committee on Contracts, Roger Grégoire (France) chairman, vice André Molitor (Belgium); the Committee on Comparative Administrative Cases, G. A. van Poelje (Netherlands) chairman, on which C. S. Ascher sat as alternate for Walter Gellhorn, member from U.S.A.

The Council of Administration, representing members states and national sections, adopted revisions of the statutes modifying the cycle of meetings to provide only one interim meeting between triennial Congresses and consequential changes in the powers of the Executive Committee and the Council to render more effective the conduct of the affairs of the Institute.

Under the leadership of Dean Donald C. Stone of Pittsburgh, some 48 persons responsible for training administrators in more than 30 national institutions met for the first time to set the stage for continued collaboration and exchanges on common problems.

The Congress of 1962—an open meeting to which all interested persons are invited—will be held probably in the second half of July, at a place in Europe to be announced.

The 19th Annual Institute on World Affairs, under the direction of Professor Minos Generales, was held August 7-25, 1961 at San Diego State College. With the theme being "Coexistence," the Institute's academic speakers included: Ross Berkes, U.S.C.; Eugene Burdick, U.C.; Arthur S. Flemming, Oregon; Constantine Generales, New York Medical College; L. F. E. Goldie, U.C.; Paul Hadley, U.S.C.; John Hutchinson, Claremont Graduate School; Amos Jordan, U.S.M.A.; Karlin & Capper-Johnson, Lewis and Clark; James Kitchen, S.D.S.C.; Joseph Lauwerys, London; Deane Malott, Cornell; Charles Martin, Washington; Hans Morgenthau, Chicago; Fred Neal, Claremont Graduate School; Peter Rohn, Claremont Men's College; Robert Scalapino, U.C.; Charles Schleicher, Oregon; Edward Stainbrook, U.S.C.; Julian Towster, U.C.; Urban Whitaker, S.F.S.C.

Other speakers included: Brutus Coste, Assembly of Captive Nations; Kenneth Dadzie, Ghana; John Denson, United Kingdom; Avraham Harman, Israel; Roger Hilsman, State Department; John McNaughton, Defense Department; Frank McCulloch, Los Angeles Times, Myron Rush, RAND.

The fifth annual meeting of the Missouri Political Science Association was held at the University of Missouri, Columbia, on October 13, 1961. Sessions were devoted to politics in council-managing cities, the politics of public education, and ethics in government. George A. Bell, assistant state budget director, was elected president of the association for 1962. The association now comprises 140 members.

A Mid-America Assembly on the topic "The Secretary of State" was held at the University of Missouri on November 16-19, 1961, under the co-sponsorship of that university and the American Assembly. Sixty persons prominent in business, government, and professional circles were in attendance. Principal addresses were delivered by Harlan Cleveland of the Department of State and Norman A. Graebner of the University of Illinois.

A section on War and Peace Studies will be included in the 1962 annual meetings of the American Sociological Association to take place in Washington, D.C., at the end of August. Persons interested in submitting papers should contact the Chairman of the session, Professor Amitai Etzioni, at Columbia University.

OTHER ACTIVITIES

The University of Michigan has received a grant of approximately $3,000,000 from the Ford Foundation to be spent over the next ten years in area and international studies. The terms of the grant provide for a total of $1,800,000 for the Chinese, Japanese and Middle Eastern Centers for the ten year period. $500,000 of the grant is to be divided over the next five years by the Russian Studies and Southern Asian Centers for the development of research and graduate instructional programs. The remaining $700,000 is to be spent over the next five years chiefly by the Law School, Business School, Center for Economic Development, and Center for Conflict Resolution in research and graduate instruction in international studies.

Under State Department contract, Indiana University is playing host to a group of chairmen of Indian political science departments during 1962—February, March and April. Following study, observation, and discussions at Indiana University, each visitor will spend some time on several other campuses. While in Bloomington, the Indian political scientists will also present a public lecture series and assist in an Indian Government and Politics course conducted by Richard F. Crabbs who is coordinating the special program. The Indian visitors are: Narayan R. Deshpande, Nagpur University; Avadh Behari Lal, Allahabad University; Indra D. Sharma, Punjab University; Abdulkarim H. Somjee, University of Baroda; Hari Shanker Srivastava, Gorakhpur University; Kopparti V. Rao, Utkal University; V. Venkata Rao, Gauhati University.

The Mershon National Security Center at Ohio State University awarded the 1961 prize of $2,500 for the best book-length manuscript on national security submitted in 1961 to George Stambuk, department of government, Indiana University.

Arthur H. Dean, President of the American Society of International Law, announced that the Society has received a grant of $500,000 from the Ford Foundation, and will now undertake long-term studies on the legal aspects of arms control and disarmament, foreign investment and economic development, space activities, and federalism in the emerging nations.

Ambassador Dean is the Chairman of the U.S. delegation at the nuclear test ban conference in Geneva and a member of the U.S. delegation to the United Nations for the current session of the General Assembly. He is senior partner of the New York law firm of Sullivan and Cromwell.

The Ford Foundation grant will be used to expand the activities of the 55-year-old Society, known for its annual meetings and its American Journal of International Law, which goes to 5000 members and subscribers in 91 countries around the world.

Charles S. Ascher of Brooklyn College has been elected president of the conference of non-governmental organizations with consultative status at the U.N. He chaired a meeting of its bureau in Geneva in August, 1961.

George M. Belknap has accepted appointment as visiting associate professor of government at Dartmouth College.

Paul C. Bartholomew, professor of political science at the University of Notre Dame, served during the past summer as a consultant to the Republican National Committee at its headquarters in Washington, D. C. in the current reorganization under the new chairman, Representative William E. Miller of New York.

Martin Birnbach, formerly of the University of Puerto Rico, has been appointed visiting instructor at the University of Nebraska.

Herbert W. Briggs, Goldwin Smith Professor of International Law at Cornell University and Editor-in-Chief of the American Journal of International Law, was recently elected by the United Nations to be a member of the U.N. International Law Commission.

Zbigniew Brzezinski of Columbia participated in the Wilton Park Conference held in November in England. This year the subject of the conference was "The Western Alliance and 'Competitive Co-existence'."

Frederic N. Cleaveland, chairman of the department of political science, University of North Carolina, participated in a conference in Santiago, Chile, from September 24 through October 7, 1961. The conference was jointly sponsored by the Inter-American Development Bank and the Latin American faculty of the social sciences (FLACSO). Professor Cleaveland served as a consultant for the public administration program.

Walter C. Clemens, who received his Ph.D. from Columbia University (Russian Institute) has been appointed acting assistant professor at University of California, Santa Barbara, for 1961-1962.

Percy E. Corbett, professor of foreign affairs at the University of Virginia gave the address at the Founder's Day Convocation at McGill University on October 6. McGill University conferred the honorary degree of D.C.L. on Professor Corbett on the same occasion.

Martin David Dubin, assistant professor of political science, has been awarded a 1961-1962 Roosevelt University faculty fellowship with leave to do research in Great Britain, the Netherlands and Switzerland, on the theory and history of international organization.

The University of Idaho's Borah Foundation Lecturer during the first semester of 1961-1962 was Francisco Garcia-Amador, former Cuban Ambassador and presently a consultant for the Pan American Union. The theme of this series of lectures was "Democratic Counteroffensive in Latin America."

Ralph M. Goldman of Michigan State University is visiting professor of political science at the University of Chicago for the academic year 1961-1962.

Franz B. Gross of Pennsylvania Military College is serving as a visiting associate professor at the University of Pennsylvania in the political science department.

George Y. Harvey of the University of Missouri has been appointed, by Secretary Ribicoff, chairman of a second citizens advisory committee to study the Food and Drug Administration and make recommendations to the Department of Health, Education and Welfare and to the Administration.

Russell H. Fifield of the University of Michigan has been appointed secretary of the association for Asian studies and a member of its executive committee.

John N. Hazard, professor of public law and government at Columbia University, has been spending 1961-62 at the Center for Advanced Study in the Behavioral Sciences, and will serve as visiting professor of political science at the University of California, Berkeley, during the spring semester, 1962.

Robert J. Horgan, chairman of the political science department at Clarke College in Dubuque, Iowa, was elected November 8 to the Dubuque City Council, for a term of four years.

Will Irwin, Colorado State University, is associate director for the Citizenship Clearing House, 1961-62.

Stephen P. Koff, assistant professor of political science at the Maxwell Graduate School of Citizenship and Public Affairs, Syracuse University, has been granted a two-year leave of absence in order to become resident administrator of the Syracuse semester in Italy program.

Fred Krinsky, associate professor at the Maxwell School of Citizenship and Public Affairs, Syracuse University, is a visiting associate professor in political science at the University of Southern California for the academic year 1961-62. Mr. Krinsky replaces Professor Carlton C. Rodee, who is on sabbatical leave.

Leslie Lipson, professor of political science at the University of California at Berkeley, is serving as acting executive secretary of the institute of international studies of the University, during 1961-62.

Vernon McKay, professor of African studies at the Johns Hopkins School of Advanced International Studies in Washington, D. C., was elected president of the African Studies Association at the annual meeting held in New York City, October 20-22. He also served as conference chairman for the Eighth National Conference of the United States National Commission for UNESCO in Boston, October 22-26. This conference, attended by 2000 U.S. and African delegates, dealt with the theme, "Africa and the United States—Images and Realities." While in Boston, Dr. McKay was elected a member of the executive committee of the United States National Commission for UNESCO.

Roy Macridis, professor of political science at Washington University is on leave during 1961-62 studying the Fifth Republic in France under a grant from the Rockefeller Foundation.

Laurence Martin has been appointed as visiting associate professor in European Diplomacy at the school of advanced international studies of Johns Hopkins University, located in Washington, D. C. Dr. Martin has also been appointed a research associate at the Washington Center of Foreign Policy Research, which is affiliated with the School of Advanced International Studies.

Robert Moses of New York City presented the second annual lecture in The Herman G. James Lectures on Municipal Government at Ohio University on November 9, 1961. This lectureship was established a year ago in honor of Dr. James, a former president of Ohio University.

Morris S. Ogul, assistant professor of political science, has been appointed senior research associate at the administrative science center at the University of Pittsburgh, for the 1961-1962 academic year.

Robert C. Osgood has been appointed as visiting professor of American Diplomacy and research associate of the Washington Center of foreign policy research at the School of Advanced International Studies of Johns Hopkins University, located in Washington, D. C. He is on leave from the University of Chicago where he is professor of political science and research associate of the Center for the study of American foreign policy.

Joseph A. Peters, assistant professor of government and history, of Beaver College is serving as lecturer at the University of Pennsylvania in the political science department.

Robert J. Pitchell, acting director of the Bureau of government research at Indiana University has been named editor of the Indiana Municipal Manual; the first annual edition is scheduled for publication in March of 1962.

Vasant D. Rao of the University of Bombay is visiting lecturer in political science and history, San Diego State College.

S. Grover Rich, professor of political science and director of the Institute of International Studies, University of Utah, is on leave during the academic year 1961-62 while serving as professor of foreign affairs on the faculty of the National War College in Washington, D. C.

Carlton C. Rodee of the University of Southern California, is on sabbatical leave for the academic year of 1961-62.

E. E. Schattschneider, emeritus professor of government at Wesleyan University, is teaching during the 1961-62 academic year in Wesleyan's experimental college of social studies.

Charles P. Schleicher, professor of political science at the University of Oregon is acting department head for the current year during the absence of E. S. Wengert, who is on leave, concluding a study of the Agency of International Development for the Inter-University Case Program.

Paul Seabury, associate professor of political science at the University of California, Berkeley, is on sabbatical leave during the fall of 1961, and holds a Guggenheim Fellowship during spring, 1962.

Glenn Tinder of the University of Massachusetts will spend the year 1961-62 on sabbatical.

Frank N. Trager, professor of international affairs, New York University, is serving as a visiting professor of political science at the National War College, Washington, D. C. during 1961-62. He will also, for the third year in succession, be in charge of the course on southeast Asia at the Army War College, Carlisle Barracks, Pennsylvania.

Robert C. Tucker has been appointed as visiting professor of Soviet affairs at the school of advanced international studies of Johns Hopkins University. Dr. Tucker has also been appointed a research associate at the Washington Center of Foreign Policy Research, which is affiliated with the school of advanced international studies in Washington. He is on leave from the University of Indiana where he is professor of government.

Maurice Waters has received a two year appointment as visiting assistant professor at Antioch College.

York Willbern, director of the bureau of government research at Indiana University, is engaged in a special research project for the year 1961-62 with a grant from the Social Science Research Council. Robert J. Pitchell, associate director of the Bureau, is serving as acting director.

Sheldon Wolin, associate professor of political science at the University of California, Berkeley, is on leave for the year 1961-62.

APPOINTMENTS AND STAFF CHANGES

Stanley V. Anderson, who received both a law degree and his Ph.D. from the University of California, Berkeley, has been appointed assistant professor of political science at the University of California, Santa Barbara.

Paul M. Bernstein has been appointed instructor in the political science department, University of Pennsylvania.

Thompson Black, formerly head of the department of government, has been promoted to chairman of the social sciences division at Los Angeles State College.

Donald Bray upon completion of his Ph.D. at Stanford, has accepted an appointment as assistant professor at Los Angeles State College.

H. Carl Camp has been appointed as assistant professor at Tulane.

William G. Carleton has been appointed professor emeritus of political science at the University of Florida to enable him to devote full time to a program of research, writing and lecturing.

Daniel S. Cheever has been appointed associate professor in the department of political science and in the graduate school of public and international affairs at the University of Pittsburgh.

Milton Colvin, formerly of Vanderbilt University and the University of Chicago, has accepted an appointment as associate professor of political science at Washington and Lee University.

Frank Dinka has been appointed as associate professor at Southwest Missouri State College, Springfield, Missouri.

Clair Doubrovsky has become a member of the department of political science at Mount Holyoke.

George S. Duggar has been named associate professor of Municipal-Metropolitan Affairs at the University of Pittsburgh.

Eugene P. Dvorin has been promoted to associate professor and appointed head of the government department at Los Angeles State College.

Milton Feder has been promoted to associate professor of government at Beloit College.

Martin Fleisher, has been appointed assistant professor of political science at Brooklyn College.

John F. Gallagher, formerly of UCLA, has been appointed acting assistant professor of political science in the University of California at Davis.

Betty Glad has been appointed instructor in the department of political science at Brooklyn College.

Edward M. Goldberg who taught at San Diego State College last year, has been appointed assistant professor at Los Angeles State College.

Walter Goldstein, has been appointed assistant professor of political science at Brooklyn College.

Elisha Greifer, formerly of Vassar College, is director of the Argentine-North American Cultural Institute, Tucuman, Argentina. This was facilitated by a grant from the United States Information Agency.

Jean Grossholtz has joined the department at Mount Holyoke as instructor.

John M. De Grove has been promoted from assistant professor to associate professor of political science at the University of Florida.

Myron Q. Hale has been appointed an assistant professor at the Ohio State University.

William J. Hanna, joined the department in January, 1961, as an instructor at Michigan State.

Alice Henkin has been appointed instructor in the political science department, University of Pennsylvania.

Henry Janssen has been promoted to professor, San Diego State College.

James D. Johnson has joined the department of government, University of Oklahoma, as an instructor.

Ned V. Joy has been promoted to professor, San Diego State College.

Will Irwin has been promoted to associate professor of political science at Colorado State University.

Richard C. C. Kim of the University of Oklahoma, has been appointed assistant professor of government at Hardin-Simmons University, in Abilene, Texas.

William R. Kintner has been appointed professor of political science at the Wharton School of Finance and Commerce of the University of Pennsylvania.

Stanley Kochanek has been appointed instructor in the political science department, University of Pennsylvania.

Merle Kling has been promoted to professor of political science at Washington University, St. Louis, Missouri.

James R. Klonoski, formerly research associate at Brookings Institution, has been appointed assistant professor of political science at the University of Oregon.

William O. Lewis, doctoral candidate at the University of Oregon, has been appointed instructor in political science at the University of Idaho.

Victor T. LeVine has been appointed assistant professor of political science at Washington University, St. Louis, Missouri.

Noah Lucatz has been appointed assistant professor at Southern Illinois University, East St. Louis campus.

Robert A. Lystad has been appointed as associate professor of African studies at the School of Advanced International Studies of Johns Hopkins University located in Washington, D. C.

Austin F. Macdonald, returned in August, 1961, as professor of political science at the University of California, Berkeley.

Joseph C. McKenna, S.J. has been appointed chairman of Fordham University's department of political philosophy and government.

Ruth McQuown has been appointed assistant professor of political science at the University of Florida.

Gerard J. Mangone of the Maxwell Graduate School of Citizenship and Public Affairs, Syracuse University, has been appointed executive assistant to Dean Stephen K. Bailey, Maxwell School.

Henry L. Mason has been promoted to the rank of full professor of political science at Tulane.

Warner E. Mills, Jr. has been promoted to associate professor of government at Beloit College.

Steven Muller has been appointed associate director for Cornell University's new Center for International Studies.

Edwin B. Morrell, who is completing his doctoral dissertation at Harvard University, has been named assistant professor of political science at Brigham Young University.

Lloyd D. Musolf, recently returned from Saigon, and has been promoted to the rank of professor at Michigan State.

Charles R. Naef has been made instructor in political science at Colgate University.

Felix Nigro has been appointed professor of political science, San Diego State College.

John Norman, professor of history and government at Fairfield University was chairman of a bipartisan Fairfield Charter Revision Commission (1960-1961). -

Frederic D. Ogden, formerly of the University of Alabama, has accepted a position as head, with rank of professor, of the recently established department of political science at Eastern Kentucky State College.

Felix Oppenheim has been appointed professor of government at the University of Massachusetts.

Don Piper, Duke University, is a research associate at Duke University for 1961-62.

John W. Price has been appointed assistant professor of political science at the University of Florida.

J. Harris Proctor has been promoted to associate professor at Duke University.

Eugene Pyziur, who received his doctorate in June at Notre Dame University, has been appointed an assistant professor of political science at St. Louis University.

Peter Remec of Fordham University has been advanced to the rank of associate professor of international law.

David RePass is now instructor in political science at Mount Holyoke.

Richard F. Schier, who has been on leave for the past year, returned to Franklin and Marshall College as associate professor and chairman of the department of government.

Edward V. Schten joined the staff of the bureau of government of the University of Wisconsin on November 1, 1961 as an assistant professor of political science and as an assistant director of the Bureau. He will be in charge of the Education and Training activities of the Bureau at Milwaukee.

John W. Schwada, recently Comptroller and Budget Director for the State of Missouri, has returned to the University of Missouri as dean of faculties and acting dean of the school of business and public administration.

Robert A. Scalapino, professor of political science at the University of California, Berkeley, assumed the chairmanship of the department in February, 1962, on his return from leave.

John C. Sherry has been promoted to professor, social sciences, at Pace College.

K. H. Silvert has accepted appointment as professor of government at Dartmouth College. He will also continue to serve as a senior associate of the American Universities Field Staff.

Marshall Singer has been appointed assistant professor of political science at Brooklyn College.

Baljit Singh has joined the department as an assistant professor at Michigan State University.

George Stambuk has been appointed assistant professor of government at Indiana University.

T. Noel Stern, former president of West Chester State College in Pennsylvania, has been appointed research associate in the bureau of government research at Indiana University.

James A. Storing, professor of political science has been appointed to be dean of faculty, Colgate University, beginning in the fall, 1961-62.

Harry P. Stumpf has been named instructor in political science at Colorado State University.

Ivan Taborsky is now instructor in government at Arlington (Texas) State College.

Phillip B. Taylor, Jr. has been appointed as associate professor of Latin American Studies at the school of advanced international studies of Johns Hopkins University, located in Washington, D. C.

Manoucher Vahdat is presently employed at Northwestern State College, Alva, Oklahoma as associate professor of political science.

Ferenc Vali, formerly professor of international law, University of Budapest, Hungary, and recently research associate at the Harvard Center for International Studies, has been appointed associate professor of government at the University of Massachusetts.

William R. Vizzard, Jr., has joined the department of government, University of Oklahoma, as an assistant professor.

Tully Warren has been promoted to associate professor at Los Angeles State College.

Wilfred D. Webb of the University of Texas has been named associate dean of the College of Arts and Sciences.

Alex Weilenmann, University of Zurich, has been appointed assistant professor of political science at the University of Oregon.

Herbert R. Winter has been appointed assistant professor of political science at Hartwick College.

David M. Wood has been promoted to assistant professor at the University of Missouri.

IN MEMORIAM

SELDEN GALE LOWRIE, age 77, died on November 2, 1961, in Cincinnati. He was born in Mt. Sterling, Illinois, and educated at Knox College, the University of Illinois and the University of Wisconsin. He had become in 1912 a member of the faculty of the University of Cincinnati, and there he had for forty years served as a teacher and head of the Department of Political Science. During those years he had been active also as a consultant and adviser in connection with matters of local and state concern in the fields of legislation and administration.

In World War I he served as a Captain, U. S. Army, with assignments in Washington. In 1919 he served as a representative of the Red Cross in Turkey. Thereafter he travelled in the Far East and lectured in colleges in China. Later he lectured at Clark University, at Syracuse University, and, on a Fulbright grant, at the University of Hawaii.

A member of Phi Beta Kappa and of Phi Delta Theta, author of The Budget and of many articles in professional journals, admitted to the Bar in 1921, he was long active in the American Political Science Association and in the Cincinnati branch of the Foreign Policy Association. His interest in legal and political developments persisted up to the moment of his last and very brief illness.

The Gale and the Lowrie families were intimately connected with the founding and the early development of Galesburg, Illinois, and of Knox College.—STANLEY K. HORNBECK

OFFICERS OF THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE ASSOCIATION

President

CHARLES S. HYNEMAN
Indiana University

President-Elect

CARL J. FRIEDRICH
Harvard University

Vice Presidents

GABRIEL A. ALMOND
Yale University

C. HERMAN PRITCHETT
University of Chicago

DWIGHT WALDO
University of California

Secretary

MARIAN IRISH
Florida State University

Treasurer

MAX M. KAMPELMAN
Washington, D. C.

Executive Director

EVRON M. KIRKPATRICK
1726 Massachusetts Ave., N. W.
Washington 6, D. C.

Assistant Director

JOHN G. STEWART

Managing Editor, APSR

HARVEY C. MANSFIELD
The Ohio State University

COUNCIL

Above-named Officers ec officiis

LAWRENCE DURISCH
Tennessee Valley Authority
WILLIAM O. FARBER
University of South Dakota
IVAN H. HINDERAKER
University of California, Los Angeles
JOHN T. HOLDEN
University of New Hampshire
GLADYS M. KAMMERER
University of Florida
RICHARD C. SNYDER
Northwestern University
KENNETH W. THOMPSON
Rockefeller Foundation
JOHN D. WILLIAMS
University of Utah

ALFRED DEGRAZIA
New York University
JOHN HALLOWELL
Duke University
SIGMUND NEUMANN
Wesleyan University
LEO C. RIETHMAYER
University of Colorado
LESTER G. SELIGMAN
University of Oregon
VERNON VAN DYKE
State University of Iowa
ROBERT E. WARD
University of Michigan
BRYCE WOOD
Social Science Research Council

FORMER PRESIDENTS

FRANK J. GOODNOW
ALBERT SHAW
FREDERIC N. JUDSON
JAMES BRYCE
A. LAWRENCE LOWELL
WOODROW WILSON
SIMEON E. BALDWIN
ALBERT BUSHNELL HART
W. W. WILLOUGHBY
JOHN BASSETT MOORE
ERNST FREUND
JESSE MACY
MUNROE SMITH
HENRY JONES FORD
PAUL S. REINSCH
LEO S. ROWE
WILLIAM A. DUNNING
HARRY A. GARFIELD
JAMES W. GARNER

CHARLES E. MERRIAM
CHARLES A. BEARD
WILLIAM B. MUNRO
JESSE S. REEVES
JOHN A. FAIRLIE
BENJAMIN F. SHAMBAUGH
EDWARD S. CORWIN
WILLIAM F. WILLOUGHBY
ISIDOR LOEB
WALTER J. SHEPARD
FRANCIS W. COKER
ARTHUR N. HOLCOMBE
THOMAS REED POWELL
CLARENCE A. DYKSTRA
CHARLES GROVE HAINES
ROBERT C. BROOKS
FREDERIC A. OGG
WILLIAM ANDERSON

ROBERT E. CUSHMAN
LEONARD D. WHITE
JOHN M. GAUS
WALTER F. DODD
ARTHUR W. MACMAHON
HENRY R. SPENCER
QUINCY WRIGHT
JAMES POLLOCK
PETER H. ODEGARD
LUTHER H. GULICK
PENDLETON HERRING
RALPH J. BUNCHE
CHARLES MCKINLEY
HAROLD D. LASSWELL
E. E. SCHATTSCHEIDER
V. O. KEY, JR.
R. TAYLOR COLE
CARL B. SWISHER
EMMETTE S. REDFORD

Purchase of Back Issues of THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW

The American Political Science Association, 1726 Massachusetts Avenue, N.W., Washington 6, D.C., will buy the following issues of the Review for $1.00 each:

Vol.	No.	Date	Vol.	No.	Date
1	1	November, 1906	30	2	April, 1936
1	2	February, 1907	30	3	June, 1936
1	3	May, 1907	30	4	August, 1936
1	4	August, 1907	30	5	October, 1936
2	Title page and Contents		30	6	December, 1936
		1907-1908	31	1	February, 1937
2	1	November, 1907	31	2	April, 1937
2	2	February, 1908	31	4	August, 1937
2	3	May, 1908	31	5	October, 1937
2	4	November, 1908	34	1	February, 1940
3	1	February, 1909	34	2	April, 1940
3	2	May, 1909	34	5	October, 1940
3	3	August, 1909	34	6	December, 1940
3	4	November, 1909	35	1	February, 1941
4	1	February, 1910	37	3	June, 1943
4	2	May, 1910	37	4	August, 1943
4	3	August, 1910	37	5	October, 1943
4	4	November, 1910	37	6	December, 1943
5	1	February, 1911	37	Title page and Index
5	2	May, 1911			1943
5	3	August, 1911	38	1	February, 1944
5	4	November, 1911	38	2	April, 1944
10	1	February, 1916	38	3	June, 1944
10	2 (1-2-3)	May, 1916	38	4	August, 1944
10	3	August, 1916	38	5	October, 1944
11	1	February, 1917	39	1	February, 1945
11	3	August, 1917	39	2	April, 1945
		(Supplement)	39	3	June, 1945
12	1	February, 1918	39	4	August, 1945
18	4	November, 1924	39	5	October, 1945
19	1	February, 1925	40	1	February, 1946
19	2	May, 1925	40	2	April, 1946
19	3	August, 1925	40	3	June, 1946
19	4	November, 1925	40	4	August, 1946
21	1	February, 1927	40	5	October, 1946
21	2	May, 1927	41	1	February, 1947
21	4	November, 1927	42	1	February, 1948
22	1	February, 1928	42	2	April, 1948
22	4	November, 1928	42	3	June, 1948
23	2	May, 1929	42	5	October, 1948
23	3	August, 1929	43	1	February, 1949
23	4	November, 1929	43	2	April, 1949
24	4	November, 1930	44	1	March, 1950
25	1	February, 1931	44	3	September, 1950
25	4	November, 1931			(Supplement)
26	1	February, 1932	46	1	March, 1952
28	1	February, 1934	46	2	June, 1952
28	3	June, 1934	46	3	September, 1952
28	4	August, 1934	48	1	March, 1954
28	5	October, 1934	48	2	June, 1954
28	6	December, 1934	49	1	March, 1955
29	1	February, 1935	49	2	June, 1955
29	2	April, 1935	49	3	September, 1955
29	3	June, 1935	49	4	December, 1955
29	4	August, 1935	51	1	March, 1957
29	5	October, 1935	51	4	December, 1957
29	6	December, 1935	52	1	March, 1958
30	1	February, 1936	53	1	March, 1959

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

Announcement of the 1962 APSA
ANNUAL MEETING

The Executive Committee of the Association again has voted to extend the length of the Annual Meeting to a four-day period—September 5 through September 8, 1962. The Mayflower Hotel will serve as Annual Meeting headquarters.

Byrum E. Carter, Department of Government, Indiana University, is Chairman of the 1962 Annual Meeting Program Committee. His Committee is composed of the following:

POLITICAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL THEORY: Professor David Smith, Department of Political Science, Swarthmore College, Swarthmore, Pennsylvania.

AMERICAN POLITICAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL THEORY: Professor James Prothro, Department of Political Science, University of North Carolina, Chapel Hill, North Carolina.

COMPARATIVE GOVERNMENT: Professor Lucian Pye, Department of Political Science, Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Cambridge, Massachusetts.

NATIONAL GOVERNMENT: Mr. Charles L. Clapp, Brookings Institution, Washington, D.C.

STATE AND LOCAL GOVERNMENT: Professor Ethan Allen, Department of Political Science, University of Kansas, Lawrence, Kansas.

POLITICAL PARTIES: Professor James Robinson, Department of Political Science, Northwestern University, Evanston, Illinois.

PUBLIC ADMINISTRATION: Professor Vincent Ostrom, Department of Political Science, University of California at Los Angeles, Los Angeles, California.

INTERNATIONAL POLITICS: Professor Vernon Van Dyke, Department of Political Science, University of Iowa, Iowa City, Iowa.

SPECIAL GRADUATE SEMINARS: Professor Howard Penniman, Department of Government, Georgetown University, Washington, D.C.

PANEL ON POLITICS AND FICTION: Professor Alex Gottfried, Department of Political Science, University of Washington, Seattle, Washington.

(A Preliminary Program will be mailed to APSA members in May)

BOOKS

THE POLITICAL FOUNDATIONS OF INTERNATIONAL LAW

by MORTON A. KAPLAN and NICHOLAS DEB. KATZENBACH, both of The University of Chicago

"It is excellent. It is the most sensible textbook on international law I've seen for a long while."

—Frederick S. Dunn, Bryn Mawr College

"A well-integrated and solid treatise absorbing what the traditional approach has to offer and yet producing a fresh, original, realistic and modern system of analysis."

—The American Behavioral Scientist

"Kaplan and Katzenbach make two especial contributions that I should like to identify at once. First, [the book] demonstrates the value of systems analysis for the study of international law. . . . Second, without sacrificing the sophistication of the legal realists, [the authors] manage to restore one's confidence in the capacity of legal norms to generate stable limits. . . . Political Foundations strikes me as almost certain to exercise a helpful influence upon serious thinking about international law in the generation ahead. Not many books give occasion for such a prediction."

—Richard A. Falk, World Politics

1961

372 pages

$6.95

Send for an examination copy.

JOHN WILEY & SONS, Inc.

440 Park Avenue South

New York 16, N.Y.

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

CITIZENS AS SOVEREIGNS

PAUL H. APPLEBY

Foreword by W. AVERELL HARRIMAN

An "old pro" in government and politics turns an X-ray eye on the American citizen and what he thinks about his government, examining fact and popular fancy about government structure, the national debt, the "welfare state," the press, political parties, and the citizen's role in our democracy. An important book written with barbed good humor, this is recommended reading for courses in Citizenship and for every citizen old enough to vote.

Paul Appleby has served as Undersecretary of Agriculture under F.D.R., Director of Budget for New York State under Averell Harriman, and Dean of the Maxwell Graduate School of Citizenship and Public Affairs at Syracuse University. He has been a newspaper publisher and is the author of many books in the field of government.

$5.50

SOVIET POTENTIALS: A GEOGRAPHIC APPRAISAL

GEORGE B. CRESSEY

An international authority surveys the assets and liabilities of Soviet geography—land, raw materials, people—in relation to the political and economic potential of the U.S.S.R. An invaluable aid to an informed assessment of the Soviet Union's ability to achieve declared goals. 70 photographs, maps, tables, index.

George Cressey is Maxwell Professor of Geography at Syracuse University. He is a past president of the International Geographical Union, and has traveled more extensively in the U.S.S.R. than any other non-Soviet geographer. He is the author of many books on Soviet and Asian geography.

$5.75

FESSENDEN OF MAINE: CIVIL WAR SENATOR

CHARLES A. JELLISON

This is the first full biography of William Pitt Fessenden, U. S. Senator from 1854 to 1869, Chairman of the Senate Finance Committee during the Civil War, and a key figure in the defeat of Andrew Johnson's impeachment. Superbly written and authoritative.

$5.50

ORDER FROM YOUR BOOKSTORE OR
SYRACUSE UNIVERSITY PRESS
SYRACUSE 10, NEW YORK

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

Announcing

the Addition of
300 ARTICLES
from Political Science!

---

The Bobbs-Merrill
REPRINT SERIES IN THE SOCIAL SCIENCES.

These outstanding articles from leading academic journals were selected by a committee of Political Scientists—Heinz Eulau, Stanford University; William Gore, Indiana University; Andrew Hacker, Cornell University; James Robinson, Northwestern University; Robert Wood, Massachusetts Institute of Technology—for addition to The Bobbs-Merrill Reprint Series in the Social Sciences, which now contains over 1,000 Reprints from Anthropology, Political Science, Psychology and Sociology.

PRICE: 25¢ for articles 32 pp. or less 50¢ for articles 33 pp. to 64 pp.

FORMAT: Each article is reprinted separately as an 8½" x 11" pamphlet, punched to fit a standard two or three ring binder.

Examine this unique Series before you plan your Fall courses. Write for a complete Catalogue and sample Reprint today to:

College Division

THE BOBBS-MERRILL COMPANY, INC.
A SUBSIDIARY OF HOWARD W. SAMS & CO., INC.
1720 EAST 38TH STREET • INDIANAPOLIS 6, INDIANA

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

Books from Harcourt, Brace & World

New Titles . . .

THE USES OF POWER: 7 Cases in American Politics

General Editor, ALAN F. WESTIN, Columbia University

Here for the undergraduate student of American government is an authoritative new paperback study with a clear, lively picture of American politics in operation. Each of the seven original case studies reveals crucial power struggles within one of the major centers of political control. The narratives provide a wealth of valuable, often little-known sidelights that illuminate the complex workings of government and place in sharp focus the issues at stake and the roles played by important personalities—those who use power, those who pursue it, those who veto it, and those who referee power struggles.

Hugh Douglas Price: the congressional response to President Kennedy's aid-to-education bills.

Louis W. Koenig: President Truman's position on the question of foreign aid to Yugoslavia and Spain in 1950.

Alan F. Westin: judicial reactions to electronic eavesdropping on a petty bookmaker by Los Angeles police.

Victor G. Rosenblum: the FCC's ruling on Channel 10 in Miami and the uproar that followed it.

Allan P. Sindler: the "loyalty fight" over ideology and party primacy between Southerners and non-Southerners in the Democratic Party.

John P. Mallan and George Blackwood: Governor Foster Furcolo's campaign for a sales tax to finance state social welfare programs.

Andrew Hacker: pressure politics in Pennsylvania: the lobbying contest between the railroads and the trucking industry.

376 pages, $2.95

THE DOLLAR IN CRISIS

Edited, with an introduction,

by SEYMOUR E. HARRIS, Lucius Littauer

Professor of Political Economy, Harvard University

In this recently published collection of essays, thirteen foremost authorities in international economics present up-to-date analyses of the pressing dollar and gold problem and the resulting dilemma faced by America's governmental policies. Nearly all the writings were specially commissioned for this book; they contain influential, often conflicting points of view and give the kind of detailed interpretations that are suitable for a variety of courses. Paperbound, 309 pages, $3.45

for Courses in Political Science and Government

Soon to be published . . .

MAJOR FOREIGN POWERS: Fourth Edition

GWENDOLEN M. CARTER, Smith College

JOHN M. HERZ, The City College, New York

When first published in 1949, Major Foreign Powers was acclaimed a classic in the field of comparative government. This newly revised edition presents afresh a comprehensive survey of the four leading nations—Great Britain, the Soviet Union, Germany, and France. Following the parallel, flexible organization of the previous editions, the authors appraise the governments of these countries not as isolated units, but as institutions reflecting the historical, economic, and social influences of the past, and an intensified comparative theme is carried throughout the book. The text, as well as all maps and charts, has been completely redesigned and reset. Other outstanding features include a highly readable narrative, a treatment of current issues and events that is virtually up-to-the-minute, and an exhaustive bibliography. May, 768 pages, prob. $8.50

WESTERN POLITICAL THEORY: The Modern Age

LEE C. McDONALD, Pomona College

This new survey of modern political thought combines a penetrating grasp of the materials with a vivid prose style to afford the student a study in depth of the main political theorists, set against the background of the age in which they lived. The chapters concentrating on the centuries are general and far-reaching in scope; the chapters on individuals depict in precise terms the characteristic outlook of each theorist. Throughout, the book maintains an interpretative approach: important issues are carefully related to present political realities and there are many lengthy quotations from original sources which convey the temper and style of the theorists as well as their ideas. April, 544 pages, prob. $6.50

Please write for examination copies.

HARCOURT, BRACE & WORLD, INC.

750 Third Avenue, New York 17, New York
1855 Rollins Road, Burlingame, California

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

Little, Brown and Company

LEGISLATIVE POLITICS U.S.A.:

Congress and the Forces that Shape It

REPRESENTATION AND THE POLITICAL PROCESS—this selection of provocative readings on representative government and the legislative process treats the system from the standpoint of the representative assembly and bears on the question of how Congress affects and is affected by all the other political participants and forces. The only brief, basic, inexpensive collection available, it includes a general introduction and combines general readings, readings on the American Congress and case studies of specific issues.

in paper      5 x 8      about 300 pages      Spring, 1962

AMERICAN GOVERNMENT: Readings and Cases

Peter Woll, University of California at Los Angeles

BASIC READINGS AND CASES IN AMERICAN GOVERNMENT—designed to introduce the student to the theoretical underpinnings of our system, aspects of its growth and development, factors and issues in its everyday operation and some problems confronting it today. Brief and flexible, this distinctive book covers all major areas of government and is organized into topics as an aid to study and discussion. Concise connecting commentary guides the student but does not overshadow the readings. Suitable for courses of varying emphasis and for use with any basic text.

in paper      5½ x 8¾      448 pages      Spring, 1962

THE COURTS: A Reader in the Judicial Process

Robert Scigliano, Michigan State University

A CORE SELECTION FOR STUDENTS, this book approaches the judicial process as part of the process of American government, through selected articles and connecting comments. Readings and explanations make clear the continuity in policy-resolution across the three branches of government, the manner in which these conflicts are brought into the courts, the stages through which they pass, and the discretion exercised in resolving these conflicts. Can be used alone as a substantial treatment of the judicial process or an effective supplement to the traditional case-book.

in paper      5½ x 8¾      504 pages      January, 1962

THE AMERICAN POLITICAL ARENA: Selected Readings

Joseph R. Fiszman, University of Oregon

FOR AN EXCITING, MATURE COURSE IN AMERICAN GOVERNMENT, this reader reflects the best of modern as well as traditional approaches to the study of American politics. The emphasis is on concepts about the political process at the national and local levels and in private group life, with sharp focus on such themes as public versus private interest, political values and value conflicts, plurality of group membership, conflict and consensus, and decision-making in the shaping of public policy. Introductions by the editor provide background and guidelines for the student.

in paper      6¾ x 9¼      about 600 pages      Spring, 1962

BOSTON

TORONTO

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

---

---

MURRAY N. ROTHBARD
MAN, ECONOMY AND STATE

In this comprehensive and systematic treatise on economics, the author draws the conclusions logically implied in the fundamental axiom of human action. Written for students and laymen with no prior knowledge of economics as well as for the economists, its clear graphical representations of the major types of economic inter-relationships are an invaluable contribution to the two volume text.

Vol. I—leads step-by-step to an understanding of the structure of varied economies and an examination of the unhampered market. 496 pages

Vol. II—considers the problems of dynamic change and entrepreneurship in a free economy, presents a new theory of monopoly, and refutes the dominant economic fallacies of our age. 544 pages

the two volumes $20.00

at your bookstore Van Nostrand Princeton, New Jersey

---

---

---

---

THE ANNALS

of The American Academy of Political and Social Science

A bi-monthly journal devoted to the discussion of political, social and economic problems. Presents the January 1962 issue as a study of the American system of criminal law, its strength and deficiencies.

Crime and the American Penal System

Edited by Professor LOUIS B. SCHWARTZ, University of Pennsylvania Law School

- Criminal Conduct
  - Enforcement and Administration
  - Sentence and Treatment

For full information write to:

3937 Chestnut Street Philadelphia 4, Pennsylvania

Single Copies
Nonmembers $2.00
Members $1.50

---

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

ANNOUNCING...

T
W
E
L
F
T
H

E
D
I
T
I
O N

OGG and RAY'S

Introduction to American Government

By WILLIAM H. YOUNG, University of Wisconsin

In the twelfth edition of this well-known best seller, some of the more notable features are the completely rewritten and expanded chapters on civil rights, elections, foreign affairs, and the national defense. A new chapter has been added on government in metropolitan areas, while the chapter on territorial government has been eliminated. The book is wholly up-to-date, including the major new programs, policies, and events of 1961.

The sections on state government and on local government have been completely rewritten. The thirteen chapters of these sections have been compressed into eleven by eliminating any descriptive matter also found in the large section on the national government. The similarities and differences in the governmental levels are highlighted by the frequent references made in the state and local sections to the national section.

Several weeks after the publication of this text, the twelfth edition of Ogg and Ray's Introduction to American Government, The National Government will be published.

Introduction to American Government: Ready in April. About 992 pages, illustrated. Tentative price: $8.00

The section on The National Government: About 768 pages, illustrated. Tentative price: $7.50

APPLETON-CENTURY-CROFTS, INC.

34 West 33rd Street, New York 1, New York

DIVISION OF MEREDITH PUBLISHING COMPANY

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

New and recent OXFORD books

.....

THE JUDICIAL PROCESS: AN INTRODUCTORY ANALYSIS OF THE COURTS OF THE UNITED STATES, ENGLAND, AND FRANCE

By HENRY J. ABRAHAM, Associate Professor of Political Science, University of Pennsylvania

In this objective, up-to-date analysis, emphasis is on the American judiciary, especially the Supreme Court. Also included is an extended comparative discussion of the court systems in England and France, with a note on the U.S.S.R. Graphs and charts clarify the institutions discussed and substantial bibliographies invite further study of pertinent topics.

Spring 1962                                      384 pp.                                      paperbound $2.25

THE SUPREME COURT ON CHURCH AND STATE

Edited by JOSEPH TUSSMAN, Professor of Philosophy of Law, Wesleyan University

This important collection includes twenty-nine of the most significant decisions of the United States Supreme Court regarding the church-state relationship. Following a penetrating introductory essay, the opinions recorded cover such topics as freedom of religious belief and worship, the politically-minded church, religion and freedom of action, and secularism and neutrality.

January 1962                                      329 pp.                                      paperbound $1.95

OBLIGATION AND THE BODY POLITIC

By Joseph Tussman,
Wesleyan University
1961    152 pp.    paperbound $1.50

READINGS IN RUSSIAN FOREIGN POLICY

Edited by Robert A. Goldwin, with Gerald Stourzh and Marvin Zetterbaum
1959    792 pp.    paperbound $2.75

READINGS IN ECONOMICS AND POLITICS

Edited by H. C. Harlan
1961    704 pp.    paperbound $2.75

READINGS IN AMERICAN FOREIGN POLICY

Edited by Robert A. Goldwin and Gerald Stourzh
1959    712 pp.    paperbound $2.75

READINGS IN WORLD POLITICS

Edited by Robert A. Goldwin, with
Ralph Lerner and Gerald Stourzh
1959    496 pp.    paperbound $2.25

READINGS IN AMERICAN DEMOCRACY

Edited by Gerald Stourzh and Ralph Lerner
1959    496 pp.    paperbound $2.25

OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS

417 Fifth Avenue, New York 16, N.Y.

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

from the Council on Foreign Relations

POLITICAL HANDBOOK OF THE WORLD, 1962

Parliaments, Parties and Press

WALTER H. MALLORY, Editor. "Comment on this familiar publication is unnecessary. One can only say tritely that it has become an indispensable reference book for all students of comparative government."—American Political Science Review.

Published for the Council on Foreign Relations by Harper & Brothers.

March, $4.95

THE FUTURE OF UNDERDEVELOPED COUNTRIES

Political Implications of Economic Development

REVISED EDITION

EUGENE STALEY. This revised edition brings a classic in the field up to date by dealing first with world-wide trends since 1953, then with developments in U.S. policy, and finally with the necessity for rethinking and reorienting our policy. "No better book could be recommended for discussion and study groups concerned with American foreign policy."—The New York Times.

Published for the Council on Foreign Relations by Harper & Brothers.

November, 1961 $5.50

ARMS AND POLITICS IN LATIN AMERICA

REVISED EDITION

EDWIN LIEUWEN. A new chapter on the recent events in Cuba and elsewhere is included in this revised edition within the context of the book's general theme: the role of the military in Latin America and its relation to the basic aim of the United States to advance the security of the hemisphere and of the Western world. In the new material, as in the rest of the book, the author offers informed and lucid discussion of this complex problem so important to our own future. "One of the most important publications about Latin America ever written."—Saturday Review.

Published for the Council on Foreign Relations by Frederick A. Praeger, Inc.

January, 1962 $5.00

COUNCIL ON FOREIGN RELATIONS

58 EAST 68TH STREET

•

NEW YORK 21, N.Y.

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

THE UNIVERSITY OF CHICAGO AND THE UNIVERSITY OF VIRGINIA PRESENT
THE FIRST TWO VOLUMES OF
THE PAPERS OF
James Madison

---

Chief architect of the Federal Constitution and the Bill of Rights, Jefferson's Secretary of State, our fourth President — Madison played key roles in American history for nearly sixty years. His views were eagerly sought in his day, and their wisdom remains fresh and timely in our own.

In 1956 the University of Chicago and the University of Virginia began preparation of the first definitive edition of the papers of James Madison. The complete edition will consist of some twenty volumes.

EDITORS:
WILLIAM T. HUTCHINSON (Chicago)
WILLIAM M. E. RACHAL (Virginia) and others

---

Volume I: 1751-1779, Volume II: 1780-1781
Each volume 360 pages, 8 plates, $10.00

A discount of 10% is offered to those who subscribe to the entire series
A detailed descriptive circular on the entire series is available upon request.

---

UNIVERSITY OF CHICAGO PRESS
Chicago and London

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

OXFORD BOOKS
OF EXCEPTIONAL INTEREST

---

ANDREW JACKSON

Symbol for an Age

By JOHN WILLIAM WARD. A fascinating account of early America and of the man who dramatized its destiny. The author sheds light on the psychology of myth and hero-making and, in so doing, succeeds in separating some fact from fiction hitherto accepted as fact. A Galaxy paperbound (GB 73) $1.75

THE CROSSROADS OF LIBERALISM

Croly, Weyl, Lippmann, and the Progressive Era, 1900-1925

By CHARLES FORCEY. A brilliant study of the rise of a new American liberal philosophy, and of the men and magazine—The New Republic—that advanced it and were caught in its contradictions. "One of those rare contributions to history which open up important but almost forgotten movements by critical yet sympathetic understanding."—JAMES T. SHOTWELL. $7.00

THE EMERGING SOUTH

By THOMAS D. CLARK. A study of the social and economic revolution which has occurred in the South since 1920, by one of the region's foremost historians. "No one who wishes to understand the South as it really is today can afford to miss this book."—JONATHAN DANIELS. $6.00

THE JEFFERSON IMAGE IN THE AMERICAN MIND

By MERRILL D. PETERSON. Winner of the Bancroft Prize for American History, 1961. Professor Peterson's important book traces the evolution of the Jefferson image and its tremendous impact on America's thought and imagination. "Commended to anyone who would penetrate the meaning of the historic American experience."—DUMAS MALONE. A Galaxy paperbound (GB 71) $2.65

At all bookstores

OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS

New York 16

OXFORD BOOKS

OF EXCEPTIONAL INTEREST

---

THE STRUCTURE OF AMERICAN FEDERALISM

By M. J. C. VILE. This is a lucid, non-technical explanation of the relationship between the constitutional structure of the American federal system and the way that that system works out in the practical world of politics. Explaining the mechanics of our system at all levels, the author offers fine insights into such areas as: the political plight of the American city; the Supreme Court and public opinion; and sectional feeling. $4.00

DOCUMENTS ON INTERNATIONAL AFFAIRS 1958

Edited by GILLIAN KING. This latest volume in the series covers such events as the renewal of the Chinese bombardment of Quemoy and Matsu; the threat to the independence of Lebanon and Jordan; and the Soviet demand for the speedy termination of the four-power occupation of Berlin. Documentation is also provided on relations between members of the Communist bloc and of the Western Alliance. (Royal Institute of International Affairs) $13.45

UNITED STATES FISCAL POLICY, 1945-1949

Its Contribution to Economic Stability

By A. E. HOLMANS. An English economist who spent a year in this country analyzes recent American fiscal policy and its effect upon our economy and stability from both the "inside" and the "outside." He discusses the strengths of our policy and what seem to him its foibles with equal thoroughness, concluding with a treatment of the recession and recovery of 1957-59. $6.40

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM 1933-1960

A Survey of Suggested Reforms

During the past thirty years much thought has been given to the question of the adequacy of current British Parliamentary methods. In this volume the Hansard Society for Parliamentary Government has for the first time drawn together a representative collection of the many suggestions made since 1933 for the reform of the House of Commons, linked together by objective comments at the end of each chapter. $4.00

At all bookstores

OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS

New York 16

"A tough, meaty book, one eminently suited for the parlous times ahead."
—Drew Middleton, in The New York Times Book Review.

AMERICA IN BRITAIN'S PLACE

The Leadership of the West and Anglo-American Unity

By Lionel Gelber

Mr. Gelber, a widely recognized authority on Anglo-American relations, has analyzed with keen perception one of the momentous events of our century—the shift of free-world leadership from Britain to the United States. In reassessing the implications and responsibilities of America's position as leader of the Western Alliance, the author contends that the breakneck tempo of political and military developments, highlighted by the Berlin crisis, makes unity between the United States and Britain imperative.

At all bookstores $5.00

FREDERICK A. PRAEGER, Publisher

RECENT PUBLICATIONS OF THE INDIAN INSTITUTE OF PUBLIC ADMINISTRATION

District Administration in India by S. S. Khara .....	$0.60
Staff Councils and Associations in the U.K. and India .....	$0.50
The Development and Impact of British Administration in India—A Bibliographic Essay by Bernard S. Cohn .....	$1.00
The Press, The Public and The Administration by V. K. Narasimhan .....	$1.00
Planning in India (Mimeographed) .....	$1.00
A Bibliography on Public Enterprises in India (Mimeographed) .....	$0.50

For fuller information, please write to: The Administrative Officer, Indian Institute of Public Administration, Indraprastha Estate, Ring Road, New Delhi-1.

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

PRAEGER PAPERBACKS

the most comprehensive series of paperbacks covering the history and politics of our time

AN ATLAS OF AFRICAN AFFAIRS Andrew Boyd &amp; Patrick van Rensburg	$1.75	PAN-AFRICANISM Colin Legum	$1.95
COMMUNIST CHINA'S FOREIGN POLICY R. G. Boyd	$1.75	ARMS AND ARMS CONTROL A Symposium Edited by Ernest W. Lefever	$1.95
RUSSIA UNDER KHRUSHCHEV An Anthology from Problems of Communism Edited by Abraham Brumberg	$2.50	ARMS AND POLITICS IN LATIN AMERICA (Rev. Ed., 1961) Edwin Lieuwen	$1.85
IDEOLOGY AND POWER IN SOVIET POLITICS Zbigniew K. Brzezinski	$1.75	GOVERNMENT AND POLITICS IN JAPAN The Road to Democracy John M. Maki	$1.95
THE AFRICAN NATIONS AND WORLD SOLIDARITY Mamadou Dia	$1.85	LENINISM Alfred G. Meyer	$2.25
CASTRO'S REVOLUTION Myths and Realities Theodore Draper	$1.75	THE SOVIET ECONOMY An Introduction Alec Nove	$2.25
SOVIET STRATEGY IN THE NUCLEAR AGE (Rev. Ed., 1962) Raymond Garthoff	$2.25	AFRICA AND THE WEST Elements of Free-Wold Policy Arnold Rivkin	$1.95
AN ATLAS OF AFRICA (Rev. Ed., 1961) J. F. Horrabin	$1.45	RUSSIAN POLITICAL INSTITUTIONS (Rev. Ed., 1961) Derek J. R. Scott	$2.25
THE AMERICAN COMMUNIST PARTY A Critical History Irving Howe &amp; Lewis Coser	$2.75	AMERICAN FOREIGN POLICY SINCE WORLD WAR II (Rev. Ed., 1962) John W. Spanier	$1.95
THE FUTURE OF COMMUNIST SOCIETY Edited by Walter Z. Laqueur &amp; Leopold Labedz	$1.75	SPAIN AND DEFENSE OF WEST Ally and Liability Arthur P. Whitaker	$2.25
For a complete listing of current and forthcoming titles please write to the publisher		THE SOVIET UNION TODAY A Concise Handbook Kenneth R. Whiting	$2.25

FREDERICK A. PRAEGER, Publisher
64 University Place, New York 3, N.Y.

Books
That Matter

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers.

BOOKS

Political Change In Underdeveloped Countries

Nationalism and Communism

Edited with an original essay by John H. Kautsky, Washington University. This is an important new work which attempts to formulate a general theory of politics and political change in underdeveloped countries. It seeks to arrive at some broad generalizations and hypotheses about the political effects of industrialization, applicable in all underdeveloped countries, through an analysis of the role of various groups (and particularly the intellectuals) in politics. Explaining the nature of and relationship between nationalism and Communism, these outstanding articles provide the reader with a unified and comprehensive picture of the subject. 1962. 347 pages. Prob. $4.95.

The Legislative System

Explorations in Legislative Behavior

*By J. C. Wahlke, Vanderbilt University; H. Eulau, Stanford University; W. Buchanan, University of Southern California; and L. C. Ferguson, Michigan State University. Reports the results of a comprehensive research undertaking, providing novel information and insights concerning the functioning of legislatures and the behavior of legislators. Using material gathered from research in four American states, this book considers more generic problems concerning the functions of similar legislatures in other democratic countries as well as other American states. These institutions are analyzed as they are seen through the eyes of the legislators who compose them. 1962. Approx. 644 pages. Prob. $10.25*.*

The Action Française

Die-Hard Reactionaries in Twentieth-Century France

By Edward R. Tannenbaum, Rutgers University. The mid-1950's marked the alarming resurgence of the Extreme Right in France. In order to furnish a background to these developments, the author here explores the history of the most important Rightist movement during the first half of the twentieth century, and analyzes it in terms of social composition, psychology, tactics, and ideology. In so doing, he portrays the kinds of people attracted to the reactionary "cause" and provides both illuminating and timely insights into their character and motives. 1962. Approx. 288 pages. Prob. $7.50.

\ Also available in textbook edition for college adoption.*

Send for examination copies.

JOHN WILEY & SONS, Inc. 440 Park Avenue South, New York 16, N.Y.

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

Population and World Power

by KATHERINE ORGANSKI and A. F. K. ORGANSKI, Brooklyn College

This interdisciplinary study gives a concise account of the impact of population problems on international relations. Treating population as one of the chief determinants of national power, the authors show with forceful logic the implications for the free world of demographic changes taking place today.

1961. 281 pp. $3.50 text

Modern Organization

by VICTOR A. THOMPSON, Illinois Institute of Technology

Professor Thompson has written an unusually good presentation and integration of modern behavioral science findings with public administration and traditional organizational theory. Not only are there many insightful ideas which will supply researchers with many hypotheses, but perhaps more important Professor Thompson is developing a theoretical framework that is of much promise. — Chris Argyris, Yale University.

1961 192 pp. $3.75

Public Opinion and American Democracy

by V. O. KEY, JR., Harvard University

Borrowing analytical techniques from several disciplines, Dr. Key identifies in broad terms the processes involved in the formation of public opinion and clarifies the relationship between popular attitudes and governmental action.

1961 672 pp. $7.50

TO BE PUBLISHED:

Organizations of Nations

by THOMAS HOVET, JR., New York University and W. HARTLEY CLARK, Carleton College

ALFRED A. KNOPF, *Publisher

College Department

501 Madison Avenue

New York 22

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

modern texts take a world's-eye view of politics

---

The Relations of Nations, Second Edition
Frederick H. Hartmann, University of Florida

The newest edition of this text is an up-to-the-moment survey of international politics. A new chapter contains fresh material on Africa and other recently developed areas, as well as an expanded treatment of the Middle East. There are twice as many maps and numerous tables and diagrams. March

---

World In Crisis: Readings in International Relations, Second Edition
Frederick H. Hartmann

The author has carefully compiled forty-seven stimulating readings, many of them classics. Selections range from the work of Thucydides to contemporary crises as seen by Churchill and Kennan. A variety of contrasting opinions appear, along with the approaches of different eras juxtaposed to illustrate the evolution of opinion over the years. March

---

The Dynamics of International Politics
Norman J. Padelford, Massachusetts Institute of Technology, and George A. Lincoln, United States Military Academy

Although addressed primarily to the present world scene, this encyclopedic new text offers a method of systematic analysis applicable to the world order of any specific time in history. Concepts and approaches to international politics are thoroughly analyzed, with an eye to its complex and dynamic character. Contemporary issues receive special attention — population explosion, the impact of technology on weapons and communications, problems of economic assistance, and the changing nature of the security problem. February

The Macmillan Company, 60 Fifth Avenue, New York 11, New York
A Division of The Crowell-Collier Publishing Company

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

NATO: The Entangling Alliance

By Robert E. Osgood. Because NATO is the outstanding political instrument of American security, the author sees the military-strategic decisions it demands as a matter of high politics. He argues that a major strategic revision is necessary, that it must be instigated by the U.S., and that it must increase European responsibility for NATO plans and decisions. Index. $7.50

Congress and the Court

By Walter F. Murphy. Direct observation and sharp characterization enliven this first-rate assessment of the balance of power between Congress and the Supreme Court. Focusing on the crucial years 1954-59, when the increasing liberalism of the Warren court stirred rightist antagonism, Mr. Murphy shrewdly sketches the tactics and the conflicting pressures that influence Court action. Index. $6.95

Black Nationalism:

A SEARCH FOR AN IDENTITY IN AMERICA

By E. U. Essien-Udom. An African assesses the Muslim movement in America and the nature of its appeal to the urban Negro. Writing from first-hand acquaintance with the Chicago leader, Elijah Muhammad, and many of his followers, he discusses the religious and educational activities of the movement and analyzes its social, psychological, and political implications. Illus. $6.95

The Illusion of Neutrality

By Robert A. Divine. The first full-scale account of the struggle between isolationists and internationalists in the U.S. in the 1930's. Centering around FDR and the arms embargo issue, this study throws much necessary light on the era that saw the defeat of a hard-dying illusion. Mr. Divine deals most skillfully with the many complexities of the shifting national mood. Index. $6.50

Through your bookseller

UNIVERSITY OF CHICAGO PRESS

5750 Ellis Avenue
Chicago 37, Illinois

from RANDOM

An outstanding series of books in Political Science

Communism, Fascism, and Democracy

The Theoretical Foundations
by CARL COHEN
University of Michigan
704 pages; paperbound; $3.95 text
1962

America's Foreign Policy

by HAROLD K. JACOBSON
University of Michigan
756 pages; $6.50 text
1960

People, Power, and Politics

An Introductory Reader
by LYMAN J. GOULD and
E. WILLIAM STEELE
both of the University of Vermont
725 pages; paperbound; $3.95 text

The Might of Nations

World Politics in Our Time
by JOHN G. STOEßINGER
Hunter College
468 pages; $6.25 text
1961

Courts, Judges, and Politics

An Introduction to the Judicial Process
by WALTER F. MURPHY
Princeton University and
C. HERMAN PRITCHETT
University of Chicago
707 pages; $6.75 text 1961

Swords into Plowshares

The Problems and Progress of International Organization
by INIS L. CLAUDE
University of Michigan
Revised Edition
551 pages; $6.50 text

To be revised Patterns of Government

The Major Political Systems of Europe
by Samuel H. Beer, Adam B.
Ulam, and Nicholas Wahl, Harvard University, Harry H. Eckstein, Princeton University, and Herbert J. Spiro, Amherst College
Approx. 700 pages

State and Local Government and Politics

by ROBERT S. BABCOCK University of Vermont
430 pages; $5.50 text

To be published Power and International Relations

by INIS L. CLAUDE
University of Michigan
Spring 1962; approx. 600 pages;
$5.95 text

The College Department

RANDOM

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

HOUSE

.....

NEW

and Forthcoming STUDIES IN POLITICAL SCIENCE

Public Opinion and Foreign Policy
by JAMES N. ROSENAU
$1.35

The Role of Congress
in American Foreign Policy
by STEPHEN P. GIBERT

Government and Politics in Africa
South of the Sahara
by THOMAS R. ADAM
$1.65

Courts and Rights
by JOHN P. ROCHE
$1.35

The Constitution and the Court
by ROBERT S. HIRSCHFIELD

Japanese Politics
by JOSEPH L. SUTTON

Contemporary Southeast Asia
by ROBERT C. BONE

Small City Government
Seven Cases in Decision Making
by WARNER E. MILLS, JR. and HARRY R. DAVIS

The Fifth Republic
France's New Political System
by NICHOLAS WAHL

The State Legislature
by MALCOLM E. JEWELL

Send for a list of Random House Studies in Political Science, a series of original works, attractively bound in paper covers from 95¢

.....

HOUSE

501 Madison Avenue • New York 22

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

DIXON-YATES

A Study in Power Politics

BY AARON WILDAVSKY. One of the most widely debated political controversies in recent years, the Dixon-Yates case offers a panoramic view of American politics under the Eisenhower Administration. From the extensive documentation on this case and from a hundred personal interviews, Mr. Wildavsky skillfully reconstructs the extraordinary sequence of events involving crucial issues of public policy: public versus private power and conflict of interest. Many fundamental issues relating to the functioning of the American political system are also involved: the executive decision-making process; coalition politics in a system of fragmented powers; the right of executive privilege to withhold information from Congress; and the role of the regulatory agencies. $6.75

POLITICS, PERSONALITY, AND NATION BUILDING

Burma's Search for Identity

BY LUCIAN W. PYE. This study of the search for personal and political identity in Burma brings to light some of the great difficulties which confront a transitional society in creating a modern state system. Mr. Pye examines Burma's political culture, exploring both the historical evolution of the society and the psychological reactions to change. He deals with problems such as the inhibitions thwarting modernization, the tendency toward ideological agitation, and the roles of colonialism and nationalism in the complex process of transformation. $7.50

THE FAR EASTERN POLICY OF THE UNITED STATES

BY A. WHITNEY GRISWOLD. First published in 1938, this is a reissue of an engrossing and authoritative chronicle of forty years of American diplomacy beginning with the annexation of the Philippines in 1898 and running through the Sino-Japanese conflict of 1938. $10.00

Selected Yale Paperbounds

The Framing of the Constitution of the United States by Max Farrand	$1.75
Journey to America by Alexis de Tocqueville	$1.75

Yale University Press

Canadian orders:

New Haven and London

McGill University Press, Montreal 25

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

Princeton

UNIVERSITY PRESS

The Sino-Soviet Conflict, 1956-1961

By Donald S. Zagoria

Donald S. Zagoria, who was from 1951 to 1961 an analyst of Communist Bloc politics for the U.S. Government, traces the development of serious conflict between the U.S.S.R. and China from the 20th Party Congress in 1956 to the 22nd Party Congress in late 1961. This conflict has enveloped three major areas—global strategy, domestic policy, and intra-bloc relations. Differences have plagued the relations between Khrushchev and Mao Tse-tung and have affected their attitudes toward de-Stalinization, the communes, Yugoslavia, Taiwan, and the developing African and Asian nations. This analysis is in itself an important contribution to all future evaluations of Communist intentions.

550 pages. $8.50

Tocqueville and the Old Regime:

Aristocracy, Democracy, or Tyranny?

By Richard Herr

Distressed by the despotism of the Second Empire in France, Alexis de Tocqueville wrote his historical masterpiece, The Old Regime and the French Revolution. Richard Herr here interprets the ideas in Old Regime in a critical study. He probes Tocqueville's earlier thoughts on French history from his notions as a young judge under Charles X through the writing of Democracy in America and his years in the Chamber of Deputies. The book then gives a sensitive account of Tocqueville's last eight years.

150 pages. $3.50

The Twilight of Federalism

The Disintegration of the Federalist Party, 1815-1830

By Shaw Livermore, Jr.

This work concerns the disintegration of the Federalist Party in the early history of the United States. The Federalist Party had been the party of such founding fathers as Washington, Hamilton, and Adams. In spite of the substantial numbers of able men who identified themselves with the Party during the period following 1815, it went into decline. The author here explores the reason why.

280 pages. $6.00

Order from your bookstore, or
PRINCETON UNIVERSITY PRESS
Princeton, N.J.

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

---

The Galleon Series

---

Just Out

CANADA VOTES. Handbook of Federal and Provincial Election Data

By Howard A. Scarrow $12.00

The Conflict Society: REACTION AND REVOLUTION IN LATIN AMERICA

By Kalman H. Silvert $7.50

Recent Publications

EXTRADITION TO AND FROM CANADA

By G. V. La Forest $6.50

THE BATTLE OF NEW ORLEANS, A British View:
The Journal of Major C. R. Forrest

Hugh F. Rankin, ed. $2.00

U.S. COMMERCIAL TREATIES AND INTERNATIONAL LAW

By Robert R. Wilson $6.50

THE CATHOLIC VOTE

By John H. Fenton $4.75

CONTEMPT OF CONGRESS

By Carl Beck $4.50

Wartime Origins of the East-West

DILEMMA OVER GERMANY

By John L. Snell $7.00

POLITICS IN THE BORDER STATES

By John H. Fenton $5.50

Once Again Available

A Distinguished Text

AN INTRODUCTION TO PEIRCE'S PHILOSOPHY

By James K. Feibleman $7.00

THE HAUSER PRESS

720 Poydras St.
NEW ORLEANS, LOUISIANA

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

POLITICAL SCIENCE BOOKS

Books, New Revisions, Spectrum  Paperbacks, 1961 Publications, Outstanding Best

PUBLISHED BY PRENTICE-HALL, INC., ENGLEWOOD CLIFFS, NEW JERSEY

NEW

from PRENTICE-HALL

CASES IN AMERICAN GOVERNMENT

Edited by Edwin Bock, Staff Director, and Alan K. Campbell, Staff Member, Inter-University Case Program

Published under the auspices of the Inter-University Case Program. Features 18 cases, researched and written by teachers experienced in using the case method approach in teaching. Focuses on communicating the realities of government to students. Combines and handles the structure and problems of government within the case method framework. May, 1962, Approx. 384 pages, Paperbound, Text price: $3.95

CONCEPTS AND ISSUES IN ADMINISTRATIVE BEHAVIOR

Edited by Sidney Mailick, New York University, and E. H. Van Ness

Enlightened and challenging examination of administrative behavior organized around the decision-making process which gives understanding and insight into the principles and practices of administration. Includes both empirically-oriented studies and theoretical analyses of administrative and organization behavior.

May, 1962, Approx. 208 pages, Text price: $4.95

SIMULATION IN SOCIAL SCIENCE: Readings

Edited by Harold Guetzkow, Northwestern University

Discusses a new research technique, the use of simulation, as a tool for research and education in social science. Contains a collection of readings to introduce laymen and students to simulation in social science. The book explains the nature and purpose of simulation, reports on a variety of cases using simulation, and explores the techniques, values, and problems involved in its use in social science.

Forthcoming, Approx. 176 pages, Text price: $3.95

THE CHALLENGE OF POLITICS: Ideas and Issues

By Harold W. Thumm, Bates College, and Alvin Z. Rubinstein, University of Pennsylvania

Unique synthesis of theory and practice which transcends the usual parochial emphasis on western societies. Provides an unusually broad range of readings encompassing the western democracies and including selections on underdeveloped countries, non-western societies and their processes of government, the Soviet Union and Communist China, and totalitarian ideologies and systems.

1961, 359 pages, Text price: $4.25

INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS: Cooperation and Conflict

By Charles P. Schleicher, University of Oregon

Designed for use in classes in international relations or international politics at the undergraduate level. Offers a comprehensive treatment of the major aspects of international society. Is organized to carry the student through a series of logical steps to a consideration of a number of cases centering around the United States and its world relationships.

April, 1962, Approx. 608 pages, Text price: $8.50

INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SIMULATION

Edited by Robert Noel in collaboration with Harold Guetzkow, both at Northwestern University

New approach to the teaching of international relations. Hand computed and ideally suited for undergraduates. During the last several years the simulation technique has been employed at Northwestern University to vividly illustrate the abstract concepts and practices of international relations.

Forthcoming, Price to be announced

SIGNIFICANT REVISIONS IN 1962

THE POLITICS OF AMERICAN DEMOCRACY, 2nd

Edited by Marian D. Irish, Florida State University, and James W. Prothro, University of North Carolina

A realistic view of the American political scene, examining both sides of controversial subjects without bias or evasion. Coordinates behavioral findings and interpretations of American politics with legal and constitutional matters.

April, 1962, Approx. 672 pages, Text price: $7.50

PRINCIPLES OF AMERICAN GOVERNMENT, 4th

Edited by Albert B. Saye, Merritt B. Pound, both at University of Georgia, and John F. Allums, Foreign Affairs Specialist, Office of the Secretary of Defense

A concise, straight-forward account of the basic features of American government with emphasis on constitutional principles. January, 1962, 512 pages, Text price: $5.95

PROBLEMS IN INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS, 2nd

Edited by Andrew Gyorgy and Hubert S. Gibbs, both at Boston University

A systematic application of the problem method to the field of international relations. Fifteen authorities contribute 25 carefully selected cases.

May, 1962, Approx. 384 pages, Text price: $4.95

FOREIGN POLICY IN WORLD POLITICS, 2nd

By Roy Macridis, Washington University

A scholarly study of the foreign policy of the major contemporary political systems examined both with reference to domestic factors and to world relations.

January, 1962, 374 pages, Text price: $4.95

AN INTRODUCTION TO POLITICAL ANALYSIS: Problems in American Government

Edited by Robert E. Lane, Fred I. Greenstein, and James D. Barber, all at Yale University

A revision of Problems in American Government.

Actual case data in workbook form. Students develop principles from factual material, interpret processes and institutions, and make appraisals. Teacher's Manual available on adoption.

June, 1962, Text price: $4.95

FUNCTIONS AND POLICIES OF AMERICAN GOVERNMENT, 2nd

Edited by Jack W. Peltason, University of Illinois, and James M. Burns, Williams College

A series of integrated essays on the policies and functions of American government and their history.

April, 1962, Approx. 480 pages, Text price: $5.95

SPECTRUM PAPERBACKS

JUST PUBLISHED

Outer Space: Prospects for Man and Society—Edited by Lincoln P. Bloomfield, Massachusetts Institute of Technology; 1962, approx. 224 pp., Text price: $1.95, Cloth: $3.95 (S-AA-5)

Science and the Nation: Policy and Politics—By J. Stefan Dupré and Sanford Lakoff, both at Harvard University; 1962, approx. 175 pp., Text price: $1.95, Cloth: $3.95 (S-25)

Politics of Africa: Prospects South of the Sahara—By Herbert J. Spiro, Harvard University; 1962, approx. 192 pp., Text price: $1.95, Cloth: $3.95 (S-26)

RECENTLY PUBLISHED

Goals for Americans—Report of the President's Commission on National Goals; 1960, 372 pp., Text price: $1.00 (S-AA-3)

The Secretary of State—Edited by Don K. Price, Harvard University; 1960, 200 pp., Text price: $1.95* (S-AA-2)

Arms Control: Issues for the Public—Edited by Louis Henkin, University of Pennsylvania; 1961, 224 pp., Text price: $1.95* (S-AA-4)

The Federal Government and Higher Education—Edited by Douglas M. Knight, Lawrence College; 1960, 205 pp., Text price: $1.95* (S-AA-1)

What Price Economic Growth?—By Klaus Knorr and William Baumol, both at Princeton University; 1961, 174 pp., Text price: $1.95, Cloth: $3.95 (S-11)

Money and Credit: Their Influence on Jobs, Prices, and Growth—Report of the Commission on Money and Credit; 1961, 256 pp., Text price: $2.00†

* An American Assembly Book (also available in cloth—$3.50)
† Not a Spectrum Book but available in paperback form

OUTSTANDING BESTSELLERS

Government by the People: The Dynamics of American Government, 4th—By James M. Burns, Williams College, and Jack W. Peltason, University of Illinois; National Edition: 1960, 804 pp., Text price: $7.75; National, State, and Local Edition: 1960, 948 pp., Text price: $7.95

American Government: The Clash of Issues—By James Burkhart, Stephens College, Henry C. Bush, Wayne State University, Samuel Krislov, Michigan State University and Raymond L. Lee, Indiana State College, Pa.; 1960, 422 pp., paperbound, Text price: $3.95

1961 PUBLICATIONS

Cases in State and Local Government—Edited by Richard T. Frost, Reed College; 1961, 362 pp., paperbound, Text price: $3.95

Foreign Policy of the American People, 2nd—By Charles O. Lerche, Jr., American University; 1961, 524 pp., Text price: $7.95

Today's Isms: Communism, Fascism, Capitalism, Socialism, 3rd—By William Ebenstein, Princeton University; 1961, 243 pp., paperbound, Text price: $2.95

Texas: Its Government and Politics—By Wilbourn E. Benton, Texas A & M College; 1961, 662 pp., Text price: $6.75

Sociology, The Progress of a Decade: A Collection of Articles—Edited by Seymour M. Lipset and Neil J. Smelser, both at University of California (Berkeley). In the P-H Sociology Series, Edited by Herbert Blumer; 1961, 635 pp., A source book, Text price: $7.95

For approval copies, please write:

PRENTICE-HALL, INC.

Box 903, ENGLEWOOD CLIFFS, NEW JERSEY

GRANTS FOR ASIAN POLITICAL SCIENTISTS

The American Political Science Association again has received from The Asia Foundation a grant for encouraging closer relations between Asian and American political scientists. The funds will be used in three ways:

- 1) To enable Asian political scientists to become members of The American Political Science Association for a three-year period at greatly reduced rates. Membership includes subscription to The American Political Science Review.

(Membership in the Association for three years and subscription to the Review will be only $1.00. Applicants should write directly to The American Political Science Association, 1726 Massachusetts Avenue, N.W., Washington 6, D.C. Payment may be made in UNESCO coupons or in any way convenient and acceptable under the exchange regulations of the country concerned. The privilege is extended to graduate students as well as to established political scientists.)

- 2) To enable libraries, university departments, and research institutes in Asia, who have heretofore been unable to do so, to subscribe to The American Political Science Review at greatly reduced rates.

(The cost of a three-year institutional subscription will be $2.00, payable as above.)

- 3) To supplement travel expenses of Asian political scientists who are in the United States and who wish to attend meetings of The American Political Science Association. The next meeting will be held September 5-8, 1962, in the Mayflower Hotel, Washington, D.C.

(Applicants must be at least at the graduate student level and may come from any Asian country from Afghanistan eastward. Applications should be sent to The American Political Science Association, 1726 Massachusetts Avenue, N.W., Washington 6, D. C. In his request the applicant should give his regular academic position, the nature of his study or visit in the United States, and the sum necessary for travel to and from the meeting.)

GOVERNMENT IN MODERN SOCIETY

With Emphasis on American Institutions

R. Wallace Brewster

Meeting the needs of both majors and students who will take no further courses in political science, this text is the first to present a conceptual introduction to principles and problems of modern government primarily within the matrix of American institutions.

619 pages

1958

$7.25

CAPITOL, COURTHOUSE, AND CITY HALL—Second Edition

Readings in American State and Local Government

Edited by Robert L. Morlan

Drawing on sources as widely separate as the Annals of the American Academy of Political and Social Sciences and the Saturday Evening Post, this edition—containing more than one-third new material—incorporates many suggestions made by users of the first edition.

348 pages, paperbound

1960

$3.50

PROFILE OF AMERICAN POLITICS

Readings in American Government

Edited by Ernest W. Lefever and Walter V. Hohenstein

Ninety-nine essays by political spokesmen, past and present, from Tom Paine to Adlai Stevenson and Dwight Eisenhower.

367 pages, paperbound

1960

$3.50

Houghton Mifflin Company

BOSTON • NEW YORK • ATLANTA • GENEVA, ILL. • DALLAS • PALO ALTO

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

POLITICAL INSTITUTIONS

Readings in Political Science

Howard D. Hamilton

Designed to supplement the standard textbooks for courses in the survey of American government and introduction to political science, this book contains 117 journal articles, documents, and essays spanning the time from Aristotle to the Freedom Riders and selected for their intrinsic merit as well as for their illumination of the basic institutions, processes, and functions of government. An introduction and study questions preface each selection, and a chart correlating the readings with major basic texts will be available.

About 375 pages, paperbound

7<sup>5</sup>/<sub>8</sub> x 10 3/16"

An April Publication

SOVIET SOCIETY: A Book of Readings

Edited by Alex Inkeles and Kent Geiger

Seventy-three articles, most of them by Western scholars, provide a comprehensive picture of the development of all the major social institutions of the Soviet Union from the Revolution to the present.

703 pages

1961

$7.50

Houghton Mifflin Company

BOSTON • NEW YORK • ATLANTA • GENEVA, ILL. • DALLAS • PALO ALTO

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

Selected RONALD Books . . .

---

European Politics and Government

A Comparative Approach

Clifford A. L. Rich, Oklahoma State University; Robert O. Gibbon, Wisconsin State University; Lowell G. Noonan, San Fernando Valley State College; Helmut Bader, El Camino College; and Karel Hulicka, University of Buffalo

Edited by Clifford A. L. Rich

Ready in March! Designed for the first course in comparative government, this book presents a detailed, comprehensive, and balanced account of the politics and government of five major European powers: Great Britain, France, Germany, Italy, and the U.S.S.R. Specialists on each country analyze the casual determinants of political action, providing the student with a sound basis for drawing comparative conclusions. The book systematically focuses attention on the governing process in order to impart a clear understanding of how the major European systems compare to that of the United States. The final chapter summarizes the politics and institutions of European Union. 1962. 800 pp., illus. $8.00

Government and Politics in Latin America

Edited by Harold Eugene Davis, The American University Prepared by 11 Contributing Authorities

A comparative survey of the political institutions of Latin America—their structure, operation, strengths, and weaknesses. Book presents the rapidly changing, frequently violent political and social life of Latin America in which emergent political forces are taking shape in movements of reform and new power structures. The institutions of government are analyzed in relation to power structures and in terms of their functions against a background of half a century of Latin American experience. The book concludes with an evaluation of democratic trends and prospects. 1958. 539 pp., illus. $7.50

Public Administration

John M. Pfiffner, University of Southern California; and Robert V. Presthus, Cornell University

Standard textbook provides a comprehensive account of public administration today. It integrates the descriptive-institutional material of administrative science and the behavioral analyses of administration in action. Book analyzes the nature of public bureaucracy and the political environment with its attendant pressures on the public administrator; incorporates material on decision-making and data-processing in fact-finding and planning; reflects recent research in group behavior, individual motivation, leadership dynamics, etc. 4th Ed., 1960. 570 pp. $7.50

Public Finance

Earl R. Rolph and George F. Break—both University of California, Berkeley

This outstanding textbook sets forth the theoretical issues in public finance involved at all levels of government. It effectively demonstrates how economic intelligence can be applied to illuminate the problems of public finance; provides a descriptive-historical analysis of government finance today and its role in the economy. Book draws mainly on American experience in fiscal affairs, but, where applicable, it incorporates evidence from other countries. It examines current social security programs, problems arising from metropolitan growth, fiscal theory and policy, etc. 1961. 586 pp. $7.50

---

THE RONALD PRESS COMPANY

15 East 26th Street, New York 10, New York

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

VOICE OF THE PEOPLE: Readings in Public Opinion and Propaganda

Edited by REO M. CHRISTENSON, Miami University, Ohio; and ROBERT O. McWILLIAMS, Eastern Michigan University. McGraw-Hill Series in Political Science. Just published

This readable anthology on public opinion and propaganda is designed for nonspecialists and students planning further study. The book includes: a discussion of the nature of public opinion; the dynamics of its process; and its role in a democracy. This is followed by a consideration of factors which influence or determine opinion. Propaganda principles, techniques and effects, plus types of propaganda are examined. Contributors include: Walter Lippmann, Bertrand Russell, Richard M. Nixon, James Bryce, Arthur Schlesinger, Jr., George Gallup, Carl Sandberg.

LATIN AMERICA: An Interpretative History

By DONALD MARQUAND DOZER, University of California, Santa Barbara.
Available May

This new text offers an important step away from the traditional nation-by-nation treatment of Latin American history and offers an organized and integrated interpretative history of the area. The treatment is generally chronological and covers the entire span of Latin American history. It avoids the encyclopedic detail that clutters much of the Latin American historiography and instead stresses relationships, currents of development, and the most significant events.

CRIME AND ITS DEFENDERS

By ARNOLD W. GREEN, formerly of The Pennsylvania State University. 240 pages, $5.95 (cloth), $2.75 (paper)

This essay explores the consequences of the theory that society is responsible for crime; discussing its place in today's mobile political, economic, and legal framework. Written within an historical framework, the author's objective is to show that crime is an inevitable accompaniment of a social system. He believes the problems cannot be solved in terms the crime defenders—social workers, psychiatrists, and criminologists—choose. There are thorough discussions on social theory, and the lives and works of such men as Max Weber, Plato, Hobbes, Rousseau, Marx, Huxley.

ELEMENTS OF AMERICAN GOVERNMENT, Fifth Edition

By JOHN H. FERGUSON, The Pennsylvania State University; and DEAN E. McHENRY, University of California, Los Angeles. McGraw-Hill Series in Political Science. 512 pages, $6.95

This book concisely discusses national, state, and local government by introducing background and principles and then institutions and their operation in practice. There is new and updated information on: Alaska and Hawaii as new states; election of 1960 and its aftermath; reapportionment of 1961; the Kennedy Administration; recent Supreme Court decisions on contempt of Congress; federal finance; new drive for state constitutional modernization.

McGRAW-HILL BOOK COMPANY, INC.
330 West 42nd Street
New York 36, N.Y.

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

From the Free Press

CHANGING PATTERNS OF MILITARY POLITICS

Edited by Samuel P. Huntington

Volume III in the Series, The International Yearbook of Political Behavior Research. A discussion of new problems in civil-military relations. The studies presented analyze the balance of terror, the decline of empire, the processes of technological development, and new collective security arrangements. Contributors to this book are Samuel P. Huntington, Harold D. Lasswell, David Rapoport, Laurence I. Radway, Raoul Giradet, Philip Abrams, and Martha Derthick.

$7.50

THE POLITICS OF URBAN RENEWAL: The Chicago Findings

By Peter H. Rossi and Robert A. Dentler

In this review of the political aspects of community development, the authors offer a valuable report on the influence local citizens and organizations may exert in an urban renewal project. Research was conducted in Hyde Park-Kenwood, a deteriorating community on the South Side of Chicago, where the citizens effected a workable plan for conservation and renewal.

$6.00

THE PROFESSIONAL SOLDIER

By Morris Janowitz

An analysis of the professional life, organizational setting, and leadership of the American military as they have evolved over the first half of this century. "A brilliant, original work."—The New Yorker

$6.75

Coming in May

FOREIGN POLICY DECISION MAKING: An Approach to the Study of International Politics

Edited by Richard C. Snyder, H. W. Bruck, and Burton Sapin

What are the intellectual foundations of the field of international politics? What are the strategies for a science of international politics, and how are they applied in demanding situations? The editors of this collection investigated these and other questions through the Foreign Policy Analysis Project administered by Princeton University. Here they study decision making in international politics.

$5.00

THE FREE PRESS OF GLENCOE

A DIVISION OF THE MACMILLAN COMPANY

60 Fifth Avenue, New York

American Indian Policy in the Formative Years

THE INDIAN TRADE AND INTERCOURSE ACTS, 1790-1834

By Francis P. Prucha, S.J. Drawn from official records and emphasizing gradual evolution of policy, this is the first full account of federal Indian law from the first statute in 1783 to the definitive laws of 1834. Relevant events are recreated and history analyzed to give an insight into current Indian policy. $6.75

The Promised City

NEW YORK'S JEWS 1870-1914

By Moses Rischin. New York's first great encounter with the social and cultural problems of the modern city is told here through the dramatic story of the great migration of East European Jews to the nation's largest metropolis. $7.50

The Economy of Cyprus

By A. J. Meyer with Simos Vassiliou. A brief analysis to acquaint the general reader with this significant island. Its smallness, its indigenous socio-economic structure, and its British legacy make Cyprus important as a laboratory of Middle Eastern development. $3.50

Fire and Water

SCIENTIFIC HERESY IN THE FOREST SERVICE

By Ashley L. Schiff. An analysis of United States Forest Service procedures and the problematic relationship of research to its administration. $5.00

Medical Service Corporations in the State of Washington

A STUDY OF THE ADMINISTRATION OF PHYSICIAN-SPONSORED PREPAID MEDICAL CARE

By George A. Shipman, Robert J. Lampman, and S. Frank Miyamoto. A study of two county medical service corporations in the State of Washington—physician-sponsored, non-profit, voluntary health insurance organizations—that have major experimental significance. Published for the Health Information Foundation. $6.50

HARVARD UNIVERSITY PRESS

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

---

DODD, MEAD BOOKS IN POLITICAL SCIENCE

Advisory Editor: DAVID FELLMAN, University of Wisconsin

---

Hitchner and Harbold

MODERN GOVERNMENT: A Survey of Political Science

By DELL G. HITCHNER and WILLIAM H. HARBOLD, The University of Washington. $
(Instructor's Manual available free to teachers.)

The authors achieve a new level of generalization and theory, appropriately illustrated from history and contemporary experiences of diverse national political systems, and make a distinguished contribution to the introductory course.

"A student who has conscientiously gone through this book—studied it—would really have an of the nature and problems of modern government that no other book can supply." Robert McCloskey, Harvard University

"... far ahead of anything else that's offered for a course in introduction to government." Robert Karsch, University of Missouri

---

Eliot

GOVERNING AMERICA: The Politics of a Free People

By THOMAS H. ELIOT, Washington University

NOW AVAILABLE IN TWO EDITIONS:

NATIONAL, STATE, AND LOCAL GOVERNMENT EDITION. $7.75

NATIONAL GOVERNMENT EDITION. 7.50

(Instructor's Manual, both editions, available free to teachers.)

STATE AND LOCAL GOVERNMENT SUPPLEMENT (available separately in paperback). 2.50

"The author's uncanny ability to relate theory and politics is enriching and refreshing." Philip Bosserman, Baker University

"The material is presented in such a manner that it fits the 'frame of reference' of our generation." Francis R. Gilmore, Phillips University

"The text has a realism not often found, an almost conversational style that is unique. Professor Eliot has written a balanced, incisive text." Charles Kerr, Westminster College

---

Eliot, Chambers, and Salisbury

AMERICAN GOVERNMENT: Readings and Problems for Analysis

By THOMAS H. ELIOT, WILLIAM N. CHAMBERS, and ROBERT H. SALISBURY, Washington University. $2.95

This "second" book, the most widely adopted in its field, is an ingenious combination of up-to-date readings, culled from 38 sources, together with 40 specified problems related to these readings.

---

Mendelson

THE CONSTITUTION AND THE SUPREME COURT

By WALLACE MENDELSON, The University of Texas. $7.00

Containing 101 cases and readings, this book may be successfully employed in either a one- or two-semester course.

---

DODD, MEAD & COMPANY, INC.

432 PARK AVENUE SOUTH, NEW YORK

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

Important New Texts in Political Science . . .

Essentials of American Government

1962

Cortez A. M. Ewing, University of Oklahoma
Jewell Cass Phillips, University of Pennsylvania

The basic principles of national, state, and local government are thoroughly explored in this outstanding new treatment.

- Strong combination of social processes and structure.
- Stimulating chapters on politics and government and America's role in international affairs.
- A separate treatment of metropolitan government.
- Study aids include charts and graphs, tables, a Glossary of terms, and end-of-chapter references.
- Contemporary cartoons.

Essentials of National Government

Contains the first nineteen chapters of Essentials of American Government in a convenient paper-bound volume.

INSTRUCTOR'S MANUAL

available for both books

College Division 55 Fifth Avenue, New York 3, New York

American Book Company

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

A New Van Nostrand Series Of Comparative Government Books

William G. Andrews, Assistant Professor of Government at Tufts University, is editing a series of readers in comparative government as part of the Van Nostrand Political Science Series. These will provide a fresh, up-to-date, comprehensive approach to the study of contemporary political systems. By March three titles in this sub-series will be available.

CONSTITUTIONS AND CONSTITUTIONALISM

by William G. Andrews. "This is an excellent and most useful contribution to the field of comparative government. Teachers and students alike will find this collection of pertinent texts almost indispensable, especially since no other work of the kind is in print. The editor's notes are enlightening and precise." Professor Henry W. Ehrmann, Dartmouth College.

"Very useful for any courses that deal with constitutions only in part or in passing. The material is well selected and annotated." Professor Daniel Lerner, Professor of Sociology, Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

1961, 192 pages, paperbound, $1.50.

EUROPEAN POLITICAL INSTITUTIONS

A Comparative Government Reader

by William G. Andrews. This collection of 57 readings presents the principal political institutions of Great Britain, France, Germany and the Soviet Union—included are essays by top-level government leaders. The readings, grouped under five categories (governmental systems, political parties, elections, legislatures, executives) vividly portray the style and values of the respective political systems. About 385 pages, paperbound, March 1962.

AMERICAN NATIONAL POLITICAL INSTITUTIONS

Some Key Readings

by William G. Andrews. As complement to European Political Institutions, this text provides in convenient form some "core" readings concerning the American government. Like its companion volume, it is organized around key concepts of government (fundamental principles, political parties, congress, the presidency, and the supreme court). It includes selections from the Federalist Papers, de Tocqueville's classic, Democracy in America, some key Supreme Court decisions, and discussions of the Presidency by William H. Taft, Theodore Roosevelt, and John F. Kennedy. About 205 pages, paperbound, about $1.50, March 1962.

D. VAN NOSTRAND COMPANY, INC.

120 Alexander St.

Princeton, N.J.

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

THE NEW COMMUNIST MANIFESTO and Related Documents

Dan N. Jacobs, Miami University, Editor. In the Second Edition, Professor Jacobs has added the Program of CPSU, first published in draft form on July 30, 1961, and here included in final form as ratified by the Party Congress XXII on October 31, 1961.

The documents in the original edition, all of which are still included, are: The New Communist Manifesto of 1960, Khrushchev's "secret" address to the Party Congress XX, Lenin's Testament with the codicil, the original Communist Manifesto, The 1957 Declaration of the Communist and workers' parties delegates, Mao's "Let a Hundred Flowers Blossom" speech, and extracts from Edvard Kardelj's "Socialism and War." Second Edition, 256 pp. Paper, $1.45

---

POLITICS, THE CONSTITUTION, AND THE SUPREME COURT

Loren P. Beth, University of Massachusetts. An introduction to the study of constitutional law, this book emphasizes the things that political science students should know about our judiciary: the role it plays in our political system, the reasons why it has been given such a role, and how it performs. Primarily useful as a supplement to the usual case or text materials used in the constitutional law course, and may also be used as supplementary reading in other courses. About 192 pp. Probably $2.00.

---

THE SUPREME COURT AND AMERICAN ECONOMIC LIFE

Benjamin Munn Ziegler, Amherst College. A collection of thirty-seven land-mark decisions of the Supreme Court, touching all phases of the relationships between government and business. Concisely excised opinions, clearly introduced. 288 pp. $2.40.

---

Examination copies available upon request to teachers of the appropriate courses.

---

HARPER & ROW, PUBLISHERS
Home office: 49 East 33rd Street, New York, New York

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

---

THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW

Published quarterly by The American Political Science Association

EDITORIAL BOARD

- HARVEY C. MANSFIELD, Managing Editor, Ohio State University
WALLACE S. SAYRE, Associate Editor, Columbia University (on leave) DWIGHT WALDO, University of California Berkeley (at Bologna, Italy)
SAMUEL H. BEER, Associate Editor, Harvard University HAROLD STEIN, University of Michigan
ALEXANDER HEARD, University of North Carolina
OTTO KIRCHHEIMER, Columbia University JOHN D. LEWIS, Oberlin College

EDITORIAL ASSOCIATES

- THOMAS H. ELIOT, Book Review Editor, Washington University (St. Louis) WILLIAM H. ROBERTS, Catholic University
CECELIA M. KENYON, Smith College
RALPH A. STRAETZ, News and Notes Editor, New York University JULIAN FELDMAN, University of California (Berkeley)
FRANKLIN L. BURDETTE, University of Maryland
HIRAM M. STOUT, Washington, D.C.

EDITORIAL OFFICE

Managing Editor, APSA
100 University Hall, Ohio State
University, 216 N. Oval Dr.,
Columbus 10, Ohio

EXECUTIVE OFFICE

Executive Director, APSA
1726 Massachusetts Avenue, N.W.
Washington 6, D.C.

---

THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW, published quarterly during the months of March, June, September, and December, is supplied to all APSA members. Individual and institutional memberships are $15.00 a year ($6.00 for graduate and undergraduate students). Foreign currency at the official exchange rate will be accepted for foreign subscriptions and foreign membership fees. The equivalent of $1 for additional postage should be added for foreign subscriptions.

Current issues are priced at $3.75 per copy. Prices of other issues are furnished on request.

Applications for membership, orders for the REVIEW, and remittances should be addressed to the Executive Director, The American Political Science Association, 1726 Massachusetts Avenue, N.W., Washington 6, D.C. Notices of change of address should be received in the Washington office by the 5th day of the month of publication.

Address correspondence about contributions to the REVIEW to Harvey C. Mansfield, 100 University Hall, 216 N. Oval Dr., Ohio State University, Columbus 10, Ohio; books intended for review, Victor T. LeVine, Washington University, St. Louis, Mo.; News and Notes items, to Ralph Straetz, Department of Political Science, New York University, University Heights, New York, N.Y.; advertising correspondence, to the Executive Director at the Washington office.

Articles and notes appearing in the REVIEW before the June, 1953 issue were indexed in The Reader's Guide to Periodical Literature. The International Index to Periodicals indexes current issues. Microfilm of the REVIEW, beginning with Volume 46, may be obtained from University Microfilms, 300 North First Street, Ann Arbor, Michigan.

---

Office of publication: Curtis Reed Plaza, Menasha, Wisconsin.

Foreign Agent: P. S. King and Staples, Ltd., Great Smith Street, Westminster, London.

Second class postage paid at Menasha, Wisconsin. Acceptance for mailing at special rate of postage provided for in Section 1103, Act of October 3, 1917, authorized May 12, 1926.

Printed in the United States of America by George Banta Company, Inc., Menasha, Wisconsin.

Copyright, 1962, by The American Political Science Association.

books you like

ESSAYS ON THE SCIENTIFIC STUDY OF POLITICS

Herbert J. Storing, (Ed.) University of Chicago; Walter Berns, Cornell University;
Robert Horwitz, Michigan State University; Leo Strauss, University of Chicago; Leo Weinstein, Smith College

• "This is a thoroughly first-class book. It is scholarly, very interestingly written and broad in coverage. Its point of view, though somewhat unorthodox, is refreshing and surely stimulating." Paul G. Steinbicker, St. Louis Univ. • "An excellent and long needed analysis of the current scientific approach to the study of politics." H. M. MacDonald, Univ. of Texas • "... raises many interesting questions, offers many illuminating insights." Daniel Lerner, M.I.T. • "... a valuable contribution to the discussion of the methodology of political science." John Herz, City College of N.Y. • "This is a book that should be read by anyone who has any pretension to being a political scientist." Howard White, Miami Univ., Ohio Jan. 1962, 340 pp., $5.50

THE LOGIC OF DEMOCRACY

Thomas Landon Thorson, University of Wisconsin

"This book is one long past due in the area of political philosophy. Professor Thorson is to be commended for showing that democracy is a philosophical problem, and hence can best be discussed and tentatively solved through an analysis and constructive criticism of what political scientists, philosophers, and men in the street hold the values of democracy to be." William Toland, Baylor Univ. Jan. 1962, 176 pp., $2.25 paper and will like

AMERICAN GOVERNMENT ANNUAL, 1962-63

Ivan Hinderaker, (Ed.) University of California, Los Angeles

Articles include: Communism, Socialism, Democracy: Perspectives—Thorson; The President and the Civil Rights of Negroes—Longaker; Politics and Reform in American Cities—Wilson; Kennedy and the 87th Congress—Koenig; American Foreign Policy—Gerberding; The Supreme Court and Issues for the Sixties—Beaney. May 1962, 128 pp., $1.95 paper.

THE AMERICAN POLITICAL DICTIONARY

Jack C. Plano and Milton Greenberg, both of Western Michigan University

Over 1100 terms, agencies, court cases, and statutes are defined and described in terms of their significance to the problems, practices, and institutions of American government. An important aid in all courses dealing with American government. Aug. 1962, 384 pp., $5.95 casebound, $2.95 paper, tentative

Holt, Rinehart and Winston
383 Madison Ave., New York 17

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

ANNOUNCING *new for 1962

MODERN GOVERNMENTS, Second Edition

by Harold Zink, Professor of Political Science, Ohio State University

The four major powers of Europe—Great Britain, France, Germany, and the Soviet Union—and also, Norway, Sweden, Canada, the Latin American countries, Japan and India, are offered in a balanced picture of world political institutions. By considering recent developments in such areas as the welfare state, nationalization of industry, and the rising clamor for independence among colonial peoples, this new edition presents a meaningful appraisal of current trends. The new 1962 edition incorporates current facts and figures, and has new additions to the bibliographies. The section on France has been thoroughly expanded and revised to reflect the major political developments and the Fifth Republic, Algeria, and the French Constitution. Material on Germany and the USSR has also been extensively revised. 824 pages, prob. $6.95

New Books of Exceptional Interest:

GOVERNMENTS AND POLITICS OF THE MIDDLE EAST in the Twentieth Century

by H. B. Sharabi, Associate Professor of History and Government, Georgetown University

This important new text clearly describes the structure, functioning, and politics of contemporary Middle Eastern governments. One pre-publication reviewer comments: "This is an excellent piece of work and would make a first-rate textbook . . . the volume is better designed for political science courses on the Middle East than any book on the market at the present time . . . Sharabi handles the English language with deftness and precision. His style is clear, economical, and eminently readable. . . ." 309 pages, text ed. $6.50

THE IMPERIALISM READER

Documents and Readings on Modern Expansionism

by Louis L. Snyder, Professor of History, The City College of New York

The many-faceted problems relating to imperialism are explored in this comprehensive collection of 178 readings and documents. In an extensive introductory essay Professor Snyder authoritatively discusses each phase of modern expansionism. Brief introductory notes before each selection place the wide variety of official documents, eye-witness reports, essays and arguments in proper perspective. Of special interest is the timely and balanced section on Communist imperialism. 636 pages, text ed. $6.75

NEW ANVIL BOOKS

#58 COLD WAR DIPLOMACY: American Foreign Policy, 1945-1960 $1.25
by Norman A. Graebner, Professor of History, University of Illinois

#59 MOVEMENTS OF SOCIAL DISSENT IN MODERN TIMES $1.25
by J. Salwyn Schapiro, Professor Emeritus of History, The City College of New York

D. VAN NOSTRAND COMPANY, INC.

120 Alexander Street • Princeton, New Jersey

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

The American Political Science Review

VOL. LVI

JUNE, 1962

NO. 2

SCIENTISTS, FOREIGN POLICY, AND POLITICS

WARNER R. SCHILLING
Columbia University

... we must take, so far as we can, a picture of the world into our minds. Is it not a startling circumstance for one thing that the great discoveries of science, that the quiet study of men in laboratories, that the thoughtful developments which have taken place in quiet lecture rooms, have now been turned to the destruction of civilization? ... The enemy whom we have just overcome had at its seats of learning some of the principal centres of scientific study and discovery, and used them in order to make destruction sudden and complete; and only the watchful, continuous cooperation of men can see to it that science, as well as armed men, is kept within the harness of civilization.<sup>1</sup>

I

These words were spoken in Paris in January 1919 by Woodrow Wilson, addressing the second Plenary Session of the Peace Conference. Wilson believed he had found a watchdog for civilization in the League of Nations. In this he was sadly mistaken. Science and armed men have indeed been harnessed, but in order to promote and maintain the goals of conflicting politics. Whether in the pursuit of these ends the cause of civilization will yet be served remains, we may hope, an open question.

The cooperation of scientists and armed men was not a new relationship, even in Wilson's day. In the United States, for example, the president of the American Association for the Advancement of Science had declared in 1861:

... it is easy to see that there are few applications of science which do not bear on the interests

<sup>1</sup> U. S. Department of State, Papers Relating to the Foreign Relations of the United States, The Peace Conference, 13 vols. (Washington, 1942-1947), vol. 3, p. 179.

An earlier version of this paper was prepared for discussion at the Fifth Congress of the International Political Science Association in Paris, September, 1961. The points made in it owe much to the comment and counsel of William T. R. Fox.

of commerce and navigation, naval or military concerns, the customs, the lighthouses, the public lands, post offices or post roads, either directly or remotely. If all examination is refused ... the Government may lose a most important advantage.<sup>2</sup>

As a result of the interest of a number of American scientists and government officials, the National Academy of Sciences was established in 1863 for the purpose of providing scientific advice to the United States Government. The use made of this Academy by the War Department between 1863 and 1913 speaks a bygone era. During those years the Department requested the Academy to constitute scientific committees on exactly five matters:

On the Question of Tests for the Purity of Whiskey; On the Preservation of Paint on Army Knapsacks; On Galvanic Action from Association of Zinc and Iron; On the Exploration of the Yellowstone; On questions of Meteorological Science and its Applications.<sup>3</sup>

<sup>2</sup> Quoted in Science and Technology Act of 1958, Staff Study of the Senate Committee on Government Operations, 85th Cong., 2d sess., Washington, 1958, p. 110.

<sup>3</sup> Ibid., p. 115.

It would be unfair to presume from this list that the War Department was uninterested in new weapons systems. Until about the turn of the century, military technology, like industrial technology, generally developed independently of advances in basic scientific knowledge. Thus, in 1915, when Wilson's Secretary of the Navy decided to establish a "Department of Invention and Development" in the hope of securing effective weapons with which to combat that "new and terrible engine of warfare . . . the submarine," it was the inventor, Thomas Edison, who was asked to head the new organization.<sup>4</sup> Although the contributions of university and industrial scientists to the fighting of World War I were marked enough to have caught Wilson's imagination, it was not until a generation later, with the advent of World War II, that the mobilization of scientists brought military results which were of great and in some instances decisive importance to the course of combat.

What has transformed the relationship between science and war has been the fact that in the twentieth century the development of technology has become increasingly dependent upon advances in basic knowledge about the physical world. Moreover, in the technically advanced nations, both the rate of technological innovation and the growth of new scientific knowledge have been increasing exponentially. As crudely measured by the volume of scientific publication, scientific knowledge has been doubling every ten to fifteen years.<sup>5</sup> In a non-Wilsonian world, the consequences of these conditions for national security policy have been as necessary as they are obvious. As the United States and the Soviet Union throw one weapons system after another into the effort to maintain at least a balance of terror, neither dares fall behind in either the discovery of new physical relationships or in the application of scientific knowledge to military hardware and political-military strategy. Thus, by the end of the first decade of the Cold War, about 50 per cent of the engineers in the United States and 25 per cent of the scientists were employed by the Federal government, either directly or on contract, and about 65 per cent of the scientific research in universities and 57 per cent of that in private industry was government-financed.<sup>6</sup>

Indicative of the new relationship between science and war, figures and graphs comparing the Great Powers in numbers of scientists and engineers have become as familiar as those in the 1930s which compared the Powers in their output of steel, coal, and oil. Nor is it only in the military field that science and technology have become vital to the course of foreign policy. Science has been harnessed to the advancement of foreign policy goals in such diverse fields as the exploration of space, birth and disease control, weather modification, economic development, and global communications.<sup>7</sup>

Present, prospective, and future developments in science and technology are certain to bring a host of problems and opportunities to those responsible for the conduct of foreign policy. In recognition of this fact, the governments of the major Powers have endeavored to find ways to make themselves more alert to such developments and more active in determining the course of science and technology. The United States and the Soviet Union are the most extensively engaged in this effort, but it should not be forgotten that the nations of Western and Central Europe were among the pioneers in cultivating the relationship between science and government. The three elements that have revolutionized current military technology and strategy (electronics, missiles, and nuclear weapons) had their harbingers in the World War II development of British radar, the German V-2, and the American A-bomb, and it is noteworthy that the two European developments were conceived, initiated, and directed by officials and employees of established government organizations. In contrast, the American A-bomb was the result of conceptions and initiatives that came from outside the government—and primarily from exiled Europeans at that.

As an integral part of the efforts of governments to become both more responsive to and responsible for the development of science and <sup>4</sup> See Daniels' letter to Edison, in Josephus Daniels, The Wilson Era: Years of Peace, 1910-1917 (Chapel Hill: The University of North Carolina Press, 1944), p. 491.

<sup>5</sup> Ellis A. Johnson, "The Crisis in Science and Technology and its Effect on Military Development," Operations Research, January-February 1958, pp. 14-15.

<sup>6</sup> See Lee A. DuBridge, "The American Scientist: 1955," Yale Review, Spring 1955, p. 13, and the Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists, March 1957, p. 82, and May-June 1961, p. 254. The figure for private industry is for the year 1959; the others are for the year 1955.

<sup>7</sup> For a more detailed treatment of some of the points in the preceding paragraphs and a general discussion of the effect of science on international relations, see the present writer's "Science, Technology, and Foreign Policy," Journal of International Affairs, Fall 1959, pp. 7-18.

technology, scientists have been invited into the highest councils of government, and it is with some of the problems occasioned by the presence of these "new" participants in the making of national policy that the remainder of this article will be concerned. Although some illustrative material will be drawn from the experience of other governments, the paper focuses on problems associated with the participation of scientists in the American policy process.

Needless to say, the problems in policy-making that may arise will vary greatly with the kind of scientist participating (oceanographer, theoretical physicist, specialist in space medicine, industrial chemist), with the nature of the policy issue at stake (weapons development, science education, public health, the exploration of space, the allocation of funds for basic research), and with the manner in which the scientist is involved in the policy process (member of the attentive public, adviser to the President, worker in a government laboratory, official in an executive department or agency). This article will make no attempt to deal systematically with the combinations possible among these three variables (profession, issue, and involvement). The discussion will be confined to a few of the central problems that the layman and the scientist are likely to encounter in working together on national security issues; and the treatment, as will become evident, will be of a very general and suggestive order.

In their general character, the problems occasioned by the participation of scientists in the determination of high policy are not nearly so novel as is generally supposed. The scientist has been brought into the councils of government because he possesses specialized skills and information believed relevant to the identification and resolution of particular policy problems. His relationship to the policy process is therefore a familiar one, that of an expert. Just as Sputnik I precipitated the establishment of a Special Assistant to the President for Science and Technology, so the earlier problems of fighting World War II and insuring postwar employment had brought the Joint Chiefs of Staff and the Council of Economic Advisers into the Offices of the President.

The central problems in policy-making posed by the entry of scientists into the policy process are thus formally no different from those associated with any other expert involved in the determination of national security policy. In particular, four such problems can be noted. (1) Like all experts, scientists will at times disagree, and the non-scientist (be he politician, administrator, or an expert in some other field) will confront the problem of choosing a course of action in the face of conflicting scientific advice. (2) Like all experts, scientists will at times evince certain predispositions toward the resolution of the policy problems on which their advice is sought, and the non-scientist will confront the problem of identifying the policy predilections peculiar to scientists and being on his guard against them. (3) The non-scientist and scientist will confront one problem in common, and that is how to organize themselves to maximize the contribution that science can make to the government's programs, opportunities, and choices. Finally, (4) the scientist will confront a problem common to all experts who participate in the American policy process, and that is how to engage in politics without debasing the coinage of his own expertise.

II

The difficulties the non-scientist confronts in choosing a course of action in the face of conflicting scientific advice seem inherently no more formidable than those a non-expert would face in deciding what to do in the event of conflicting advice from economists, soldiers, or specialists on Soviet foreign policy. There are at least seven procedures that the non-expert can follow in such circumstances, singly or in combination, and they appear to have about the same promise, for better or for worse, regardless of the kind of experts involved.<sup>8</sup>

The first step the non-scientist can take is to make certain that it is really conflicting scientific advice he is receiving. In the fall of 1949 President Truman asked Secretary Acheson to look into the disputes then current within the Atomic Energy Commission and elsewhere about the consequences of undertaking an intensive effort to make an H-bomb. Upon investigation the Secretary of State concluded that the scientists involved were not really very far apart except on the foreign policy issues that were his and Truman's responsibility to decide.<sup>9</sup>

<sup>8</sup> Cf. the implication in the following remarks of Glenn T. Seaborg, the Chairman of the Atomic Energy Commission: "Scientists don't necessarily have to make the final political decisions, but it might be easier to let a capable scientist learn political reality than to teach a politician science." Quoted in the Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists, February 1961, p. 79.

<sup>9</sup> In this and subsequent undocumented references the present writer has drawn upon personal interviews during 1956-1958 with participants in the H-bomb decision.

Procedures two and three are simple: the non-scientist may be guided by quantitative or qualitative features of the division (he can side with the majority, or with that side whose past record is the more confidence-inspiring). Failing these, there is, four, the "principle of least harm" and, five, the "principle of minimal choice." In the former, one chooses that course of action which appears to involve the least cost if the technical premise on which it is based proves to be wrong. Thus in World War II, given the American belief that the Germans were hard at work on an A-bomb, it seemed more sensible to spend $2 billion on the assumption that the bomb could be made than to do little or nothing on the assumption that it could not. In the case of the "principle of minimal choice," one chooses that course of action which seems to close off the least number of future alternatives. This was the character of President Truman's first decision on the H-bomb. He decided to go ahead in the effort to explore the feasibility of an H-bomb, but nothing was decided about technical steps of a greater political or military consequence (for example, testing a device if one were fabricated, or preparing to produce the materials that would be required for weapons production in the event of a successful test).<sup>10</sup>

In the case of procedure six the non-scientist can make his choice among conflicting scientists on the basis of whichever technical estimate is most in accord with policy on which he was already intent. (In contrast to the first procedure, where the non-scientist endeavors to factor out of the conflict the policy preferences of the scientists, here he is factoring into the conflict his own policy preferences.) In the spring of 1942, the British scientists Henry Tizard and F. A. Lindemann (Lord Cherwell) diverged greatly in their estimates of the destruction that could be accomplished by an intensive bombing of the homes of the German working class. There was general agreement among the soldiers and politicians involved that if the lower estimate were correct there were better military uses for the resources the bombing campaign would require, but in the end the campaign was made in the expectation that the higher estimate would prove to be the more accurate (which it did not). This choice was clearly influenced by Churchill's interest in presenting the Russians with a dramatically visible contribution to the war against Germany and by the fact that British air doctrine had long presumed the efficacy of strategic bombing.<sup>11</sup>

In procedure seven the non-scientist is guided by his own sense for the scientific and technical problems involved. In the 1949 H-bomb debate, some of the politicians involved were little deterred by the fact that the scientists were by no means confident that they could make such a weapon and by the possibility that an all-out but failing effort might entail very high costs for the A-bomb program. These politicians were willing to press ahead in part because of their belief that the scientists were not really aware of their own potential. Similarly, when the German soldiers, scientists, and engineers engaged in the development of the V-2 divided on the question of whether it should be launched from mobile or fixed batteries, Hitler's own technical enthusiasm for large, hardened bunkers led him, unwisely as it turned out, to decide on behalf of the latter.<sup>12</sup>

In concluding this survey of the problem of conflicting advice, it should be noted that one of the more likely outcomes is that the actions of the contending scientists may prove much more influential than the procedures followed by the non-scientist. Divided experts will not always be equal in their physical or personal access to the decision-maker, in the persistence with which they state their case, or in the force and clarity of their arguments. Thus, in the H-bomb debate, there were instances where equally qualified scientists differed greatly in the time and energy they spent circulating their views of the technical (and political) prospects, and such differences were by no means without consequence for the judgments of others.<sup>13</sup>

<sup>11</sup> See C. P. Snow, Science and Government (Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1961), pp. 47-51, the review of this book by P. M. S. Blackett in Scientific American, April 1961, pp. 192-194, and Winston S. Churchill, The Second World War: The Hinge of Fate (Boston: Houghton Mifflin Company, 1950), p. 281. For British air doctrine see also Herbert S. Dinnerstein, "The Impact of Air Power on the International Scene, 1933-1940," Military Affairs, Summer 1955, pp. 67-68.

<sup>12</sup> Maj. Gen. Walter Dornberger, V-2 (New York: Ballantine Books, 1954), pp. 97, 158-160, and Lt. Gen. James M. Gavin, War and Peace in the Space Age (New York, 1958), pp. 76-77.

<sup>13</sup> Note should also be taken of the problem the policy-maker faces when all his experts are agreed. The present writer is unable to suggest a useful <sup>10</sup> For the "principle of least harm," see Bernard Brodie, "Strategy as a Science," World Politics, July 1949, p. 479n. On the H-bomb choice, see the present writer's "The H-Bomb Decision: How To Decide Without Actually Choosing," Political Science Quarterly, March 1961, pp. 37-38.

III

The discussion of the policy predispositions displayed by scientists must be entered with considerable caution. The major theoretical premise involved is that all experts will evidence certain predilections with regard to policy and policy-making which are the result of the character of their expertise: their skills, knowledge, and experience. Since experts differ in the skills, knowledge, and experience they command (or in the responsibilities with which they are charged), they will differ in the biases they characteristically exhibit. Thus scientists, soldiers, and diplomats jointly concerned with a policy problem are likely to approach the question of how and in what manner it should be resolved with rather dissimilar predispositions.

These points, however, are easier stated than demonstrated. To begin with, it should be clear that, insofar as policy is concerned, "the scientific mind" is as much a chimera as "the military mind." Scientists, like soldiers and the rest of us, differ greatly in the ideas they have about the political world and the things that will (or ought to) happen in it, and their views on foreign policy matters are far more likely to be reflective of these differences than conditioned by their common professional skills and interests. Moreover, even if differences in expertise or responsibility were the only factors determining the views of policy-makers (and they certainly are not), one would still have to take account of the fact that scientists are as varied in their professional skills and pursuits as soldiers. The perspectives of a theoretical procedure here (other than variations on numbers five, six, and seven above); but that the problem is a real one can be seen in the conclusion of the German physicists that it would be infeasible for any Power to develop an atomic bomb during World War II. Some of the German scientists later stated that political considerations were partly responsible for their advice and for the fact that they made so little progress themselves on an A-bomb (cf. procedure one).

---

The German work on the A-bomb during World War II is described in Samuel A. Goudsmit, Alsos (New York: Henry Schuman, Inc., 1947). For various appraisals of the influence exercised by political considerations, see Robert Jungk, Brighter than a Thousand Suns (New York: Harcourt, Brace and Company, 1958), pp. 88-104, Hans Bethe in the Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists, December 1958, p. 427, and William L. Laurence, Men and Atoms (New York: Simon and Schuster, 1959), pp. 90-93.

physicist engaged in basic research are no more to be equated with those of an organic chemist engaged in applying extant knowledge to the improvement of an industrial product than is the outlook of a staff officer in Washington drafting a war plan to be considered identical with that of a general in charge of a theatre of operations.

In addition to these difficulties, analysis must also contend with the fact that it is directed toward a moving target. The policy perspectives that a physicist may have developed as a result of two decades in a university laboratory are unlikely to endure without change after a few years on a Washington advisory committee. Many American scientists are well along the same route that transformed the policy perspectives of large numbers of the American military profession during the war and immediate postwar years. As a result of new problems and new responsibilities, these soldiers acquired new skills, knowledge, and experience. In consequence, with regard to their approach to foreign policy, some are, for all practical purposes, interchangeable between the Pentagon and the State Department, and one could wish that there were more diplomats equally well equipped to work on both sides of the Potomac.

With these reservations in mind, six policy perspectives will be presented here which seem moderately characteristic of many scientists, most of them physicists, who have participated in national security policy in recent times. Most of these predispositions were first evidenced during their work with the military during World War II, and the extent and manner in which they have been later operative in reference to larger foreign policy issues is not always easy to document, since most of the sources are still classified. Needless to say, in outlining these predispositions, one is presenting a cross between a caricature and a Weberian ideal type, not describing real people. In discussing these predispositions, the present writer does not mean to convey the impression that they are either "good" or "bad" from the point of view of policy or policy-making, or that one or another of these predispositions may not also be evidenced by groups other than scientists. The point to this discussion is that if certain orders of scientists are indeed prone to these or other policy predispositions, the non-scientist will be wise to be alert to them, even if in the event he should conclude that they are all for the good.

Naive utopianism or naive belligerency. C.P. Snow has described the scientist as an impatient optimist in his approach to social wrongs; he is quick to search for something to do and inclined to expect favorable results.<sup>14</sup> Certainly, the scientist's profession inclines him to look at problems in terms of searching for a solution to them. When this perspective is turned to problems of international politics, however, the scientist's approach often appears open to the characterization of "naive utopianism or naive belligerency."<sup>15</sup> His approach to international relations appears simplistic and mechanistic. It is almost as if he conceives of policy being made primarily by forward-looking, solution-oriented, rational-thinking types like himself.

In these perspectives the scientist is likely to find little in common with the diplomat (who is inclined to believe that most of his problems have no solution, and who is in any event too busy with the crises of the day to plan for tomorrow), or with the politician (whose approach to problems is so spasmodic as to seem neither analytical nor rational, and whose policy positions are anyway soon blurred by his efforts to accommodate to the positions of others), or with the professional student of international politics (who, when the opportunity permits, lectures the scientist on the elegant complexity of the political process, but who never seems, to the scientist at least, to have any really good ideas about what to do). It is perhaps these differences in perspective that lead the scientist on occasion to seem "intellectually arrogant"; it is as if he concludes that those who have no promising solutions or are not seeking them cannot be very bright. In his predisposition toward action and solutions, the scientist comes closest to sharing the predilection of the soldier for decision, which may be one reason why their partnership has been so spectacularly successful.

The whole problem approach. The first grant made by the United States Government for experimental research was in 1832 to the Franklin Institute. The scientists were asked to investigate the reasons for explosions in steamboat boilers. They reported back not only with a technical explanation but with a draft bill to provide for Federal regulation of steamboats.<sup>16</sup> In this they evidenced the scientist's predilection for the "whole problem approach." The reluctance of scientists to apply their expertise to mere fragments of the total problem, especially under conditions where those who prescribe the fragments do not reveal the whole of which they are a part, was evident in the work of both British and American scientists during World War II. Military officials initially approached the scientists with requests for the development of particular weapons and devices without revealing the military problems or reasoning responsible for their requests. The scientists objected to this procedure, and they were eventually able to persuade the soldiers to inform them of the general military problems involved in order that the scientists might reach their own conclusions about the kinds of weapons and devices the military would need to meet those problems.<sup>17</sup>

In 1952, in connection with an Air Force project on air defense, a group of American scientists were asked to review the prospects for improving the nation's continental air defense. The scientists concluded that some new and promising systems were possible, and they submitted an estimate of what the developments might cost. They also recommended that the money be spent. The Air Force did not approve the recommendation, and as is customary in Washington the disputants on both sides began to search for allies and to leak their cases to the press. Certain Air Force officials, who feared that additional funds for air defense would come at the expense of dollars otherwise available for the Strategic Air Command and who were convinced that this would be militarily undesirable, charged that the scientists by entering into matters of military strategy and budget policy had exceeded both their assignment and their expertise. Commenting on this charge, one of the scientists involved later explained that he would have little interest in working on a study project that did not have the potential for leading into the question of whether the conclusions should be acted upon.<sup>18</sup>

<sup>17</sup> This persuasion was largely accomplished through demonstrations of the military utility of the scientists' taking such an approach, although in the early history of the M.I.T. Radiation Laboratory a certain amount of polite bargaining was apparently practiced. One scientist involved, whenever told that the reason for a request was a problem for Washington, not him, to worry about, adopted the practice of working on something else until he was given a description of the problem involved. For a brief summary of the British experience, see Alexander Haddow, "The Scientist as Citizen," Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists, September 1956, p. 247.

<sup>18</sup> Cf. the following exchange between Gordon Gray and Jerrold Zacharias during the Oppen-

<sup>14</sup> C. P. Snow, The Two Cultures and the Scientific Revolution (New York: Cambridge University Press, 1959), pp. 9-11.

<sup>15</sup> I am indebted to Hans Speier for the phrasing of this point.

<sup>16</sup> Don K. Price, Government and Science (New York: New York University Press, 1954), pp. 10-11.

The predisposition to want to be told and to deal with the whole problem no doubt has its base in the professional experience of scientists (and one of the central credos of science) that good ideas on a problem may come from the most unexpected quarters and that the widest possible dissemination of information about a problem will significantly enhance its chances for an early solution.<sup>19</sup> Still, there are problems and problems; some are open to determinate solutions, and others can be resolved only through the exercise of political power. The point about the "whole problem approach," as the air defense example illustrates, is that it not only helps propel the scientists from an advisory to a political role but it serves to make the scientist somewhat blind to the fact that he is so moving. In its most extreme form, the "whole problem approach" coupled with the "intellectual arrogance" perspective can lead to such instances as when, on one high-level advisory committee concerned with several areas of national security policy, a scientist whose formal claim to participation was a knowledge of infra-red ray phenomena was reportedly quite free with his proposals for what political policies should be adopted with regard to the United Nations.

Quantum jumps versus improvements. A number of scientists have advanced the proposition that the military tend to be more interested in improving existing weapons than in developing radically new ones, and they have urged that a separate civilian agency be established to undertake such development. Both scientists and soldiers have explained this difference in their approach to military research and development, "quantum jumps versus improvements," with the hypothesis that the soldier's interest in developing entirely new weapons must always be inhibited by his concern for the possibility that war may come in the near future, since in this event his interests are best served by improving existing weapons. It has also been suggested that military leaders, who must be prepared at any time to ask others to take up the weapons at hand and fight with them, cannot afford to let themselves or others become too impressed with the deficiencies of those weapons as compared with others that might have been had.<sup>20</sup>

An explanation less flattering to the military for this difference is the occasional assertion by scientists that theirs is a profession which stimulates original and creative thought, while that of the military tends to develop minds which accept the existing situation without too much question. As indicated in the discussion of the first predilection, this is a judgment which the scientist may extend to the diplomat and the politician as well. The structure of both the domestic and the international political process is normally such as to make "quantum jumps" in policy infeasible. Diplomats and politicians are accustomed to seeing the same old policy problems come around year after year, and they are generally intent on policies which promise only slow and modest change. Scientists, on the other hand, have been demanding and searching for quantum jumps in foreign policy ever since the end of World War II. It is symptomatic that the first proposal developed by the Advisory Committee on Science and Technology to the Democratic National Advisory Council, established in 1959, was for the creation of a new scientific agency, independent of the State and Defense Departments, whose function would be "to face all the problems of disarmament."<sup>21</sup>

Technology for its own sweet sake. In the sum-heimer hearing. Gray: "If you were directing a study which had to do with electronics, a pretty clearly defined field, and it started to come up with recommendations with respect to foreign policy, would you feel that an official of the Defense Department who urged that you stick to electronics was acting with impropriety?" Zacharias: "I think I would not direct a project that was as restrictive as that, sir, as to be restricted only to electronics." U. S. Atomic Energy Commission, In the Matter of J. Robert Oppenheimer, Transcript of Hearing before Personnel Security Board, Washington, 1954, p. 930.

For some of the issues involved in the 1952 air defense study, see ibid., pp. 598-99, 749-50, 763-65, 923-24, 930-31, 935, 938, and also the account in Price, Government and Science, pp. 136-38.

<sup>19</sup> General Leslie Groves, who directed the Manhattan project, was especially sensitive to the scientists' tendency to take on the whole problem. (Some even advised him on how the garbage should be collected at Los Alamos, an act which may possibly have reflected self- rather than scientific interest.) One reason for his effort to compartmentalize the work scientists were doing was his fear that "if I brought them into the whole project, they would never do their own job. There was just too much of scientific interest, and they would just be frittering from one thing to another." Oppenheimer Transcript, p. 164.

<sup>20</sup> See, for example, Lloyd V. Berkner, "Science and National Strength," Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists, June 1953, pp. 155, 180.

<sup>21</sup> See the Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists, December 1959, p. 412.

mer of 1945, after the A-bomb had been tested but before the first drop on Japan, the Director of the Los Alamos Laboratory, J. Robert Oppenheimer, suggested to his superior, General Leslie Groves, that if some improvements were made in the design of the bomb it would be more effective. Groves decided against the improvements because he did not want to incur any delay in the use of the bomb, which he expected would end the war with Japan. In the summer of 1943, after the Director of the German V-2 project, General Dornberger, had finally secured a first-class priority for the use of the weapon, those responsible for producing it in quantity were increasingly handicapped by the scientists and engineers who kept improving but changing its design. Dornberger was finally obliged to issue a flat order against any further improvements.<sup>22</sup>

There was nothing irresponsible in these scientists' actions. Charged with the technical development of weapons, they would have been remiss in their responsibilities if they had failed to call attention to the prospects for improvement. The point to the examples is that scientists and engineers, in the pursuit of their own responsibilities and interests, may easily lose sight of those of the policy maker.

The scientists on the General Advisory Committee to the Atomic Energy Commission who recommended against the development of an H-bomb in 1949 did so in part because of their concern for the foreign-policy consequences of introducing a weapon of such destructive power into the world. Oppenheimer, the Chairman of the Committee, later stated that the thermonuclear design developed by Edward Teller in 1951 was "technically so sweet" that, if it had been available in 1949, the Committee would probably not have made the recommendation that it did. Since, with a technically more promising design at hand, one might suppose that the Committee's foreign-policy concerns would have been all the greater, some observers have concluded that in the pursuit of his technical interests the scientist can also easily lose sight of his own policy concerns.<sup>23</sup>

Such a judgment ignores the complexity of the Committee's position. For example, one of the reasons why the Committee thought the United States should take the initiative in renouncing the H-bomb was precisely because the device then in view seemed likely to be both difficult to make and of dubious military value. It was thought that for this reason the Russians might be willing to follow the American example and that, if they did not, the United States would not have risked much by the delay. These were considerations which obviously would have been changed if a technically more promising design had been available in 1949.<sup>24</sup> Still, the comments of several scientists close to these events are not without relevance. It is their feeling that there are times when the technician does take over, that when the scientist is faced with an interesting and challenging problem his inclination is to get to work on it, and that under these circumstances he should not be the first person to be expected to keep larger policy considerations in balance.

This predisposition, "technology for its own sweet sake," appears to have its roots in two more of science's central credos: the belief in the value of pursuing knowledge for its own sake, and the belief that the best motivation for the direction of research is the strength and character of individual curiosities. But the direction and strength of scientific interests and curiosities is not necessarily coincident with the requirements of military or foreign policy. One of the most recent examples of the scientist's capacity to get caught up in a challenging problem (assigned, to be sure, by policy-makers) is afforded by the ingenious techniques scientists conceived for evading nuclear-test detection systems and for the design of new systems to meet those evasions. In the light of the later course of negotiations, an American statesman who believed there was considerable foreign-policy gain in a test-ban treaty and who believed that the Russians were at one time seriously interested in such a treaty might well conclude that the formula developed by Watson-Watt, the scientist who fathered radar, with reference to the problem of meeting wartime military requirements was not without its implications for meeting peacetime foreign policy requirements: "Give them the third best to go with; the second comes too late, the best never comes."<sup>25</sup> This observation is not intended as an argument that the interests of the United States would have been better served by a test-ban treaty with a "third best" detec-

<sup>22</sup> Oppenheimer Transcript, p. 33, and Dornberger, V-2, pp. 134-137.

<sup>23</sup> Oppenheimer Transcript, p. 251. For an extreme judgment, see Jungk, Brighter Than a Thousand Suns, p. 296.

<sup>24</sup> See Oppenheimer's statements in Oppenheimer Transcript, pp. 81, 251, 897, and "The H-bomb Decision: How to Decide Without Actually Choosing," loc. cit., pp. 30-36.

<sup>25</sup> Sir Robert Watson-Watt, Three Steps to Victory (London: Odhams, 1957), p. 74.

tion system than by no treaty at all. The point is that the policy maker must be sensitive to the prospect that, because of the constant advance of technology, his only real choices may be of this order.

The sense for paradise lost. This predisposition is likely to be more characteristic of the scientists who had their graduate training and early professional experience in the years before World War II than of those who have known only war or Cold War conditions.<sup>26</sup> The prewar scientists took it as an article of faith that certain conditions were essential for the progress of science, in particular that scientists be free to select their research problems and that both scientists and scientific information be free to move among as well as within nations.<sup>27</sup> All of these conditions were violated during World War II, and as a result of the Cold War they were never fully re-established. The nuclear physicists had had perhaps the most highly developed sense of international community. They were relatively few in number, had intimate personal relationships at home and abroad, and had been experiencing an exciting exchange of discoveries since Rutherford identified the nucleus in 1911. They also lost the most, for theirs was militarily the most sensitive knowledge, and the pages of the Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists offer eloquent testimony to their ideological disturbance.

The result is that the senior scientists tend to be especially sensitive to possibilities which hold some promise for restoring the former order. They may usually be found on the side (or in front) of those urging freer exchange of scientific and military information with allied governments, less secrecy in the circulation of scientific (and sometimes military) information, and more extensive cultural, and especially scientific, exchanges with the Soviet Union. Similarly, the major activities of the Foreign Policy Panel of the President's Science Advisory Committee and of the Office of the Science Adviser to the Secretary of State have been in connection with the Science Attaché program, the facilitation of international scientific programs and conferences, and the exchange of scientists with the Soviet Union.<sup>28</sup>

Science serves mankind. For at least 300 years the western scientific tradition has assumed that the unrestricted generation of new knowledge about the world was a social good. Over these years science in its purest form (the discovery of the facts of nature for knowledge's sake alone) became increasingly an autonomous social institution; research scientists were largely disassociated from the practical applications of their discoveries, but they took it for granted that these discoveries would ultimately benefit mankind.<sup>29</sup> The advent of nuclear and bacteriological weapons systems which have the potential of destroying so much of mankind and his works has called this faith sharply into question. It does not take much imagination to wonder if man, in view of his apparent inability to escape from the order of conflicts which have historically resulted in war, would not be better off in a world where the knowledge that has made the new weapons possible did not exist. For some of the senior nuclear physicists this is more than a philosophical question. They are unable to avoid a sense of real personal responsibility; they reason from the premise that they were few, and if they had acted differently weapons development might not have taken the turn it did.

In the immediate postwar years, the apparent contradiction between the good of science and the evil of war was resolved by the expectation that the very destructiveness of the new weapons would lead man to renounce at last the folly of war. The course of foreign policy in later years has weakened these expectations but not destroyed them, as the recent flurry of arms-control proposals premised on the rational self-interest of both sides in avoiding mutual destruction testifies.

The need to preserve their sense of service to mankind led some American scientists to refuse to work on weapons. Similarly, there are reports that several Russian scientists were imprisoned, exiled, or placed under surveillance <sup>26</sup> In 1955 slightly more than half of the active research physicists in the United States were under forty years of age and had received their doctorates after December 7, 1941. Lee A. DuBridge, "The American Scientist: 1955," Yale Review, September 1955, p. 1.

<sup>27</sup> These assumptions are excellently set forth in Margret Smith Stahl, "Splits and Schisms: Nuclear and Social," unpublished doctoral dissertation, University of Wisconsin, 1946, ch. 4.

<sup>28</sup> For the activities of the Panel and the Office, see James R. Killian, "Science and Public Policy," Address to the American Association for the Advancement of Science, December 29, 1958, as printed in Science Program—86th Congress, Report of the Senate Committee on Government Operations, 86th Cong., 1st sess. (1959), pp. 12-13, and The Science Adviser of the Department of State, Department of State Publication 7056 (Washington, 1960).

<sup>29</sup> See Stahl, op. cit., ch. 4.

for refusing to participate in weapons work between 1945 and 1953, and in 1957 a number of Germany's elite physicists announced that they would have no part in nuclear weapons work.<sup>30</sup> Such cases are dramatic, but nowhere have they prevented the development of weapons on which governments were determined. The more consequential resolutions have been those in which scientists have simply identified the good of mankind with the strength of their nation or have endeavored to develop new weapons systems which would be as effective as the old in promoting national policy but which would result in less slaughter if used. This was part of the rationale behind the recommendation made by a group of American scientists in 1951 that the government undertake the development and production of a large number of A-bombs for tactical use in the ground defense of Western Europe. Their hope was that such an innovation would relieve the United States of the burden of having to rely solely on the threat of strategic bombing to contain the Red Army.<sup>31</sup>

The failure of the United States to orbit a satellite before the Soviet Union did was the result of the State Department's insensitivity to the political implications of the event and the decision of the President and the Secretary of Defense not to let a satellite program interfere with military missile programs. A small part of the story, however, is to be found in the reluctance of some of the American scientists involved in the programming of the International Geophysical Year to see an American IGY satellite propelled by an operational military weapon. Their preference for the less developed but non-military Vanguard over the Army's Redstone appears to have reflected a combination of the "sense for paradise lost" and the "science serves mankind" predispositions, in this case an interest in showing the world the peaceful side of science and in demonstrating that the scientists of the world could cooperate in the interests of knowledge as well as compete in the interests of nations.<sup>32</sup>

<sup>30</sup> See Arnold Kramish, Atomic Energy in the Soviet Union (Stanford: Stanford University Press, 1959), p. 105. Kramish states that it is not certain whether the objections of the Russian scientists were technical or political. For the declaration of the German physicists, see the Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists, June 1957, p. 228.

<sup>31</sup> Oppenheimer Transcript, pp. 584, 594-95, 891-94.

<sup>32</sup> See Walter Sullivan, Assault on the Unknown (New York: McGraw-Hill, 1961), pp. 79-81.

IV

With regard to the two remaining problems to be discussed—how to organize relations between science and government, and how the scientist can participate in policy-making and still keep his expert standing—four points seem deserving of special emphasis: (A) the problem of organization, especially in the area of foreign policy, is still very much in the research and development stage, and so it may long remain, considering the precedent set by the problem of how to relate military experts and foreign policy; (B) in many areas of policy it will never be possible to specify what constitutes "the best" organization; the way in which policy-makers are organized is not without influence on the kind of policies they will produce, and so long as there are differences over policy there will be no agreement about organization; (C) in the American political system, at least, the science expert at the high-policy level has no real hope of keeping out of politics; his only choice is in the character of his political style; and finally, (D) it should not be forgotten that organization and policy-making are not the same as policy; successful instances of foreign policy capitalizing on or guiding developments in science and technology will not automatically follow just because scientists have been liberally injected into the policy-making process.

Organization. Current American organization in the area of science and foreign policy still reflects the emergency responses to the Russian ICBM and Sputnik I. One effect of these events was that scientists were rushed to the most important single center of power, the Office of the President, by means of the creation of the Special Assistant to the President for Science and Technology and the President's Science Advisory Committee.

The President certainly needs men around him sensitive to the areas of interaction between science and foreign policy. But a case can be made for the proposition that the center of gravity for the input of scientific advice into the policy-making process should be at a lower level than the White House. The President's political interests lie in keeping the staff about him small and generalized. Well-developed plans and programs will have a better chance of maturing in the larger and more diversified facilities that departments and agencies can provide. Secondly, as C. P. Snow concludes in his account of the differences between Tizard and Lindemann, there are risks in having a single science adviser sitting next to the center of political power. Although it should be noted that Churchill fared better with a single science adviser than Hitler did with none ("The Führer has dreamed," Dornberger was told, "that no [V-2] will ever reach England"), Snow's point has merit and it holds for institutions as well as for individuals.<sup>33</sup> The President will generally find his choices facilitated by the existence of multiple and independent sources of scientific advice.

This is a condition that already prevails in the case of many of the departments and agencies whose actions have significant foreign policy consequences, especially in the use of scientists by the Department of Defense, the Atomic Energy Commission, and the National Aeronautics and Space Administration. It is, however, a condition notably absent in the case of the Department of State. As it now stands, the President has more scientists to advise him on the scientific and technical aspects of various foreign policy issues, particularly in the national security field, than has the Secretary of State.

Excluding the science attachés overseas, the Department of State's Office of the Science Adviser numbers six people of whom three, including the director, are professional scientists. There are no scientists, full or part-time, in the Department's offices for policy planning, space and atomic energy, or political-military affairs. As might be inferred from these arrangements, many of the policy-makers concerned believe that their needs for scientific advice are adequately met through formal and informal communication with scientists employed in the operating agencies and departments and with the President's own Science Advisory Committee. (It should also be noted that in at least one office the need for additional political personnel is clearly more urgent than the need for scientists.) The Department's Science Adviser, who participates in the work of both the President's Committee and the Federal Council on Science and Technology, serves to facilitate such communication; otherwise both the demands placed on the Office and its own interests have limited its activity, as previously noted, to a relatively narrow range of foreign policy problems.<sup>34</sup>

<sup>33</sup> Snow, Science and Government, pp. 66-68, and Dornberger, V-2, p. 87.

<sup>34</sup> There are eighteen scientists on the President's Science Advisory Committee; its working panels also contain participants from outside the committee. In December 1958 the Committee and the Office of the Special Assistant for Science and Technology had together some 75 scientists

Whether the interests of the Department of State would be better served by a larger "in-house" scientific competence is a question that an outside observer cannot easily answer. Much depends on the validity of the expectations that the Department can rely on the scientists of the operating agencies to alert it to developments and information relevant to foreign policy. Even more depends on how determined the Department is to play an active and influential part in shaping the scientific and technical programs of the government to conform to its own conception of national needs and priorities.<sup>35</sup> Should this determination be high, it is difficult to avoid the hypothesis that if the President has found it useful to have a relatively large science advisory body to help him monitor and direct the course of science and technology as they affect foreign and domestic policy, so too might the Secretary of State in the area of his own more limited but still extensive responsibilities.

Organization and purpose. Since administrative organizations exist for the purpose of serving policy goals and implementing policy programs, it is to be expected that those who differ on the goals and programs of policy will differ about the proper design of administrative organizations. The desire of many scientists in 1945 to see atomic energy used for peaceful rather than military purposes was one of the reasons for their political campaign to place the postwar atomic energy program in the hands of a civilian commission instead of the War Deand engineers serving part time. See Killian, "Science and Public Policy," loc. cit., p. 8. The work of the Committee and the Office are additionally described and appraised in Science Organization and the President's Office, Staff Study of the Subcommittee on National Policy Machinery, Senate Committee on Government Operations, 87th Cong., 1st sess. (1961).

The information presented about the Department of State is based on U. S. Department of State, The Science Adviser of the Department of State, and interviews with several Department officials in February 1962. Needless to say, the description and interpretation made above are entirely the present writer's responsibility.

<sup>35</sup> These two conditions are not unrelated. The more influence the Department exercises in determining the goals and programs of other agencies, the more confident it can be that scientists in those agencies will call the Department's attention to goals and programs which they believe to be receiving too much or too little attention.

partment. Similarly, more recent differences about how to organize the government's space effort reflect, in part, policy differences about whether space will or should be an area for major military operations.

The same point can be seen in the proposal to create a Department of Science and Technology which would include the variety of "little" science programs now scattered throughout the Executive structure (for example, those of the Weather Bureau, National Bureau of Standards, the Antarctic Office) but would exclude those of the Department of Defense, the Atomic Energy Commission, and the Space Administration. The hope behind this proposal is that, combined together, the "little" programs would be able to compete more effectively in the struggle for government dollars with the "big" science programs of the military, atomic energy, and space organizations.<sup>36</sup>

The question of the "best" science organization is thus inescapably tied to the question of what is the "best" science policy. But who can demonstrate whether science and foreign policy would be better served by allocating dollars to a program to control weather or to a program to explore Mars? There are no determinate solutions to problems of this order. Neither, for that matter, is there any "one right amount" of the nation's scientific resources that should be allocated to basic as compared to applied research. Differences on policy questions such as these are unavoidable among scientists and non-scientists alike, and they can be resolved in but one manner: through the interplay of power and interest in a political arena.

This condition, plus the increasing dependence of scientific programs and research on government funds, plus the increasing consequences of the choices the government makes in allocating those funds, all promise to put the politicians and the scientists under increasing pressure. As the opportunities for further development in each of a thousand different scientific fields mushroom with the acceleration of scientific knowledge, whatever the government decides to support, it will be deciding not to support more. Indeed, it is not too difficult to see the scientists becoming practiced advocates and lobbyists for the government's support of their cherished fields and projects, or to imagine the day when the politicians start to complain about "interscience rivalry" and begin to fancy that, if only there were a single Chief of Science, competition and duplication could be ended and the nation could have an integrated science policy.

Scientists in politics. The American political system is not one that insulates its experts from the politics of choice.<sup>37</sup> The scientist involved in high-policy matters is likely to find himself propelled into the political arena, either by a push from behind or by his own interest in seeing that the "right" choices are made. Some of the incentives the scientist may have, to follow up his advice with an effort to see that it is accepted (and to take a hand in a few other matters while he is at it), were outlined and illustrated in the preceding section. It is equally important to recognize that the scientist may find himself on the political firing line, placed there by a politician interested in using the scientist's prestige as an "expert" to disarm the critics of his (the politician's) choices.

Thus, prior to the moratorium on nuclear tests, the Eisenhower administration appeared to be using scientists and their scientific facts on fall-out as a means of justifying and defending a policy that was obviously compounded of a variety of considerations besides that of the radiological hazard. The comparison with Truman's use of the prestige of the Joint Chiefs of Staff to defend his choices in the Korean War comes easily to mind. So, too, do the statements of various Republican leaders that they had lost confidence in the Joint Chiefs and their determination, when they came to power, to get rid of the "Democratic" Chiefs and to appoint Chiefs in sympathy with Republican policies.

The scientist, in short, is not likely to orbit the centers of political power emitting upon request "beeps" of purely technical information. He will inevitably be pulled into the political arena. If his participation there is to be either productive or personally satisfying, both the scientist and the non-scientist need to be highly conscious of the character of their activity and the problems involved. The scientist (and many a non-scientist) must learn that the making of foreign policy is not a quest for the "right" answers to the problems of our time. There are only hard choices, the consequences of which will be uncertain and the making of which will often seem interminable in time and irrational in procedure.

<sup>36</sup> See Lloyd V. Berkner, "National Science Policy and the Future," Address at Johns Hopkins University, December 16, 1958, as printed in Science Program—86th Congress, pp. 116-18.

<sup>37</sup> This point, especially as it relates to science experts, is discussed in Price, Government and Science, pp. 61-62, and in Herman Finer, "Government and the Expert," Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists, November 1956, pp. 331-32.

The debate and disagreement over these choices will be heated and confused under the best of circumstances, but emotion and misunderstanding can be eased if scientists and non-scientists are both alert to the limits as well as the potential of the scientist's contribution. On the scientist's part, there is the obvious need to exercise the utmost care in making clear to himself and to others the areas where he speaks as a concerned citizen and those where he speaks as a professional expert. More difficult will be the task of learning how and to whom to address himself in each of these capacities when he is dissatisfied with the outcome of a policy decision in which he has participated. There is, as Don Price has pointed out, no clear code in Washington to govern the conduct of dissenting experts, only a "flexible" set of possible relationships with one's immediate superiors and those whose authority competes with or exceeds that of one's superiors. In contrast to the soldier, who can find some although not complete guidance in the doctrine of "civilian control," the very nature of the scientist's intellectual habits and many of his policy predispositions may make especially difficult his task in determining the limits to which he can stretch his dissent.<sup>38</sup>

On their part, the non-scientists need to recognize that scientists can hardly be expected to remain politically indifferent or inactive about the policy issues with which they are involved (especially when no one else in Washington practices such restraint). It was the naivete of this expectation that was so appalling in the conclusion of the Gray Board that Oppenheimer was a security risk because (among other reasons) "he may have departed his role as scientific adviser to exercise highly persuasive influence in matters in which his convictions were not necessarily a reflection of technical judgment, and also not necessarily related to the protection of the strongest offensive military interests of the country."<sup>39</sup>

<sup>38</sup> See the discussion in Price, Government and Science, pp. 131, 133, 138-42. The point about the scientists' lacking a tradition of "civilian control" was suggested by William T. R. Fox.

<sup>39</sup> U. S. Atomic Energy Commission, In the Matter of J. Robert Oppenheimer, Texts of Principal Documents and Letters (Washington, 1954), pp. 19-20. Note the policy predisposition in the phrase "strongest offensive military interests."

It should not be comfortable for an American to reflect on the career of Peter Kapitsa, a Soviet physicist who was a student of Rutherford

It is unlikely that "civil-scientist" relations will ever get any worse than this. With time and experience one can expect many of these problems to be eased, but it would be unrealistic to expect them to disappear. Military experts have participated in the making of foreign policy far longer than scientists, and the question of how they can best do so is still the subject of more than a little disagreement.

Policy processes and policy. In closing this discussion of scientists and the problems of their organizational and political relationships to others engaged in the determination of foreign policy, it is important to remember that the policy process can bring minds together but it cannot make them think. It is worth noting that, in the political and administrative structure of the Soviet Union, no scientist is as institutionally close to the Premier as is the Special Assistant for Science and Technology to the President of the United States and that there is no equivalent of the Science Advisory Office in the Russian Ministry of Foreign Affairs.<sup>40</sup> Yet one would not say that the and who worked in England from 1922 to 1934 and then returned to the Soviet Union. Kapitsa was placed under house arrest in 1947 and remained there until after Stalin's death. Kapitsa has told western scientists and newsmen that his arrest was the result of his refusal to work on nuclear energy for military purposes. Kramish believes that his arrest was due to the government's dissatisfaction with his advice on certain technical approaches to weapons development. In either event, it is noteworthy that Kapitsa is believed to have recently been, on an informal basis, one of Khrushchev's main science advisers.

On the matter of his arrest, see the report by Harrison Salisbury in the New York Times, July 11, 1956; the Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists, January 1957, p. 38; and Kramish, Atomic Energy in the Soviet Union, pp. 109-110. The information on his recent activity was supplied by the staff of the Subcommittee on National Policy Machinery, Senate Committee on Government Operations.

<sup>40</sup> On Soviet government and science organization, see National Policy Machinery in the Soviet Union, Report of the Subcommittee on National Policy Machinery, Senate Committee on Government Operations, 86th Cong., 2d sess. (Washington, 1949), pp. 24-35, 59-62, and Nicholas DeWitt, "Reorganization of Science and Research in the U.S.S.R.," Science, June 23, 1961, pp. 1981-91. The points made above were additionally confirmed by the staff of the Subcommittee on National Policy Machinery.

foreign policy of the Soviet Union has appeared either ineffectual or insensitive in its response to developments in science and technology.

The circumstances attendant on the development of radar by the British from 1935 to 1940 provide a useful insight into both the potential and the limits of effective organization. Essential, obviously, were the scientific and technical ideas that Watson-Watt and his colleagues had in mind in 1935, ideas which in turn were the result of the earlier years of research they had been free to conduct in the facilities of a government laboratory. Certainly, it was important that there were administrative scientists in the Air Ministry who were so alert to the military problems of the Air Force that they could see on their own initiative the need to establish a special scientific committee for the study of air defense (the Tizard Committee) and who were so alert to the work of the scientific community that they made their first request for information to Watson-Watt.<sup>41</sup> Of consequence, too, was the fact that the personal and political relations of the members of the Tizard committee with the members of the military, administrative, and political hierarchies whose interest and cooperation were vital for the subsequent progress of the research and development program were relations characterized by mutual ease, respect, and understanding.

But these conditions would not have led from the formation of the Tizard Committee in 1935 to a chain of operational radar stations by 1940 and a Fighter Command practiced in their use if it had not been for the military ideas of members of the Royal Air Force. It was they who first thought of the formation of a committee to look specifically into the problem of detection, they who recommended more funds than those first proposed by the Tizard Committee for the development of an electromagnetic detection system, and they who were responsible for the decision to start constructing the stations and training the personnel while the equipment was still under development.<sup>42</sup> The explanation for this interest and support is to be found in their theories about the next World War. They believed the Germans were planning to engage in the strategic bombing of Great Britain, and they wished to be prepared for it.<sup>43</sup>

The point is obvious but important. British scientists and science organization were in the final measure but ready tools. They were good tools, but the use to which they were put was the result of the kind of ideas the military men had about war. The same will hold in the other areas in which science may affect foreign policy. The contributions that science and technology will bring to international politics will largely turn, not so much on the particular arrangements of scientists in the policy-making process, but on the purposes of statesmen and the theories they have about the political world in which they live.

<sup>42</sup> For the development of radar, see ibid., pp. 108-09; C. P. Snow, Science and Government, pp. 24-38, 60-61, 74-75; P. M. S. Blackett, "Tizard and the Science of War," Nature, March 5, 1960, pp. 648-49; and Basil Collier, The Defense of the United Kingdom (London: H.M.S.O., 1957), pp. 33, 36-39.

<sup>43</sup> Ironically, the British were mistaken in their theory. The German Air Force had no such strategy in mind, and in 1940 when it tried to improvise a strategic bombing campaign it had neither the equipment nor the doctrine with which to conduct the campaign effectively. See Herbert Dinnerstein, "The Impact of Air Power on the International Scene: 1933-1940," Military Affairs, Summer 1955, pp. 65-71; Telford Taylor, The March of Conquest (New York: Simon and Schuster, 1958), pp. 24-30; and Adolf Galland, The First and the Last (New York: Ballantine Books, 1954), chs. 2-5.

<sup>41</sup> The circumstances provide an interesting variation of the "whole problem approach." The Tizard Committee was initially interested in techniques for destroying aircraft or their crews, and Watson-Watt was asked in 1935 to investigate the possibility of using electromagnetic radiation for this purpose. He reported that such a use was apparently infeasible. In any event, he went on to note, the aircraft would first have to be located, and if anyone was interested electromagnetic radiation might be useful for this. Watson-Watt, Three Steps to Victory, pp. 81-83.

sional committee analysis in terms of functional problems such as this one.

I

Five important characteristics of the Appropriations Committee which help explain Committee integration are (1) the existence of a well-articulated and deeply rooted consensus on Committee goals or tasks; (2) the nature of the Committee's subject matter; (3) the legislative orientation of its members; (4) the attractiveness of the Committee for its members; and (5) the stability of Committee membership.

Consensus. The Appropriations Committee sees its tasks as taking form within the broad guidelines set by its parent body, the House of Representatives. For it is the primary condition of the Committee's existence that it was created by the House for the purpose of assisting the House in the performance of House legislative tasks dealing with appropriations. Committee members agree that their fundamental duty is to serve the House in the manner and with the substantive results that the House prescribes. Given, however, the imprecision of House expectations and the permissiveness of House surveillance, the Committee must elaborate for itself a definition of tasks plus a supporting set of perceptions (of itself and of others) explicit enough to furnish day-to-day guidance.

The Committee's view begins with the preeminence of the House—often mistakenly attributed to the Constitution ("all bills for raising revenue," Art. I, sec. 7) but nevertheless firmly sanctioned by custom—in appropriations affairs.

It moves easily to the conviction that, as the efficient part of the House in this matter, the Constitution has endowed it with special obligations and special prerogatives. It ends in the view that the Committee on Appropriations, far from being merely one among many units in a complicated legislative-executive system, is the most important, most responsible unit in the whole appropriations process.<sup>4</sup> Hand in hand with the consensus on their primacy goes a consensus that all of their House-prescribed tasks can be fulfilled by superimposing upon them one, single, paramount task—to guard the Federal Treasury. Committee members state their goals in the essentially negative terms of guardianship—screening requests for money, checking against ill-advised expenditures, and protecting the taxpayer's dollar. In the language of the Committee's official history, the job of each member is, "constantly and courageously to protect the Federal Treasury against thousands of appeals and imperative demands for unnecessary, unwise, and excessive expenditures."<sup>5</sup>

To buttress its self-image as guardian of public funds the Committee elaborates a set of perceptions about other participants in the appropriations process to which most members hold most of the time. Each executive official, for example, is seen to be interested in the expansion of his own particular program. Each one asks, therefore, for more money than he really needs, in view of the total picture, to run an adequate program. This and other Committee perceptions—of the Budget Bureau, of the Senate, and of their fellow Representatives—help to shape and support the Committee members in their belief that most budget estimates can, should and must be reduced and that, since no one else can be relied upon, the House Committee must do the job. To the consensus on the main task of protecting the Treasury is added, therefore, a consensus on the instrumental task of cutting whatever budget estimates are submitted.

As an immediate goal, Committee members agree that they must strike a highly critical, aggressive posture toward budget requests, and that they should, on principle, reduce them. In the words of the Committee's veterans: "There has never been a budget submitted to the Congress that couldn't be cut." "There isn't a budget that can't be cut 10 per cent immediately." "I've been on the Committee for 17 years. No subcommittee of which I have been a member

<sup>4</sup> This and all other generalizations about member attitudes and perceptions depend heavily on extensive interviews with Committee members. Semi-structured interviews, averaging 45 minutes in length were held with 45 of the 50 Committee members during the 86th Congress. Certain key questions, all open-ended, were asked of all respondents. The schedule was kept very flexible, however, in order to permit particular topics to be explored with those individuals best equipped to discuss them. In a few cases, where respondents encouraged it, notes taken during the interviews. In most cases notes were not taken, but were transcribed immediately after the interview. Where unattributed quotations occur in the text, therefore, they are as nearly verbatim as the author's power of immediate recall could make them. These techniques were all used so as to improve rapport between interviewer and respondent.

<sup>5</sup> "History of the Committee on Appropriations," House Doc. 299, 77th Cong., 1st sess., 1941-1942, p. 11.

has ever reported out a bill without a cut in the budget. I'm proud of that record." The aim of budget-cutting is strongly internalized for the Committee member. "It's a tradition in the Appropriations Committee to cut." "You're grounded in it. . . . It's ingrained in you from the time you get on the Committee." For the purposes of a larger study, the appropriations case histories of 37 executive bureaus have been examined for a 12-year period, 1947-1959.<sup>6</sup> Of 443 separate bureau estimates, the Committee reduced 77.2 per cent (342) of them.

It is a mark of the intensity and self-consciousness of the Committee consensus on budget-cutting that it is couched in a distinctive vocabulary. The workaday lingo of the Committee member is replete with negative verbs, undesirable objects of attention, and effective instruments of action. Agency budgets are said to be filled with "fat," "padding," "grease," "pork," "oleaginous substance," "water," "oil," "cushions," "avoirdufois," "waste tissue," and "soft spots." The action verbs most commonly used are "cut," "carve," "slice," "prune," "whittle," "squeeze," "wring," "trim," "lop off," "chop," "slash," "pare," "shave," "fry," and "whack." The tools of the trade are appropriately referred to as "knife," "blade," "meat axe," "scalpel," "meat cleaver," "hatchet," "shears," "wringer," and "fine-tooth comb." Members are hailed by their fellows as being "pretty sharp with the knife." Agencies may "have the meat axe thrown at them." Executives are urged to put their agencies "on a fat boy's diet." Budgets are praised when they are "cut to the bone." And members agree that "You can always get a little more fat out of a piece of pork if you fry it a little longer and a little harder."

To the major task of protecting the Treasury and the instrumental task of cutting budget estimates, each Committee member adds, usually by way of exception, a third task—serving the constituency to which he owes his election. This creates no problem for him when, as is sometimes the case, he can serve his district best by cutting the budget requests of a federal agency whose program is in conflict with the demands of his constituency.<sup>6a</sup> Normally, however, members find that their most common role-conflict is between a Committee-oriented budget-reducing role and a constituency-oriented budget-increasing role. Committee ideology resolves the conflict by assigning top, long-run priority to the budget-cutting task and making of the constituency service a permissible, short-run exception. No member is expected to commit electoral suicide; but no member is expected to allow his district's desire for federal funds to dominate his Committee behavior.

Subject Matter. Appropriations Committee integration is facilitated by the subject matter with which the group deals. The Committee makes decisions on the same controversial issues as do the committees handling substantive legislation. But a money decision—however vitally it affects national policy—is, or at least seems to be, less directly a policy decision. Since they deal immediately with dollars and cents, it is easy for the members to hold to the idea that they are not dealing with programmatic questions, that theirs is a "business" rather than a "policy" committee. The subject matter, furthermore, keeps Committee members relatively free agents, which promotes intra-Committee maneuvering and, hence, conflict avoidance. Members do not commit themselves to their constituents in terms of precise money amounts, and no dollar sum is sacred—it can always be adjusted without conceding that a principle has been breached. By contrast, members of committees dealing directly with controversial issues are often pressured into taking concrete stands on these issues; consequently, they may come to their committee work with fixed and hardened attitudes. This leads to unavoidable, head-on intra-committee conflict and renders integrative mechanisms relatively ineffective.

The fact of an annual appropriations process means the Committee members repeat the same operations with respect to the same subject matters year after year—and frequently more than once in a given year. Substantive and procedural repetition promotes familiarity with key problems and provides ample opportunity to test and confirm the most satisfactory methods of dealing with them. And the absolute necessity that appropriations bills do ultimately pass gives urgency to the search for such methods. Furthermore, the House rule that no member of the Committee can serve on another standing committee is a deterrent against a fragmentation of Committee member <sup>6</sup> The bureaus being studied are all concerned with domestic policy and are situated in the Agriculture, Interior, Labor, Commerce, Treasury, Justice and Health, Education and Welfare Departments. For a similar pattern of Committee decisions in foreign affairs, see Holbert Carroll, The House of Representatives and Foreign Affairs (Pittsburgh, 1958), ch. 9.

<sup>6a</sup> See, for example, Philip A. Foss, "The Grazing Fee Dilemma," Inter-University Case Program, No. 57 (University, Alabama, 1960).

activity which could be a source of difficulty in holding the group together. If a committee has developed (as this one has) a number of norms designed to foster integration, repeated and concentrated exposure to them increases the likelihood that they will be understood, accepted and followed.

Legislative Orientation. The recruitment of members for the Appropriations Committee produces a group of individuals with an orientation especially conducive to Committee integration. Those who make the selection pay special attention to the characteristics which Masters has described as those of the "responsible legislator"—approval of and conformity to the norms of the legislative process and of the House of Representatives.<sup>7</sup>

Key selectors speak of wanting, for the Appropriations Committee, "the kind of man you can deal with" or "a fellow who is well-balanced and won't go off half-cocked on things." A Northern liberal Democrat felt that he had been chosen over eight competitors because, "I had made a lot of friends and was known as a nice guy"—especially, he noted, among Southern Congressmen. Another Democrat explained, "I got the blessing of the Speaker and the leadership. It's personal friendships. I had done a lot of things for them in the past, and when I went to them and asked them, they gave it to me." A Republican chosen for the Committee in his first term recalled,

The Chairman [Rep. Taber] I guess did some checking around in my area. After all, I was new and he didn't know me. People told me that they were called to see if I was—well, unstable or apt to go off on tangents . . . to see whether or not I had any preconceived notions about things and would not be flexible—whether I would oppose things even though it was obvious.

A key criterion in each of the cases mentioned was a demonstrable record of, or an assumed predisposition toward, legislative give-and-take.

The 106 Appropriations Committee members serving between 1947 and 1961 spent an average of 3.6 years on other House committees before coming to the Committee. Only 17 of the 106 were selected as first term Congressmen. A House apprenticeship (which Appropriations maintains more successfully than all committees save Ways and Means and Rules<sup>8</sup>) provides the time in which legislative reputations can be established by the member and an assessment of that reputation in terms of Appropriations Committee requirements can be made. Moreover, the mere fact that a member survives for a couple of terms is some indication of an electoral situation conducive to his "responsible" legislative behavior. The optimum bet for the Committee is a member from a sufficiently safe district to permit him freedom of maneuver inside the House without fear of reprisal at the polls.<sup>9</sup> The degree of responsiveness to House norms which the Committee selectors value may be the product of a safe district as well as an individual temperament.

Attractiveness. A fourth factor is the extraordinarily high degree of attractiveness which the Committee holds for its members—as measured by the low rate of departure from it. Committee members do not leave it for service on other committees. To the contrary, they are attracted to it from nearly every other committee.<sup>10</sup> Of the 106 members in the 1947–1961 period, only two men left the Committee voluntarily; and neither of them initiated the move.<sup>11</sup> Committee attractiveness is a measure of its capacity to satisfy individual member to 86th Congress) 79 separate appointments were made to the Appropriations Committee, with 14 going to freshmen. The Committee filled, in other words, 17.7 per cent of its vacancies with freshmen. The Rules Committee had 26 vacancies and selected no freshmen at all. The Ways and Means Committee had 36 vacancies and selected 2 freshmen (5.6 per cent). All other Committees had a higher percentage of freshmen appointments. Armed Services ranked fourth, with 45 vacancies and 12 freshmen appointed, for a percentage of 26.7. Foreign affairs figures were 46 and 14, or 30.4 per cent; UnAmerican Activities figures were 22 and 7, or 31.8 per cent. cf. Masters, op. cit.

<sup>9</sup> In the 1960 elections, 41 out of the current 50 members received more than 55.1 per cent of the vote in their districts. By a common definition, that is, only 9 of the 50 came from marginal districts.

<sup>10</sup> The 106 members came to Appropriations from every committee except Ways and Means.

<sup>11</sup> One was personally requested by the Speaker to move to Ways and Means. The other was chosen by a caucus of regional Congressmen to be his party's representative on the Rules Committee. Of the 21 members who were forced off the Committee for lack of seniority during a change in party control, or who were defeated for reelection and later returned, 20 sought to regain Committee membership at the earliest opportunity.

<sup>7</sup> Nicholas A. Masters, "House Committee Assignments," this REVIEW, Vol. 55 (June, 1961), pp. 345–357.

<sup>8</sup> In the period from 1947 through 1959, (80th needs—for power, prestige, recognition, respect, self-esteem, friendship, etc. Such satisfaction in turn increases the likelihood that members will behave in such a way as to hold the group together.

The most frequently mentioned source of Committee attractiveness is its power—based on its control of financial resources. “Where the money is, that’s where the power is,” sums up the feeling of the members. They prize their ability to reward or punish so many other participants in the political process—executive officials, fellow Congressmen, constituents and other clientele groups. In the eyes of its own members, the Committee is either the most powerful in the House or it is on a par with Ways and Means or, less frequently, on a par with Ways and Means and Rules. The second important ingredient in member satisfaction is the government-wide scope of Committee activity. The ordinary Congressman may feel that he has too little knowledge of and too little control over his environment. Membership on this Committee compensates for this feeling of helplessness by the wider contacts, the greater amount of information, and the sense of being “in the middle of things” which are consequent, if not to subcommittee activity, at least to the full Committee’s overview of the federal government.

Thirdly, Committee attractiveness is heightened by the group’s recognizable and distinctive political style—one that is, moreover, highly valued in American political culture. The style is that of hard work; and the Committee’s self-image is that of “the hardest working Committee in Congress.” His willingness to work is the Committee member’s badge of identification, and it is proudly worn. It colors his perceptions of others and their perceptions of him.<sup>11a</sup> It is a cherished axiom of all members that, “This Committee is no place for a man who doesn’t work. They have to be hard working. It’s a way of life. It isn’t just a job; it’s a way of life.”

<sup>11a</sup> A sidelight on this attitude is displayed in a current feud between the House and Senate Appropriations Committees over the meeting place for their conference committees. The House Committee is trying to break the century-old custom that conferences to resolve differences on money bills are always held on the Senate side of the Capitol. House Committee members “complain that they often have to trudge back to the House two or three times to answer roll calls during a conference. They say they go over in a body to work, while Senators flit in and out . . . . The House Appropriations Committee feels that it does all the hard work listening to witnesses for months on each bill, only to have the Senate Committee sit as a court of appeals and, with little more than a cursory glance, restore most of the funds cut.” Washington Post, April 24, 1962, p. 1.

The mere existence of some identifiable and valued style or “way of life” is a cohesive force for a group. But the particular style of hard work is one which increases group morale and group identification twice over. Hard work means a long, dull, and tedious application to detail, via the technique of “dig, dig, dig, day after day behind closed doors”—in an estimated 460 subcommittee and full committee meetings a year. And virtually all of these meetings are in executive session. By adopting the style of hard work, the Committee discourages highly individualized forms of legislative behavior, which could be disruptive within the Committee. It rewards its members with power, but it is power based rather on work inside the Committee than on the political glamour of activities carried on in the limelight of the mass media. Prolonged daily work together encourages sentiments of mutual regard, sympathy and solidarity. This esprit is, in turn, functional for integration on the Committee. A Republican leader summed up,

I think it’s more closely knit than any other committee. Yet it’s the biggest committee, and you’d think it would be the reverse. I know on my subcommittee, you sit together day after day. You get better acquainted. You have sympathy when other fellows go off to play golf. There’s a lot of esprit de corps in the Committee.

The strong attraction which members have for the Committee increases the influence which the Committee and its norms exercise on all of them. It increases the susceptibility of the newcomer to Committee socialization and of the veteran to Committee sanctions applicable against deviant behavior.<sup>12</sup>

Membership Stability. Members of the Appropriations Committee are strongly attracted to it; they also have, which bears out their selection as “responsible legislators,” a strong attraction for a career in the House of Representatives. The 50 members on the Committee in 1961 had served an average of 13.1 years in the House. These twin attractions produce a noteworthy stability of Committee membership. In the period from the 80th to the 87th <sup>12</sup> This proposition is spelled out at some length in J. Thibaut and H. Kelley, The Social Psychology of Groups (New York, 1959), p. 247, and in D. Cartwright and A. Zander, Group Dynamics: Research and Theory (Evanston, 1953), p. 420.

Congress, 35.7 per cent of the Committee's membership remained constant. That is to say, 15 of the 42 members on the Committee in March, 1947, were still on the Committee in March, 1961.<sup>13</sup> The 50 members of the Committee in 1961 averaged 9.3 years of prior service on that Committee. In no single year during the last fourteen has the Committee had to absorb an influx of new members totalling more than one-quarter of its membership. At all times, in other words, at least three-fourths of the members have had previous Committee experience. This extraordinary stability of personnel extends into the staff as well. As of June 1961, its 15 professionals had served an average of 10.7 years with the Committee.<sup>14</sup>

The opportunity exists, therefore, for the development of a stable leadership group, a set of traditional norms for the regulation of internal Committee behavior, and informal techniques of personal accommodation. Time is provided in which new members can learn and internalize Committee norms before they attain high seniority rankings. The Committee does not suffer from the potentially disruptive consequences of rapid changeovers in its leadership group, nor of sudden impositions of new sets of norms governing internal Committee behavior.

II

If one considers the main activity of a political system to be decision-making, the acid test of its internal integration is its capacity to make collective decisions without flying apart in the process. Analysis of Committee integration should focus directly, therefore, upon its subgroups and the roles of its members. Two kinds of subgroups are of central importance—subcommittees and majority or minority party groups. The roles which are most relevant derive from: (1) positions which each member holds by virtue of his subgroup attachments, e.g., as subcommittee member, majority (or minority) party member; (2) positions which relate to full Committee membership, e.g., Committee member, and the seniority rankings of veteran, man of moderate experience, and newcomer;<sup>15</sup> (3) positions which relate to both subgroup and full Committee membership, e.g., Chairman of the Committee, ranking minority member of the Committee, subcommittee chairman, ranking subcommittee member. Clusters of norms state the expectations about subgroup and role behavior. The description which follows treats the ways in which these norms and their associated behaviors mesh and clash. It treats, also, the internal control mechanisms by which behavior is brought into reasonable conformity with expectations.

Subgroup Integration. The day-to-day work of the Committee is carried on in its subcommittees each of which is given jurisdiction over a number of related governmental units. The number of subcommittees is determined by the Committee Chairman, and has varied recently from a low of 9 in 1949 to a high of 15 in 1959. The present total of 14 reflects, as always, a set of strategic and personal judgments by the Chairman balanced against the limitations placed on him by Committee tradition and member wishes. The Chairman also determines subcommittee jurisdiction, appoints subcommittee chairmen and selects the majority party members of each group. The ranking minority member of the Committee exercises similar control over subcommittee assignments on his side of the aisle.

Each subcommittee holds hearings on the budget estimates of the agencies assigned to it, meets in executive session to decide what figures and what language to recommend to the full Committee (to "mark up" the bill), defends its recommendations before the full Committee, writes the Committee's report to the House, dominates the debate on the floor, and bargains for the House in conference committee. Within its jurisdiction, each subcommittee functions independently of the others and guards its autonomy jealously. The Chairman and ranking minority member of the full Committee have, as we shall see, certain opportunities to oversee and dip into the operations of all subcommittees. But their intervention is expected to be minimal. Moreover, they themselves operate importantly within the subcommittee framework by sitting as chairman or ranking minority member of the subcommittee in which they are most interested. Each subcommittee, under the guidance of its chairman, transacts its business in considerable isolation from every other one. One subcommittee chairman exclaimed, Why, you'd be branded an impostor if you went into one of those other sub-committee meetings. The only time I go is by appointment, by arrangement with the chairman at a special time. I'm as much a stranger in another subcommittee as I would be in the legislative Committee on Post Office and Civil Service. Each one does its work apart from all others.

<sup>13</sup> This figure is 9 per cent greater than the next most stable House Committee during this particular period. The top four, in order, were Appropriations (35.7%), Agriculture (26.7%), Armed Services (25%), Foreign Affairs (20.8%).

<sup>14</sup> The Committee's permanent and well integrated professional staff (as distinguished from its temporary investigating staff) might be considered as part of the subsystem though it will not be treated in this paper.

<sup>15</sup> "Newcomers" are defined as men who have served no more than two terms on the Committee. "Men of moderate experience" are those with 3-5 terms of service. "Veterans" are those who have 6 or more terms of Committee service.

All members of all subcommittees are expected to behave in similar fashion in the role of subcommittee member. Three main norms define this role; to the extent that they are observed, they promote harmony and reduce conflict among subcommittees.<sup>16</sup> Subcommittee autonomy gives to the House norm of specialization an intensified application on the Appropriations Committee. Each member is expected to play the role of specialist in the activities of one subcommittee. He will sit on from one to four subcommittees, but normally will specialize in the work, or a portion of the work, of only one. Except for the Chairman, ranking minority member and their confidants, a Committee member's time, energy, contacts and experience are devoted to his subcommittees. Specialization is, therefore, among the earliest and most compelling of the Committee norms to which a newcomer is exposed. Within the Committee, respect, deference and power are earned through subcommittee activity and, hence to a degree, through specialization. Specialization is valued further because it is well suited to the task of guarding the Treasury. Only by specializing, Committee members believe, can they unearth the volume of factual information necessary for the intelligent screening of budget requests. Since "the facts" are acquired only through industry an effective specialist will, perforce, adopt and promote the Committee's style of hard work.

Committee-wide acceptance of specialization is an integrative force in decision-making because it helps support a second norm—reciprocity. The stage at which a subcommittee makes its recommendations is a potential point of internal friction. Conflict among subcommittees (or between one subcommittee and the rest of the Committee) is minimized by the deference traditionally accorded to the recommendation of the subcommittee which has specialized in the area, has worked hard, and has "the facts." "It's a matter of 'You respect my work and I'll respect yours.'" "It's frowned upon if you offer an amendment in the full Committee if you aren't on the subcommittee. It's considered presumptuous to pose as an expert if you aren't on the subcommittee." Though records of full Committee decisions are not available, members agree that subcommittee recommendations are "very rarely changed," "almost always approved," "changed one time in fifty," "very seldom changed," etc.

No subcommittee is likely to keep the deference of the full Committee for long unless its recommendations have widespread support among its own members. To this end, a third norm—subcommittee unity—is expected to be observed by subcommittee members. Unity means a willingness to support (or not to oppose) the recommendations of one's own subcommittee. Reciprocity and unity are closely dependent upon one another. Reciprocity is difficult to maintain when subcommittees themselves are badly divided; and unity has little appeal unless reciprocity will subsequently be observed. The norm of reciprocity functions to minimize inter-subcommittee conflict. The norm of unity functions to minimize intra-subcommittee conflict. Both are deemed essential to subcommittee influence.

One payoff for the original selection of "responsible legislators" is their special willingness to compromise in pursuit of subcommittee unity. The impulse to this end is registered most strongly at the time when the subcommittee meets in executive session to mark up the bill. Two ranking minority members explained this aspect of markup procedure in their subcommittees:

If there's agreement, we go right along. If there's a lot of controversy we put the item aside and go on. Then, after a day or two, we may have a list of ten controversial items. We give and take and pound them down till we get agreement.

We have a unanimous agreement on everything. If a fellow enters an objection and we can't talk him out of it—and sometimes we can get him to go along—that's it. We put it in there.

Once the bargain is struck, the subcommittee is expected to "stick together."

It is, of course, easier to achieve unity among <sup>16</sup> A statement of expected behavior was taken to be a Committee norm when it was expressed by a substantial number of respondents (a dozen or so) who represented both parties, and varying degrees of experience. In nearly every case, moreover, no refutation of them was encountered, and ample confirmation of their existence can be found in the public record. Their articulation came most frequently from the veterans of the group.

the five, seven, or nine members of a subcommittee than among the fifty members of the full Committee. But members are expected wherever possible to observe the norm of unity in the full Committee as well. That is, they should not only defer to the recommendations of the subcommittee involved, but they should support (or not oppose) that recommendation when it reaches the floor in the form of a Committee decision. On the floor, Committee members believe, their power and prestige depend largely on the degree to which the norms of reciprocity and unity continue to be observed. Members warn each other that if they go to the floor in disarray they will be "rolled," "jumped," or "run over" by the membership. It is a cardinal maxim among Committee members that "You can't turn an appropriations bill loose on the floor." Two senior subcommittee chairmen explain,

We iron out our differences in Committee. We argue it out and usually have a meeting of the minds, a composite view of the Committee. . . . If we went on the floor in wide disagreement, they would say, 'If you can't agree after listening to the testimony and discussing it, how can we understand it? We'll just vote on the basis of who we like the best.'

I tell them (the full Committee) we should have a united front. If there are any objections or changes, we ought to hear it now, and not wash our dirty linen out on the floor. If we don't have a bill that we can all agree on and support, we ought not to report it out. To do that is like throwing a piece of meat to a bunch of hungry animals.

One of the most functional Committee practices supporting the norm of unity is the tradition against minority reports in the subcommittee and in the full Committee. It is symptomatic of Committee integration that custom should proscribe the use of the most formal and irrevocable symbol of congressional committee disunity—the minority report. A few have been written—but only 9 out of a possible 141 during the 11 years, 1947–1957. That is to say, 95 per cent of all original appropriations bills in this period were reported out without dissent. The technique of "reserving" is the Committee member's equivalent for the registering of dissent. In subcommittee or Committee, when a member reserves, he goes on record informally by informing his colleagues that he reserves the right to disagree on a specified item later on in the proceedings. He may seek a change or support a change in that particular item in full Committee or on the floor. But he does not publicize his dissent. The subcommittee or the full Committee can then make an unopposed recommendation. The individual retains some freedom of maneuver without firm commitment. Often a member reserves on an appropriations item but takes no further action. A member explained how the procedure operates in subcommittee,

If there's something I feel too strongly about, and just can't go along, I'll say, 'Mr. Chairman, we can have a unanimous report, but I reserve the right to bring this up in full Committee. I feel duty bound to make a play for it and see if I can't sell it to the other members.' But if I don't say anything, or don't reserve this right, and then I bring it up in full Committee, they'll say, 'Who are you trying to embarrass? You're a member of the team, aren't you? That's not the way to get along.'

Disagreement cannot, of course, be eliminated from the Committee. But the Committee has accepted a method for ventilating it which produces a minimum of internal disruption. And members believe that the greater their internal unity, the greater the likelihood that their recommendations will pass the House.

The degree to which the role of the subcommittee member can be so played and subcommittee conflict thereby minimized depends upon the minimization of conflict between the majority and minority party subgroups. Nothing would be more disruptive to the Committee's work than bitter and extended partisan controversy. It is, therefore, important to Appropriations Committee integration that a fourth norm—minimal partisanship—should be observed by members of both party contingents. Nearly every respondent emphasized, with approval, that "very little" or "not much" partisanship prevailed on the Committee. One subcommittee chairman stated flatly, "My job is to keep down partisanship." A ranking minority member said, "You might think that we Republicans would defend the Administration and the budget, but we don't." Majority and minority party ratios are constant and do not change (i.e., in 1958) to reflect changes in the strength of the controlling party. The Committee operates with a completely non-partisan professional staff, which does not change in tune with shifts in party control. Requests for studies by the Committee's investigating staff must be made by the Chairman and ranking minority member of the full Committee and by the Chairman and ranking minority member of the subcommittee involved. Subcommittees can produce recommendations without dissent and the full Committee can adopt reports without dissent precisely because party conflict is (during the period 1947-1961) the exception rather than the rule.

The Committee is in no sense immune from the temperature of party conflict, but it does have a relatively high specific heat. Intense party strife or a strongly taken presidential position will get reflected in subcommittee and in Committee recommendations. Sharp divisions in party policy were carried, with disruptive impact, into some areas of Committee activity during the 80th Congress and subsequently, by way of reaction, into the 81st Congress.<sup>17</sup> During the Eisenhower years, extraordinary presidential pleas, especially concerning foreign aid, were given special heed by the Republican members of the Committee.<sup>18</sup> Partisanship is normally generated from the environment and not from within the Committee's party groups. Partisanship is, therefore, likely to be least evident in subcommittee activity, stronger in the full Committee, and most potent at the floor stage. Studies which have focussed on roll-call analysis have stressed the influence of party in legislative decision-making.<sup>19</sup> In the appropriations process, at any rate, the floor stage probably represents party influence at its maximum. Our examination, by interview, of decision-making at the subcommittee and full Committee level would stress the influence of Committee-oriented norms—the strength of which tends to vary inversely with that of party bonds. In the secrecy and intimacy of the subcommittee and full Committee hearing rooms, the member finds it easy to compromise on questions of more or less, to take money from one program and give it to another and, in general, to avoid yes-or-no type party stands. These decisions, taken in response to the integrative norms of the Committee are the most important ones in the entire appropriations process.

<sup>17</sup> See, for example, the internal conflict on the subcommittee dealing with the Labor Department. 93 Cong. Record, pp. 2465-2562 passim; 94 Cong. Record, pp. 7605-7607.

<sup>18</sup> See, for example, the unusual minority report of Committee Republicans on the foreign aid appropriations bill in 1960. Their protest against Committee cuts in the budget estimates was the result of strenuous urging by the Eisenhower Administration. House Report No. 1798, Mutual Security and Related Agency Appropriation Bill, 1961, 86 Cong. 2d sess. 1960.

<sup>19</sup> David Truman, The Congressional Party (New York, 1959); Julius Turner, Party and Constituency: Pressures on Congress (Baltimore, 1951).

Role Integration. The roles of subcommittee member and party member are common to all.

Other more specific decision-making positions are allocated among the members. Different positions produce different roles, and in an integrated system, these too must fit together. Integration, in other words, must be achieved through the complementarity or reciprocity of roles as well as through a similarity of roles. This may mean a pattern in which expectations are so different that there is very little contact between individuals; or it may mean a pattern in which contacts require the working out of an involved system of exchange of obligations and rewards.<sup>20</sup> In either case, the desired result is the minimization of conflict among prominent Committee roles. Two crucial instances of role reciprocity on the Committee involve the seniority positions of old-timer and newcomer and the leadership positions of Chairman and ranking minority member, on both the full Committee and on each subcommittee.

The differentiation between senior and junior members is the broadest definition of who shall and who shall not actively participate in Committee decisions. Of a junior member, it will be said, "Oh, he doesn't count—what I mean is, he hasn't been on the Committee long enough." He is not expected to and ordinarily does not have much influence. His role is that of apprentice. He is expected to learn the business and the norms of the Committee by applying himself to its work. He is expected to acquiesce in an arrangement which gives most influence (except in affairs involving him locally) to the veterans of the group. Newcomers will be advised to "follow the chairman until you get your bearings. For the first two years, follow the chairman. He knows." "Work hard, keep quiet and attend the Committee sessions. We don't want to listen to some new person coming in here." And newcomers perceive their role in identical terms: "You have to sit in the back seat and edge up little by little." "You just go to subcommittee meetings and assimilate the routine. The new members are made to feel welcome, but you have a lot of rope-learning to do before you carry much weight."

At every stage of Committee work, this differentiation prevails. There is remarkable agreement on the radically different sets of expectations involved. During the hearings, the view of the elders is that, "Newcomers . . . don't know what the score is and they don't have enough information to ask intelligent questions." A newcomer described his behavior in typically similar terms: "I attended all the hearings and studied and collected information that I can use next year. I'm just marking time now." During the crucial subcommittee markup, the newcomer will have little opportunity to speak—save in locally important matters. A subcommittee chairman stated the norm from his viewpoint this way: "When we get a compromise, nobody's going to break that up. If someone tries, we sit on him fast. We don't want young people who throw bricks or slow things down." And a newcomer reciprocated, describing his markup conduct: "I'm not provocative. I'm in there for information. They're the experts in the field. I go along." In full Committee, on the floor, and in conference committee, the Committee's senior members take the lead and the junior members are expected to follow. The apprentice role is common to all new members of the House. But it is wrong to assume that each Committee will give it the same emphasis. Some pay it scant heed.<sup>21</sup> The Appropriations Committee makes it a cornerstone of its internal structure.

<sup>20</sup> The ideas of "reciprocity" and "complementarity," which are used interchangeably here, are discussed in Alvin Gouldner, "The Norm of Reciprocity," American Sociological Review (April, 1960). Most helpful in explaining the idea of a role system has been the work of J. Wahlke, H. Eulau, W. Buchanan, L. Ferguson. See their study, The Legislative System (New York, 1962), esp. Intro.

Among the Committee's veterans, the key roles are those of Committee Chairman and ranking minority member, and their counterparts in every subcommittee. It is a measure of Committee integration and the low degree of partisanship that considerable reciprocity obtains between these roles. Their partisan status nevertheless sets limits to the degree of possible integration. The Chairman is given certain authority which he and only he can exercise. But save in times of extreme party controversy, the expectation is that consultation and cooperation between the chairman-ranking minority member shall lubricate the Committee's entire work. For example, by Committee tradition, its Chairman and ranking minority member are both ex officio voting members of each subcommittee and of every conference committee. The two of them thus have joint access at every stage of the internal process. A subcommittee chairman, too, is expected to discuss matters of scheduling and agenda with his opposite minority number. He is expected to work with him during the markup session and to give him (and, normally, only him) an opportunity to read and comment on the subcommittee report.<sup>22</sup> A ranking minority member described his subcommittee markup procedure approvingly:

Frequently the chairman has a figure which he states. Sometimes he will have no figure, and he'll turn to me and say, '—, what do you think?' Maybe I'll have a figure. It's very flexible. Everyone has a chance to say what he thinks, and we'll move it around. Sometimes it takes a long time. . . . He's a rapid partisan on the floor, but he is a very fair man in the subcommittee.

Where influence is shared, an important exchange of rewards occurs. The chairman gains support for his leadership and the ranking minority member gains intra-Committee power. The Committee as a whole insures against the possibility of drastic change in its internal structure by giving to its key minority members a stake in its operation. Chairmen and ranking minority members will, in the course of time, exchange positions; and it is expected that such a switch will produce no form of retribution nor any drastic change in the functioning of the Committee. Reciprocity of roles, in this case, promotes continued integration. A ranking minority member testified to one successful arrangement when he took the floor in the 83d Congress to say:

The gentleman and I have been see sawing back and forth on this committee for some time. He was chairman in the 80th Congress. I had the privilege of serving as chairman in the 81st and 82nd Congresses. Now he is back in the saddle. I can say that he has never failed to give me his utmost cooperation, and I have tried to give him the same cooperation during his service as chairman of this Committee. We seldom disagree, but we have found out that we can disagree without being disagreeable. Consequently, we have unusual harmony on this committee.<sup>23</sup>

Reciprocity between chairmen and ranking minority members on the Appropriations Committee is to some incalculable degree a function of the stability of membership which allows a pair of particular individuals to work out the kind of personal accommodation described above. The close working relationship of Clarence Cannon and John Taber, whose service on the Committee totals 68 years and who have been changing places as Chairman and ranking minority member for 19 years, highlights and sustains a pattern of majority-minority reciprocity throughout the group.

<sup>21</sup> For example, the Committee on Education and Labor, see footnote 26.

<sup>22</sup> See the exchange in 101 Cong. Rec. pp. 3832, 3844, 3874.

<sup>23</sup> 99 Cong. Rec., p. 4933.

Internal Control Mechanisms. The expectations which apply to subcommittee, to party, to veterans and to newcomers, to chairmen and to ranking minority members prescribe highly integrative behaviors. We have concentrated on these expectations, and have both illustrated and assumed the close correlation between expected and actual behavior. This does not mean that all the norms of the Committee have been canvassed. Nor does it mean that deviation from the integrative norms does not occur. It does. From what can be gathered, however, from piecing together a study of the public record on appropriations from 1947 to 1961 with interview materials, the Committee has been markedly successful in maintaining a stable internal structure over time. As might be expected, therefore, changes and threats of change have been generated more from the environment—when outsiders consider the Committee as unresponsive—than from inside the subsystem itself. One source of internal stability, and an added reason for assuming a correlation between expected and actual behavior, is the existence of what appear to be reasonably effective internal control mechanisms. Two of these are the socialization processes applied to newcomers and the sanctioning mechanisms applicable to all Committee members.

Socialization is in part a training in perception. Before members of a group can be expected to behave in accordance with its norms, they must learn to see and interpret the world around them with reasonable similarity. The socialization of the Committee newcomer during his term or two of apprenticeship serves to bring his perceptions and his attitudes sufficiently into line with those of the other members to serve as a basis for Committee integration. The Committee, as we have seen, is chosen from Congressmen whose political flexibility connotes an aptitude for learning new lessons of power. Furthermore, the high degree of satisfaction of its members with the group increases their susceptibility to its processes of learning and training.

For example, one half of the Committee's Democrats are Northerners and Westerners from urban constituencies, whose voting records are just as "liberal" on behalf of domestic social welfare programs as non-Committee Democrats from like constituencies. They come to the Committee favorably disposed toward the high level of federal spending necessary to support such programs, and with no sense of urgency about the Committee's tasks of guarding the Treasury or reducing budget estimates. Given the criteria governing their selection, however, they come without rigid preconceptions and with a built-in responsiveness to the socialization processes of any legislative group of which they are members. It is crucial to Committee integration that they learn to temper their potentially disruptive welfare-state ideology with a conservative's concern for saving money. They must change their perceptions and attitudes sufficiently to view the Committee's tasks in nearly the same terms as their more conservative Southern Democratic and Republican colleagues. What their elders perceive as reality (i.e., the disposition of executives to ask for more money than is necessary) they, too, must see as reality. A subcommittee chairman explained:

When you have sat on the Committee, you see that these bureaus are always asking for more money—always up, never down. They want to build up their organization. You reach the point—I have—where it sickens you, where you rebel against it. Year after year, they want more money. They say, 'Only $50,000 this year'; but you know the pattern. Next year they'll be back for $100,000, then $200,000. The younger members haven't been on the Committee long enough, haven't had the experience to know this.

The younger men, in this case the younger liberals, do learn from their Committee experience. Within one or two terms, they are differentiating between themselves and the "wild-eyed spenders" or the "free spenders" in the House. "Some of these guys would spend you through the roof," exclaimed one liberal of moderate seniority. Repeated exposure to Committee work and to fellow members has altered their perceptions and their attitudes in money matters. Half a dozen Northern Democrats of low or moderate seniority agreed with one of their number who said: "Yes, it's true. I can see it myself. I suppose I came here a flaming liberal; but as the years go by I get more conservative. You just hate like hell to spend all this money. . . . You come to the point where you say, 'By God, this is enough jobs.'" These men will remain more inclined toward spending than their Committee colleagues, but their perceptions and hence their attitudes have been brought close enough to the others to support a consensus on tasks. They are responsive to appeals on budget-cutting grounds that would not have registered earlier and which remain meaningless to liberals outside the Committee. In cases, therefore, where Committee selection does not and cannot initially produce individuals with a predisposition toward protecting the Treasury, the same result is achieved by socialization.

Socialization is a training in behavior as well as in perception. For the newcomer, conformity to norms in specific situations is insured through the appropriate application, by the Committee veterans, of rewards and punishments. For the Committee member who serves his apprenticeship creditably, the passage of time holds the promise that he will inherit a position of influence. He may, as an incentive, be given some small reward early in his Committee career. One man, in his second year, had been assigned the task of specializing in one particular program. However narrow the scope of his specialization, it had placed him on the road to influence within the Committee. He explained with evident pleasure:

The first year, you let things go by. You can't participate. But you learn by watching the others operate. The next year, you know what you're interested in and when to step in. . . . For instance, I've become an expert on the — program. The chairman said to me, 'This is something you ought to get interested in.' I did; and now I'm the expert on the Committee. Whatever I say on that, the other members listen to me and do what I want.

At some later date, provided he continues to observe Committee norms, he will be granted additional influence, perhaps through a prominent floor role. A model Committee man of moderate seniority who had just attained to this stage of accomplishment, and who had suffered through several political campaigns back home fending off charges that he was a do-nothing Congressman, spoke about the rewards he was beginning to reap.

When you perform well on the floor when you bring out a bill, and Members know that you know the bill, you develop prestige with other Members of Congress. They come over and ask you what you think, because they know you've studied it. You begin to get a reputation beyond your subcommittee. And you get inner satisfaction, too. You don't feel that you're down here doing nothing.

The first taste of influence which comes to men on this Committee is compensation for the frustrations of apprenticeship. Committee integration in general, and the meshing of roles between elders and newcomers in particular, rests on the fact that conformity to role expectations over time does guarantee to the young positive rewards—the very kind of rewards of power, prestige, and personal satisfaction which led most of them to seek Committee membership in the first place.

The important function of apprenticeship is that it provides the necessary time during which socialization can go forward. And teaching proceeds with the aid of punishments as well as rewards. Should a new member inadvertently or deliberately run afoul of Committee norms during his apprenticeship, he will find himself confronted with negative sanctions ranging in subtlety from "jaundiced eyes" to a changed subcommittee assignment. Several members, for example, recalled their earliest encounter with the norm of unity and the tradition against minority reports. One remembered his attempt to file a minority report. "The Chairman was pretty upset about it. It's just a tradition, I guess, not to have minority reports. I didn't know it was a tradition. When I said I was going to write a minority report, some eyebrows were raised. The Chairman said it just wasn't the thing to do. Nothing more was said about it. But it wasn't a very popular thing to do, I guess." He added that he had not filed one since.

Some younger members have congenital difficulty in observing the norms of the apprentice's role. In the 86th Congress, these types tended to come from the Republican minority. The minority newcomers (described by one of the men who selected them as "eight young, energetic, fighting conservatives") were a group of economy-minded individuals some of whom chafed against any barrier which kept them from immediate influence on Committee policy. Their reaction was quite different from that of the young Democrats, whose difficulty was in learning to become economy-minded, but who did not actively resent their lack of influence. One freshman, who felt that "The appropriations system is lousy, inadequate and old fashioned," recalled that he had spoken out in full Committee against the recommendations of a subcommittee of which he was not a member. Having failed, he continued to oppose the recommendation during floor debate. By speaking up, speaking in relation to the work of another subcommittee and by opposing a Committee recommendation, he had violated the particular norms of his apprentice role as well of the generally applicable norms of reciprocity and unity. He explained what he had learned, but remained only partially socialized:

They want to wash their dirty linen in the Committee and they want no opposition afterward. They let me say my piece in Committee. . . . But I just couldn't keep quiet. I said some things on the floor, and I found out that's about all they would take. . . . If you don't get along with your Committee and have their support, you don't get anything accomplished around here. . . . I'm trying to be a loyal, cooperative member of the Committee. You hate to be a stinker; but I'm still picking at the little things because I can't work on the big things. There's nothing for the new men to do, so they have to find places to needle in order to take some part in it.

Another freshman, who had deliberately violated apprenticeship norms by trying to ask "as many questions as the chairman" during subcommittee hearings, reported a story of unremitting counteraction against his deviation:

In the hearings, I have to wait sometimes nine or ten hours for a chance; and he hopes I'll get tired and stay home. I've had to wait till some pretty unreasonable hours. Once I've gotten the floor, though, I've been able to make a good case. Sometimes I've been the only person there. . . . He's all powerful. He's got all the power. He wouldn't think of taking me on a trip with him when he goes to hold hearings. Last year, he went to——. He wouldn't give me a nudge there. And in the hearings, when I'm questioning a witness, he'll keep butting in so that my case won't appear to be too rosy.

Carried on over a period of two years, this behavior resulted in considerable personal friction between a Committee elder and the newcomer. Other members of his subcommittee pointedly gave him a great lack of support for his non-conformity. "They tried to slow him down and tone him down a little," not because he and his subcommittee chairman disagreed, but on the grounds that the Committee has developed accepted ways of disagreeing which minimize, rather than exacerbate, interpersonal friction.

One internal threat to Committee integration comes from new members who from untutored perceptions, from ignorance of norms, or from dissatisfaction with the apprentice role may not act in accordance with Committee expectations. The seriousness of this threat is minimized, however, by the fact that the deviant newcomer does not possess sufficient resources to affect adversely the operation of the system. Even if he does not respond immediately to the application of sanctions, he can be held in check and subjected to an extended and (given the frequency of interaction among members) intensive period of socialization. The success of Committee socialization is indicated by the fact that whereas wholesale criticism of Committee operations was frequently voiced among junior members, it had disappeared among the men of moderate experience. And what these middle seniority members now accept as the facts of Committee life, the veterans vigorously assert and defend as the essentials of a smoothly functioning system. Satisfaction with the Committee's internal structure increases with length of Committee service.

An important reason for changing member attitudes is that those who have attained leadership positions have learned, as newcomers characteristically have not, that their conformity to Committee norms is the ultimate source of their influence inside the group. Freshman members do not as readily perceive the degree to which interpersonal influence is rooted in obedience to group norms. They seem to convert their own sense of powerlessness into the view that the Committee's leaders possess, by virtue of their positions, arbitrary, absolute, and awesome power. Typically, they say: "If you're a subcommittee chairman, it's your Committee." "The Chairman runs the show. He gets what he wants. He decides what he wants and gets it through." Older members of the Committee, however, view the power of the leaders as a highly contingent and revocable grant, tendered by the Committee for so long and only so long as their leaders abide by Committee expectations. In commenting on internal influence, their typical reaction is: "Of course, the Committee wouldn't follow him if it didn't want to. He has a great deal of respect. He's an able man, a hard-working man." "He knows the bill backwards and forwards. He works hard, awfully hard and the members know it." Committee leaders have an imposing set of formal prerogatives. But they can capitalize on them only if they command the respect, confidence and deference of their colleagues.

It is basic to Committee integration that members who have the greatest power to change the system evidence the least disposition to do so. Despite their institutional conservatism, however, Committee elders do occasionally violate the norms applicable to them and hence represent a potential threat to successful integration. Excessive deviation from Committee expectations by some leaders will bring counter-measures by other leaders. Thus, for example, the Chairman and his subcommittee chairmen exercise reciprocal controls over one another's behavior. The Chairman has the authority to appoint the chairman and members of each subcommittee and fix its jurisdiction. "He runs the Committee. He has a lot of power," agrees one subcommittee chairman. "But it's all done on the basis of personal friendship. If he tries to get too big, the members can whack him down by majority vote."

In the 84th Congress, Chairman Cannon attempted an unusually broad reorganization of subcommittee jurisdictions. The subcommittee chairman most adversely affected rallied his senior colleagues against the Chairman's action—on the ground that it was an excessive violation of role expectations and threatening to subcommittee autonomy. Faced with the prospect of a negative Committee vote, the Chairman was forced to act in closer conformity to the expectations of the other leaders. As one participant described the episode,

Mr. Cannon, for reasons of his own, tried to bust up one of the subcommittees. We didn't like that. . . . He was breaking up the whole Committee. A couple of weeks later, a few of the senior members got together and worked out a compromise. By that time, he had seen a few things, so we went to him and talked to him and worked it out."

On the subcommittees, too, it is the veterans of both parties who will levy sanctions against an offending chairman. It is they who speak of "cutting down to size" and "trimming the whiskers" of leaders who become "too cocky," "too stubborn" or who "do things wrong too often." Committee integration is underwritten by the fact that no member high or low is permanently immune from the operation of its sanctioning mechanisms.

III

Data concerning internal committee activity can be organized and presented in various ways. One way is to use key functional problems like integration as the focal points for descriptive analysis. On the basis of our analysis (and without, for the time being, having devised any precise measure of integration), we are led to the summary observation that the House Appropriations Committee appears to be a well integrated, if not an extremely well integrated, committee. The question arises as to whether anything can be gained from this study other than a description of one property of one political subsystem. If it is reasonable to assume that the internal life of a congressional committee affects all legislative activity involving that committee, and if it is reasonable to assume that the analysis of a committee's internal relationships will produce useful knowledge about legislative behavior, some broader implications for this study are indicated.

In the first place, the success of the House Appropriations Committee in solving the problem of integration probably does have important consequences for the appropriations process. Some of the possible relationships can be stated as hypotheses and tested; others can be suggested as possible guides to understanding. All of them require further research. Of primary interest is the relationship between integration and the power of the Committee. There is little doubt about the fact of Committee power. Of the 443 separate case histories of bureau appropriations examined, the House accepted Committee recommendations in 387, or 87.4 per cent of them; and in 159, or 33.6 per cent of the cases, the House Committee's original recommendations on money amounts were the exact ones enacted into law. The hypothesis that the greater the degree of Committee unity the greater the probability that its recommendations will be accepted is being tested as part of a larger study.<sup>24</sup> House Committee integration may be a key factor in producing House victories in conference committee. This relationship, too, might be tested. Integration appears to help provide the House conferees with a feeling of confidence and superiority which is one of their important advantages in the mix of psychological factors affecting conference deliberations.

Another suggested consequence of high integration is that party groups have a relatively small influence upon appropriations decisions. It suggests, too, that Committee-oriented behavior should be duly emphasized in any analysis of Congressional oversight of administrative activity by this Committee. Successful integration promotes the achievement of the Committee's goals, and doubtless helps account for the fairly consistent production of budget-cutting decisions. Another consequence will be found in the strategies adopted by people seeking favorable Committee decisions. For example, the characteristic lines of contact from executive officials to the Committee will run to the chairman and the ranking minority member (and to the professional staff man) of the single subcommittee handling their agency's appropriations. The ways in which the Committee achieves integration may even affect the success or failure of a bureau in getting its appropriations. Committee members, for instance, will react more favorably toward an administrator who conforms to their self-image of the hard-working master-of-detail than to one who does not—and Committee response to individual administrators bulks large in their determinations.

Finally, the internal integration of this Committee helps to explain the extraordinary stability, since 1920, of appropriations procedures—in the face of repeated proposals to change them through omnibus appropriations, legislative budgets, new budgetary forms, item veto, Treasury borrowing, etc. Integration is a stabilizing force, and the stability of the House Appropriations Committee has been a force for stabilization throughout the entire process. It was, for example, the disagreement between Cannon and Taber which led to the indecisiveness reflected in the short-lived experiment with a single appropriations bill.<sup>25</sup> One need only examine the conditions most likely to decrease Committee integration to ascertain some of the critical factors for producing changes in the appropriations process. A description of integration is also an excellent base-line from which to analyze changes in internal structure.

<sup>24</sup> Cf. Dwaine Marvick, "Congressional Appropriations Politics," unpublished manuscript (Columbia, 1952).

All of these are speculative propositions which call for further research. But they suggest, as a second implication, that committee integration does have important consequences for legislative activity and, hence, that it is a key variable in the study of legislative politics. It would seem, therefore, to be a fruitful focal point for the study of other congressional committees.<sup>26</sup> Comparative committee analysis could usefully be devoted to (1) the factors which tend to increase or decrease integration; (2) the degree to which integration is achieved; and (3) the consequences of varying degrees of integration for committee behavior and influence. If analyses of committee integration are of any value, they should encourage the analysis and the classification of congressional committees along functional lines. And they should lead to the discussion of interrelated problems of committee survival. Functional classifications of committees (i.e., well or poorly integrated) derived from a large number of descriptive analyses of several functional problems, may prove helpful in constructing more general propositions about the legislative process.

parative success in meeting the problem of integration. The House Committee on Education and Labor appears to be a poorly integrated committee. Its internal structure is characterized by a great deal of subgroup conflict, relatively little role reciprocity, and minimally effective internal control mechanisms. External concerns, like those of party, constituency and clientele groups, are probably more effective in determining its decisions than is likely to be the case in a well-integrated committee. An analysis of the internal life of the Committee on Education and Labor, drawn partly from interviews with 19 members of that group, will appear in a forthcoming study, Federal Aid to Education and National Politics, by Professor Frank Munger and the author, to be published by Syracuse University Press. See also Nicholas R. Masters, op. cit., note 7 above, pp. 354–555, and Seymour Scher, "Congressional Committee Members as Independent Agency Overseers: A Case Study," this REVIEW, Vol. 54 (December 1960), pp. 911–920.

<sup>25</sup> See Dalmas Nelson, "The Omnibus Appropriations Act of 1950," Journal of Politics (May, 1953).

<sup>26</sup> This view has been confirmed by the results of interviews conducted by the author with members of the House Committee on Education and Labor, together with an examination of that Committee's activity in one policy area. They indicate very significant contrasts between the internal structure of that Committee and the Appropriations Committee—contrasts which center around their com-

SUPREME COURT BEHAVIOR IN RACIAL EXCLUSION CASES: 1935-1960

S. SIDNEY ULMER
Michigan State University

The United States Supreme Court is often guided by rules of law which make the disposition of cases depend upon singular combinations of circumstances. It is a relatively simple procedure to go through the cases in a subject matter area and compile a list of the facts the justices seem to have considered material to their solution of the issue at hand. But the identification of the peculiar combinations of events which push the decisions in one direction or the other is more difficult. The number of possible combinations is almost endless: with as few as twenty specified circumstances there are more than one million possible combinations. And the weight of a particular circumstance may depend on the combination of factors in which it appears.

Fred Kort has pointed to the "concrete differentiation of factual elements" which seem decisive in cases involving such procedural civil rights as protection against unreasonable searches and seizures, coerced confessions, and unfair trial procedures.<sup>1</sup>

This paper does not employ the methods developed by Kort, but its point of departure is also a recognition of the fundamental importance of factual elements in certain kinds of cases. The subject area here is the type of unfair trial procedure at issue in cases involving the exclusion of Negroes from jury service in state courts. Supreme Court decisions on this issue are well known and the general topic has been well plowed by students of constitutional law. My purpose is to see whether inferences about Supreme Court behavior in racial exclusion cases can be sharpened by a shift from the traditional method of analysis. The shift in method involves no change in focus since my investigation will use the same facts chosen as material by those employing other workways. But my aim is quantitative generalization.

I

Racial exclusion in the Federal courts has been barred by a congressional statute for many years and since 1875 state officials discriminating against Negroes in determining jury service in state courts have been subject to a fine of not more than $5,000.<sup>2</sup> But the vindication of Negro rights in this area has depended not on prosecutions under this statute but primarily on appeals to the Supreme Court invoking the Fourteenth Amendment against convictions in state courts obtained from juries from which Negroes are said to have been systematically excluded. In deciding these appeals the Court has developed the concept of a "representative" jury that is "an impartial jury drawn from a cross section of the community."

<sup>1</sup> Fred Kort, "Predicting Supreme Court Decisions Mathematically: A Quantitative Analysis of the Right to Counsel Cases," this REVIEW, Vol. 51 (March, 1957), pp. 1-12.

As Black put it in Smith v. Texas:

It is part of the established tradition in the use of juries as instruments of public justice that the jury be a body truly representative of the community. For racial discrimination to result in the exclusion from jury service of otherwise qualified groups not only violates our Constitution . . . but is at war with our basic concepts of a democratic society and a representative government.<sup>3</sup>

The Court has held that this principle entitles the Negro to a jury system in which Negroes are not intentionally and systematically excluded solely on account of race or color. But whether exclusion is intentional and systematic and solely on the basis of race or color must be determined on the facts.<sup>4</sup> If the facts suggest a prima facie case of discrimination, the burden is on the state to rebut the presumption. In deciding whether a prima facie case has been made out the Court has chosen to focus on a particular type of fact, i.e.,—as David Fellman has expressed it—"Usually it is a matter of numbers."<sup>5</sup> The crucial facts, in short, seem to be qualitative variables, the variations in which may be represented numerically. A judgment as to discrimination is a rebuttable inference from a particular combination of numerically expressed facts or factual relationships. The lawyer, by necessity, must be interested in

<sup>2</sup> 18 USC at 243.

<sup>3</sup> 311 U.S. 128, 130 (1940).

<sup>4</sup> As Black expressed it in Patton v. Mississippi: "Whether there has been systematic racial discrimination . . . in the selection of jurors is a question to be determined from the facts in each particular case." 332 U. S. 463 at 466.

<sup>5</sup> David Fellman, The Defendant's Rights (1958), p. 103.

identifying the criteria which guide the formulation of such a judgment. The political scientist specializing in public law may equally have an interest if he would explain the Court's actions. The test which the Court has used to distinguish the combinations of circumstances which show unconstitutional exclusion seems to have been clearly stated on several occasions by several different justices.

In Smith v. Texas, for instance, Justice Black declared that "Chance and accident alone could hardly have brought about the listing for grand jury service of so few negroes from among the thousands shown by the undisputed evidence to possess the legal qualifications for jury service."<sup>6</sup> Stone remarked in Hill v. Texas that "... chance or accident could hardly have accounted for the continuous omission of negroes from the grand jury lists for so long a period as sixteen years or more."<sup>7</sup> And as late as 1958, Black, speaking for a unanimous Court in Eubanks v. Louisiana said, "... the uniform and long-continued exclusion of Negroes from grand juries shown by this record cannot be attributed to chance [or] to accident..."<sup>8</sup>

These statements, and others like them, suggest that while the Court sees the event of exclusion as a juncture of innumerable forces, a distinction is made between determinative and chance factors. When convictions have been upset in exclusion cases, the Court has found that intentional and purposeful racial discrimination has determined the exclusion. It seems perfectly clear at the same time that exclusion resulting from chance factors constitutes no violation of the Fourteenth Amendment. In deciding whether a particular exclusion of Negroes from some part of the jury system is a chance occurrence, the Court has been careful to note two types of statistics. One is the ratio of qualified Negroes to qualified whites in the jurisdiction involved. In determining this ratio the Court has utilized such measures as the percentage of Negro taxpayers, the percentage literate, the percentage of Negro males 21 years and older, and the percentage of Negroes in the total population of the county. It has not, however, considered all these factors in every case. In fact, the only statistic running through all cases is the raw population figure.

The second type of statistic the Court has looked at is the ratio of Negroes to whites in the area of service from which exclusion is charged. The ratio chosen for emphasis usually depends on the nature of the claim, since exclusion from petit juries, grand juries, or jury lists may be involved.

Evidently, we have here an application of the statistical concept of sampling, and it suggests a testable hypothesis, namely, that the outcome in racial exclusion cases depends upon the relationship of a sample to a population on a particular attribute—racial heterogeneity (RH). The population consists of the Negroes and whites from which the sample (read jury or jury list) is drawn. The play in the joints of the judicial machine is of great importance here. For whether the racial heterogeneity of a sample is representative of a population is a meaningful question only if the population and sample are relevant for each other.

The racial heterogeneity of a population or a sample may be measured by an index of qualitative variation. This method essentially counts differences. The greater the number of differences among a set of items, the more heterogeneous the aggregate and hence the greater the variation in it. By counting the differences between each item and every other item in a set, we get a total number of differences in the aggregate. This becomes meaningful when we relate the observed differences to the maximum number of differences possible. The index of qualitative variation is the ratio of total observed differences to maximum possible differences, a ratio that can vary between zero and 100 per cent.

II

An idea of what the court has been doing in exclusion cases can be gained by comparing the racial heterogeneity of the populations and samples to which the court has paid attention. RH values for populations and samples are presented in Table I for the 13 cases decided in the period 1935-1960. The table shows that the court has often used the racial composition of a total county population as a base for comparison with the racial composition of juries and jury lists. Yet, it is safe to say that in no county or state is the total population the relevant base for determining jury service. Total population always needs refining by the elimination of those who lack the requisite qualities and characteristics specified by the statutes. There is some tension between the notion of a representative cross-section of the community and the long lists of requirements and exemptions which characterize jury selection procedures in many states.<sup>9</sup> But as long as the Supreme Court

<sup>6</sup> Loc. cit., p. 131.

<sup>7</sup> 316 U. S. 400, 404.

<sup>8</sup> 356 U. S. 584, 587.

<sup>9</sup> For example, Alabama excludes those who are under age, habitual drunkards, permanently diseased or unfit because of physical weakness, il-

TABLE I. COMPARATIVE RACIAL HETEROGENEITY* IN SELECTED POPULATIONS WITH ASSOCIATED PROBABILITIES FOR BI-RACIAL SAMPLES

Case	Year	Out- come	RHP %	RHS %	P	Vote
Norris v. Alabama	1935	+	29.8(M)	0		8-0
Hale v. Kentucky	1938	+	41(Tx)	0		8-0
Pierre v. Louisiana	1939	+	88.8(R)	0		8-0
Smith v. Texas	1940	+	36(PT)	13.4(JL)	<.001	9-0
Smith v. Texas	1940	+	13.4(JL)	4.5(GJ)	<.05
Hill v. Texas	1942	+	52.3(R)	0		9-0
Adkins v. Texas	1945	-	52.3(R)	23(JL)	<.05	6-3
Patton v. Mississippi	1947	+	92.1(R)	0		9-0
Brunson v. N. Carolina	1948	+	9.3(JP)	3.1(JL)	<.001	9-0
Cassell v. Texas	1950	+	24.3(PT)	25(GJ)	>.7	7-1
Cassell v. Texas	1950	+	24.3(PT)	24(GJ)	P <sub>21</sub> <.01
Brown v. Allen	1953	-	53.7(Tx)	53.3(JL)	>.8	6-3
Brown v. Allen	1953	-	53.7(Tx)	34.4(JL)	>.16
Speller v. Allen	1953	-	94.2(Tx)	26(JB)	<.001	6-3
Reece v. Georgia	1955	+	37.5(M)	4.3(JL)	<.001	9-0
Eubanks v. Louisiana	1958	+	88.8(R)	.07(GJ)	<.001	9-0

* Distinguishing Negroes and Whites only.

Legend: + = decision for the Negro claimant

- = decision against the Negro claimant

RHP = racial heterogeneity of the relevant population

RHS = racial heterogeneity of the relevant sample

M = males, 21 and over

Tx = total tax paying population

R = raw population

PT = poll tax paying population

GJ = grand jury

JL = jury list

JP = jury pool

JB = jury box

P = probability of the difference between RHP and RHS occurring by chance as not seen fit to prohibit such disqualifications, the representative jury should be interpreted as one which represents fairly the population of qualified prospects. And indeed, the justices have at times used a refined rather than a raw population count as a basis for their computations, though they have not been as careful to distinguish the one from the other as operates (except property holders), and those convicted of any offense involving moral turpitude. Alabama exempts from jury service judges, attorneys, officers of the United States, officers of the Executive Department of the state, sheriffs, deputies, clerks of court, county commissioners, physicians, dentists, pharmacists, optometrists, teachers, actuaries, boat engineers, bus drivers, truck drivers (under jurisdiction of the Public Service Commission), railroad engineers, firemen, conductors, train dispatchers, bus dispatchers, might be wished.<sup>10</sup>

In five of the 16 relationships examined, the court used total population statistics. In four of these the racial heterogeneity of the sample railroad station agents, telegraph operators, reporters, embalmers, radiobroadcasting engineers and announcers, superintendents, doctors and regular employees of Bryce and Searcy Hospitals, officers and enlisted men of the National Guard and Naval Militia, convicts and prison guards. See Anderson v. Alabama, pending before the U. S. Supreme Court, 1961 Term, Docket No. 326.

<sup>10</sup> It is only fair to say that the necessary distinction with supporting statistical data has not often been presented in the parties' briefs. On several occasions, the court has apparently found it necessary to take judicial notice of census data in order to reach a determination.

population over extended periods of 16 years or more was zero. In the fifth case, the court used the county tax list to identify the qualified population, but here again exclusion was total over a period of 30 years. Since all five cases were decided against the state, it seems fair to conclude that where the Negro population is substantial (7.2 per cent or more), and exclusion from the sample absolute, the court has required no further test. Indeed, the language in the opinions occasionally suggests that proof of total exclusion alone may be sufficient for showing racial discrimination, assuming there were some qualified Negroes in the county. Typical of this view is the comment of Black in Patton v. Mississippi that

... whatever the precise number of qualified colored electors in the county, there were some. ... We hold that the state wholly failed to meet the very strong evidence of purposeful racial discrimination made out by the petitioner upon the uncontradicted showing that for thirty years or more no Negro had served as a juror in the criminal courts of Lauderdale County.<sup>11</sup>

Total exclusion cases, therefore, appear to require no further analysis, though problems could arise if the period of exclusion is sufficiently shortened. For the court has often asserted that exclusion of a race from a small enough sample is not sufficient for showing intentional and purposeful discrimination on a racial basis.<sup>12</sup>

The remaining cases raised problems of the type likely to plague the court in the future. In these cases the sample was racially heterogeneous as was also the population with which <sup>11</sup> 332 U.S. 463, 468-469. This comment was in response to an attempt by the Mississippi Supreme Court to play the role of statistician. "Of the 25 qualified Negro male electors there would be left, therefore, as those not exempt, 12 or 13 available male negro electors as compared with 5,500 to 6,000 male white electors as to whom, after deducting 500 to 1,000 exempt, would leave a proportion of 5,000 non-exempt white jurors to 12 or 13 non-exempt negro jurors, or about one fourth of one per cent negro jurors,—400 to 1. . . . For the reasons already heretofore stated there was only a chance of 1 in 400 that a Negro would appear on such a venire and as this venire was of 100 jurors, the sheriff, had he brought in a negro, would have had to discriminate against white jurors, not against negroes,—he could not be expected to bring in one fourth of one Negro." (p. 467).

<sup>12</sup> E. g., Cassell v. Texas, 339 U.S. 282, 286; Akins v. Texas, 325 U.S. 403.

it was compared. The question the court has been asking is whether the differences in degree of heterogeneity are due to chance or intentional racial policy. As Frankfurter put it Cassell v. Texas, the question is whether there was "a purposeful non-inclusion of Negro because of race or a merely symbolic representation, not the operation of an honest exercise of relevant judgment or the uncontrollable caprices of chance."<sup>13</sup> While the court has not publicly used statistical tests of significance for the differences observed, nothing prevents, from doing so in our search for a standard. Associated probabilities have been calculated for each of the bi-racial distributions in Table I. In Smith v. Texas, the grand jury list was rated 13.4 per cent on the RH factor as compared 36 per cent for the relevant population, composed of those paying poll taxes in the county. The chance expectation of such a difference is much less than 1 in 1,000. But when the grand jury list and the grand jury are compared on the same factor, the former exceeds the latter by a three-to-one ratio—a difference expected by chance less than five times in a hundred. In Brunson v. North Carolina,<sup>15</sup> Reece v. Georgia<sup>16</sup> and Eubanks v. Louisiana,<sup>17</sup> the differences observed have associated probabilities of considerably less than .001. In Brown v. Allen<sup>18</sup> on the other hand, the observed differences in drawing grand jury and petit jury lists would be expected by chance about nine times

<sup>13</sup> Loc. cit., p. 291.

<sup>14</sup> Unless otherwise indicated, all probability statistics used in this paper are two-tailed and were computed with the binomial expansion when N was small and with the binomial test and the Yates correction for continuity if N was large. The formula for the binomial expansion is where P = proportion of cases expected in one category,

$$P(x) = \frac{(N)!}{(x)!(N-x)!} P^x Q^{N-x}$$

$$Q = 1 - P \text{ and } \frac{(N)!}{(x)!(N-x)!} = \frac{N!}{x!(N-x)!}$$

For large samples

$$(N > 25)Z = \frac{(x \pm .5) - NP}{\sqrt{NPQ}}$$

<sup>15</sup> 333 U.S. 851 (1948).

<sup>16</sup> 350 U.S. 85 (1955).

<sup>17</sup> 356 U.S. 584 (1954).

<sup>18</sup> 344 U.S. 443 (1953).

in ten for the latter and approximately 17 times in 100 for the former. Social scientists analyzing these data would be likely to reject chance as an explanation in the first three cases but not in the Brown case since .05 is the usual cutting point. In these cases, the Supreme Court consciously or unconsciously has chosen to use a region of rejection consistent with established statistical procedures. And in Brown, the decision is for the state, racial discrimination not having been proved.

The remaining three cases do not fit the same pattern. In Cassell v. Texas, the difference between the racial heterogeneity of the poll tax population and that of the grand jury is so minimal that its associated probability of occurrence is about eight times in ten. On that basis, we might expect a decision for Texas. In Akins v. Texas,<sup>19</sup> the disparity between the RH of the poll tax population and the jury list would be expected by chance less than five times in a hundred. We should therefore anticipate a decision for the Negro claimant. Contrary to these expectations, Texas won the decision in Akins but lost it in Cassell. The difficulties of squaring the two cases in terms of legal doctrine have been recognized. Herman Pritchett says that "the authority of the Akins ruling was subsequently impaired by the somewhat confused decision in Cassell v. Texas."<sup>20</sup> And it is true that the seven members of the majority in Cassell split 4-3 in choosing a rationale for their decision. The behavior of this majority, however, is entirely consistent with the statistical considerations previously introduced. For Reed, speaking for the court, was no more impressed by the differences in the racial heterogeneity of the poll tax population and that of the grand jury population than we are. And he declared, "Without more it cannot be said that Negroes had been left off grand-jury panels to such a degree as to establish a prima facie case of discrimination."<sup>21</sup>

The decision in the case turned, therefore, on the second charge that "the Dallas County grand-jury commissioners for 21 consecutive lists had consistently limited Negroes selected for grand-jury service to not more than one on each grand jury."<sup>22</sup> While the justices split 4-3 in agreeing with this charge, the decision for the Negro can be explained statistically since the associated probability of no more than one Negro on 21 consecutive grand juries is less than .01. This explanation eliminates the confusion in Reed's opinion and makes the outcome in Cassell consistent with the outcome in the other cases. In Akins, on the other hand, the Negro claimant failed because his sample was too small, not because the observed differences between sample and population were insignificant. As Reed pointed out for the court, the only complaint was said "to consist of an arbitrary and purposeful limitation by the Grand Jury Commissioners of the number of Negroes to one who was to be placed upon the grand jury panel of sixteen for the term of court at which the indictment against petitioner was found. This is petitioner's only complaint as to racial discrimination."<sup>23</sup> If this is viewed as a claim for proportional representation, it would have no standing. If it is viewed as a claim of intentional racial discrimination, a sample of 16 persons containing one Negro was not sufficient to prove racial discrimination where Negroes constituted 15.5 per cent of the population sampled. The court, indeed, seems to have found the sample inadequate even when doubled to 32 persons including two Negroes. It may be surmised that had no more than one Negro name appeared on 21 consecutive lists, the sample would have been sufficiently large to support an inference consistent with that drawn in Cassell.

While the court has not been prone to use such terms as "sample size," an inference that such a factor is important in exclusion cases is entirely consonant with the data we have examined. The sample size in the 13 cases studied varied from 16 in Akins to 2,126 in Speller. And the sample in Akins was only about one-fourth the size of the next smallest sample. This alone is sufficient to put Akins in a class by itself. But even more striking is the fact that the court has decided no case in favor of a Negro claimant where the sample available numbered less than 252 names. It is also worth noting that a total of 25 different justices have compiled, over a period of 24 terms, a record of remarkable consistency in racial exclusion cases. For, as Table I shows, the 25 justices cast a total of 113 votes; all but 10 of these were cast consistently with the statistical explanations here advanced. This record shows that the liberal-conservative dichotomy which often characterizes the Supreme Court has not been operative in this area of litigation. It also shows that the court did not wait for Earl Warren to bring unanimity to one area of decision making of vital importance to those subjected to racial discrimination.

<sup>19</sup> 325 U.S. 398 (1945).

<sup>20</sup> C. Herman Pritchett, The American Constitution (1959), p. 546.

<sup>21</sup> Loc. cit., pp. 285-286.

<sup>22</sup> Ibid., p. 286.

<sup>23</sup> Loc. cit., p. 400.

The final case, Speller v. Allen, is the only one not decided consistently with the statistical formulations we have advanced. In Speller no Negro had served on a Vance County, North Carolina jury in "recent" years. In examining the jury box, it was found that of 2,126 names, only 145 were those of Negroes. The majority of six justices (Vinson, Reed, Jackson, Burton, Clark and Minton) failed to find racial discrimination. Yet the probability of such an observed difference in the racial composition of the tax list and the jury box would be less than .001. Speller, therefore, is a deviant case not explained by our formulations. In terms of the standards seemingly used by the court before and after that decision it would appear, as Black and Frankfurter agreed, that there was "unconstitutional discrimination" in the make-up of the jury box in Speller.

III

What may be concluded from all this? Basically, that it is now possible to formulate a set of explanatory hypotheses as follows:

(1) The total absence of Negroes from a state jury system or a part thereof is a violation of the Fourteenth Amendment given two conditions:

- (a) The proportion of Negroes in the qualified population is substantial (i.e., 7.2 per cent or more).
- (b) The period of exclusion is long (i.e., 16 years or more).

(2) Partial absence of Negroes from a state jury system or a part thereof is a violation of the Fourteenth Amendment given two conditions:

- (a) The racial heterogeneity of a sample population (read jury or jury list) differs from that of a qualified population to an extent expected by chance less than five times in one hundred.
- (b) The sample is sufficiently large (60 or more cases).

These hypotheses are not offered as final explanations or as complete explanations or as the only explanations for the Supreme Court's decisions in racial exclusion cases. They are submitted as explanations consonant with the data examined and are stated with sufficient precision to make empirical testing possible.

KANT, LIBERALISM, AND WAR*

KENNETH N. WALTZ

Swarthmore College

Many liberals of the nineteenth century, and their predecessors of the middle eighteenth, thought the natural condition of men to be one of harmony. Dissension and strife do not inhere in man and society; they arise instead from mistaken belief, inadequate knowledge, and defective governance. With the evils defined, the remedies become clear: educate men and their governors, strip away political abuses. This is one theme in the history of liberal thought. Urged by humane philosophers and supported by pacifistic economists, its appeal in Western society is immense and enduring.

There is in liberal thought another theme as well, which is often obscured though it goes back to the earliest philosophers who can fairly be called liberal. Montesquieu, Adam Smith, and Kant made no easy assumptions about the rationality and goodness of man. Among men in nature and states in a world of states, they found not harmony and peace but hostility and war to be the natural condition.

The two liberal traditions are partly contradictory. Kant is often improperly placed in the first of them, which helps to account for many of the misinterpretations of his political philosophy. His essay Eternal Peace is seen as one of a succession of peace plans going back to Dante and Dubois in the early fourteenth century, encompassing the French monk Crucé and the abbé St. Pierre, and culminating in the League and the United Nations. Some emphasize the plan, that is, international organization; others the importance of its being based on republican or democratic governments. In his guise as a philosopher urging the peaceful proclivities of democracy, Kant has even infiltrated the State Department. Giving full credit to the analysis of Kant, George V. Allen, an assistant secretary, once said: "The United Nations, with all its virtues, has not yet been able to achieve freedom from fear. The reason is easy to understand. Its second most powerful member is not a democracy."<sup>1</sup>

Some have accepted such an interpretation not to applaud Kant's commanding vision and high moral purpose but rather to decry his political naiveté and simple-minded optimism.<sup>2</sup> Kant's supposed conviction that a Europe of republics would be peaceful, Crane Brinton finds to be a pathetic relic of the Enlightenment.<sup>3</sup> The statement exposes one of the problems of interpretation. Kant is a child of the Enlightenment; he is also the father of a critical philosophy that goes beyond it. Sometimes he writes as though peace were inevitably coming; at other times, as though Realpolitik were the mode of the present and the future. One who cannot ignore the latter aspect may label it a Germanic aberration, as Gooch did in his work on Germany and the French Revolution.<sup>4</sup> While Kant may be seen as a backsliding liberal, he may also be considered a theorist of power politics who hid his Machiavellian ideas by hanging 'round them the fashionable garments of liberalism. Since he explained and in a sense accepted the practice of power politics in the relations of states, since he wrote of nature's plan and man's predetermined destiny, this interpretation too becomes plausible, the more so if his Rechtsstaat is taken to be a thinly disguised despotism with the sovereign supposedly limited by law but actually free of any human constraint.<sup>5</sup>

It is little trouble to collate passages that would support in turn each of the preceding interpretations of Kant, but the whole man would thereby elude us. There is a unity in his thought that is hard to grasp. His manner of thinking is foreign to social-science fashions, his mode of analysis rigorous and yet subtle, his style difficult but clear, his writing crabbed and still, as Goethe said, sometimes slyly ironic and even eloquent.

I

"A true political philosophy . . . cannot advance a step without first paying homage to the principles of morals. . . ." <sup>6</sup> It is incumbent

<sup>2</sup> Crane Brinton, A Decade of Revolution, 1789-1799 (New York, 1934), p. 261.

<sup>3</sup> G. P. Gooch, Germany and the French Revolution (London, 1920), p. 271.

<sup>4</sup> For a recent example, see the lead review of The Times Literary Supplement, January 23, 1959.

<sup>5</sup> Kant, Eternal Peace and other International Essays, tr. W. Hastie (Boston, 1914), p. 118. This book contains: pp. 1-25, "The Natural

* Prepared for delivery at the 1961 Annual Meeting of the American Political Science Association, St. Louis, Mo., September 1961.

<sup>1</sup> George V. Allen, "Perpetual Peace Through World-Wide Federation," Department of State Bulletin, Vol. 20 (June 19, 1949), pp. 801-802.

upon us to take Kant at his word and begin by briefly discussing his moral philosophy. Kant was neither an empiricist nor an idealist. Empiricism he criticizes as leading to "merely contingent" knowledge; idealism as exceeding the bounds of reason. Man is a member of two worlds: the phenomenal and the noumenal. In the first, he is a creature of the senses, of impulse and desire. Utility or happiness as a standard of morals or legislation is mere caprice, for the object of action is taken from the realm of contingency. There can be no certainty nor universality of agreement. If your happiness is not mine, a government that presumes to tell either of us what objects we should seek and how we should seek them exceeds the bounds of permissible legislation. It undertakes to do what all men could not possibly have assented to.<sup>6</sup> This is the kernel of all liberalism, rigorously defined. It is expressed, for example, by Lord Acton in his argument that liberty is the only end of government that can be generally pursued without producing tyranny. In Kant's words: "No one may force anyone to be happy according to his manner of imagining the well-being of other men; instead, everyone may seek his happiness in the way that seems good to him as long as he does not infringe on the freedom of others to pursue a similar purpose, when such freedom may co-exist with the freedom of every other man according to a possible and general law."<sup>7</sup> Where others have grounded the injunction more pragmatically, Kant roots the limitation in a profound analysis of the nature of reason.

By his possession of reason, man is distinguished from all mere animals. Man's reasoning abilities are, however, circumscribed. He can know that noumena, things-in-themselves, exist; he cannot know their content. The imperative, which is the basis of morality and of legislation, is then necessarily without content. "Act according to a Maxim which can be adopted at the same time as a Universal Law."<sup>8</sup> My act is proper if everyone could, without contradiction and conflict, claim the right to act similarly. Men would always act in accordance with the categorical imperative if they were wholly creatures of reason. They are not. From the sensual nature of man conflict and violence arise. The contradiction between his condition and his potential gives the right to compel others to enter with him into a civil society in which his rights are secured, and with them the possibility of moral behavior.<sup>9</sup> The criterion of legislation is abstract in order that it may be, within the limits of reason, of general validity. The purpose of legislation is negative: to "hinder hindrances" to freedom so that each may enjoy his antecedently existing rights unmolested.

Each man is an end in himself. The rights of one man before the law are the same as the rights of another. Kant is sharply critical of all practice contrary to this dictum. In the state of nature men have possessions; in the civil state their possessions are secured to them by law and become property. Men have equal rights to property but in varying amounts depending on their situation and abilities. There can, by right, be no nobility of birth but only gradations of rank according to merit. Great inequalities of wealth may, however, limit or even destroy equality of opportunity, as Kant himself remarks. The remedy, negative and typically liberal, is to arrange the laws so as to lessen the perpetuation of family lands by inheritance.<sup>10</sup> To take another example and one that will incline our analysis toward the problem of war, Kant steadfastly opposed the impressment of subjects into military service. The practice was widespread. Karl Alexander, nephew of Frederick the Great, sold his regiments to England for the American War. At the bidding of his English mistress, he finally sold his principality to Prussia for cash and retired to England. In England impressment of sailors Principle of the Political Order Considered in Connection with the Idea of a Universal Cosmopolitan History"; pp. 27-54, "The Principles of Political Right Considered in Connection with the Relation of Theory to Practice in Natural Law"; pp. 55-66, "The Principle of Progress Considered in Connection with the Relation of Theory to Practice in International Law"; pp. 67-168, "Eternal Peace, A Philosophical Essay."

<sup>6</sup> See Fundamental Principles of the Metaphysics of Morals, esp. sec. 2; and in general, Critical Examination of Practical Reason. Both are in Thomas Kingsmill Abbott, tr., Kant's Critique of Practical Reason and Other Works on the Theory of Ethics, 6th ed. (London, 1909). For the political parts of the argument, see "Principles of Political Right."

<sup>7</sup> Acton, "Nationality," The History of Freedom and Other Essays (London, 1907), pp. 270-300; Kant, "Theory and Practice: Concerning the Common Saying: This May Be True in Theory But Does Not Apply to Practice," tr. Carl J. Friedrich, The Philosophy of Kant (New York, 1949), p. 416.

<sup>8</sup> The Philosophy of Law, tr. W. Hastie (Edinburgh, 1887), p. 34.

<sup>9</sup> Ibid., pp. 77-78, 157.

<sup>10</sup> "Principles of Political Right," pp. 34-39.

was regarded as an undeniable prerogative of the Crown, and the brutal and inefficient practice not eliminated until it was made unnecessary by the Continuous Service Scheme adopted in 1853.<sup>11</sup> In the face of such practices, Kant writes:

A State is not to be regarded as a property or patrimony like the soil on which it may be settled. It is a society of men, over which no one but itself has the right to rule . . . and to incorporate it as a graft in another State is to destroy its existence as a moral person; it is to reduce it to a thing, and thereby to contradict the idea of the original compact without which a right over a people is inconceivable.

Subjects are not, like the vegetables the farmer uproots and carts off to market, objects that the ruler can dispose of according to his whim. In many states the ruler does so treat them. Where war does not require of the ruler the least sacrifice of his pleasures he may resolve for war from insignificant reasons, as if it were but a hunting expedition; and, as regards its propriety, he may leave the justification of it without concern to the diplomatic body, who are always too ready to give their services for that purpose.<sup>12</sup>

The practices of governments contradict the principles of right. How are the required limitations to be secured? The answer has two parts: first, the institutions that are appropriate, and then how they may come to exist. Only in a republic can it be hoped that the principles of right will prevail. In such a state the executive is made up of one or a few; separated from it is an assembly representing the self-dependent citizens, men of property, profession, or craft. The executive presents its proposed legislation, the assembly chants its ayes and nays. The question put to it is not, for example, is a 10 per cent tax on bread supportable as compared to a tax of 5 per cent? The question, in the manner of Rousseau, is simply this: Does the proposed law accord with the general will? Is it one that everyone, though he would have preferred the lower tax, could conceivably have agreed to? If it is such, then the idea of the original contract is preserved. Still, what if the assembly says "nay" and the executive refuses to listen?

Kant's philosophy, including his political philosophy, moves forward by resolving a series of antinomies or tensions. The enjoyment, as distinct from the possession, of rights depends on the state. However imperfect the state may be, it is greatly preferable to anarchy. On such grounds as these, revolution is absolutely enjoined. Yet one may, as Kant did, view with sympathy revolutions that according to the principles of right would stand condemned. There is no contradiction. He writes, one might say, sometimes noumenally and sometimes phenomenally, or, more accurately, with both aspects of human affairs clearly in his mind. Careful analysis and the clear specification of standards square easily in Kant's philosophy with caution, flexibility, and moderation in the judgment of human behavior.

<sup>11</sup> Gooch, Germany and the French Revolution, p. 12; Christopher Lloyd, The Nation and the Navy (London, 1954), pp. 131, 209.

<sup>12</sup> "Eternal Peace," pp. 70, 78; Philosophy of Law, p. 217.

The other institutional arrangement that is essential to proper governance is freedom of expression. Kant takes Sapere Aude! as the motto of the Enlightenment, and one of the most frequently quoted of his statements is that "the liberty of the press is the sole palladium of the rights of the people."<sup>13</sup> One hears a distinct reverberation from the Philosophes' Shield of Evidence or an echo, to take a German formulation, of Schlözer's dictum that statistics and despotism cannot coexist. In his own and his subjects' interest, the ruler ought to permit the widest freedom of expression; but again, if he does not, there is nothing that can rightfully be done about it.

At such points as these some have concluded that Kant's political theory is a defense of despotism coupled with a hope that the despot will rule by law. He does, it is true, reflect the widespread ideas of his time. But they were ideas shared by many who were liberals as well as by others. Only a government secure in its power, Hegel once wrote, can permit the conscientious objector to live by his scruples. Across the North Sea one finds Lord Hardinge, Secretary at War in Wellington's Cabinet, describing the army as a protection rather than any detriment to Liberty. We permitted a licentiousness which under any other constitution might be fatal to the public peace. Meetings were held and language was used which no other empire would permit and which nothing but the confidence of the Crown in the Standing Army would justify even our Government in permitting."

Neither Hegel nor Hardinge were liberals, but they reflect the idea that Kant emphasizes: A government that while limited is strong in its sphere can permit a freedom to its subjects that would otherwise endanger the state. Thus Kant, with obvious reference to Frederick the Great, applauds the strength of the Prussian state upon which the individual's liberty depends.<sup>14</sup>

<sup>13</sup> "What is Enlightenment?" tr. Friedrich, Philosophy of Kant; "Principles of Political Right," p. 50.

So long at least as the state "runs a danger of being suddenly swallowed up by other States," it must be powerful externally as well as internally. In international relations the difficulties multiply. The republican form is preferable, partly because republics are more peacefully inclined; but despotisms are stronger—and no one would expect or wish to bring the state into jeopardy by decreasing its strength.<sup>15</sup> Standing armies are dangerous, arms races themselves being a cause of war, but in the absence of an outside agency affording protection, each state must look to the effectiveness of its army.<sup>16</sup> A freely flowing commerce is a means of promoting peace, but a state must control imports, in the interests of its subjects "and not for the advantage of strangers and the encouragement of the industry of others, because the State without the prosperity of the people would not possess sufficient power to resist external enemies or to maintain itself as a commonwealth."<sup>17</sup> Not only standing armies but also, indeed more so, the disparity of economic capacities may represent danger, occasion fear, and give rise to war.

Kant's concern with the strength and thus the safety of the state is part of his perception of the necessities of power politics. Among states in the world, as among individuals in the state of nature, there is constantly either violence or the threat of violence. States, like "lawless savages," are with each other "naturally in a nonjuridical condition."<sup>18</sup> There is no law above them; there is no judge among them; there is no legal process by which states can pursue their rights. They can do so only by war, and, as Kant points out, neither war nor the treaty of peace following it, can settle the question of right. A treaty of peace can end only a particular war; a pretext for new hostilities can always be found. "Nor can such a pretext under these circumstances be regarded as unjust; for in this state of society every nation is the judge of its own cause."<sup>19</sup> More surely than those who extract and emphasize merely Kant's republican aspirations and peaceful hopes, Khrushchev speaks as though he had read Kant correctly. "War," in Khrushchev's peculiar yet apt phrase, "is not fatalistically inevitable."<sup>20</sup>

Kant does set forth the "shoulds" and "oughts" of state behavior.<sup>21</sup> He does not expect them to be followed in a state of nature, for, as he says, "philosophically or diplomatically composed codes have not, nor could have, the slightest legal force, since the States as such stand under no common legal constraint. . . ."<sup>22</sup> His intention clearly is that the "oughts" be taken as the basis for the juridical order that must one day be established among states, just as the rights of the individual, though not viable in a state of nature, provided the basis for the civil state.

This is the culminating problem of Kant's philosophy. Men need the protection of law before they have any chance of leading the moral life to which their reason commands them. The civil state is not sufficient. Peace among, as well as within, states is essential to the development of uniquely human capacities. "So act as to treat humanity, whether in thine own person or in that of any other, in every case as an end withal, never as means only."<sup>23</sup> This is the form of the imperative that is most appropriate here. The constant hostility of states and the pressures of recurring war make its fulfillment impossible. How can the problem be solved?

<sup>14</sup> Alfred Vagts, A History of Militarism (New York, 1937), pp. 167-168; "What is Enlightenment?" p. 139.

<sup>15</sup> "Eternal Peace," p. 108.

<sup>16</sup> Ibid., p. 71. In a way that long remains typical of liberals, Kant, in effect, criticizes the army that has nobility as officers and rabble for its soldiers. He would prefer not the nation-in-arms but an army of citizen-soldiers periodically and voluntarily rehearsing their military duties.

<sup>17</sup> Ibid., pp. 98-99; "Principles of Political Right," pp. 42-43.

<sup>18</sup> Philosophy of Law, p. 214; cf. pp. 223-224: "Further, it may be said that the expression 'an unjust enemy in the state of Nature' is pleonastic; for the state of Nature is itself a state of injustice."

<sup>19</sup> "Eternal Peace," p. 83; cf. p. 76.

<sup>20</sup> Report of the Central Committee of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union to the 20th Party Congress. Cf. Kant's Critique of Teleological Judgement, tr. James C. Meredith (Oxford, 1928), p. 96. Referring to "a system of all states that are in danger of acting injuriously to one another" Kant says: "In its absence, and with the obstacles that ambition, love of power, and avarice, especially on the part of those who hold the reins of authority, put in the way even of the possibility of such a scheme, war is inevitable."

<sup>21</sup> Philosophy of Law, pp. 219-225; "Eternal Peace," pp. 69-75.

<sup>22</sup> "Eternal Peace," p. 83.

<sup>23</sup> Metaphysic of Morals, p. 47.

II

As is well known, Kant proclaims the Rechtsstaat, or republic, as preeminently the peaceful form of the state. In a republic the unambiguous test of right is applied to every piece of legislation, and every act of the executive will in turn follow the universally established law.<sup>24</sup> Such a state could not undertake an aggressive war, for its sole purpose, a purpose guaranteed by its structure, is to further the moral life of its subjects by enacting and administering positive, general law.<sup>25</sup> There may be reasons for a republic to fight, but they are not internally generated. Kant records, as had Hume, the couplet from Pope's Essay on Man:

For Forms of Government let fools contest;
Whate'er is best administered is best.

And, just as with Hume, he cites the thought in order to disagree with it. The point for both of them is that as the context of action varies, similar causes have different effects. Notice what Kant has done. With no comforting illusions about man, he seeks in the state, and among states as will be seen in a moment, the structure that will turn men's "unsocial sociability," their conflict and violence, toward a constructive result.<sup>26</sup>

How are the appropriate structures to come into being, nationally and in the world at large? Kant sees in history, indeed in the very horrors of war, "a deep-seated, maybe far-seeing, attempt on the part of supreme wisdom, if not to found, yet to prepare the way for a rule of law governing the freedom of states, and thus bring about their unity in a system established on a moral basis."<sup>27</sup> Aha! one may say, an overriding determinism, an uncritical teleology, an Hegelian world-spirit marching with benign purpose, a sterile optimism. Kant succumbs to none of these. He is neither determinist, uncritical, nor rosy-faced with hope. A universal plan of nature, unknowable in detail but dimly discernible in outline, must be assumed; it cannot be known. He is moving at the outermost rim of reason to establish the necessity of an act of faith and its compatibility with his own critical philosophy. We can discern in nature "a design to bring forth concord out of the discord of men. . . ." This must be so if Kant's moral theory is correct, for only in concord can man follow the categorical imperative. But, he warns, human reason, when dealing with the relation of effects to their causes, must keep within the limits of possible experience; and to speak of Providence as knowable by us in this relation would be putting on Icarian wings with presumptuous rashness in order to approach the mystery of His unfathomable purposes.<sup>28</sup>

His argument, both of limits and of possibilities, is established in the Pure Reason and elaborated in the Practical Reason. Along with its relation to moral philosophy, his reasoning is great with political implications.

The activities of bees and beavers, guided by instinct, produce regular patterns and predictable results. Citizens of a purely rational world, on the other hand, would act according to a preconcerted plan. Because men behave in neither of these ways, "no regular systematic history of mankind" appears to be possible. But if we take progress not as a final cause but as a postulate of the practical reason, "the cheerless gloom of chance" is illumined by "the guiding light of reason."<sup>29</sup> In the economic world of Adam Smith, men scratch and claw, each seeking his profit. The result is the greater good of all. If we look at the world and see discrete events, we are overwhelmed by the chaos: each event without cause and all events without meaning. But if we look at the aggregate of events with a proper organizing principle in our minds, we may see in the chaos, order; in the welter of events, a plan of nature. Newton, as Darwin said, did not explain why there is a gravitational force but that there is such a force. The cause, as Kant would put it, located in the bodies, is inaccessible to our reason; but the rules by which it operates can be discerned.<sup>30</sup> And so it is that out of the "universal violence" of the state of nature and "the necessity arising therefrom" comes the resolution of a people "to subject themselves to national law. . . ."<sup>31</sup> The juridical union itself is "a condition of [legal] equality . . . de-

<sup>24</sup> Philosophy of Law, pp. 210-211.

<sup>25</sup> "Principle of Progress," p. 64: Each republic "unable to injure any other by violence, must maintain itself by right alone; and it may hope on real grounds that the others being constituted like itself will then come, on occasions of need, to its aid."

<sup>26</sup> "That politics may be reduced to a science," Hume's Political Discourses (London, n.d.), pp. 229-243; Kant, "Eternal Peace," p. 80n.

<sup>27</sup> Teleological Judgement, p. 96.

<sup>28</sup> "Eternal Peace," p. 91.

<sup>29</sup> "Principle of the Political Order," pp. 3-5.

<sup>30</sup> Charles Darwin, The Origin of Species (London, 1928), p. 455.

<sup>31</sup> "Principle of the Political Order," pp. 15-17; "Principle of Progress," p. 62.

terminated by the action and reaction of free wills limiting one another. . . ."<sup>32</sup> And even if a people were not compelled by internal discord to submit to the coercion of public laws, war as an external influence would effect this. For, according to the arrangement of nature already indicated, every people finds another pressing upon it in its neighborhood and it must form itself internally into a State in order to be equipped as a power so as to defend itself.<sup>33</sup>

Men and states seek their ends little knowing that they are by their actions producing a result that may have been no part of their intentions. Smith's invisible hand is at work in the realm of politics. The "planless aggregate" of human actions can be represented as "constituting a system," though the demonstrations of Kant in the realm of the political are necessarily vaguer, crasser, and less certain than are those of Smith.<sup>34</sup>

There is a sense of progress but not a naive optimism, for as we advance Kant sees that the dangers and difficulties also grow. The practical reason pronounces its irresistible veto: "There shall be no war."<sup>35</sup> Yet without war in the past, men now would be feeble types sheltering in caves and feeding on nuts and berries. The development as conceived by Kant is dialectic:

By the expenditure of all the resources of the commonwealth in military preparations against each other, by the devastations occasioned by war, and still more by the necessity of holding themselves continually in readiness for it, the full development of the capacities of mankind are undoubtedly retarded in their progress; but, on the other hand, the very evils which thus arise, compel men to find out means against them. A law of equilibrium is thus discovered for the regulation of the really wholesome antagonism of contiguous States as it springs up out of their freedom; and a united power, giving emphasis to this law, is constituted, whereby there is introduced a universal condition of public security among the nations.<sup>36</sup>

<sup>32</sup> "Principles of Political Right," pp. 34-35.

<sup>33</sup> "Eternal Peace," p. 95.

<sup>34</sup> "Principle of the Political Order," p. 22.

<sup>35</sup> Philosophy of Law, p. 230.

<sup>36</sup> "Principle of the Political Order," p. 17; cf. p. 23: "Applying the same method of study everywhere, both to the internal civil constitutions and laws of the States and to their external relations to each other, we see how in both relations the good they contained served for a certain period to elevate and glorify particular nations, and with themselves, their arts and sciences,—until the de-

Kant mentions, by way of suggestion, some of the ways in which peace may come out of war. The strength of a state is directly related to its general prosperity and well-being, and these in turn to the amount of liberty enjoyed by its subjects. "If the citizen is hindered in seeking his prosperity in any way suitable to himself that is consistent with the liberty of others, the activity of business is checked generally; and thereby the powers of the whole State are again weakened." Since states are in close competition, the sovereign, to avoid weakening his state, must grant a greater liberty to his subjects. Meanwhile the growing intensity of the competition among states leads them to spend larger amounts of money, even in time of peace; in military preparation. Prices rise, the national debt mounts, and finally the states are so weakened by this competition and by actual war that the sovereign is forced to give in peacefully to the people and place in their hands the power to choose between war and peace.<sup>37</sup> The attempt to win in the competition of states leads the sovereign to make some concessions; the impossibility of winning leads to the final concession, at which point, presumably, the republican form becomes the pattern of government throughout the world.

The manner of approach is immensely impressive. Its execution is accomplished with modesty, perception, and political sensibility. This is not to say that the vision is without flaw, the plan without blemish. Kant, if read from one point of view, can be taken as a study in the futility of the unsoundly based "ought." This was clear in his analysis of the individual in a state of nature where, he argued, the moral obligations, the "oughts" that apply to every rational being, cannot possibly be fulfilled. Prior to the establishment of a pacific federation, the "oughts" in international law turn out to mean as little as those applied to man in the state of nature. When the state of nature gives way to the civil state, the "oughts" applied to moral man take on a practical meaning. Those that apply to states can be taken seriously only if the environment of the state is similarly improved. For he says: "Every people, for the sake of its own security, thus may and ought to demand from any other that it shall enter along with it into a constitution, similar to the civil constitution, in which the right of each shall be secured."<sup>38</sup> The civil state is necessary for two reasons, because men are imperfect and because even good men may fall into dispute and require a legally established mediator. The universal law-state would seem to be necessary for a similar pair of reasons.

fects attaching to their institutions came in time to cause their overthrow."

<sup>37</sup> Ibid., p. 20; "Principle of Progress," p. 63.

<sup>38</sup> "Eternal Peace," p. 81.

Yet in spite of a number of statements such as the one just quoted, Kant will not accept the "legal state of Society" on a grand scale, the world constitution "similar to the civil constitution," as a solution to the problem. Every time he uses such phrases he quickly adds qualifications that materially change their meaning. His "universal International State, or Union of Nations," turns out to be "a voluntary combination of different States that would be dissoluble at any time, and not such a union as is embodied in the United States of America, founded upon a political constitution, and therefore indissoluble."<sup>39</sup> In such a voluntary organization, Kant says, the settlement of disputes among states can be conducted according to a civil process instead of by war. And yet he has also said in the clearest terms that against the evils of war and the general insecurity of states "there is no possible remedy but a system of international right founded upon public laws conjoined with power, to which every State must submit,—according to the analogy of the civil or political right of individuals in any one State."<sup>40</sup> The seeming contradiction calls for some explanation.

III

Why does Kant, after having constructed an argument internally consistent, turn to the conclusion that not government but a voluntary organization is the solution to the problem of war? He gives two reasons. The first is partly a logical proposition resting on his definition of terms. States already have a legal constitution; it would be illogical to place them under another. Individuals in a condition of nature have a right to compel others to join with them to form a state. The right of a state to demand that other states submit to the rule of law is not comparably strong. As a matter of right, no state can interfere with the internal arrangements of another. Kant, in contrast to Mazzini and Woodrow Wilson, is a non-interventionist liberal.<sup>41</sup> One suspects that his second reason for shying away from a world state is more important. He fears that such a state, once achieved, would be a greater evil than the wars it is designed to eliminate. It could so easily become a terrible despotism, stifle liberty, kill initiative, and in the end lapse into anarchy.<sup>42</sup>

States in the world are like individuals in the state of nature. They are neither perfectly good nor are they controlled by law. Consequently conflict and violence among them are inevitable. This statement does not lead Kant to the conclusion that a world state is the answer. Distrusting that solution, he casts about for another. The other possibility open to him is that all states so improve that they will act according to maxims that could be universally followed without conflict. While he fears the former solution, he is too cautious and critical to place his faith entirely in the latter. Instead he attempts to combine them. It is the aim of his political philosophy to establish the hope that states may improve enough and learn enough from the suffering and devastation of war to make possible a rule of law among them that is not backed by power but is voluntarily observed. The first factor is the internal improvement of states; the second, the external rule of law. But the second, being voluntary, is dependent on the perfection with which the first is realized. The "power" to enforce the law is derived not from external sanction but from internal perfection.

Can one sensibly expect all states gradually to conform to a pattern that, once universally established, would provide the basis for perpetual peace? At one point Kant says: "Seek ye first the kingdom of pure practical reason and its righteousness, and then will your object, the benefit of perpetual peace, be added unto you."<sup>43</sup> This is a strange injunction to come from Kant, for he has pointed out, as we have several times noted, that it is only in the civil state that man has the possibility of living the moral life. The civil state made changes in man's behavior possible; it was not the other way around. And this is also the view that Kant takes of the relation between the internal and external affairs of states. In the 7th Proposition of his "Principle of the Political Order," for example, he avers that without the proper ordering of the external relations of states, the internal establishment of the perfect civil constitution is impossible.

see Waltz, Man, the State, and War (New York, 1959), ch. 4.

<sup>42</sup> "Principle of Progress," pp. 62–63; "Eternal Peace," pp. 97–98.

<sup>43</sup> "Eternal Peace," p. 114.

<sup>39</sup> Philosophy of Law, p. 225.

<sup>40</sup> "Principle of Progress," p. 65. Cf. "Eternal Peace," pp. 122–123; and Philosophy of Law, pp. 163–164, where Kant emphasizes that the federation must have the function of determining according to law, wherever there is a significant conflict, which interpretation of right should prevail.

<sup>41</sup> "Eternal Peace," p. 81; and see above, n. 9. For differences among liberals on this question,

For the moment, however, let us assume that, without profound change in their external relations, all states have become republics. Kant's conclusion is that at this point perpetual peace is established, at least approximately. The international rule of law is realized, for the law is voluntarily agreed upon and voluntarily obeyed. This whole system of voluntary universal law rests upon an equilibrium of forces that is the culmination of world history.

To show that the equilibrium, once realized, is bound to collapse, one need only refer to Kant's own analysis. He points out that in a state of nature, where each state must define its rights and prosecute them with its own power, no one country can be secure against any other. "Lesion of a less powerful country may be involved merely in the condition of a more powerful neighbor prior to any action at all; and in the State of Nature an attack under such circumstances would be warrantable." This is a logical justification of the right of preventive war. From it Kant derives the principle of the balance of power.<sup>44</sup> How, one may ask, does the final equilibrium of the voluntary federation among states differ from the equilibrium sometimes attained by balance-of-power politics, an equilibrium that Kant properly labelled precarious? It should be clear by now that it differs in only one of the two respects that Kant believes to be essential. He ridicules the balance of power by comparing it with "the house described by Swift, which was built by an architect so perfectly in accordance with all the laws of equilibrium that when a sparrow lighted upon it it immediately fell." Yet the same doubt would seem to apply to Kant's hope for a pacific world secured "not by the weakening of all the separate powers of the States, but by an equilibrium which is brought forth and guaranteed through their rivalry with each other."<sup>45</sup> It is, in Kant's impeccable logic, necessary to supersede the state of nature among states and establish the rule of law. It is, by the same logic, impossible for a voluntary international federation effectively to guarantee the peace. If equilibrium depends on spontaneous agreement or if equilibrium depends on a balance of forces, the federation of Kant is either way doomed to be transitory and shifting. Just as the house designed by a Laputian would collapse under the weight of a sparrow so Kant's structure falls to the ground whenever one major state chooses to forsake the international federation and flout its universal law.

The difficulty is made all the clearer by noting how, in a republic, the general will pronounces on the question of war and peace. The unambiguous test of right is again applied to a proposed act of the executive. The question is, as with domestic legislation, abstractly put. The answer to it must be a simple yes or no. Since the point is important and generally overlooked, I quote the relevant passage.

If, for example, a proportioned war-tax were imposed on all the subjects, they are not entitled . . . to say that it is unjust because somehow, according to their opinion, the war was unnecessary. For they are not entitled to judge of this; whereas, because it is at least always possible that the war was inevitable and the tax indispensable, it must be regarded as rightful in the judgment of the subject.<sup>46</sup>

IV

Kant has held out a hope for perpetual peace, which upon closer scrutiny seems to disappear. Has he deluded himself with a false optimism, which has then been transferred to many of his interpreters? To answer the question we have to complete the circle and return to a consideration of his moral philosophy.

It is, Kant writes in the Metaphysics of Morals, "absolutely impossible to make out by experience with complete certainty a single case in which" an act was purely moral. However, whether this or that takes place is not at all the question; but that reason of itself, independent on [sic] all experience, ordains what ought to take place, that accordingly actions of which perhaps the world has hitherto never given an example, the feasibility even of which might be very much doubted by one who founds everything on experience, are nevertheless inflexibly commanded by reason. . . .<sup>47</sup>

A moral act may never have been performed; yet moral behavior is a "necessary" or "practical" goal of mankind. When Kant uses such adjectives he means that the action described is the only action in accordance with man's noumenal nature, that its performance is a duty. Kant demonstrates that the categorical

<sup>44</sup> Philosophy of Law, p. 218, where in addition to what is quoted above, he writes: "This international relation is the foundation of the Right of Equilibrium, or of the 'balance of Power,' among all states that are in active contiguity to each other."

<sup>45</sup> "Principle of Progress," p. 65; "Eternal Peace," p. 98.

<sup>46</sup> "Principles of Political Right," p. 41n.

<sup>47</sup> Metaphysic of Morals, pp. 23-24.

imperative exists and that to follow it is not impossible; he does not imply that men will live according to it. From the moral duty inherent in man's noumenal nature arise other of Kant's postulates. He accords to man in the form of practical reason, or will, what he has denied to him in the form of pure reason. If we are ever to fulfil the moral law, we must assume the existence of progress, an immortal soul, a God.<sup>48</sup>

Kant approaches the problem of war in similar fashion. Perpetual peace is a particular reading of the postulate of progress, for if a condition of peace is not possible, then the prospect of one day realizing the ideal of moral behavior disappears. It is a partial and erroneous interpretation of Kant to say that he thought the realization of "necessary" or "practical" goals something that would occur in anyone's lifetime. Kant's analysis makes the conclusion that a universal rule of law can be achieved almost incomprehensible, but even this conclusion makes sense in his way of thinking; for to say that we can only "comprehend the incomprehensibility" of something is simply to face up to the inherent limitations of reason.<sup>49</sup>

The conclusion that follows from considering Kant's political philosophy in the context of his moral philosophy is borne out by many of his more purely political statements. In the Philosophy of Law, after one of his many iterations of the proposition that only in a universal state can man find security, he raises the argument that if the state is extended over too large an area it becomes physically incapable of protecting its members. "Hence," he says, the Perpetual Peace, which is the ultimate end of all the Right of Nations, becomes in fact an impracticable idea. The political principles, however, which aim at such an end, and which enjoin the formation of such unions among the States as may promote a continuous approximation to a Perpetual Peace are not impracticable. . . .<sup>50</sup>

As he had demonstrated the possibility of moral behavior, so he must establish the possibility of perpetual peace. The second is the precondition of the first, and nothing that is impossible can be imperatively commanded. Peace is possible. This Kant has sought to prove. Its achievement remains an improbability.

Now, as a matter of fact, the morally practical Reason utters within us its irrevocable Veto: 'There shall be no War.' . . . Hence the question no longer is as to whether Perpetual Peace is a real thing or not a real thing, or as to whether we may not be deceiving ourselves when we adopt the former alternative, but we must act on the supposition of its being real. . . . And although the realization of this purpose may always remain but a pious wish, yet we do certainly not deceive ourselves in adopting the maxim of action that will guide us in working incessantly for it; for it is a duty to do this.<sup>51</sup>

V

Kant shares the major tenets of liberalism: the source of the individual's rights lies outside of the state; his freedom may be limited only when its exercise interferes with the rights of others; such limitation must be by known general laws before which all men stand equal; men's capacities are greater than is shown by their present accomplishments; and, finally, their potential will unfold in time, with education being one of the important means of progress. But Kant sees in combination what others have often separated—the defects, or as he says, the evil of men and the possibility of their living good lives, the strength of the state and the liberty of its subjects, progress amidst ever greater difficulties, the approach to peace as wars become fiercer and more frequent. He has, as many liberals do not, an appreciation of politics as struggle, an idea of possible equilibrium not as simple and automatic harmony but always as something perilously achieved out of conflict.

Let the philosophers scribble as they will, writes Kant at the beginning of "Eternal Peace." There is no danger, for rulers will not listen. This has been taken as criticism of states and condemnation of their rulers. But to the philosopher's advice rulers cannot listen, as Kant well knew. He was not engaged in the <sup>48</sup> We must, for example, "postulate the existence of God, as the necessary condition of the possibility of the summum bonum. . . ." Practical Reason, p. 221.

<sup>49</sup> Metaphysic of Morals, p. 84. This is a difficult problem. To put peace in the infinite future would be to demonstrate its impossibility. Kant must therefore think of sequences in the phenomenal world that are not infinite but do continue without end. This abstruse statement of the problem may help to make clear the philosophic context of Kant's political thought. For this resolution of the problem, I am indebted to S. Körner's superb little book, Kant (Penguin, 1955), pp. 163–174.

<sup>50</sup> Philosophy of Law, p. 224; cf. "Principle of the Political Order," p. 13.

<sup>51</sup> Philosophy of Law, pp. 229–230.

puerile task of telling men of affairs to stop behaving badly. Nor could he have been, for the dependence of behavior upon condition is one of his major theses. Taken as a King's Mirror, Kant's "Eternal Peace" is lost in futility. But so to take it requires a very unKantian interpretation. In describing what the states and the world will have to do and to become if moral behavior is to be possible, Kant makes understandable and in a sense excuses the failures of men and their rulers to achieve moral rectitude.

Many liberals of Kant's time and after have looked upon war as annoyance or aberration, as something, one might say, that lies outside of history. Kant, in contrast, at once condemns war and demonstrates that its occurrence is expected rather than accidental. In the end we are left not with a confident foretelling of "the end of wars and the reign of international law"<sup>52</sup> but with a deeper appreciation of the causes of war and the immense difficulty of doing anything about them.

<sup>52</sup> Edwin D. Mead's introduction to the book cited above, n. 5.

THE REVIVAL OF CLASSICAL POLITICAL PHILOSOPHY: A CRITIQUE*

STANLEY ROTHMAN
Smith College

*If wishes were horses,
Then beggars would ride . . .*

Perhaps no single individual has had as much impact on the discipline of political science during the past several years as has Leo Strauss of the University of Chicago. Both he and his disciples (and they are disciples in the "classical" sense) have engaged in a full scale attack upon the premises underlying the contemporary study of politics.<sup>1</sup>

Strauss argues that these premises are ill-founded and self-contradictory, and, if taken seriously, lead to moral nihilism. He contends, further, that another set of premises, those of "classical natural right," which treat man in terms of his natural end and his relation to the "mysterious whole," are capable of providing a more adequate foundation for the study of politics.

Given the vigor with which Strauss' criticisms have been developed, it is only legitimate that the attackers and the alternatives proposed be themselves subject to examination. The argument of this essay is that while Strauss raises a number of interesting and important questions, his own thinking is marked by at least as much confusion as that of those he criticizes. The essay will first summarize Strauss' position, along with some preliminary comments, and will then proceed to a more detailed examination of its assumptions, logic and implications.<sup>2</sup>

I

According to Strauss, both contemporary political philosophy and contemporary political science are in a state of "decay and perhaps of putrefaction."<sup>3</sup> Political philosophy, originally the attempt to understand man's social life as a "whole," has been replaced by narrow empirical studies which eschew value judgments as unscientific, and which tend to reduce the political to the sub-political, i.e., to reduce politics to psychology or sociology and to explain political decisions in terms of primitive drives whose direction is determined by one's culture or epoch.<sup>4</sup>

The sources of this decay seem to lie in the abandonment of classical natural right and the domination of contemporary social science by positivism and historicism. These two sources are closely related, Strauss argues, for historicism is the logical consequence of positivism.<sup>5</sup>

Positivists, he argues, deriving their study of man from a "mechanical"<sup>6</sup> and materialistic view of natural science, maintain that values are matters of personal choice and hence not subject to discussion in terms of any natural standard. Thus, they argue that social science is incapable of passing upon questions of value. And, since values are not to be found in the nature of things, the sources of moral conceptions must be sought in the passions as these are channelled by environment. Hence the reductionist tendency of which we spoke earlier.<sup>7</sup>

<sup>3</sup> WPP, p. 17 and p. 25 f.

<sup>4</sup> WPP, p. 38. See also the epilogue by Strauss in Herbert J. Storing (ed.) Essays on the Science of Politics (New York, 1962), especially pp. 311, 322, 325; Walter Berns, "The Behavioral Sciences and the Study of Political Things: The Case of Christian Bay's The Structure of Freedom," this REVIEW, Vol. 55 (September, 1961), p. 550, and Joseph Cropsey, "On the Relation of Political Science and Economics," this REVIEW, Vol. 54 (March, 1960), pp. 3-14.

<sup>5</sup> WPP, pp. 18-25 and passim.

<sup>6</sup> By a "mechanical" interpretation of nature Strauss means one which attempts to understand the present in terms of the past (i.e., in terms of efficient rather than "final causes"), and the complex in terms of the more simple (i.e., the whole in terms of its parts).

<sup>7</sup> WPP, pp. 18-25 and passim.

* I wish to thank Professors Cecelia M. Kenyon, Guenter Lewy, John Ladd and Felix Oppenheim, all of whom read an earlier version of this essay.

<sup>1</sup> The most articulate of Strauss' students include Walter Berns, Joseph Cropsey, Harry V. Jaffa and Allan Bloom.

<sup>2</sup> The bulk of Strauss' criticism of contemporary political theory and political science is to be found in three books: Natural Right and History (Chicago, 1953), Thoughts on Machiavelli (Glencoe, 1958), and What Is Political Philosophy? (Glencoe, 1959). The last named is a collection of essays and book reviews which have appeared in various journals. Henceforth the volumes will be cited as NRH, TM and WPP, respectively.

Historicism, Strauss maintains, carries this one logical step further. If the whole is unknowable, if men's preferences, and hence the framework of men's preferences, are purely subjective, then neither ethical judgments nor the principles of science can be regarded as true for all times. Even the so-called facts of any epoch or culture (since these are determined by assumptions as to what constitutes a fact) must be regarded as purely subjective. The only valid historical proposition open to historicists, according to Strauss, is that one cannot develop valid historical propositions:

After having reached its full growth historicism is distinguished from positivism by the following characteristics. (1) It abandons the distinction between facts and values, because every understanding, however theoretical, implies specific evaluations. (2) It denies the authoritative character of modern science, which appears as only one form among many of man's thinking orientation in the world. (3) It refuses to regard the historical process as fundamentally progressive. . . . (4) It denies the relevance of the evolutionist thesis by contending that the evolution of man out of non-man cannot make intelligible man's humanity.<sup>8</sup>

The destruction of political philosophy by positivism and historicism has had practical as well as theoretical consequences.<sup>9a</sup> The denial of the possibility of judging between the "base" and the "noble" leads to nihilism and the glorification of personal self-aggrandisement at worst or a blind conformism at best.<sup>9</sup> (If American social scientists have maintained some integrity it is only because, failing to understand the consequences of their own position, they remain attached to humane values.<sup>10</sup>)

These practical consequences are disastrous and, according to Strauss, help explain the general character of the contemporary world, including the development of both National Socialism and Communist totalitarianism.<sup>11</sup> But, he admits, pointing this out is not sufficient. It is not enough to be appalled at the present state of social science and its consequences. One must demonstrate that political philosophy is possible, that it is possible to distinguish between the noble and the base. For if one cannot achieve this any hope for improvement must remain a "wish," and "a wish is not a fact."<sup>12</sup>

One can demonstrate the possibility of political philosophy, in part, by demonstrating that the premises conventionally accepted by contemporary social scientists are not satisfactory for explaining what they purport to explain, or by proving that these premises are self-contradictory. The latter is quite clear in the case of historicism. Historicism, Strauss argues, leads inevitably to the conclusion that historicism itself is historically determined.

In other words, to maintain that all thought is historically determined is to be forced to admit that one's own thought is so determined. To argue that no statement possesses absolute validity is to argue that one's own statements lack absolute validity:

Only under one condition could historicism claim to have done away with all pretense to finality, if it presented the historicist thesis not as simply true, but as true for the time being only. In fact, if the historicist thesis is correct we cannot escape the consequence that the thesis itself is "historical" or valid because meaningful, for a specific historical situation only. Historicism is not a cab which one can stop at his convenience: historicism must be applied to itself.<sup>13</sup>

Positivist thought is characterized by a similar contradiction. Positivists claim to eschew value judgments, but they constantly bring these in through the backdoor, as when they use such terms as "the authoritarian personality," for example, or contrast the normal with the "neurotic."<sup>14</sup>

Further, it is not at all obvious that value judgments and descriptions belong to different realms of discourse. To prove such an assertion would require an effort comparable to Kant's Critique of Pure Reason, and such a critique has yet to be developed.<sup>15</sup> On the contrary, it can be shown that in general one cannot describe social acts—or at least talk significantly about important social acts—without evaluating them.<sup>16</sup> The very decision to define the political involves understanding the purpose of a society and hence admits the necessity of standards of judgment. And, even more narrowly, one cannot develop important propositions dealing with political events without making value judgments:

Scientific concern with political facts . . . requires

<sup>8</sup> WPP, p. 26.

<sup>9a</sup> Strauss differentiates "political philosophy" from both "political theory" and "political thought in general"; see WPP, pp. 11–15.

<sup>9</sup> WPP, p. 20, NRH, p. 6.

<sup>10</sup> NRH, p. 4.

<sup>11</sup> WPP, pp. 41, 54, 55.

<sup>12</sup> NRH, p. 6.

<sup>13</sup> WPP, pp. 72–3.

<sup>14</sup> WPP, p. 21.

<sup>15</sup> WPP, p. 22.

<sup>16</sup> WPP, p. 21.

isolation of the phenomena which it is studying. But if this isolation is not to lead to irrelevant or misleading results, one must see the phenomena in question within the whole to which they belong.<sup>17</sup>

But it is impossible to define the political . . . or the "state," without answering the question of what constitutes this kind of society. Now a society cannot be defined without reference to its purpose. . . . But by defining the state, or rather civil society, with reference to its purpose, one admits a standard in the light of which one must judge political actions and institutions: the purpose of civil society necessarily functions as a standard for judging of civil societies.<sup>18</sup>

Or can one say anything relevant on public opinion polls, for example, without realizing the fact that many answers to the questionnaires are given by unintelligent, uninformed, deceitful, and irrational people, and that not a few questions are formulated by people of the same caliber—can one say anything relevant about public opinion polls without committing one value judgment after another?<sup>19</sup>

. . . if the historian shows, by objectively measuring the action of a statesman against the model of "rational action in the circumstances," that the statesman made one blunder after another, he makes an objective value judgment to the effect that the statesman was singularly inept. In another case the historian arrives by the same procedure at the equally objective value judgment that a general showed unusual resourcefulness, resolution and prudence. It is impossible to understand phenomena of this kind without being aware of the standard of judgment that is inherent in the situation. . . .<sup>20</sup>

However, pointing out that positivists and historicists contradict themselves, or that description of social acts entails evaluation, is still not sufficient to establish the validity of classical natural right. It is, therefore, necessary to go further, i.e., to demonstrate that classical natural right (or a philosophic position which takes its bearings from classical natural right) both resolves this dilemma and stands up against criticism which may be directed against it.<sup>21</sup> Strauss' major efforts have been directed to this dual task. These efforts will be summarized and evaluated later, but, at this point, certain preliminary comments are in order.

Strauss' analysis of the historicist implications of positivism (as he defines it) is not very convincing.<sup>22</sup> It is not a logical contradiction to accept the view that values are a matter of personal commitment, and at the same time to assert that empirical propositions can, in principle, be verified. In fact, on the face of it, the opposite position seems far more cogent, i.e., it is only when men clearly differentiate between what is and what they feel should or must be that both natural and social science become possible. The failure of Greek science was partially the result of an attempt to tie science to a cosmology which insisted upon the fusion of the descriptive and the normative, and the rise of modern science was closely related to a break with that tradition.<sup>23</sup> Interestingly enough, Strauss does not carry his argument to its logical conclusion. If he had he would be forced to assert that a "mechanical"

<sup>17</sup> WPP, p. 24. As Walter Berns puts it: The political, generally speaking, is not visible to any of our senses, or even a combination of them. Racial segregation in the United States is seen by the observer because he can see the injustice of the practice; racial segregation in South Africa is seen by the same observer because of an understanding of justice and injustice that is not confined by a parochial "value system." Through the "eye of the mind" we are able to see the injustice and hence the political. Walter Berns, "The Behavioral Sciences. . . ." Op. cit., p. 550.

The above example is, incidentally, rather surprising given the contention of Strauss and his disciples that the modern world is characterized by moral regression rather than moral progress. After all, it is only very recently in human history that dominant opinion has come to regard slavery itself as morally bad.

<sup>18</sup> WPP, p. 22.

<sup>19</sup> NRH, p. 53.

<sup>20</sup> NRH, p. 54.

<sup>21</sup> NRH, pp. 1-8. According to Strauss the dilemma is that: "The more we cultivate reason, the more we cultivate nihilism." (Ibid., p. 6.)

<sup>22</sup> One wonders why, in these passages at least, Strauss identifies modern positivism, and related positions, with both materialism and a "mechanical" conception of natural science, rather than with the critique of the possibilities of knowledge which culminates in Hume. Certainly modern positivists as well as other "moderns" who take their bearings from the same tradition, would not accept his categories. See, for example, Herbert Feigl and May Brodbeck, Readings in the Philosophy of Science (New York, 1953) and Ernest Nagel, The Structure of Science (New York, 1960).

<sup>23</sup> See Giorgio de Santillana, The Origins of Scientific Thought (New York, 1961), and Charles C. Gillispie, The Edge of Objectivity (Princeton, 1960).

conception of science makes science impossible. (It can be argued that the tendency of many social scientists to confuse personal commitments with empirical propositions is a major impediment to the development of the social sciences.)

Nor is the argument that one must understand the "whole" before one can develop empirical propositions any more convincing.<sup>24</sup> Again, the physical sciences have proceeded with considerable success on just the opposite assumption. In fact, it was only when "narrow" empirical studies were substituted for analysis of the "whole" that modern science was born.

It is true, of course, that the objects of investigation and even the very formulation of problems are shaped by personal interests or commitments, but just as the accuracy or meaningfulness of propositions dealing with the nature of cancer is logically independent of the universal desire to discover a cure for the disease, so the accuracy or meaningfulness of propositions dealing with the sources of racial prejudice is logically independent of ethical views on the subject. And, of course, many very significant investigations are motivated simply by the desire to understand or master nature. While the question of whether or not man should master nature may, under certain circumstances, become a moral question, the fact that all or most men desire to do so says nothing about propositions dealing with nature nor even, as Strauss must admit, about the moral rightness of engaging in this task.<sup>25</sup>

The direction of men's interests or commitments indicates only the direction of their interests or commitments, and the sources of this direction are a legitimate subject for investigation, although the uncovering of sources has little or nothing to do with the validity of propositions dealing with these interests or commitments.

<sup>24</sup> By the "whole" I assume Strauss means the "natural order" of the universe and man's place in that order.

<sup>25</sup> Although Strauss and his disciples often imply otherwise, they would certainly admit that one cannot argue from conventional standards to the existence of a natural order. Such an argument would be akin to maintaining, on the other side, that natural right cannot exist because people disagree as to the content of any number of very important moral imperatives.

Strauss' assertion, incidentally, that one cannot understand any society except in terms of its purpose, is merely an assertion. Most societies are characterized by the presence of many conflicting human purposes.

Strauss' argument that social scientists cannot develop significant propositions without evaluating is based on the conflation of terms which should be kept analytically distinct. No one in the empirical tradition would deny that normative judgments or evaluations are a legitimate part of scientific discourse. There is all the difference in the world, however, between talking about "deceitful" individuals and "neurotic" individuals. While both are evaluations the first is quite clearly a moral evaluation which carries with it heavy elements of condemnation. The latter, however, more nearly resembles what Nagel has aptly termed a "characterizing value judgment" and contains little or no moral content in conventional discourse, despite what Strauss has argued. In this sense it is little different from the statement "This is a healthy (or unhealthy) person" which also relates to standards having a descriptive function, and which can easily be reduced to purely descriptive terms.<sup>26</sup>

The case of the prudent general is a little more difficult, for the term "prudence" generally carries with it some element of commendation. However, the term is not generally thought to convey a moral connotation when used functionally. (It is certainly possible to argue that General X, an imprudent general, may be a more moral man than General Y who is quite prudent as a general.) The example closely resembles the statement "X is a good thief." In both instances the phrase involves commendation in terms of an evaluative standard which has very little direct relevance to moral concerns.

Further, both the statement "this is a prudent general" and "this is a deceitful person" imply that the speaker can offer reasons for the judgment, and these reasons are descriptive statements. General X is prudent because he knows how to place his men so as to keep casualties at a minimum, etc. Y is deceitful because he lies continuously, etc. Of course one could respond to a query as to why General X is prudent by offering reasons which themselves contain evaluative terms, but in that case the questioner could still legitimately ask for further explication, and, in the last analysis, such explication would necessarily involve descriptive statements.<sup>27</sup>

<sup>26</sup> The difficulty of formulating a definition of "normal" or "healthy" which would enable one to fully differentiate even between very close cases is not, as Strauss would admit, a legitimate argument against regarding the terms as primarily descriptive. For discussions of these issues see Nagel, op. cit., pp. 485-502. See also R. M. Hare, The Language of Morals (London, 1952); P. H. Noel-Smith, Ethics (Penguin Books Ltd.: Middlesex, 1954), and Kurt Baier, The Moral Point of View (Ithaca, 1958).

Once the description was complete both the original speaker and the questioner might conceivably disagree as to whether the individual being described was indeed a prudent general or a deceitful person, depending on the standards which they accepted, and the discussion then would come to an end. The point is, however, that unless one can describe without at the same time evaluating, rational discussion cannot even begin.

The fact that Strauss and his disciples can point to many instances where social scientists use evaluative standards without clearly specifying this, or even make moral judgments without realizing that they are doing so, proves nothing except that some social scientists are mediocre. And the fact that conventional language sometimes makes it difficult to avoid such confusions proves nothing except that perhaps we require the development of a "meta-language" which eliminates such confusions.

"Characterizing evaluations" will continue to be used in both the social sciences and the sciences because they serve human purposes, i.e., the description and control of the natural and social environment. It can be argued, too (and I think legitimately), that many evaluations which have a generally commendatory or even a moral connotation can be used in analysis, provided that the social scientist is aware of the standards on which they are based. Finally, social scientists will and should continue to explore problems which are related to a moral commitment.<sup>28</sup> But to argue from the fact that human beings develop evaluations which derive from their interests and standards, to the existence of an objective moral basis for such standards is only legitimate if it can be shown that these interests and standards cannot be understood except in terms of some norm which transcends them. But this is just what Strauss is trying to prove.

<sup>27</sup> Most discussions of this kind between individuals of similar cultural background do not proceed this far. However, one could not explain what one means by the expression "good" car to a Martian who only knew the referent of the word car, except by pointing to differences between existing cars.

<sup>28</sup> For a discussion of some of these issues see David Braybrooke, "The Relevance of Norms to Political Description," this REVIEW, Vol. 52 (December, 1958), pp. 989-1006.

His critique of the modern position assumes what it must demonstrate.

And, finally, there remains a large core of propositions which are not evaluative in any sense of the term. Strauss' argument is ambiguous on this score, for he uses the words "in general" and "important." But most political scientists would accept the following, among myriads of others, as both value-free and significant propositions, though they might disagree with them: (1) "The Supreme Court has never struck down national legislation designed to curtail the key prerequisites to popular equality and popular sovereignty." (2) "The extent of consensus on the basic norms of democracy is a function of the extent of agreement on choices among policy alternatives."<sup>29</sup> However, given the possibility of disagreement, let us take an example which Strauss offers.

Strauss criticizes Max Weber's discussion of the relationship between Protestantism and Capitalism on two grounds: (1) Weber is forced to make moral judgments in his analysis in spite of himself. (2) Weber's refusal to make moral judgments leads to errors of analysis.<sup>30</sup> Weber is forced to make value judgments, Strauss argues, because he must admit that it was not Calvin's thinking but the thinking of "epigones" (intellectual descendants, generally of an inferior variety) which provided the justification of capitalist virtues. Again, the word epigone (if used simply to describe a person with, say, less capacity for abstraction) can be considered a descriptive evaluation rather than a moral judgment. The key point, however, is this: The logic of Strauss' position requires him to maintain that purely descriptive propositions are not merely wrong but rather that they are meaningless. His statement that Weber was "incorrect," however, implicitly accepts the possibility of developing purely descriptive proposition dealing with significant social action.

Beyond this, Strauss, in a footnote to these passages, gives a more correct interpretation of the developments which Weber was attempting to describe. What Weber failed to consider, Strauss notes, was that:

... in the course of the sixteenth century there was a conscious break with the whole philosophic

<sup>29</sup> The examples are from an article by Robert A. Dahl in which he makes just this point, in reply to a student of Strauss who had criticized his Preface to Democratic Theory. Robert A. Dahl, "A Rejoinder," this REVIEW, Vol. 51 (December, 1957), p. 1060.

<sup>30</sup> NRH, pp. 59-61.

tradition, a break that took place on the plane of purely philosophic or rational or secular thought. This break was originated by Machiavelli, and it led to the moral teachings of Bacon and Hobbes. . . .<sup>31</sup>

While this self-admittedly significant proposition contains a number of evaluations it does not evaluate the break which occurred. In that sense, at least, it is a purely descriptive proposition.

The analysis of Strauss' thinking thus far has been incomplete in that it has concededly approached his critique of modern thought from the standpoint of modern thought. Since it may be argued that such an approach misses the point, it would seem wise to follow Strauss in his restatement of the implications of classical political philosophy and the modern break with that thought. The task is made difficult by the fact that Strauss seems to have shifted his position after completing Natural Right and History. I shall describe and evaluate his earlier position before turning to his later one.<sup>32</sup>

It is imperative that his restatement carry more conviction than his critique of modern thought. Having opened the eyes of American political scientists to the "nihilistic" and "Machiavellian" implications of their thought, he would indeed be subject to reproach if he did not draw them back from the abyss to whose edge he had led them.

II

According to Strauss, classical political philosophers considered the universe a cosmos, that is, a purposively ordered whole.<sup>33</sup> Within this cosmos all things, including man, tend toward their natural place. For the order, while never completely realized, nevertheless tends toward realization. The natural order defines the good, and to understand the natural order one must examine it in terms of the purposes which infuse its parts. Thus heavy objects fall toward the center of the earth (and heavier objects fall more rapidly than lighter objects) because they aim toward their natural resting place. This mode of explanation applies equally to nature and to man. In fact the separation of man and nature, and the attempt to apply different modes of analysis to each, was inconceivable to classical political philosophy, and is a product of the break with that philosophy. One can see why then, in classical political philosophy, every description was at the same time an evaluation. To describe a thing fully was to describe its natural (i.e., right or good) place in the cosmos.<sup>34</sup>

Thomistic philosophy, Strauss argues, continued the classical tradition. The differences between the two were designed to subordinate philosophy to theology and to make room for revelation and a transcendent personal God. However, while philosophy was subordinated to religion, religion was not divorced from philosophy. The existence of a natural purposive order is fundamental to the proof of God's existence, and, in general, to Thomistic ethics.<sup>35</sup>

The rejection of classical natural right and of classical political philosophy was based on the Hobbesian interpretation of the modern "scientific" outlook. While Machiavelli had "discovered" the new terrain, it was Hobbes who described it systematically. Machiavelli had rejected the classics because their idealism did not permit them to develop an effective social order. To achieve this a political science was necessary which began from an extreme rather than the ideal case.<sup>36</sup> Hobbes was encouraged or led (Strauss is unclear) to the systematic development of Machiavelli's insight, however, because the new science seemed to pave the way for a view of the universe based on scientific materialism and hence both a nominalistic and mechanical view of the world.<sup>37</sup>

Hobbes' analysis involved a fundamental attack upon classical philosophy. If the universe is to be understood mechanically, it lacks a purpose which informs its component parts, and one cannot evaluate the moral rightness of individual and collective purposes in terms of a given natural order. Under such circumstances only human passions and desires can serve as a basis for action and these passions and desires cannot be justified beyond the fact that they are wishes or passions.<sup>38</sup>

<sup>34</sup> NRH, pp. 81-164.

<sup>35</sup> NRH, pp. 163-4.

<sup>36</sup> NRH, pp. 77-181.

<sup>37</sup> According to Strauss, Hobbes recognized that a consistent materialism would lead to self-negating skepticism. Thus he adopted a "methodical" materialism. The natural world remains fundamentally unknowable. However, we can know the concepts we use to master the world, since they are our free creation. Hence science must always retain a hypothetical character. NRH, pp. 171-5.

<sup>38</sup> NRH, pp. 181-3 passim.

<sup>31</sup> NRH, p. 61.

<sup>32</sup> The break seems to have come with the publication of "What Is Political Philosophy," in the Journal of Politics in August, 1957. The essay is reprinted in an expanded form in the book of the same title.

<sup>33</sup> NRH, p. 7.

It is upon these premises that Hobbes sought to develop an axiology compatible with the method of the new science. If the desires of men are equally legitimate and not additive, the only "goods" are those which men call good, and these are, basically, the avoidance of pain and the achievement of pleasure. The only function of reason is to inform the passions, i.e., to guide the passions to the achievement of these goals. The social good, thus, can only be that which all men agree is good (or would agree is good if their view of reality were not distorted by pride or false doctrine). For only that which all men agree is good can serve as a norm through which individual actions may be judged. And, of course, the one desire which all men share in common, and which is the most powerful of all, is the desire to avoid violent death.

Hobbes' efforts to construct a new social science and a new philosophy were too radical for the society of which he was part and his name was "justly decried." However, his thought, in disguised and more respectable garb, provided the basis for the philosophy of John Locke and hence for the development of modern natural right and modern Liberalism.<sup>39</sup>

<sup>39</sup> NRH, p. 181 and pp. 202-251. Most English and American political theorists, Strauss notes, fail to see that Locke is essentially a consistent (though more respectable) Hobbesian. Rather they assume that the contradictions which they seem to find in Locke's political philosophy are a sign of confusion and failure to realize the implications of his own thought. However, if one examines Locke carefully one recognizes that he was "cautious" rather than naive or stupid, and one can uncover his Hobbesian premises. Of course, contemporary historians of political philosophy, mistakenly believing that the history of political philosophy represents a progression, are all too inclined to misunderstand philosophers of the past, and to assume that they were victims of their epoch or culture. Thus, they fail to realize that the discovery of simple-minded errors is the beginning of the quest for the real intention of these philosophers. One can only recognize this if one takes the history of political philosophy seriously and becomes aware that Locke and Hobbes were giants. See WPP, pp. 221-232. (It is surprising that Strauss should so fully agree with contemporary historians of political philosophy on who the "greats" in the history of political philosophy really were. After all, given the inability of contemporary historians to understand not only classical political philosophy but most political philosophy, we might expect Strauss to come up with some seminal thinkers whom these historians had failed to notice.)

Locke's moral and political conclusions still dominate English and American political thought, even though American political thinkers have long since rejected his premises in favor of either positivism or historicism or both.

Hobbes provides the basis for Liberal democracy for this reason: If the interests of all men are equally legitimate, then the only justifiable basis upon which one man can exercise authority over another is if the latter is convinced that this authority is being exercised in his own interest. In other words, given the natural equality of the passions of all men, only direct or representative government is legitimate.<sup>40</sup> The classics, on the other hand, legitimized the rule of the wise, i.e., of those who understand the cosmos, i. e., the nature of the good.

Liberalism ends in positivism and historicism, according to Strauss, because its fundamental assumptions are untenable in the form in which Hobbes developed them. Rousseau rejected Hobbes because, on the basis of Hobbes' own premises, he was led to conclude that the laws of nature must be rooted directly in the passions of natural man. But since these passions are "sub-human," they cannot provide a norm for human beings. The ultimate results of Rousseau's critique are not only the nihilism of Nietzsche, but also the whole pattern of contemporary historicism and positivism.<sup>41</sup> Thus, Liberalism negates itself. At the same time, however, it serves as the basis of modern social science. Modern economics starts with the individual seeking to "rationally" maximize his non-rational passions, and political science and sociology concern themselves with an investigation of the social and cultural sources of values. For if values are largely a reflection of the direction given to the passions by the environment, the social sciences as disciplines turn quite naturally to understanding this relationship.<sup>42</sup>

And, finally, Liberalism gives rise to modern technology. The classics, if not hostile to technological change, at least regarded it as inimical to an ordered society. However, if the only goal is the satisfaction of individual and collective passions, then the development of technology becomes a supreme good.<sup>43</sup>

<sup>40</sup> NRH, p. 182 and p. 231.

<sup>41</sup> NRH, pp. 252-323 and WPP, pp. 41-55. I have used WPP because NRH carries the analysis only through Burke. The essential difference between Strauss' earlier and later work revolves about the relationship between Machiavelli and Hobbes, and does not seem to affect his interpretation of the consequences of their thinking.

<sup>42</sup> See Cropsey, op. cit.

How does an examination of classical natural right and the modern break with the classical position enable us to overcome the dilemma into which modern thought has led us? Strauss himself sets the conditions:

We all are in the grip of the same difficulty. Natural right in its classic form is connected with a teleological view of the universe. All natural beings have a natural end, a natural destiny, which determines what kind of operation is good for them. In the case of man, reason is required for discerning these operations: reason determines what is by nature right with ultimate regard to man's natural end. The teleological view of the universe, of which the teleological view of man forms a part, would seem to have been destroyed by modern natural science. From the point of view of Aristotle—and who could dare to claim to be a better judge in this matter than Aristotle?—the issue between the mechanical and the teleological conception of the universe is decided by the manner in which the problem of the heavens, the heavenly bodies, and their motion is solved.<sup>44</sup>

Thus Strauss notes:

The fundamental dilemma, in whose grip we are, is caused by the victory of modern natural science. An adequate solution to the problem of natural right cannot be found before this basic problem has been solved.<sup>45</sup>

We see now why Strauss rejects the typically modern differentiation between evaluations which have a descriptive function and evaluations which have a commendatory function, and between evaluations in general and ethical evaluations. In the classical view all descriptions are evaluations and all evaluations are moral evaluations. If the universe is "purposively" ordered, then the normative and the descriptive are fused. It becomes more difficult, however, to understand why Strauss limited his demands to "important social acts." For if he agrees with the classics, not only all social acts but all phenomena can only be described in normative terms. Thus it logically follows from Strauss' analysis, though Strauss appears to miss the implication, that propositions such as  $e$  equals  $mc^2$ , or  $PV$  equals  $nRT$ , are either both descriptive and evaluative or else they are meaningless.

The modern mind undoubtedly finds it difficult to understand such a contention, or what is meant by a purposive universe, unless the universe as a whole is to be regarded as an organism, or as the work of an intelligence which transcends it. However, evidence tending to support the argument that the universe is a cosmos will certainly win a hearing.<sup>46</sup> And "faith" is not admissible as proof, since Strauss identifies himself with the Aristotelian position (as against the Thomist) which maintains that the structure of the universe can be understood through human reason.<sup>47</sup>

And again, contrary to what Strauss has stated elsewhere, it is his task which is of Kantian dimensions. In fact it is a more difficult task than Kant set for himself. Kant, after all, accepted the picture of the universe offered by Newtonian physics. His effort was directed to providing a basis for both ethics and faith by demonstrating that Newtonian physics presupposes a cosmology which limits its competence, for he recognized that unless this were so, ethical statements would be little more than meaningless.<sup>48</sup>

Strauss rejects this solution, and thus his effort must be directed to proving that classical physics is superior to modern and contemporary physics.<sup>49</sup> But what does such proof involve? It certainly requires much more than indicating, after the fact, that the categories of classical physics are capable of subsuming

<sup>46</sup> We may leave aside some dilemmas which Strauss' position seems to involve, for example: In what sense is a norm which can be violated natural? In what sense can someone be called a "base" or evil person if his acts are the result of error rather than of willfulness? And, of course, why is the natural good? If the natural is good by definition, the statement that something is good because it is natural is a tautology and adds nothing. But, if the statement is not analytic, one can still legitimately ask why "the natural" is necessarily good.

<sup>47</sup> NRH, pp. 7-8. See also NRH, p. 164.

<sup>48</sup> At least this is the conventional view of Kant's efforts. Since Strauss seems to reject this view it is possible that he conceives of Kant having had another, more esoteric, enterprise.

<sup>49</sup> Modern writers generally use the term "classical physics" to describe the Newtonian world view, and the term "modern physics" to describe developments since quantum and relativity theory. In this essay classical physics refers to Aristotelian physics, Newtonian physics is referred to as modern physics, and post-Newtonian physics is referred to as contemporary physics.

Of course, the restoration of classical natural right would not resurrect creative political philosophy. Since it would be the "truth," all that would be left after this restoration would be the practical application of the "truth."

<sup>43</sup> NRH, p. 23 and pp. 244-5.

<sup>44</sup> NRH, pp. 7-8.

<sup>45</sup> Ibid.

the discoveries of modern physics. With the proper juggling this is easily done. Rather it involves demonstrating that classical physics is superior in creativity to modern and contemporary physics. The test of a particular proposition lies in its empirical verification, and the choice of one conceptual scheme (or cosmology) over another is determined by the number and range of verifiable propositions to which it gives rise.

Newton's laws and the method associated with them were a landmark not only or even primarily because they enabled us to deal economically with the motion of the planets, but because they opened vistas. The concepts of force, mass acceleration, etc., as well as Newton's laws, served as the basis for the development of all of modern physics, and provided answers to question after question. Further, Newtonian physics, through Boyle's gas law and Avogadro's hypothesis, provided the basis for all of modern chemistry and, increasingly, for new breakthroughs in biology.

But nowhere in Strauss' writings do we find a systematic discussion of the relevance of the categories of classical physics to an understanding of the physical universe. We must then attempt to determine its relevance for ourselves as best we can.

Modern physics certainly developed categories which lead one to the conclusion that the universe is to be understood in terms of "efficient" causes. With this statement Strauss agrees, at least implicitly. But what about developments in contemporary physics? The great revolution in contemporary physics has been the development of quantum mechanics and relativity. But quantum mechanics arose out of, and still uses most of the concepts of, Newtonian physics (which, incidentally, remains applicable in very large areas). A conservative interpretation of the implications of quantum mechanics does not affect the Newtonian world view.<sup>50</sup> A more radical interpretation of Heisenberg's principle of indeterminacy gives rise to the possibility of elements of randomness on the micro-level.<sup>51</sup> But even if the more radical view were correct it would give no comfort to proponents of classical natural right. For both the classics and Newtonian physics assumed a totally causal universe. In fact both also assume a continuous universe, and quantum mechanics would seem to destroy this view, for quanta of energy are emitted in discrete stages. Nor does field theory associated with the general theory of relativity and, more practically, as applied to electromagnetic phenomena, offer any encouragement to those who would restore a teleological universe. It is true that field theory is incompatible with a simple-minded mechanical view, but field theory possesses a deterministic structure, and changes in state over time are dealt with mechanically, if one regards "mechanism" as referring to analysis in terms of efficient causes.<sup>52</sup>

In fact, contemporary physics takes another step to complete the destruction of the possibility of a restoration of classical natural right. According to classical physics the fundamental tendency of the universe is toward order. However, the second law of thermodynamics tells us that the fundamental tendency of the universe is toward randomness or disorder. At very most it can only be argued that order and disorder are equally characteristic of the universe and that the pattern may be cyclical.

Nor do any of the other sciences offer much encouragement to the classical view. Chemistry is increasingly being reduced to physics, at least in its more creative aspects. And while it is true that, for some purposes, functional explanation of biology is more useful than mechanical explanation, it can be shown that: (1) Functional explanation is reducible to mechanical explanation.<sup>53</sup> (2) The most dynamic areas in biology today are those in which biological phenomena are being explained in terms of the more fundamental categories of chemistry and physics. It is this approach which has permitted the synthesis of amino acids and even proteins in the laboratory.

But unless Strauss can demonstrate the superiority of classical over modern and contemporary science, his whole case collapses, including his reinterpretation of the history of political thought. For example, the conventional interpreters of Locke are willing to accept the apparent contradictions in his thought as evidence of real confusion, and excuse him because he lived and wrote at a <sup>50</sup> E. Nagel, "The Causal Character of Modern Physical Theory," in Feigl and Brodbeck (eds.), op. cit., pp. 419-437. Incidentally, there seems to be little difference, for theoretical purposes, between a universe in which the fundamental categories are particles of matter and one in which matter and energy are interchangeable.

<sup>51</sup> Henry Morganau, The Nature of Physical Reality: A Philosophy of Modern Physics (New York, 1960).

<sup>52</sup> Nagel, The Structure of Science, op. cit., pp. 287-288.

<sup>53</sup> E. Nagel, "Teleological Explanation and Teleological Systems," in Feigl and Brodbeck, op. cit., pp. 537-558.

time when progress in the physical and social sciences had not gone far enough to permit the development of insights which they now have. They admit that Locke was a giant, but argue that they are standing on the backs of giants. Strauss' contention that Locke did not contradict himself is based on the assumption that, if anything, the modern period has been marked by retrogression rather than progress. But, again, on Strauss' own conditions, this assumption does not seem to be tenable.<sup>54</sup>

In the foregoing light it is perhaps not surprising that in his later writing Strauss takes still another position, a position which seems to deny the dependence of classical natural right upon a teleological physics. One must still examine man in relation to the "mysterious whole" but, he argues:

... granted that there are no valid moral or political objections to classical political philosophy—is that political philosophy not bound up with an antiquated cosmology? Does not the very question of the nature of man point to the question of the nature of the whole, and therewith to one or the other specific cosmology? Whatever the significance of modern natural science may be, it cannot affect our understanding of what is human in man.<sup>55</sup>

This later position is unlikely to develop much appeal to any but the already convinced. We would want to know why Strauss rejected his earlier views, what evidence he can offer for this new view, and, finally, in what ways this new view differs from other "modern" views which separate man from the rest of nature. Without such an analysis, the implications of a purposeless universe still seem to involve moral skepticism.<sup>55a</sup>

<sup>54</sup> See footnote 39 above. Strauss' reinterpretation of political philosophy has another interesting implication. He asserts that while modern social scientists are pigmies compared to Locke, so Locke was a pigmy compared to Thomas or Aristotle. This we may indeed accept, but Strauss' position further entails the proposition that Locke and Hobbes were pigmies compared to Strauss and his disciples.

<sup>55</sup> WPP, p. 38.

<sup>55a</sup> In his epilogue to the Storing volume, op. cit., which, unfortunately, came to my attention only after this essay had been written, Strauss seems to change front on a number of points. On the issue which concerns us here he cites Aristotle to prove that "the practical sciences do not depend on the theoretical sciences or are not derivative from them." (309). This is true because: "The principles of action (of the practical sciences) are the natural ends of man of which he has by nature some awareness." (Ibid.) The argu-

And, when we search (in either his earlier or his later writings) for a discussion of what Strauss considers the limits of the implications of modern science, all we find are a few brief and rather cryptic remarks. These seem to reveal an inadequate view of contemporary developments.

According to Strauss, "positivists" (a label which he never really defines with any precision) accept and are proud of the fact that they are concerned only with the "how?" rather than the "why?" of things.<sup>56</sup> Thus the universe remains unintelligible, for the admissibility of any proposition depends upon its contribution to our dominating the universe rather than to our understanding of it. The fruit of modern science is technology rather than wisdom.<sup>57</sup>

Again, the "modern" approach to science "implies a depreciation" of common sense or "pre-scientific" knowledge:

... positivism preserves in a scarcely disguised manner Descartes' universal doubt of pre-scientific knowledge. . . . This superstition fosters all sorts of sterile investigations or complicated idiocies. Things which every ten-year-old child of normal intelligence knows are regarded as being in need of scientific proof. . . .<sup>58</sup>

Finally, Strauss argues, those who accept the model of modern science attempt to understand man entirely in terms of the "sub-human" (in terms of his desires and passions). In these terms man is unknowable.<sup>59</sup>

Surely this is a caricature. While some "positivists" may hold some of the above positions, Strauss here has set up a straw man. First, whatever the philosophic origins of modern science, and whatever value one may set upon technology, contemporary philosophers of science do not make technological success the test of propositions. In fact the only requirements are certain criteria of verification, the most important of which demand that all propositions be stated in such form as to be capable of being validated by empirical procedures, and that propositions which form part of a system not contradict each other.<sup>60</sup> ment is not very convincing, nor, for that matter, very clear.

<sup>56</sup> WPP, p. 18.

<sup>57</sup> NRH, p. 177 and pp. 285-6.

<sup>58</sup> WPP, p. 23.

<sup>59</sup> NRH, p. 8 and WPP, p. 38. Strauss' assertion that the passions and desires of men are "sub-human" is only an assertion.

<sup>60</sup> For a discussion of these rules of procedure see Felix Kaufman, Methodology of the Social Sciences (New York, 1944), pp. 33-66.

Second, those in the empirical tradition would deny that explanation in terms of efficient causes leads to an unintelligible universe. They would assert the opposite, i.e., that modern science has led to an increasingly intelligible universe. Third, empiricists would regard as empty the distinction between the "how" and the "why" which Strauss seems to be making. Modern and contemporary science are certainly attempting to answer the why, and the answer is given either in terms of an "efficient cause" or in terms of a higher level of generality. Nor would they accept the argument that the classics had discovered the correct answer to any particular "why" which is unanswerable within a modern framework.

Fourth, modern science does not cultivate a spirit of universal doubt, nor does it "depreciate" common sense. Rather it builds on common sense, questioning "pre-scientific" knowledge only when it seems unsatisfactory. All that modern empiricists do assert is that no particular set of ideas is sacrosanct, and that some apparently obvious matters turn out, upon further investigation, not to be so, or to need refinement and qualification.

Finally, modern science does not necessarily imply that human behavior must be fully reduced to the desires or passions, whatever some scientists or social scientists may believe. In fact Weber, whom Strauss takes as epitomizing modern social science, deals seriously with human ideas as analytically independent variables, not entirely reducible to psychological or social and economic categories.

Whether or not the modern position is tenable, one cannot refute it by setting up straw men. Nor are a series of brief remarks a substitute for a detailed analysis of the issues involved.<sup>61</sup>

Associated with Strauss' revised position is a somewhat different interpretation of the development of modern political thought and the break with classical natural right. The rejection of classical natural right now seems to stem almost entirely from Machiavelli's conviction that the classics, in developing an ideal model, reduced the possibility of achieving more limited goals. Thus Machiavelli, and following him Hobbes, et. al., chose rather the extreme case in order that more limited goals might be attained. Under this interpretation Machiavelli becomes the central character and the development of modern physics plays little or no role. In fact, Strauss now argues that the idea of the controlled experiment (i.e., "torturing nature," whatever that may mean) rose from shifts in political philosophy rather than vice versa.<sup>62</sup>

It now seems that Machiavelli, Hobbes, etc., rejected the classics because of the idealism of the classics. However, Strauss finds it very easy to prove (what no one denies) that the classics are practical, i.e., that the development of an ideal model does not preclude satisfaction with lesser goals.<sup>63</sup> Machiavelli, Hobbes, etc. were indeed either stupid or naïve. But, if they were so, it seems equally plausible to believe that they were guilty of simple-minded self-contradictions, or that they were unable to recognize the full consequences of their own premises.

It would seem, then, that Strauss has not provided a solution to the dilemma in which we find ourselves and that the restoration of natural right remains only a "wish." But wishes are not horses and beggars do not ride.

III

If I am right in thinking that Strauss' efforts have not been successful, the question remains, what is the source of his appeal? In part, I suggest, the readiness with which some political scientists accept Strauss' arguments reveals a regrettable illiteracy as to the nature and sources of modern and contemporary science. However this alone does not explain the attractiveness of his analysis. To understand this we must turn once again to his writings.

Strauss has made a fetish of the esoteric content of the writings of political philosophers. If a philosopher, he argues, notes that prudence may require esoteric writing, and speaks even once of the need for apparent contradiction, we must assume that the contradictions and obscurity we find in his writing are purposive rather than that he is naïve. Whether this argument is correct or not for most philosophers, we have some warrant to wonder whether it might be true for Strauss himself, <sup>61</sup> For a general discussion of these issues which elaborates most of the points made above in answer to arguments developed by Maritain, Gilson, Wheelwright and other Catholic or "classical" thinkers, see Ernest Nagel, Sovereign Reason (New York, 1954), pp. 1-35. I have not developed the above points in detail, because it is almost impossible to determine where Strauss really stands. I am aware of Catholic and other conventional views of the classics, but, since Strauss' views are, he argues, unconventional, a criticism of conventional views might be wide of the mark.

<sup>62</sup> See TM and WPP, especially pp. 40-55 of the latter.

<sup>63</sup> WPP, pp. 27-40 and 78-94.

since concern with esoteric writing permeates the whole corpus of his work.<sup>64</sup>

Strauss argues that the classics, while not considering democracy an "ideal," are less hostile to democratic forms than one might suppose. He notes that, according to Plato, since the principle of democracy is freedom it permits all human types to develop freely, and hence in particular the best human type. After all, Socrates was permitted to live in democratic Athens for 70 years.<sup>65</sup> Here Strauss is evidently referring, in part, to the eighth book of the Republic, where Socrates compares democracy to a "garment of many colours."<sup>66</sup> But, reading this metaphor in context, it is quite clear that it is meant to be pejorative, and to help explain both why the worst types come to the surface in a democratic polity and why democracy is so readily transformed into tyranny. Further, while in the sixth book of the Republic Plato argues that no existing constitution is compatible with philosophy, he draws his examples entirely from democratic cities.<sup>67</sup> The implication would seem to be that democracy is the worst offender.

Further, Strauss makes much of the fact that, as he puts it, America is the only country which was founded on the basis of an anti-Machiavellian tradition, and he is fond (it often seems over-fond) of citing Jefferson or even Tom Paine to bolster particular philosophic points.<sup>68</sup> But the whole thrust of Strauss' analysis is that the American tradition stems from Hobbes and Locke.<sup>69</sup> In other words, the American tradition is Machiavellian.

How can we explain these seeming contradictions? One is strongly tempted to believe that Strauss is following the advice given by Aristotle in the Rhetoric; that is, he is attempting to convince his audience that his basic premises do not differ from theirs. We are drawn to the further conclusion that this "prudence" is accompanied by the rejection of the values underlying the American experience, and is designed to prepare the way for that unlikely conjunction of philosophy and power which will place in power the philosopher king and the guardians, i.e., Strauss and his disciples.

This analysis is not meant to be taken more than half-seriously, but it does open the way to an understanding of the peculiar attraction which classical natural right seems to hold for some of the current generation of intellectuals. The attraction of Marxism in the pre-war period stemmed from what appeared to be the failures of "liberal clichés" and the prospect that Marxism offered a comprehensive and (as vulgarly interpreted) simple key to the universe. The attraction of classical natural right stems, one suspects, from the continued rejection (for the opposite reasons) of "liberal clichés," the obvious failure of Marxism, and the prospect that it provides a different kind of comprehensive and simple key to the universe. In essence the attraction suggests a loss of nerve in the face of contemporary chaos, for this is when simple keys become the most attractive.

Unfortunately this particular key is even less relevant than the Marxist to understanding our world and its dilemmas. It is little wonder that while students of Strauss have found it so easy to criticize that naive combination of "Jacobinism" and positivism so characteristic of an earlier generation of political scientists (a task accomplished at least as effectively by events as well as by many "non-Straussian" political scientists), they have contributed little or nothing to the empirical work so necessary for understanding contemporary society. This is no accident, for they lack the conceptual tools adequate to this latter task. One cannot understand real men in a real environment with simple keys.

It is understandable that many intellectuals should feel that modernity has led to a blind alley. It does seem as if, having mastered the basic forces of the universe, we may use them to destroy ourselves. Further, it does seem that, having been able to bend nature to our purposes, we can find no rational basis for guiding these purposes. But, assuming all of this to be true, the problems will not be solved by wishing.

And even if the problems are insoluble, even if the world is really absurd, the great adventure which led us to our present predicament may still seem to have been worthwhile. Despite his concern with identifying the "true nature of man," Strauss' definition of the human, his longing for the "closed society" of Plato's ideal, is rather less than human. To me at least the essence of man (if we may speak of an essence) lies not in omphaloskepsis, but in his efforts to bend the universe to his will.

I stand with Prometheus against the gods.

<sup>64</sup> WPP, pp. 221-233.

<sup>65</sup> WPP, p. 36.

<sup>66</sup> Republic, VIII, 557.

<sup>67</sup> Republic, VI, 448-497.

<sup>68</sup> For example, NRH, p. 1; TM, p. 13, and WPP, pp. 85-6. See also Harry V. Jaffa, Crisis of the House Divided (New York, 1959), p. 409.

<sup>69</sup> For Strauss, see NRH, pp. 181-2, 245, and WPP, pp. 47 and 49. See also Jaffa, op. cit., pp. 75 and 314, and W. Berns, Freedom, Virtue and the First Amendment (Baton Rouge, 1957), p. 45.

A REPLY TO ROTHMAN

JOSEPH CROPSY

The University of Chicago

Readers of Stanley Rothman's article "The Revival of Classical Political Philosophy: A Critique" will be aware that the title he has chosen does not indicate the full scope of his endeavor. He has in fact attempted to state and criticize the grounds of classical political and natural philosophy, and to state and in a certain measure defend the grounds of modern social and natural science. Exceptional resources of scholarship and analytic power would be needed to dispose of those tremendous themes, which I believe Rothman has not succeeded in doing. A prominent purpose of Rothman's paper is to criticize the work of Professor Leo Strauss and of some of his students, on the view that he, and after his instruction they, are the animators of the attempted revival of classical doctrines concerning natural right. The attempt to revive natural right is presented as complementary with a belief in the weakness of social science as now understood by the majority of academic and other professionals. The purpose of the present reflections on Rothman's article is to see how far he has made a valid criticism of the classics and of the men he regards as their attempted restorers; and to consider the soundness of his views on the received sciences.

Rothman's essay consists of five main parts, organized about the distinction between Mr. Strauss's writing on contemporary social science and his writing on classical and early modern political philosophy. In the former division are two main parts: a summary (pages 341-343) of Mr. Strauss's position on the question of contemporary social science; and a counter-statement (pages 343-346) in defense of social science, maintaining its consistency and validity on what is best known as the question of facts and values, including the "values" of the social scientists. In the latter division there is again an attempt to summarize (pp. 346-348) a long development of Mr. Strauss's, in this case on classical political philosophy and the early modern position that comprised the rebellion against antiquity. Then there is a counter-statement (pp. 348-351) arguing the superiority of modern over ancient natural science, and inferring therefrom the superiority of modern social science over the ancient. There is also an argument that Mr. Strauss at one time asserted and at a later time denied that classical political philosophy depended on classical natural philosophy. Finally there is a conclusion of a miscellaneous character.

The thesis of Rothman's paper could be said to be this: on the premise of modern scientific method it can be shown that there can and must be clear a distinction between "description" and "evaluation" in both social and natural science; and the denial or ignorance of this proposition is at the core both of classical philosophy and of the attempt to revive natural right on the foundation of a discredited teleologism. Unless this misrepresents Rothman's position, it follows that if natural right does not suppose, nor teleology imply, that description and evaluation are "fused" in Rothman's sense of the term, then this criticism of natural right would prove invalid and Rothman's thesis would have to be rejected. And if Mr. Strauss does not argue, and if it should not be true irrespective of Mr. Strauss's argument, that natural science determines political science, then not only would Rothman's statement of Mr. Strauss's self-contradiction prove incorrect but the basis of Rothman's argument in general would be falsified: for his paper as a whole stands or falls on the validity of adopting the premises and method of modern natural science for vindicating modern social science and for rejecting classical political philosophy as well as natural philosophy. Also rejected would be the vindication of modern natural science by the premises of modern natural science.

In taking up Rothman's argument, I will not discuss thematically his two summaries of Mr. Strauss's statements (in what I have described as the first and third divisions of his article). Rothman, in his second footnote, names Natural Right and History, Thoughts on Machiavelli, and What Is Political Philosophy? as the main sources of Mr. Strauss's views, adding "An Epilogue" from Essays on the Scientific Study of Politics, ed. H. J. Storing (incorrectly cited) in footnote 4. Rothman's references to What Is Political Philosophy? are heavily concentrated in the first 27 pages, but extend to page 94 of that volume. His references to Natural Right and History are extensive but not always precise (e.g., "pp. 88-164," "pp. 77-181"). Thoughts on Machiavelli, a difficult book of about 300 pages, is referred to twice, once in footnote 62 ("See TM") and again in footnote 68 ("TM, p. 13"). There is no evidence that Rothman's argument is affected by Thoughts on Machiavelli, although his claim that there has been a shift in Mr. Strauss's position would have to rest upon a close reading of that book. How thoroughly Rothman has studied his opponent is by no means an unimportant matter; but as far as possible I wish to leave that question open to the judgment of readers, believing that those who take the trouble to compare the original with the restatement will be struck by the disproportion between the solidity of the one and the looseness, if not unintelligible abbreviation of the other. Because Rothman's purpose is complex—not merely the criticism of natural right proper but the criticism of it in its revived form, under the influence of a scholar who has, as the ancients did not have, experience of modern circumstances—it will not be possible entirely to ignore the question of the accuracy of Rothman's representation of classical thought as revived.

Let us turn to Rothman's attack on natural right in the form of a defense of social science. Broadly, Rothman must refute this doctrine: that positivism and historicism are vitiated, positivism by its untenable position on values, and both historicism and positivism by the application of each to itself. The part of the question that pertains to historicism is not examined by Rothman. He does assert that "Strauss' analysis of the historicist implications of positivism (as he defines it) is not very convincing." (p. 6) This remark is supported by a footnote which does not mention the issue, but which contains, among other things, the reference: "See, for example, Herbert Feigl and May Brodbeck, Readings in the Philosophy of Science. . . ." The Feigl and Brodbeck volume consists of 52 essays and almost 800 pages, and there is no direct manner of knowing in what way Rothman considers it to bear on the question. Let us, with Rothman, drop the problem of natural right and history and take up the question of whether positivistic social science is self-contradictory.

The position that Rothman contests may be taken to begin with this sentence on page 21 of What Is Political Philosophy?: "It is impossible to study social phenomena, i.e., all important social phenomena, without making value judgments." (My italics) The argument of Mr. Strauss proceeds generally in this way: Social science which attempts to assimilate itself to natural science denies that there can be judgments of goodness or excellence, i.e., of "value," exceeding bare preferences in cognitive standing. To the extent to which positivistic social science makes or implies such judgments, it contradicts its precept by its practice. It must contradict itself thus if it wishes to consider important questions; but it can avoid contradicting itself thus if it confines itself, for example, to purely technical questions qua technical, or to subordinate tasks of mere enumeration, correlation, and so on. The untenability or the inutility of positivistic social science proceeds from its premise that judgments of value are not as intelligible or rational as are judgments of fact. Positivistic social science grants that men's preferences or values are themselves facts deducible from men's behavior, and may as such be described, enumerated, and so on; but it insists that there is no way of verifying, i.e., establishing the truth of, a value judgment: only the existence but not the truth of value judgments is matter of fact.

Nothing in this characterization of positivistic social science can be taken as implying that there are no judgments as to fact which are not also judgments as to value. The point is rather that judgments as to value are not to be excluded from the class of judgments as to fact, and that such judgments as to value cannot be excised from social science without sterilizing it in more senses than the one intended. I am not now trying to argue the truth of this doctrine but only to establish what the position at issue is. The first part of the position can be stated thus, with bare brevity: values are factual, but not all facts are values (e.g., "the cube root of 64 is less than half of 10" contains no element of discretion or judgment in the proper sense).<sup>1</sup>

Rothman, however, makes it clear that he takes the natural right position to imply the "fusion" of facts and values. On page 491 of The Structure of Science,<sup>2</sup> Ernest Nagel, discussing a passage by Mr. Strauss, denies that "fact and value are fused beyond the possibility of distinguishing them." Rothman has evidently taken up the understanding of natural right implicit in that denial, and made it fundamental to his own view. In the part of his article dealing thematically with social science, he builds up to the assertion (p. 345) that "one can describe without at the same time evaluating." (My italics) In the subsequent part of his article which could be said to have natural science as the theme, he asserts that "In the classical view all descriptions are evaluations and all evaluations are moral evaluations." (p. 348)

No evidence brought by Rothman supports the view that, according to Mr. Strauss or to anyone, all description is evaluation and all evaluation is moral evaluation. The Statistical Abstract of the United States could be regarded as a kind of description of this country, without moral judgements of any sort being expressed in its pages. No one could deny the importance of some or many of the undoubted facts contained in it. Also, buildings may be approved for their durability, horses for their swiftness, women for their beauty and men for their intelligence without any trace of moral evaluation entering. There is assuredly a difference between a broken-winded nag of great age and a vigorous plow horse in the prime of life, and as a difference which is essential to the nature of the horse it could be said to rest upon a norm of "natural right;" but what does that difference have to do with morality? Why should a man be said to make a moral evaluation when he judges a hound to have a good nose? Rothman's misrepresentation of the view he attempts to criticize must emanate from a failure to reflect on the difference between "right" and "moral."

<sup>1</sup> The reader should consult Walter Berns' Communication in this REVIEW, Vol. 52 (September, 1958), entitled "On Robert Dahl's 'Important Questions.'"

<sup>2</sup> See Rothman's footnote 26.

The classical doctrine is that each thing is excellent in the degree to which it can do the things for which its species is naturally equipped. Later on, in footnote 46, Rothman will ask, why is the natural good? The answer is that there is neither a way nor a reason to prevent ourselves from distinguishing between useless and serviceable beasts, for example, and that the most empirical and also obvious, as well as rational standard of the serviceable, or the limit of the thing's activity, is set by its nature. We do not judge elephants to be good because they are natural; or because nature is morally good—whatever that would mean. We judge a particular elephant to be good by the light of what elephant nature makes it possible for elephants to do and to be. As long as we continue to base our judgments of beings on their natures, we will be preserved, for example, from expecting all men to become philosophers at the same time that we are preserved from being unable to distinguish good citizens from parasites and criminals. The common notion of natural right is that it is not empirical. Rothman distinguishes the men of the empirical tradition from those he criticizes. Like all understanding, that provided by the light of nature is of course not simply empirical. But it should be clear that greater scope can hardly be given to observation than to allow it to be the basis for our recognition of the species of things and their faculties. Whether teleology or some other principle lies behind the phenomena is a question that can be deferred for a while. For the present it suffices that Rothman's main argument in his rejoinder to the natural right argument against positivistic social science is made against a point that his opponent does not make.

A further argument thought by Rothman to be necessary for his case against natural right and for social science is this: it is not legitimate to object against social science that "the objects of investigation and even the very formulation of the problems are shaped by personal interests or commitments. . . ." (p. 344) I do not know (but will in a moment attempt to guess) what point of classical doctrine Rothman is attempting to refute with this argument, but its bearing can be determined in a general way. In his footnote 26, he draws attention to pages 485-502 of Ernest Nagel's The Structure of Science. Those pages comprise a section of a chapter on Methodological Problems of the Social Sciences. The section in question is entitled "The Value-Oriented Bias of Social Inquiry." In it, Professor Nagel takes up, under four headings, "the alleged role of value judgments," i.e., of the social scientists' value judgments, in influencing the work of the social scientists. His first heading is, the alleged role of value judgments in the selection of problems. The position he brings under critical review is this: the possible field of interest of social scientists is determined by their culture and values, and therefore a strictly objective or scientific social science is impossible. We may note that he rejects the conclusion, arguing that investigation of value-indicated objects can still be perfectly scientific. Of interest to us is the fact that the writer who advanced the view that Nagel rejects is Max Weber. The situation is as follows. Weber is a powerful advocate of value-free social science, and is defended as such by Rothman against the criticisms of Mr. Strauss (pp. 345-346). But Weber believes that the possibility of value-free social science is unavoidably limited by the value-directedness of the social scientists' choice of subjects. Mr. Strauss denies both the possibility and the desirability of value-free social science and would certainly deny that an intelligent man's investigations are determined by his cultural values. Rothman here takes up Nagel's rebuttal against Weber, but mistakes the arguments against Weber for arguments against Mr. Strauss. This is especially damaging to Rothman for the reason that there is perhaps one point on which Mr. Strauss's position is more congenial to the claim of social science than is Max Weber's: Weber affirms and Mr. Strauss denies that the scientist is in principle culture-bound in the choice of topics. It is precisely on this point that Rothman imagines the refutation of Weber to be a refutation of Mr. Strauss; and, as it happens, he presents it as a refutation of an argument which Mr. Strauss did not make (namely, that there are no important value-free facts) and to which the supposed refutation would in any case be unrelated, as is evident. The obscurity of Rothman's position is increased by the fact that the position of Weber, to which he takes unwitting exception, is Rothman's own position expressed in other words. Rothman argues the impossibility of reducing interest and commitment to anything else: they simply are what they are. Weber, as Mr. Strauss remarks on page 46 of Natural Right and History, admits this and even gives it a respectability which Rothman does not try to do: "Excellence now means devotion to a cause, be it good or evil, and baseness means indifference to all causes."

If we try to reconstruct Rothman's reason for including his passage on "commitments," (p. 344) we may conjecture (he does not say it) that this is his argument against Mr. Strauss's view that positivistic social science is self-depreciatory to the point of being self-contradictory. In other words, value-free social science denies the objectivity or truth of the value-judgment that pronounces science itself to be more worthy than other pursuits. The highest wisdom about value judgments includes the judgment that there is no objective superiority in the pursuit of that highest wisdom, without which men would err concerning judgment itself. If Rothman's passage on page 344 is intended to be the rejoinder to this part of the natural right position, then it must be said that the rejoinder is a confirmation of the view it seeks to refute: he tells us that men's interests and commitments simply are what they are. That is to say, he admits precisely what he would have to refute in order to meet the argument against which he is contending. If Rothman's passage is not intended as I have supposed it, then it must be regarded as not to the point. The reader's attention should be drawn in passing to Rothman's use of "interests" in conjunction with "commitments." "Interests" is an ambiguous word; and it becomes clear later in his article that Rothman must be held to mean that investigators are directed not only by their interests in the sense of "what excites curiosity" but also by their interests as the word appears in the phrase "interested or selfish motives." The purification of science is inseparable from the incrimination of the scientists. It is an open question whether social scientists, of whatever opinion, will find this doctrine more contradictory than derogatory or vice versa. In any case, it is not an effective refutation of the charge that positivistic social science infects its own being with a fundamental weakness.

Rothman proceeds with a reference to Mr.

Strauss's position on Weber's thesis concerning the rise of capitalism. If what has been said above is correct, Rothman's remarks are not to the point, for he is still arguing that, according to the natural right position, "purely descriptive propositions are not merely wrong but rather . . . they are meaningless." (p. 345) In any case, the reader might wish to know that a fuller statement on the Weber thesis can be found in Church History, March, 1961: "The Weber Thesis Reexamined (W. S. Hudson) with Comment by Leo Strauss," against which Rothman's remarks can be checked.

Rothman prepares to bring this section of his article to a close by asserting "that Strauss seems to have shifted his position after completing Natural Right and History." This is one of the points we shall have to consider, as we turn to the part of his paper that Rothman describes as dealing with Mr. Strauss's "restatement of the implications of classical thought and the modern break with that thought," (p. 346), but which in effect contains Rothman's treatment of the problem of natural science.

The primary subject in part II of Rothman's paper is natural science and its relation to social science. The argument falls into divisions which are determined by the fact that Rothman is contending partly against classical philosophy and partly against the revival of classical philosophy. The difference between the two is produced by the intervention of modern natural science. Rothman's method is to adopt as his premise the decisive supersession of ancient physics by modern physics and then to argue (1) that both ancient and revived natural right, which depend upon the teleological view of nature, are invalid as ancient physics is because ancient physics depends upon the teleological view of nature; and (2) that Mr. Strauss in his earlier writings conceded the victory of modern natural science and with it, in effect, the victory of modern social science; but in his later writings denies that the victory of the former implies the victory of the latter. I shall try to show that there is no merit in the argument that natural right falls with ancient physics because both are teleological; and that Mr. Strauss did not assert what Rothman alleges him to have asserted, and therefore that the change of view which Rothman speaks of never occurred. The majority of Rothman's detailed points I shall have to leave to each reader's scrutiny, with the suggestion that they be tested by the rule, are they comprehensible if read very literally?

The point numbered (1) above would be valid if it were true not only that modern natural science has simply superseded ancient natural science, but also that in the decisive respect, i.e., on the ground of that supersession, natural right was simultaneously overthrown. What is the ground on which that supersession is thought, or is specifically thought by Rothman, to rest? It is that modern natural science is, whereas classical natural science is not, guided or dominated by the verification principle.<sup>3</sup> What is the verification principle? Rothman gives one form of it: "that all propositions be stated in such form as to be capable of being validated by empirical procedures, and that propositions which form part of a system not contradict each other." (p. 360) As to the latter condition, it is clear that the need to avoid self-contradiction is as much an element of ancient as of modern method, and consciously so.

The novelty of the ground of modern science is the condition, apparently, that propositions must be capable of empirical verification in order to be regarded as meaningful. As is well known, the acceptance of the empirical test for verification rests upon this belief: that the evidence of the senses is the most fundamental or most genuine evidence accessible to man; and that in turn is true because what is, is sensible and what is sensible, is. I do not wish to emphasize what is common knowledge, namely, that there is no empirical basis for the metaphysical doctrine that to be is to be sensible. I mean only to point out that this metaphysical principle does not overthrow (for it does not meet) the metaphysical principle "to be is to be intelligible"; it merely draws men's minds in a different direction. Ruling out certain questions as meaningless because not empirically verifiable, does no more than any abstention from an inquiry can do: it leaves the question open, in the minds of those who do not mistake the negative of a blank for a negation by refutation. It might be true that the order of nature, and the necessary culmination of that order in some principle that originates motion without itself being in motion, cannot be made a matter of empirical demonstration (if that expression is not a self-contradiction). But it might also be true, for anything the verification principle can adduce to the contrary, that an infinite regress of sources of motion in the universe is a contradiction of the profoundest sort; and that, therefore, to insist upon empirical verification and consistency of the system is meaningless. I am far from wishing to maintain that ancient physics is superior to modern physics. I wish only to suggest that the case against teleology is not made out by Rothman.

What of the collapse of natural right because of its association with teleological physics? In order to consider this question, I will merge the remainder of point (1) with point (2) as they were numbered above. How closely are physics and moral philosophy linked? Rothman believes that they are inseparable. He writes, "... unless Strauss can demonstrate the superiority of classical over modern and contemporary science, his whole case collapses. ..." (p. 349) Why should this be so? Rothman does not say, but he gives the impression that if the Heisenberg uncertainty principle (not both the velocity and the position of the small quanta are determinate) and the second law of thermodynamics (on the irreversibility of energy transfers in the universe as a whole) are somehow true, then there are consequences for the possibility that man's end is related to his nature. But Heisenberg's uncertainty principle has precisely as much to do with the goodness of man's rational activity, for example, as the law of gravity has to do with the question, ought you to knock down an old lady in order to get a seat on the subway—neither more nor less. The principles of physics are relevant to the problems of human life to the extent that human life can be reduced to the motion of matter. This is true according to the self-understanding of modern science, at any rate, which, so far as it adopts the verification principle, adopts simple empiricism and with it materialism. On this score, Rothman's argument consists exclusively of his unsupported assertions.

But he claims that on this issue of the relation between natural science and natural right, it is Mr. Strauss who is inconsistent, having changed his views fundamentally. Rothman, summarizing Mr. Strauss's position, says, "... the separation of man and nature, and the attempt to apply different modes of analysis to each, was inconceivable to classical political philosophy, and is a product of the break with that philosophy." (p. 346) We leave altogether out of the account Spinoza's famous remark against the writers (by which he meant the traditional writers) who "conceive man to be situated in nature as a kingdom within a kingdom."<sup>4</sup> Let us turn to the presentation of the case in Natural Right and History, accepting it as at the same time a statement of the classical and revived natural right position:

Socrates was forced to raise the question as to what the human things as such are, or what the ratio rerum humanarum is. But it is impossible to grasp the distinctive character of human things as such without grasping the essential difference between human things and the things which are not human, i.e., the divine or natural things. . . .

<sup>3</sup> Pp. 348, 349, 350 for example.

<sup>4</sup> Ethics, III, introduction.

Contrary to appearances, Socrates' turn to the study of human things was based, not upon disregard of the divine or natural things, but upon a new approach to the understanding of all things. That approach was indeed of such a character that it permitted, and favored, the study of human things as such, i.e., of the human things in so far as they are not reducible to the divine or natural things. Socrates deviated from his predecessors by identifying the science of the whole, or of everything that is, with the understanding of "what each of the beings is." For "to be" means "to be something" and hence to be different from things which are "something else"; "to be" means therefore "to be a part." Hence the whole cannot "be" in the same sense in which everything that is "something" "is"; the whole must be "beyond being."<sup>5</sup>

It simply is not true that the classics compromised their teaching concerning human things with a teaching concerning the non-human things—saying nothing further about the possible merit of that latter teaching. What then is the basis of Rothman's allegation that Mr. Strauss has shifted his position in an impossible way? It is this: early in Natural Right and History (pp. 7-8), Mr. Strauss refers to a "dilemma" that confronts modern men as a result of the great successes (i.e., technological successes) of non-teleological science. Men believe either that they must accept non-teleological moral doctrine because of the success of non-teleological physical science; or that they can escape by arguing that the human things are intelligible teleologically and the non-human things non-teleologically. The former are positivists (and would include Rothman), the latter are Thomists and others who have broken with Aristotle, i.e., with the classical tradition of natural right. Since it is perfectly obvious that Mr. Strauss is not in the course of associating himself with either party, it is equally clear that he means literally what he says toward the end of the Introduction to Natural Right and History: the book "will have to be limited to that aspect of the problem of natural right which can be clarified within the confines of the social sciences." Rothman's misinterpretation consists in this: he believed Mr. Strauss, or the natural right position (in fact both) to be themselves confined to the two horns of the dilemma. He did not realize that what follows, both in Natural Right and History and in the later works, is a statement that refuses the dilemma because what follows does not concede that the issue between ancient and modern natural science is simply disposed of by arguing from the premises of modern natural science. Rothman's argument thus does not bear weight.

I deeply deplore the need to notice the concluding section of Rothman's paper. In it he continues in the tone he sets very early when he refers to Mr. Strauss's students as "disciples," a term of gratuitous offense that insinuates a combination of self-satisfied sectarianism and hypnotic influence. In the conclusion he permits himself to speculate on the basis of that influence, and easily satisfies himself that it is founded upon a susceptibility to "simple keys," and a lust for power. He does himself little credit by describing as simple the oldest and deepest philosophic tradition known to man, one which he shows no sign of having grasped. And as for the desire to seize power, what more does that half-serious allegation rest upon than a mixture of levity and the near-malevolence of hostile brooding upon motives? That same conjunction of levity and ill-temper could as well impute to Rothman an appetite to be known as climbing Jack in search of giants to slay; but the man who would write so of him would deserve the censure of scholars, for the charge would be mere speculation, and irrelevant to every genuine issue.

Rothman writes that Mr. Strauss "has made a fetish of the esoteric content of the writings of political philosophers." Mr. Strauss has not made a fetish of anything. He has done no more than to act on the principle that, when one reads the writings of great men, one should as long as possible abstain from concluding that what appears obscure or contradictory, i.e., unintelligible, is really so. Any other approach to the great literature is sheerly presumptuous. Rothman does not refer to Persecution and the Art of Writing. Readers might be interested in consulting that statement of the issue by Mr. Strauss, in order to ascertain whether there are any traces of fetishism in it.

Rothman makes a particularly offensive and unjust insinuation when he depreciates the sincerity of the adherence of Mr. Strauss and his students to the principles of democracy and of the United States. The quality of Rothman's method of scholarship, and the wholesomeness of his intention can best be exposed by quoting the passage from What Is Political Philosophy? that he alludes to as he distorts it (see his footnote 65):

To speak first of the classics' attitude towards democracy, the premises: "the classics are good," and "democracy is good" do not validate the conclusion "hence the classics were good democrats." It would be silly to deny that the classics rejected democracy as an inferior kind of regime. They were not blind to its advantages. The severest indictment of democracy that ever was written occurs in the eighth book of Plato's Republic. But even there, and precisely there, Plato makes it clear—by coordinating his arrangement of regimes with Hesiod's arrangement of the ages of the world—that democracy is, in a very important respect, equal to the best regime, which corresponds to Hesiod's golden age: since the principle of democracy is freedom, all human types can develop freely in a democracy, and hence in particular the best human type. . . .

<sup>5</sup> P. 122.

Rothman hints at a sinister purpose underlying Mr. Strauss's "contradictory" attribution of American political institutions to "Machiavellian" and "anti-Machiavellian" sources. Rothman does not appear to realize that the tradition of modern political philosophy is not a seamless web, but a complicated structure consisting of parts which are to some extent antagonistic. He might be expected to know that this is, at least, the view of Mr. Strauss, for the sixth chapter of Natural Right and History is called "The Crisis of Modern Natural Right," and begins with the remark that "The first crisis of modernity occurred in the thought of Jean-Jacques Rousseau." (My italics) Readers may conclude for themselves whether Rothman's presentation of the case was fair or well-informed.

The contest between ancients and moderns is bound to continue. It draws our attention to the deepest and grandest questions, in the presence of which there is no proper frame of mind but modesty and concentration upon the issues. To proceed in any other spirit is to show disrespect for scholarship and for the sovereign questions, and is altogether deplorable.

THE POLITICAL IDEAS OF ENGLISH PARTY ACTIVISTS*

RICHARD ROSE

University of Manchester

If a democracy is to function successfully, the great mass of the population need instruments for communicating their views to political leaders. The chief channels for communication are parties and pressure groups. English politics provides much scope for study of these conduits, because both parties and pressure groups are highly organized and well articulated. Although the part played by party activists in policy formulation is only one small aspect of this network, the study of that part throws considerable light upon the interplay of parties and pressure groups, and challenges as well some prevailing notions about the policy demands of party activists.

Party activists in Britain have only comparatively recently been regarded as potentially capable of participating in discussions of public policy. Both the Conservatives and Liberals originated as small coterie of parliamentary notables who controlled, or were independent of rank-and-file party workers. Writing in 1908, A. Lawrence Lowell characterized the two party organizations as shams—the Liberals, with their formal devices for rank-and-file policy-making as an opaque sham, and the Conservatives as transparent shams.<sup>1</sup> He noted that in 1903 Conservative Party members were so deferential that when the Cabinet was split on tariff reform the annual membership conference “shrank from saying what it thought.” Both Conservative and Liberal parties have maintained this aloofness from activists in matters of policy discussion up to the present day. The official report on Conservative Party re-organization prepared after the 1945 debacle noted that the size of the annual party conference made it “a demonstration of strength and enthusiasm” and made impossible “the more intimate circumstances necessary to thoughtful debate.”<sup>2</sup> Since the farcical intervention of activists in policy-making at the 1958 Liberal Assembly, Jc Grimond has successfully emphasized the need to keep Liberal policy-making in the hands of a small circle.

The Labour Party, in theory and to some extent in practice, has always stood for participation by rank-and-file party members in policy-making. A current party pamphlet states: “The right to a voice in determining policy is important to any member . . . The individual member has a chance to use the machinery of the party to secure support for ideas on every aspect of party policy.”<sup>3</sup> In recent years a harassed Labour leadership has begun to stress Robert T. McKenzie’s thesis that it is unconstitutional for party members to make policy to which MPs are bound, because MPs must be responsible to those who elect them and not to that allegedly unrepresentative fraction who constitute active party members. The Labour leadership is reverting to the Burkean position maintained by many Conservatives, that an MP owes his constituency party supporters nothing more than his informed and independent judgement.<sup>4</sup> Except for Ralph Miliband, who has argued that the influence of the active Labour minority should not be reduced because of the apathy of the majority,<sup>5</sup> there is a consensus among students of British politics that party activists cannot and should not make party policy, or ever influence it greatly.

* This is a revised version of a paper read at the International UNESCO Seminar on Political Participation, held at the Christian Michelsen Institute, Bergen, Norway in June, 1961.

The author is indebted to Mrs. T. Collins and her associates in the computer section of the University of Manchester for considerable assistance in tabulating the data discussed herein.

<sup>1</sup> A. L. Lowell, The Government of England (London, 1921 edition) Vol. I, pp. 578, 584. See also M. Ostrogorski, Democracy and the Organization of Political Parties (London, 1902), Vol. I, p. 161 ff; J. L. Garvin, The Life of Joseph Chamberlain (London, 1932), Vol. I, ch. 14; W. S. Churchill, Lord Randolph Churchill (London, 1906), esp. chs. 6–8.

<sup>2</sup> Final Report of the Committee on Party Organization (National Union, London, 1949), p. 27.

<sup>3</sup> S. Barker, How the Labour Party Works (London, 1955), p. 6.

<sup>4</sup> See R. T. McKenzie, British Political Parties (London, 1955), esp. chs. 1, 10; Report of the Fifty-Ninth Annual Conference of the Labour Party (London, 1960), p. 159 ff, and Morgan Phillips’ Memorandum on the Constitution of the Labour Party (London, 1960).

<sup>5</sup> “Party Democracy and Parliamentary Government,” Political Studies, Vol. 6 (1958), pp. 170–74. Wilfrid Fienburgh, then research secretary of the Labour Party, implicitly took this position in “Put Policy on the Agenda,” Fabian Journal, No. 6 (1952), pp. 25–7.

It does not follow, however, that the views of party activists are of no interest. There are several reasons for analyzing them. First, activists may be mobilized to support a faction within the elite when there occurs what Michels treated as "The Struggle Among the Leadership Themselves."<sup>6</sup> Sometimes, a section of the counter-elite and of the activists appear to work together and respond to a common stimulus. Second, activists are a major channel of communication between MPs and party leaders and the electorate at large. Third, they are presumed to be the last stronghold of ideologues within the party system. Last but hardly least, there has never been any systematic study of the policy views of activists in Britain, although there has been no lack of generalizing on this subject.

Many students of political parties, most notably Duverger, have claimed that the views of activists differ significantly from those of most party voters; hence, the description of an activist as a militant.<sup>7</sup> (American experience would suggest that many active party workers are far from being ideologically militant, but this has not until recently been thought relevant to European politics.) Such leading writers on British politics as Bagehot, Lowell and McKenzie have also argued this with reference to Britain.<sup>8</sup> Leon Epstein has explained the alleged extremist views of these activists as follows:

The voluntary and amateur nature of these associations ensures that they attract zealots in the party cause, and particularly so at the local leadership level, where there are many routine political chores which only the devoted are likely to perform. Principles, not professional careers, are what matter here.<sup>9</sup>

<sup>6</sup> Political Parties (Dover edition, New York, 1959), p. 164 ff. McKenzie ignores this phenomenon.

<sup>7</sup> Political Parties (London, 1954), p. 101 ff. Cf. A. Leiserson, Parties and Politics (New York, 1958), pp. 191, 274.

<sup>8</sup> Bagehot, quoted in N. Nicolson, People and Parliament (London, 1958), p. 166; A. L. Lowell, Public Opinion and Popular Government (New York, 1914), p. 92; R. T. McKenzie, op. cit., pp. 196-7, p. 506. See also T. E. M. McKitterick, "The Membership of the [Labour] Party," Political Quarterly, Vol. 31 (1960), p. 316 ff.

<sup>9</sup> "British MPs and their Local Parties: The Suez Case," this Review, Vol. 54 (1960), p. 385. Epstein wrongly suggests that rank-and-file extremism strengthens the position of party leaders. This is because he generalizes from the extremist

Nigel Nicolson, the victim while a Conservative MP of a constituency association which disowned him because of his centrist views, has argued that the extremist outlook of activists threatens to endanger parliamentary government, because Parliament is losing power to Cabinet and Cabinet is dominated by party. Nicolson claims that parliamentary leaders rightly see problems in terms of "the intrusive grey," whereas activists see things in black and white terms. Political activity only intensifies their militant beliefs. Hence, in the constituencies, warfare between the parties is "a grim reality."<sup>10</sup>

To use the terminology of Martin Lipset in Political Man, the influence of activists in party policy-making is said to give heavy emphasis to ideological cleavage without a compensating statement of consensus, whereas both the theory and practice of British government value consensus much more than cleavage. It is theoretically possible that constituency parties may act as a safety valve through which extremist pressures escape, but this argument has not been advanced. It is the crux of Nicolson's case that the steam being generated by extreme-minded activists threatens to scald the engine drivers of democracy and endanger all the passengers.

I

Party activists have the same formal method of influencing policy in both parties—sending resolutions to the annual party conferences.<sup>11</sup> This is not sufficient proof of policy concern, but it is almost certainly a necessary condition which activists must meet if they wish their views to be considered by the national party leadership. The other major channel—lobbying one's MP—is informal and indirect. Furthermore, half the constituencies have an MP from the opposition party. There are no inhibitions surrounding conference resolutions. If anything, there is an expectation that resolutions will be used by extremists to voice complaints to and about leaders.

The circumstances in which policy resolutions are drafted, debated and approved differ widely from constituency to constituency. Resolutions are likely to originate in committee position of the leadership on Suez; the instance is, however, exceptional.

<sup>10</sup> Op. cit., p. 169. His fear is not new. Cf. Ostrogorski, op. cit., Vol. I, p. 493 ff.

<sup>11</sup> See S. Barker, op. cit., p. 7 ff; Party Organization (Conservative & Unionist Central Office, London, 1961), p. 23 ff; R. T. McKenzie, op. cit., pp. 231-58, 532-46.

meetings of local parties; alternatively, suggestions or amendments may be made at party meetings, where attendance will invariably be only a small fraction of a constituency party's membership, and an extremely small fraction of the party vote in the constituency.<sup>12</sup> Thus, the method and setting facilitate domination by a small group determined to foster a particular set of ideas. The extent to which policy is discussed in local parties appears to vary considerably.<sup>13</sup> Motives for tabling resolutions may be mixed and several. Expressions of opinion may spontaneously originate within the local caucus from concern with an immediate event in the news. MPs or candidates may stimulate resolutions favouring views they wish to advance. Sometimes resolutions are presented in efforts to gain publicity, either for the local party or for the person who may be chosen to move it in an auditorium crowded with delegates.

The resolutions analyzed herein are those submitted to Conservative and Labour annual party conferences from 1955 to 1960 inclusive. No list of resolutions was published for the cancelled 1959 Conservative conference. The omission of one year's total from the sample is offset by the fact that there is no limit on the number of resolutions which a Conservative constituency may forward. In the Labour Party, a constituency normally may send only one resolution, and occasionally an amendment. Because of alterations to constituency boundaries prior to the 1955 election, the analysis could not be accurately carried further back in time.

Each resolution has been assigned to one of four categories—Right, Left, Partisan or Non-Partisan. Resolutions in the first three categories contain a distinctive element of partisan ideology; those in the last tend to reflect pressure group concerns or general cultural values not integrally a part of party ideology. The definitions follow, with examples taken from conference programs.

Partisan: Enunciation of an agreed party policy which is opposed to that of the other party and which has an ideological basis.

<sup>12</sup> Cf. reports of low participation by trade unionists in discussions of union policy, in B. C. Roberts, Trade Union Government and Administration in Great Britain (London, 1956), p. 95 ff; M. Harrison, Trade Unions and the Labour Party Since 1945 (London, 1960), ch. 3.

<sup>13</sup> Cf. D. V. Donnison and D. E. G. Plowman, "The Functions of Local Labour Parties," Political Studies, Vol. 2 (1954), p. 156 ff; A. H. Birch, Small-Town Politics (Oxford, 1959), p. 44 ff.

Conservative example: "That this Conference congratulates the Government on its economic policy, which has resulted in full employment, stable prices and the highest standard of living in our history, but urges the removal of the many impediments still hindering the spread of ownership throughout the community." (No. 177, 1960)

Other favored Conservative themes include: requests for maximum economy in public expenditure, denunciation of further nationalization, protection of property rights in land compulsorily acquired by the state, support for the Commonwealth, and approval of the tripartite division of secondary education.

Labour example: "This Conference believes that a substantial measure of public ownership is essential for the nation's well-being. It therefore instructs the NEC to prepare for presentation to the 1961 Annual Conference a practical programme of public ownership for the next Labour Government, based on the needs of the economy, workers and consumers' interests." (No. 203, 1960)

Labour resolutions in this category often deal with: world disarmament through the United Nations, support for colonial freedom and attacks upon the Conservative colonial policy, attacks upon advertising, the need for economic planning and controls, demands for an end to profiteering in land prices, and support for a comprehensive secondary education system.

Non-partisan: Enunciation of a policy which is not the subject of controversy along party lines, either because it reflects the views of pressure groups working within both parties or because it is generally regarded as desirable within the culture. A non-partisan resolution is not necessarily non-political.

Conservative example: "That this Conference is of the opinion that in view of the statement made at the time of the General Election that old age pensioners were to share in the prosperity of the country, an increase in their pensions should now be made." (No. 126, 1960)

Other popular themes for non-party resolutions at Conservative conferences include: assistance for particular industries or for agriculture, calls for more teachers and smaller class sizes, demands for more roads and safer roads, tax relief for homeowners, changes to strengthen local government in its work, changes in electoral law to simplify the job of party workers, and improvements in party organization.<sup>14</sup>

Labour example: "This Conference urges the Government to grant an immediate increase for old age pensioners." (No. 344, 1960)

Among a welter of Labour themes that were basically non-ideological were: assistance for shipbuilding, coal, other industries and for agriculture, calls for more teachers and smaller class sizes, requests for more hospitals and removal of alleged anomalies in welfare services, changes to strengthen local government in its work, more roads and safer roads, better railway services, and relief of the housing shortage and need for slum clearance.

Right-wing Conservative: A policy statement which calls for widening the gap between the two parties through adoption of a reactionary variant of party policy.

Example: "That in the opinion of this Conference the monopoly of omnibus transport in large cities and towns should be abolished and that responsible operators be allowed to compete, thereby giving the public a better service." (No. 48, 1960)

Right-wing Conservatives concentrate upon: pleas for weakening taxes which tend to redistribute income, requests for laws to curb trade unions and strikers, demands for a return to flogging and heavy reliance upon capital punishment to fight crime, the absolute reduction of government spending and services, the denationalization of various industries, and reducing benefits available through welfare services.

Left-wing Labour: A statement calling for a radical transformation of the domestic mixed economy welfare state, or of the existing system of international relations, in order to make the breakthrough to a Socialist society. Such statements are usually out of harmony with the declared policy of the leadership.

Example: "This Conference instructs the National Executive Committee to appoint a sub-committee to investigate and report to the 1961 Annual Conference the most practical way in which all the means of production, distribution and exchange can be brought under public ownership, ensuring that the workers and consumers alike can participate in the management of each industry." (No. 206, 1960)

Under this heading come resolutions: asking for unilateral nuclear disarmament, demanding large-scale extension of nationalization and/or workers' control, reaffirming Socialist principles in terms of root-and-branch rejection of a capitalist-influenced society, and those calling for compulsory closure of the public boarding schools.

Left-wing Conservative/Right-wing Labour: Statements of policy which deviate so markedly from conference policy that they tend to be in harmony with the policies of the opposing party.

Conservative example: "That this Conference requests the Minister of Housing and Local Government to examine the position of the tenants of furnished accommodation with a view to introducing legislation to guarantee an adequate standard of furnishings and fittings, and a reasonable security of tenure." (No. 331, 1960)

Labour example: "This Conference moves that the Labour Party, being a social and democratic movement, seeks to determine by means of a social-political survey, such questions as the image of the party in the minds of the electorate, their social habits and background, and their wishes concerning the fundamental issues of the day, with the aim of studying the results of such an enquiry and deciding to what extent they should influence future party policy." (No. 424, 1960)

The number of these resolutions is so few that one cannot generalize much. In the Conservative Party, left-wing resolutions seemed to come either from constituency parties in working-class areas, which voiced Labour-inclined views on social services and economic policy, or from constituencies where progressive Conservatives had some sympathies with Labour's overseas policy. Labour deviation seemed largely motivated by a desire to repudiate traditional Socialist ideology, with an occasional repudiation resulting in virtual alignment with Conservative positions.

Any system of categorizing data is open to criticism. The headings here employed have been designed to group together views which signify, either explicitly or by their nuance, association with one or another faction within the two parties. This is the standard used by many speakers on resolutions at party conferences, who discuss them in terms of left/right tendencies, and the same standard is characteristically employed in descriptions of conference debates by journalists.

<sup>14</sup> Resolutions dealing with the mechanics of party organization have been scored non-partisan because they show bureaucratic rather than ideological concerns. Interestingly, a number of resolutions ostensibly dealing with party principles are also non-ideological. They simply stress the need for unity on principle, or promoting principles, without any indication of which particular principles (if any) should be emphasized.

II

The analysis immediately reveals that the description of local parties as a force constantly pressing extremist views upon national party leaders is false. The total proportion of ideological (i.e., left-wing, right-wing and partisan) resolutions is 54 per cent; those which are non-ideological constitute 46 per cent of the total (Table IA). In other words, constituency parties are nearly as apt to be voicing views derived from general cultural values or from interest group links as they are to voice those clearly associated with a partisan ideology.

When the scores are analyzed according to parties, one finds that the Conservatives are more inclined to press non-partisan resolutions on their leaders than are Labour constituencies. But the differences are not great and Labour parties do not show strong partisanship; 42 per cent of their resolutions are non-partisan, compared with 50 per cent of Conservative ones (Table IB, IC). The variation in the number and orientation of resolutions from year to year appears to reflect the temper of the times. A party's adversity would seem to stimulate extremist views.

An analysis of the number of resolutions submitted by individual constituency parties reveals the existence of wide variations in concern with policy. Approximately one-third of Conservative constituency parties did not present a single resolution in the five-year period studied; only 26 per cent forwarded an average of one resolution or more a year (Table IIA). This disinterest in pressing policy views cannot be attributed to poor party organization, because virtually all English Conservative constituencies are sufficiently well organized to have a full-time party agent. It may well be related to the deferential relationship which exists, socially as well as politically, between party leaders and members. Balfour is reported to have said that he would as soon take orders from his valet as from a Conservative Party

TABLE IA. TOTAL SCORES FOR ALL CONSTITUENCY RESOLUTIONS

Type	No.	%
Extremist (Rt, Con; Left, Lab)	1398	30
Partisan (Con and Lab)	1013	22
Misplaced partisanship (Left, Con; Rt, Lab)	97	2
Non-partisan (Con and Lab)	2090	46
Totals	4598	100

TABLE IB. TOTAL SCORES OF CONSERVATIVE
CONSTITUENCY RESOLUTIONS*

Year	Right	Partisan	Left	Non- Partisan	Total
1955	50	52	17	173	292
1956	137	109	10	137	393
1957	130	60	6	216	412
1958	90	141	12	204	447
1959	(No resolutions published)
1960	98	41	17	259	415
Totals No.	505	403	62	989	1959
Per Cent	26	21	3	50	100

* This table, like IA and VA, includes resolutions filed by Welsh constituency parties and minor federated bodies, as well as those from English parties. Welsh resolutions are omitted from all other calculations because the party system there is not quite the same as in England; minor parties are twice as strong. The federated bodies are omitted because they are not comparable to Labour ones. Omitted groups have similar scores to those fully analysed. Scotland and Northern Ireland are not included in any Conservative tabulations, because these parties are separate and have their own conferences.

annual conference.<sup>15</sup> Perhaps some party members would equally regard it as wrong to depart from the obligations of their station in life.

In the Labour Party, concern with matters of policy is more widely diffused, as one might expect from a party which has always boasted of its ideological basis. The gap between individual constituency parties is not so great, because of the limit of one resolution and one amendment for each party at each conference. (Table IIB) Although the Labour Party has more constituencies which will sometimes file a resolution, there is little difference in terms of

TABLE IC. TOTAL SCORES OF LABOUR
CONSTITUENCY RESOLUTIONS*

Year	Left	Partisan	Right	Non- Partisan	Total
1955	123	98	5	198	424
1956	109	119	5	169	402
1957	127	140	4	172	443
1958	173	89	6	160	428
1959	152	73	3	186	414
1960	209	91	12	216	528
Totals No.	893	610	35	1101	2639
Per Cent	34	23	1	42	100

* This table, like IA and VB, includes resolutions from Welsh and Scottish constituency parties, and from trade unions and other affiliated bodies. There is no significant variation in scores as between those groups fully analyzed and those omitted elsewhere.

<sup>15</sup> Quoted in McKenzie, op. cit., p. 82. See also Earl Balfour, Chapters of Autobiography (London, 1930), p. 158 ff.

heavy activity, insofar as different regulations permit of comparison. Among Conservative constituencies, 74 per cent file resolutions less than once a year on average; in the Labour Party, the proportion is 79 per cent.

Concern with questions of policy is not the same as partisanship. In order to isolate those constituencies which reflected particularly strong partisanship, the groups were divided into four categories, according to the extent to which they varied from the average party score. In the Conservative table, partisan views are those scored right or partisan; in the Labour table, those scored left or partisan. From this we find (Tables IIIA, IIIB) that the proportion of constituency parties which regularly press partisan views is less than one-quarter in each party. There is a skewed distribution among the Conservatives, for 59 per cent of the constituencies show less than average partisanship. Absence of partisanship does not, of course, mean absence of ideological commitments; it is evidence that parties so labeled are little interested in advocating ideological views. There is more interest in proclaiming partisan views in the Labour parties.

TABLE IIA. FREQUENCY DISTRIBUTION OF RESOLUTIONS FILED BY CONSERVATIVE CONSTITUENCY PARTIES

Number of resolutions	No. of parties*	% of all parties	Cumulative percentage†
0	165	32	32
1	90	18	50
2	49	10	60
3	42	8	68
4	29	6	74
5	23	5	79
6	22	4	83
7	14	3	86
8	15	3	89
9	12	2	91
10	7	1	92
11-20	33	6	98
21-30	4	0.8	98.8
31-40	3	0.6	99.4
46	1	0.2	99.6

* Bolton West and Huddersfield West are omitted from this and subsequent calculations because they do not nominate parliamentary candidates, standing aside in favour of the Liberals.

† Percentages do not add up to 100 because of rounding off.

TABLE IIB. FREQUENCY DISTRIBUTION OF RESOLUTIONS FILED BY LABOUR CONSTITUENCY PARTIES

Number of resolutions	No. of parties	% of all parties	Cumulative percentage*
0	28	6	6
1	48	9	15
2	62	12	27
3	72	14	41
4	94	18	59
5	102	20	79
6	96	19	98
7	7	1.4	99.4
8	2	0.4	99.8

* Percentages do not add up to 100 because of rounding off.

TABLE IIIA. PARTISANSHIP IN CONSERVATIVE CONSTITUENCY PARTIES*

Category	No.	Per cent
No partisan resolutions	164	35
Low (1-34%) partisanship	113	24
Average (35-64%) partisanship	120	26
High (65% or more) partisanship	71	15

* Constituencies which submitted only one resolution in the period, and that one partisan, have been omitted, because this was regarded as insufficient evidence for categorization.

TABLE IIIB. PARTISANSHIP IN LABOUR CONSTITUENCY PARTIES*

Category	No.	Per cent
No partisan resolutions	88	18
Low (12.5-40%) partisanship	83	17
Average (41-75%) partisanship†	208	42
High (above 75%) partisanship	113	23

* Constituencies presenting only one resolution, and that partisan, have been omitted from this table.

† This category is not as large as it appears, for only seven parties could have scored between 41-49.9%.

The incidence of ideological partisanship is certainly no cause for concern; few could criticize party activists for pressing party policy upon their leaders, when the leaders ac-

TABLE IVA. EXTREMISM IN CONSERVATIVE PARTIES*

Category	No.	Per-Cent
No extremist resolutions	314	66
Low (1-16.5%) extremism	20	4
Average (16.6-37.4%) extremism	92	19
High extremism (37.5% or more)	52†	11

* Those constituencies submitting one extremist resolution and filing only one or two in the period are omitted.

† Consists of 24 parties submitting up to 5 resolutions each in the period and 28 parties submitting more than 5 resolutions each in the period.

cept the ideas, as well as many voters. Ideological extremism is a far greater force for social cleavage, but it is extremely limited in both parties. (Tables IVA, IVB) Even though the definition of high extremism in the Conservative Party does not require a constituency to express extremist views as much as half the time, only 11 per cent qualify for that appellation—and only 6 per cent are both extremist and quite active in pressing views. Although more Labour constituencies are extremist than Conservative, they form only 18 per cent of the total. The median Labour constituency will only forward one extremist resolution in a six-year period, and the median Conservative one will not even forward a single extremist resolution in a five-year period.

The foregoing tables indicate that party workers on opposite sides of the political fence are not so partisan as electoral contests suggest, and not so extremist as some theorists suggest. A breakdown of resolutions by subject matter and by policy orientation provides a list of areas of common agreement within both parties (Tables VA, VB). A notable feature of Conservative resolutions is concentration upon

TABLE IVB. EXTREMISM IN LABOUR PARTIES*

Category	No.	Per-Cent
No extremist resolutions	191	38
Low extremism (20% or less)	47	9
Average (25-50%) extremism	172	35
High (above 50%) extremism	87	18

* Those constituencies submitting only one resolution, and that extremist, have not been categorized.

domestic issues, notwithstanding the importance of international affairs to the government and to the electorate. Only 3 per cent of resolutions concerned foreign policy and defence questions, compared to 29 per cent in the Labour Party. The latter devotes less attention to politically important domestic questions. The virtual absence in both parties of expressions on highly explosive racial, religious and constitutional questions should not be overlooked.

Analysis by topics suggests that the partisanship and extremism of party activists is not so strong in several fields as the pull of interest group or general cultural standards.<sup>16</sup> In four areas of public concern—education, welfare services, transport and pensions—partisan standards are applied less than half the time by activists in both parties. When facing these questions they may ask for 'more schools' or 'higher pensions'; this is a cry of beneficiaries and benefactors, not of ideologues. This non-party emphasis is the more striking because there are clear ideological differences between the parties on education, welfare and transport. For instance, although the method of organizing secondary education is a point of sharp difference between the parties and affects the whole electorate, 64 per cent of Labour resolutions and 56 per cent of Conservative ones steer clear of all partisan controversy on education. The proportion of ideological resolutions rises in areas of economic policy, where interest group and ideological standards are likely to be the same for most activists; partisan ideology is thus intensified. For instance, all of the 19 Labour resolutions on industrial relations were partisan, and only 12 per cent of the 133 Conservative resolutions on this topic were non-partisan.

Some activists appear more concerned with the mechanics of party organization than with party policy. This shows in Conservative resolutions on party structure and on election law, and in organizational resolutions in the Labour Party, and resolutions asking for party unity—without any sign of preference concerning the program upon which unity should be based.

III

Examination of conference resolutions has shown that constituency parties differ considerably in their political attitudes. The question is then raised: Do they differ in relation to other measurable social or political factors? Unfortunately, the data available for cross-

<sup>16</sup> Cf. S. H. Beer, "Pressure Groups and Parties in Britain," this REVIEW, Vol. 50 (1956), pp. 1-23.

TABLE VA. TOPICS FOR CONSERVATIVE RESOLUTIONS

Topic	Right	Partisan	Left	Non-Partisan	Total
Economic affairs	121	142	28	64	355
Housing	22	35	4	107	168
Industrial relations	73	37	7	16	133
Party organization	5	8	3	112	128
Education	33	18	2	72	125
Pensions	6	2	—	104	112
Taxes	56	17	—	29	102
Compulsory purchase	16	79	—	4	99
Crime	63	13	4	11	91
Transportation	5	1	—	82	88
Election law	—	—	—	85	85
Commonwealth, colonies	31	14	4	7	56
Local government	—	—	—	51	51
Welfare services	21	—	—	29	50
Agriculture	5	—	—	42	47
Foreign policy	6	16	5	5	32
Defence	1	18	2	7	28
Immigration	21	—	—	—	21
Party principles	9	2	—	6	17
Miscellaneous	11	1	3	156	171

tabulation is strictly limited,<sup>17</sup> but sufficient exists to test several important hypotheses.

<sup>17</sup> For instance, census data cannot be related to parliamentary constituencies because of boundary differences.

One hypothesis concerns the relationship between party strength and attitudes of activists. It has been argued<sup>18</sup> that in areas where <sup>18</sup> E.g., Sir Ivor Jennings, The Queen's Government (Harmondsworth, 1960), pp. 60-1.

TABLE VB. TOPICS FOR LABOUR RESOLUTIONS

Topic	Left	Partisan	Right	Non-Partisan	Total
Foreign policy, defence	594	145	14	20	773
Economic affairs	117	141	10	188	456
Housing and land	10	85	—	80	175
Party organization	14	4	1	130	148
Pensions	2	1	—	143	146
Welfare services	7	31	—	94	132
Education	17	19	—	64	100
Commonwealth & colonies	8	82	3	1	94
Local government	7	43	—	44	94
Socialist principles	57	15	2	5	79
Transportation	4	3	—	56	63
Party unity	18	2	1	31	52
Industrial relations	6	13	—	—	19
Miscellaneous	32	26	4	245	306

the strength of both parties is nearly equal, policies will tend to converge. In safe seats, extremist policies may be more readily found. The most important index of party strength is the margin by which a constituency is won or lost at the general election. A safe seat may conveniently be defined as one in which the winner had a majority of more than 10 per cent; a marginal seat as one in which the majority is less than that; and a hopeless seat one as in which a candidate lost by more than 10 per cent.<sup>19</sup> Nearly 85 per cent of English seats were either safe, marginal or hopeless at both the 1955 and 1959 elections. In what follows only these three major groups are discussed, because the numbers in the others are so small as to be of negligible significance. Safe Labour seats may be assumed to be heavily working-class; safe Conservative seats are likely to be disproportionately middleclass, though manual workers may still form a numerical majority in the constituency. It is probable that these differences in turn are reflected in the composition of party activists in different areas, although there is no conclusive evidence on this point.

The analysis shows no relation between partisanship in policy outlook and safety of seat in Conservative constituencies, and only a limited relationship in the Labour Party. (Tables VIA, VIB) In both parties there is a clear but strictly limited relationship between ideological extremism and electoral support. In the Conservative Party, safe seats display on average 9.1 per cent more extremist resolutions than hopeless seats. In the Labour Party, hopeless seats adopt 9.2 per cent more extremist resolutions than safe seats. A further check was made to test this finding because of its importance. Constituency parties were divided ac-

TABLE VIA. PARTISANSHIP, EXTREMISM AND ELECTORAL SUPPORT FOR CONSERVATIVE CONSTITUENCY PARTIES

Category	No. of seats	Total Resolutions	% Partisan	% Extremist
Safe	213	788	48.4	29.3
Marginal	123	512	49.8	25.0
Hopeless	110	193	49.7	20.2

<sup>19</sup> On electoral swing and margins of victory, see D. E. Butler, The British General Election of 1955 (London, 1955), p. 202 ff; D. E. Butler and Richard Rose, The British General Election of 1959 (London, 1960), p. 236.

TABLE VIB. PARTISANSHIP, EXTREMISM AND ELECTORAL SUPPORT FOR LABOUR CONSTITUENCY PARTIES

Category	No. of seats	Total Resolutions	% Partisan	% Extremist
Safe	110	383	50.6	28.2
Marginal	123	462	55.2	32.7
Hopeless	217	829	60.0	37.4

cording to degrees of partisanship and extremism, as in Tables IIIA-B, IVA-B, to see whether each group had a fair cross-section of parties with strong, medium and weak electoral support. This was the case.

In both parties the variation between these two factors was of the order of one resolution in ten. But it takes a Conservative constituency party on average about 14 years to submit ten resolutions, and a Labour party about 12 years. The major conclusion must be that policy views are randomly distributed among constituency parties without regard to their electoral strength, for the statistical differences are of negligible political significance. One may note but hardly stress that parties in the most markedly middle-class areas are slightly more extremist on both sides than in working-class areas.

The author began his investigation with the hypothesis that the smaller a constituency party's membership, the higher the incidence of extremism. This was based upon the assumption that the number of extremist party supporters is very small, and that they could more easily dominate a small party. This hypothesis could only be tested for the Labour Party. There are 140 English parties which affiliate to headquarters on the minimum membership of 800; the extremism score for this group averaged 36 per cent. For the 61 parties with above average memberships ranging from 2,000 to 3,000, the extremism score averaged 34 per cent; for the 35 parties reporting membership above 3,000, the figure was 30 per cent. Similarly, parties with high extremism scores average 22 party members for every 1,000 electors, compared to a figure of 26 for those with average scores, and 25 for those with no extremist resolutions. The differences are hardly of a size to lend much support to the hypothesis.

Constituency parties may also seek to influence policy by pressing MPs or prospective candidates to act as spokesmen for the local party caucus. Candidates are selected by small groups representing less than 1 per cent of the electorate, and these nominations cannot be effectively challenged. In a normal election, nomination is tantamount to election in at least three-quarters of the constituencies; nomination is virtually tantamount to election for life in upwards of half the constituencies. Most students of British politics have commented upon the failure of constituency parties to exercise their considerable potential powers over candidates in such a way as to produce MPs with views like their own.<sup>20</sup> This generalization needs testing by reference to extremism scores because these writers have usually assumed that constituency selection committees are dominated by extremists. The wide range of opinion within both parliamentary parties might reflect an absence of policy concern in the selection process—or it might reflect a tendency for constituency parties to adopt candidates with views compatible with their own.

The emergence of unilateral nuclear disarmament as a major factional issue within the Labour Party provides one test for the coincidence between extremism in candidates and in parties. We find that there is some relationship between extremism in a constituency party and a candidate who is extreme on this issue. Parties showing high extremism constitute 18 per cent of all local parties, but 29 per cent of those nominating unilateralist candidates. Unilateralist candidates are least likely to be found where extremism is low or non-existent (Table VII). Like many statistical findings, this one is only important if it is an indication of a trend. Further checks showed no tendency for unilateralist candidates to be nominated particularly for hopeless seats, nor were they especially favoured in the adoption of new candidates. Counterbalancing this absence of association was the tendency of constituencies with trade union sponsored candidates to score below average on extremism. Of 102 constituencies categorized, only 5 per cent were extremist, and 55 per cent had submitted no extremist resolutions in the period.

A similarly meaningful issue was not available for testing Conservative MPs. A rundown of the 16 Conservative MPs who took extremist positions on the Suez affair showed that two-thirds of their constituency parties scored below average on extremism. A check was made on Conservative parties which had Privy Councillors as MPs; it was assumed that the

TABLE VII. EXTREMISM AND THE NOMINATION OF UNILATERALIST CANDIDATES BY CONSTITUENCY LABOUR PARTIES

Category*	No. Candidates	No. Unilateralist	Per Cent Unilateralist
No extremism	191	14	7
Low extremism	47	5	11
Average extremism	172	31	18
High extremism	87	20	23
Totals	497	70	14

* Constituency parties submitting only one resolution, and that one extremist, have not been categorized.

responsibility of these MPs, and their closer identification with generally moderate government policies, would damp down party extremism. In fact, the distribution of extremism scores among the 46 parties categorized was virtually identical with the distribution for all Conservative constituency parties. The most significant relationship found had on the face of it no connection with policy. It was that safe Conservative seats choose 84 per cent of their candidates from those with expensive public school educations, and only 31 per cent of the time take men with local connections. In hopeless seats, only 44 per cent have been at public schools, and 60 per cent of candidates have local connections. Marginal seats fall between these two groups. (No such pattern exists in the Labour Party.) One might speculate that the return of members of a national social-political elite by safe constituencies tends to increase the independence of MPs from constituency parties, for such persons are more likely to be independently minded, or influenced by a national peer group, than to submit to pressure from lower status activists.

IV

The fundamental conclusion which arises from this study is that attitudes on questions of policy are randomly distributed among constituency parties and, it may be tentatively assumed, among party activists as well. One cause of the diversity would appear to be the plurality of motives leading individuals to become active in party politics, together with the plurality of functions which local parties may perform.<sup>21</sup> The following list of motives is not exhaustive, nor is any particular one meant to exclude the operation of others within the same individual.

<sup>20</sup> See especially John Biffen, "The Constituency Leaders," Crossbow, Vol. 4, No. 13 (1960), p. 30.

<sup>21</sup> A. Leiserson, op. cit., is notable for the allowance he makes for diversity. See also Robert E.

Motives for volunteer political work

- A. Overtly political
  - Desire to advance party program
  - Desire to modify party program to bring it more into line with one's own ideological beliefs
  - Desire to modify party program to bring it more into line with the program of one's interest group
  - Local government concerns
  - Sense of civic duty
  - Ex officio* involvement—e.g., as trade union official.
- B. Non-political
  - Occupational careerism
  - Status seeking
  - Gratification of desire for power
  - Pleasure from group activities
  - Pleasure from a 'sporting' contest
  - Friendship with active party workers.

The functions which constituency parties fulfill are also numerous. Some have a bearing on national party policy, but others do not:

Functions of English constituency parties

- Propagate national party policy
- Advise upon national party policy
- Organize and conduct election contests
- Nominate parliamentary candidates
- Manage local government affairs
- Act as pressure group for local interests
- Provide social facilities for the community
- Finance and maintain local party office.

An immediate consequence of this diversity is the flexibility which it gives to party leaders. At annual party conferences leaders are not faced with a mass of extreme-minded activists, demanding the adoption of socially divisive policies as the price of continuing to do menial work.<sup>22</sup> Opposition comes from only a fraction of the rank-and-file. Another portion is likely to support the leadership and a significant group may have no clear views, or even interest, Lane, Political Life (Glencoe, 1959), for much evidence on motives for political participation.

<sup>22</sup> Some British politicians still regard local party organizations with the respect they received in the days of open voting and bribery. The Nuffield studies find no evidence to support this. See most recently D. E. Butler and R. Rose, The British General Election of 1959 (London, 1960), pp. 143, 232 ff.

in questions of party policy. In such circumstances support of the rank-and-file assembly may be gained simply by giving a clear policy lead. Lacking firm anchorage in an ideological position, constituency parties may be willing to trust their leaders wherever they lead. The pressure from above, the effect as it were of the gardener's lawnmower upon the grass roots activists, is considerable. The classic illustration occurred when the Conservative government was able to keep the party virtually united behind it when it unexpectedly attacked Egypt, and again when it abruptly accepted a cease-fire there in 1956. This flexibility is less in the Labour Party; a small contributing factor is the greater attachment which activists have to ideological standards.

Robert T. McKenzie has suggested that representative democracy presupposes a near identity in views between persons at different levels in parties, and half-suggested that democratic parties should have views tending towards identity.<sup>23</sup> Hence, his polemics against the participation of alleged extreme-minded activists in party policy-making. But on the basis of their resolutions, constituency parties do not seem to be pulling the parties apart. While recognizing the simplifications involved, one might consider party differences as being ranked on a scale from 0 to 100, with 0 being extreme right-wing and 100 being left-wing extremism. Simple consensus based upon an identity of views within and between parties would occur if all opinion rested at 50; more realistically, consensus would result if the center of gravity of opinion<sup>24</sup> within both parties was at 50. But a situation of balanced disagreement would operate if one of the parties centered at 60 and the other at 40, assuming a normal distribution frequency. An imbalance would result only if one party tended towards the center while the other balanced near an extreme. Balance, of course, is not a good in itself. Theoretically, a balance would occur if one party rested at 90 and another at 10. Furthermore, balance could produce stagnation when a radical shift in one direction was required by objective social circumstances. If we distribute resolutions along such an axis, we see that much of the weight of constituency views is closer to the center than to the extremes. The leftward bias is largely the result of the greater frequency of Labour resolutions. When a correction is made for differences in expressing views as between the parties, the point of balance turns out to be three per cent to the left of center.

<sup>23</sup> See especially "Parties, Pressure Groups and the British Political Process," Political Quarterly, Vol. 29, No. 1 (1958), p. 12 f; and "The 'Political Activists' and Some Problems of 'Inner Party' Democracy in Britain" (mimeo, International Political Science Association, Paris, 1961), p. 5 ff.

<sup>24</sup> Cf. D. E. Butler "The Paradox of Party Difference" American Behavioral Scientist, IV: 3 (1960), pp. 3-5, where the concept of centers of party gravity is developed.

There has been no systematic investigation of political attitudes in an effort to find out what differences, if any, exist between voters, activists, MPs, and leaders in parties. There is evidence to indicate that the spread of opinion is wide at all levels of both parties. For instance, a 1959 national survey found that 45 per cent of Conservative sympathizers accepted the status quo in the nationalized industries, and 40 per cent wished to denationalize one or more industries. In addition, 42 per cent of Labour sympathizers were opposed to further nationalization, whereas 36 per cent supported it.<sup>25</sup> In 1960, when 34 per cent of constituency party resolutions were extremist, 33 per cent of Labour MPs voted against Hugh Gaitskell in a contested election for the parliamentary party <sup>25</sup> See D. E. Butler and R. Rose, op. cit., p. 244, and also p. 71. The opinion surveys regularly reported in the monthly Gallup Political Index (London) by the British Institute of Public Opinion, and by Mark Abrams, in M. Abrams and R. Rose, Must Labour Lose? (Harmondsworth, 1960) also bear out the point that party sympathizers are divided into partisans, extremists, deviants and indifferents on almost all issues. Cf. also S. E. Finer, H. Berrington and D. Bartholomew, Backbench Opinion in the House of Commons 1955-59 (London, 1961).

TABLE VIII. DISTRIBUTION OF THE POLICY VIEWS OF ACTIVISTS*

Scale:	0	25	50	75	100
	Rt. Con.	Parti-san Con.	Non-parti-san	Parti-san Lab.	Left Lab.
No. of resolutions	505	438	2090	672	893
Per Cent of resolutions	11	10	45	15	19

* Resolutions showing misplaced partisanship are assigned to the partisanship category for the other party.

leadership. During the past decade the resignations of such leading Cabinet ministers as Aneurin Bevan, Lord Salisbury and Peter Thorneycroft have provided public evidence of the frequent suspicions of sharp divisions within a theoretically united Cabinet. Thus, it appears that the dilemma which David Butler has posed for party leaders—"their most loyal and devoted followers tend to have more extreme views than they have themselves, and to be still farther removed from the mass of those who actually provide the vote"<sup>26</sup>—does not really exist. Differences in policy exist within parties, and conflict is sometimes great, but this is not conflict between a monolithic bloc of activists and a monolithic leadership. Rather, it would seem that factional disputes divide parties vertically, joining some Privy Counsellors, MPs, lobbyists, activists and voters into a faction which is in conflict with another which also contains members drawn from all ranks of the party.

<sup>26</sup> D. E. Butler, op. cit., p. 5

THE ITALIAN SOCIALIST PARTY: A CASE STUDY IN FACTIONAL CONFLICT*

RAPHAEL ZARISKI
University of Nebraska

The Italian Socialist Party (PSI) is one of the three major groupings—the Social Democrats, the Socialists and the Communists—that have cultivated the ground to the left of center (i.e., to the left of the ruling Christian Democrats) in Italian politics since World War II. As recently as 1951, the PSI appeared to be inextricably linked with the Communists; but the Socialists have gradually worked themselves around to the position, early in 1962, of openly supporting a Left-Center coalition government still headed by the Christian Democrats. This drastic alteration in the Italian political spectrum has created new possibilities for Italy's political development. It has already permitted the long-awaited "opening to the Left"—as a basic alternative to governments dependent on the Center-Right—under which Italy will be ruled by a coalition of Christian Democrats, Republicans, and Social Democrats, with the PSI offering its support in Parliament in exchange for a bold program of economic planning and social reform. But some Socialists see a further possibility: the so-called "Socialist alternative." They hope for the possible development of the PSI into a second major party in a two-party system which would absorb the great bulk of the Italian electorate, with the exception of minor extremist fringes to the right and left.<sup>1</sup> To be sure, the success of the "opening to the Left" and the eventual emergence of a "Socialist alternative" both depend on the continued supremacy of the more progressive factions within the ranks of the Christian Democratic Party.

The decade-long process of change in the Socialist position results from influences both external and internal to the party. Such factors as Italy's close alignment with the West, and its entry into NATO and the Common Market; the rapid economic growth and relative prosperity of the country; the evident danger that Socialist intransigence might provoke the Christian Democratic Party (which lacks an absolute majority in Parliament) into forming an alliance with Rightist parties; the changes in Soviet policy since the death of Stalin; and growing disillusionment engendered among Italian Socialists by the Hungarian intervention and by the subservience of the Italian Communist Party to the dictates of its Soviet senior partner—these and other considerations have had their impact on Socialist ideology and strategy. And within the PSI, a three-way factional split has gradually developed. Pietro Nenni, leader of the PSI throughout most of the postwar period, heads the dominant faction which has steered the party's course away from the original alliance with the Communists to the current entente with the Christian Democrats and Social Democrats. But his freedom of action has been narrowed by the persisting influence of two left-wing factions that have steadily held out for maintaining the Communist link.

The strength of these intra-party Socialist factions varies considerably in the several geographic regions of Italy and is noticeably affected by the historical traditions, demographic and economic characteristics, and political coloration of each region. The party's strategy, in consequence, reflects these variations: for instance, the Communist tie may be affirmed in some areas, rejected in others.

Since Socialist parties the world over have been undergoing an agonizing reappraisal of their beliefs and roles in the postwar scheme of things, and since American political scientists have become increasingly concerned with the dynamics of intra-party politics, more than a parochial interest attaches to a study of the intricacies of the Socialist evolution in recent Italian politics. That evolution is traced in the pages that follow. It is a case study with two major themes: the movement away from the Communist alliance and the interplay of factional conflict within the Italian Socialist Party. But we are also concerned with using our data on PSI factions as a point of departure for investigating some more general questions regarding the dynamics of intra-party factional conflict, and for formulating hypotheses which may be tested in other contexts.

* This study was made possible by a Summer Research Fellowship from the University of Nebraska in 1960 and by a Fulbright lectureship in Florence, Italy, during the academic year 1960-61.

<sup>1</sup> For a brief discussion of the two doctrines of "opening to the Left" and "Socialist alternative," see Tristano Codignola, "Il PSI davanti al Paese," Il Ponte, Vol. 13 (January, 1957), p. 27; Angelo Macchi, "Il XXXIII Congresso del PSI," Aggiornamenti Sociali, Vol. 10 (March, 1959), pp. 162-170; and "Editoriale," Nord e Sud, Vol. 6 (February, 1959), pp. 3-9.

I. THE PSI ON THE ROAD TO AUTONOMY

The PSI—the larger of the two Socialist parties in Italy today—emerged from the secession of Palazzo Barberini in 1947, when Giuseppe Saragat and his Social Democratic followers deserted the Italian Socialist Party of Proletarian Unity (PSIUP) in protest against the pro-Communist tendencies of some of its leaders and against the allegedly authoritarian methods being employed by the dominant Nenni group.<sup>2</sup> Saragat founded the Italian Socialist Workers' Party (PSLI), the forerunner of the present Italian Democratic Socialist Party (PSDI). The rump of the PSIUP, remaining under the control of the Nenni leadership, adopted the briefer—and more accurate—title of Italian Socialist Party (PSI), which it retains to this day.<sup>3</sup>

After the Saragat secession, the PSI came under the domination of its Left-wing faction. The party secretary from 1947 to mid-1948 was Lelio Basso—a brilliant political theorist and exponent of a rather esoteric type of Marxism with Trotskyite and Titoist overtones. In Basso's opinion, a well organized and vigorous PSI would have nothing to fear from an alliance with the Communists but would, on the contrary, be able to seize the leadership in such an alliance. He therefore continued to maintain close unity of action with the Communist Party, and created an "apparatus"—a salaried party bureaucracy—with a view to augmenting the bargaining power of the PSI in this risky partnership. Under pressure from extreme pro-Communists ("fusionists") in the PSI and under the influence of his own ideological preconceptions, Basso was induced to advocate the formation of a People's Democratic Front for the general elections of 1948. The Front was essentially an electoral bloc in which Communists, Socialists, and assorted splinter movements formed combined lists of candidates in each of Italy's 30 electoral circumscriptions. The result of this venture was catastrophic. Not only did the FDP go down to defeat in 1948, but also the hapless Socialist candidates on the FDP lists suffered especially heavy casualties as a result of the tendency of the more numerous and more disciplined Communist voters to concentrate their preference votes on a few names designated by their party leaders. Thus, the PSI, whose voters tended to scatter their preference votes among numerous candidates, failed to receive its proportionate share of FDP seats in Parliament. The FDP had, in effect, served as a device for cutting down the number of Socialist deputies within the Leftist bloc.

On the heels of the electoral defeat of 1948, it became evident that the Social Democratic secession of 1947 had by no means drawn all moderate elements out of the PSI. The failure of the People's Front policy resulted in a rank-and-file revolt against Basso's leadership. This insurrection was led by two leaders of a self-styled Centrist faction—Alberto Jacometti and Riccardo Lombardi—and by Giuseppe Romita, who headed a small group of Autonomists. Romita and his followers were interested primarily in achieving a rapprochement with Saragat and a reunification of the two Socialist parties, whereas the Centrists of Riscossa Socialista (Socialist Rally) were skeptical as to the prospects for reunification but insisted on a policy of greater autonomy for the PSI vis-à-vis its powerful Communist ally. These two factions, pooling their respective strength and taking advantage of grass-roots disillusionment, won control of the PSI at the Genoa Congress in June, 1948. Basso resigned as party secretary and was succeeded by Jacometti, whose faction dominated both the Party Directorate (a sort of party cabinet with from 15 to 21 members) and the larger Central Committee.

But the triumph of the moderates was short-lived. While Saragat's collaboration in a predominantly Christian Democratic Cabinet seemed to discredit the Social Democrats and to weaken the case for Socialist reunification, the impact of the North Atlantic Treaty negotiations on traditionally neutralist Socialist <sup>2</sup> On the Saragat secession and the internal conflicts in the PSI between 1947 and 1951, see Raphael Zariski, "Problems and Prospects of Democratic Socialism in France and Italy," Journal of Politics, Vol. 18 (May, 1956), pp. 256-257 and 269-270; Raphael Zariski, "Socialism in Postwar Italy," unpublished Ph.D. thesis, Harvard University, 1952; Francesco D'Arcais, "Lineamenti Storici del socialismo italiano," Civitas, Vol. 8 (August-September, 1957), pp. 52-104, but especially pp. 80-91; Giuseppe Pera, "L'alternativa socialista del PSI," Il Ponte, Vol. 9, (May, 1953), pp. 579-598; Angelo Macchi, "Il XXXIV Congresso del PSI," Aggiornamenti Sociali, Vol. 12 (May, 1961), pp. 295-297; Giorgio Galli, La Sinistra Italiana nel dopoguerra (Bologna, Il Mulino, 1958), chs. 1 and 5; and Paolo Emiliani, Dieci anni perduti (Pisa, Nistri-Lischi, 1953).

<sup>3</sup> The PSI is about three times as strong as the PSDI in terms of electoral strength. In the general elections of 1958, it polled 4,206,777 votes, as against 1,345,334 received by the PSDI. Voting figures are drawn from the general elections to the Chamber of Deputies; see Istituto Centrale di Statistica, Elezioni della Camera dei Deputati, 25 Maggio 1958, Vol. 1 (Roma, Istituto Poligrafico dello Stato, 1960), pp. 50-51.

opinion seemed to lend an aura of justification to the Unity of Action Pact with the Communists and thus strengthened the Leftist faction in the PSI. This faction was now led by a triumvirate composed of Pietro Nenni (leader of the PSIUP from 1945 to 1947 and the idol of the Socialist masses), Lelio Basso, and Rodolfo Morandi. Morandi, an able organizer and intransigent Leftist, used the superior financial resources of the Leftist faction to obtain control of the party "apparatus," which the vacillating Centrists had failed to purge. With the aid of a network of provincial secretaries who took their orders from Morandi rather than from the Directorate, the Leftist faction won a striking victory at the Florence Congress of 1949.<sup>4</sup> Failure to agree on a truly autonomous policy, and fear of offending the Communists, had prevented the Centrists from offering effective resistance to the Leftist counter-attack. After the Florence Congress, Nenni was elected party secretary and a majority of seats in the Directorate and Central Committee were assigned to his faction. The Centrists bowed to the majority decision, but Romita led his group out of the PSI in a new secession.

After the Leftist victory in 1949, the Unity of Action Pact with the Communists, never repudiated even by the Centrists, was stoutly reaffirmed. Morandi was now in charge of the party organization, and was regarded as second only to Nenni in the party hierarchy. In this capacity, he went so far as to declare the PSI's adherence to Leninist doctrine.<sup>5</sup> And in order to enforce the new Leftist line, he streamlined and expanded the "apparatus." The party machine, as we shall see, was never the all-powerful instrument that so many observers viewed with alarm in the 1950's. But it did enable the central party leadership to mobilize rapidly against isolated local rebellions. In a party characterized by widespread apathy among the bulk of its dues-paying members, a few hundred trained officials on regular salary could wield considerable influence.

So effective were Nenni and Morandi (Basso, for personal and doctrinal reasons, had been dropped from the Directorate and Central Committee at Morandi's behest) in suppressing autonomist tendencies that the Congress of Bologna in 1951 was marked by the absence of any organized opposition to the Leftist Directorate. The atmosphere, in fact, was one of near-unanimity. Firmly aligned with the Communist Party on both internal and foreign policy, the PSI seemed to have become little more than a Communist-front organization.

Yet the PSI has recovered from the nadir of the Bologna Congress and has moved toward ever greater autonomy since 1953. This gradual but steady progression toward the democratic camp was encouraged by several factors: the respectable showing made by the PSI in the 1953 elections; the more independent line adopted by Saragat toward the Christian Democratic regime thereafter; the easing of East-West tension after Stalin's death; and above all, the drop in Communist prestige resulting from both the exposure of Stalin's crimes at the 20th Congress of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union and the Soviet intervention in Hungary. Paradoxically enough, Morandi's "apparatus" played an unwitting role: by increasing the PSI's organizational strength and efficiency, it rendered an autonomous posture toward the Communists pragmatically feasible.<sup>6</sup> The heavy losses of the CGIL (the Communist-dominated labor confederation, which enjoyed PSI support) in various trade-union elections, and the corresponding gains by the democratic trade unions, also played an influential part, especially after 1955.<sup>7</sup> Italy's remarkable economic progress and increasingly close integration into a prosperous Western European economic community was causing many Socialists to question their long-established patterns of action, and to cast about for a more imaginative set of policies, geared to the realities of the mid-50's. And finally, there was still a strong minority of autonomists in the PSI—men who had supported the ill-starred Jacometti Directorate of 1948-49. These former Centrists had accepted

<sup>4</sup> For comments on the role of the "apparatus" in strengthening the PSI, see Pera, ibid., p. 591, and Umberto Segre, "La stagione dei congressi," Il Ponte, Vol. 14 (November, 1958), pp. 1373-1374.

<sup>7</sup> On losses by the CGIL in various grievance committee elections, see Murray Edelman, "Causes of Fluctuations in Popular Support for the Italian Communist Party since 1946," Journal of Politics, Vol. 20 (August, 1958), pp. 542-544; Antonio Toldo, "Situazione Sindacale Italiana," Aggiornamenti Sociali, Vol. 8 (February, 1957), pp. 113-122; Maurice F. Neufeld, "Appunti sul funzionamento delle commissioni interne," Il Diritto del Lavoro (Roma, Edizioni del Diritto del Lavoro, 1956), no. 6, pp. 1-8; and Joseph LaPalombara, The Italian Labor Movement: Problems and Prospects (Ithaca, N. Y., Cornell University Press, 1957), pp. 110-118.

<sup>4</sup> The pre-Congress campaign of 1949 is ably described by Pera, loc. cit., and by Emiliani, op. cit., pp. 115-123.

<sup>5</sup> See Pera, ibid., p. 590.

the unfavorable verdict of the Florence Congress of 1949 but were finding it increasingly difficult to repress their feelings of dissatisfaction with the outspokenly pro-Communist policies proclaimed by the leaders of the Leftist faction. By 1953, this autonomist minority had found an unexpected ally and leader in Pietro Nenni, who began to modify his political strategy in the direction of greater autonomy and a more democratic orientation for the PSI.

At the pre-election Socialist Congress of Milan in January, 1953, Nenni launched the slogan of "a Socialist alternative."<sup>8</sup> This minor ideological shift—at the time it seemed to be little more than a temporary electoral expedient—was accompanied by the PSI's presentation of separate slates of candidates in the general elections of 1953 and marked the first stage in Nenni's cautious campaign for a reappraisal of the PSI's objectives, methods, and alliances.

After the 1953 elections, Nenni began to take further steps along an autonomist course.<sup>9</sup> At the PSI Congress of Turin in April, 1955, he demanded—even while reconfirming the Unity of Action Pact with the Communists—a "dialogue" with the Christian Democratic Left with a view to forming an alliance between the Socialist and Catholic masses. This thesis encountered a cool reception from the delegates; and consequently Nenni did not press for a vote on his new doctrine but consented to the usual unanimous resolution acceptable to the Leftist faction. It is significant to note, however, that Nenni's prestige as party leader, and his popularity with both the rank-and-file members and the Socialist electorate, protected him from any open repudiation of his leadership by the Congress.

After the shattering revelations which leaked out of the 20th Congress of the CPSU in February, 1956, the sequence of events began to accelerate.<sup>10</sup> Nenni reacted to the destruction of the Stalin myth by rejecting the Stalinist concepts of the vanguard party (the CPSU) and the vanguard nation (the Soviet Union), and by insisting on the "democratic road" to Socialism. The dictatorship of the proletariat, he asserted, was not a suitable concept for a Western European context, and the democratic way of life had to be regarded as an irreplaceable fundamental value, not a mere way-station on the road to Socialism. In a similarly heretical vein, the PSI daily Avanti! urged Communist defectors to join the PSI. After the municipal and provincial elections of 1956, which resulted in noticeable Socialist gains at the expense of the Communists, there were increasingly frequent references, by Nenni and others, to the possibility of a rapprochement and possible reunification with the Social Democrats. Contacts between these two parties at the local level began to develop and multiply. And finally, in a dramatic and seemingly portentous breakthrough, Nenni and Saragat held their famous summit meeting in August, 1956, at Pralognan in the French Alps. During this conference the two leaders agreed to press for the reunification of their two parties on a platform of democratic Socialism.

Pralognan was regarded by most observers as constituting a turning point in the troubled history of postwar Italian Socialism, and as paving the way for that "great, united, democratic Socialist movement" which has a virtually chiliastic appeal for Italian progressives. But the obstacles to PSI autonomy and Socialist reunification soon became manifest. Togliatti, the Communist leader, issued sharp warnings against undermining working-class unity, and actually threatened to provoke a split in the PSI if Nenni should prove too willing to capitulate to Social Democratic demands.<sup>11</sup> The PSI rank-and-file had been insufficiently prepared for the new approach Nenni was initiating. And the Social Democrats were demanding a complete break between the PSI and the Communist Party, and acceptance by the PSI of the North Atlantic Treaty, as prerequisites to Socialist reunification. Nenni, for his part, was willing to jettison the Unity of Action Pact with the Communists and to accept the North Atlantic Treaty in a strictly defensive sense. But he was still deeply influenced by traditional Socialist values of pacifism and working-class unity, and was also acutely aware of the dangers of a party split which might be precipitated by excessive concessions to the Social Democrats. Therefore, he advocated that Italy play a mediating role between East and West, suggested that close contacts be established with the uncommitted countries, and insisted that collaboration with the Communists in the CGIL and in hundreds of local governments could not be abandoned too precipitously.

In view of the traditional attitudes of many

<sup>8</sup> On the Milan Congress, see D'Arcais, loc. cit., pp. 91-92.

<sup>9</sup> On the movement of the PSI in an autonomist direction from 1953 to 1956, see D'Arcais, ibid., pp. 91-103, and U. Alfassio Grimaldi, "Nuovo capitolo," Il Mondo, February 12, 1957, pp. 1-2.

<sup>10</sup> On developments between the 20th Congress of the CPSU and the PSI Venice Congress, see D'Arcais, ibid., pp. 95-103, and Grimaldi, ibid., pp. 1-2.

<sup>11</sup> La Nuova Stampa, January 22, 1957.

PSI members—attitudes shaped by the Maximalist tradition of the early 20th Century, with its largely verbal revolutionary fervor, its intransigence toward bourgeois parties, its intense pacifism, its proletarian bias, and its rejection of gradualism<sup>12</sup>—Nenni's negotiations with Saragat and his increasing coolness toward the Communists were bound to provoke rebellion. Several opposition groups began to form behind the illusory façade of party unity which had been maintained with considerable success since 1951.<sup>13</sup> One faction was led by Lelio Basso, who had returned to a position of prominence after the death of his rival Morandi, and who hoped to replace Nenni as party secretary. Another group was made up of avowed pro-Communists who went so far as to defend the Soviet intervention in Hungary: these were the so-called carristi or "armored troops." In a curious juxtaposition, this faction included not only orthodox Stalinists but also some former autonomists and Resistance heroes—notably Sandro Pertini and Emilio Lussu—men who, for sentimental reasons, could not bear the thought of ending the longstanding friendship with the Communist Party. And finally, there was the party bureaucracy, the Morandian "apparatus," led by such young disciples of the late Rodolfo Morandi as Dario Valori and Vincenzo Gatto.

By combining their efforts, these three factions, which controlled a majority of the seats on the Directorate and the Central Committee, were able to place effective checks on Nenni's power to implement the policy goals he had formulated. And at the Venice Congress in February, 1957, Nenni's efforts to reverse this situation proved to be unavailing. To be sure, the Secretary's report was accepted unanimously and all but the carristi joined in criticizing the earlier policy of close cooperation with the Communists. Totalitarian methods were denounced by virtually all speakers. But in the secret balloting for the 81-member Central Committee, Nenni and his Autonomists obtained only 27 seats, while 10 seats went to the carristi, 14 to Basso, and 30 to the Morandian bureaucrats. The Central Committee in turn elected a 21-member Directorate, composed of 10 Nenni supporters and 11 members of the three Leftist factions, and a 5-member Secretariat in which Nenni had a 3-2 majority. Thus, Nenni (who was reconfirmed as party secretary) retained control over day-to-day policy-making in the Secretariat, but could be curbed on broader policy questions by Leftist majorities in the Directorate and the Central Committee.<sup>14</sup>

Nenni's defeat was unexpected but probably inevitable in view of the tactics he had employed. He had been so uncertain regarding his actual strength within the party that he had not dared to force a showdown at the provincial congresses where delegates to the Venice Congress were chosen.<sup>15</sup> In order to secure as high a degree of party harmony as possible, Nenni's supporters at many of these Congresses agreed to the passage of ambiguously worded, strongly qualified resolutions in favor of Socialist reunification—resolutions to which the Basso faction and the Morandians were willing to subscribe. At many provincial congresses, there were two competing slates of delegates to be voted on: one presented by a makeshift Nenni-Basso-Morandian coalition and the other by the outnumbered and isolated carristi. In exchange for their willingness to refrain from open opposition, the Basso and Morandian factions were rewarded with a quota of delegates on the winning slate. Thus, many a provincial federation whose membership was mostly of moderate sympathies found itself sending Leftist delegates to the National Congress. Fear of a clamorous defeat, or of a bruising and highly publicized intra-party conflict, prevented Nenni from conducting an all-out offensive against the opposition and helped bring about a serious setback for the cause of democratic Socialism. Socialist reunification was postponed indefinitely.

<sup>12</sup> On the attitude of the revolutionaries (later known as Maximalists) in the PSI in the early 20th Century see Roberto Michels, Storia critica del movimento socialista italiano (Firenze, La Voce, 1926), Part V, ch. 2, and Wayland Hilton-Young, The Italian Left (New York, Longmans, Green, 1949), passim. For accounts of factional struggle at pre-1922 Socialist congresses, see Franco Pedone, Partito Socialista Italiano nei suoi Congressi, Vol. II (Milano, Edizioni Avanti, 1961); and Spartaco Cannarsa, Il Socialismo e i XXVIII Congressi del Partito Socialista Italiano (Milano, Edizioni Avanti, 1950), pp. 104-244.

<sup>13</sup> On the various contending factions in the PSI at the Venice Congress, see Corriere d'Informazione, February 5-6, 1957.

<sup>14</sup> On the Venice Congress and its outcome, see Umberto Segre, "Luci e ombre di un Congresso," Il Ponte, Vol. 13 (February 1957), pp. 185-192. See also La Nuova Stampa, February 7-10, 12 and 13, 1957, and La Giustizia, February 12, 13, 1957.

<sup>15</sup> On the intra-party contest at the provincial level just prior to the Venice Congress, see La Nuova Stampa, January 29, 1957, and F. Paolo Glorioso, "Nenni 60%," L'Espresso, January 11, 1959, p. 8.

After the Venice Congress, the most effective remaining weapon at Nenni's command was his immense popularity with the ordinary members and voters of the PSI. By threatening to resign as party secretary, Nenni was able to obtain some significant concessions—a majority on the Secretariat, appointment of a Nenni supporter to supervise the party organization—and to achieve a delicately balanced stalemate in place of the unconditional surrender the balloting at Venice had seemed to foreshadow.<sup>16</sup>

Thanks to his prestige as party leader, Nenni was able to press for more PSI autonomy even after the Venice debacle. The three Leftist factions failed to coordinate their efforts adequately, and in fact Basso sometimes threw his support to Nenni on certain policy issues.<sup>17</sup> Consequently, the PSI was able to abrogate the Unity of Action Pact and withdraw from several Communist-led mass organizations.<sup>18</sup> Only in the CGIL and in local government did cooperation with the Communists continue: Nenni himself opposed any basic departures from earlier commitments in these two sectors.

Another token of autonomy was the PSI's decision to welcome secessionists from the Communist Party into its ranks. This policy came up for a vote in the PSI Parliamentary Group in 1957 when Antonio Giolitti, an ex-Communist Deputy from Cuneo, applied for admission. On this matter, Nenni obtained the support of Basso and the Morandians, with only the carristi remaining in opposition.<sup>19</sup> The admission of the popular Deputy from Cuneo was followed by the entry of other ex-Communists into the PSI, where they usually joined the ranks of Nenni's Autonomists.

Moreover, Nenni also used the threat of resignation to induce his party to vote in favor of the European Atomic Agreements and to abstain from voting on the European Common Market when these two issues arose in Parliament.<sup>20</sup> On these two points, the intransigent carristi stood alone in defying Nenni. And, it should be added, on both these issues the Communists voted nay. The PSI, then, was diverging abruptly from the Communist line. The prospect of finding broader European outlets for Italian products and surplus manpower was far too tempting to be ignored for the sake of timeworn Maximalist shibboleths.

Shortly before the 1958 elections, the Popular Unity Party, a splinter group led by Florentine and Milanese intellectuals, merged with the PSI. These new recruits were mostly former members of the defunct Action Party, favored a synthesis of liberalism and socialism, and tended to support the Autonomist faction in the PSI.<sup>21</sup>

In the 1958 elections, the PSI temporarily submerged its internal differences and presented a reasonably united front to the electorate. In a few electoral circumscriptions, to be sure, provincial party federations removed the names of some prominent members of minority factions from the lists of candidates. A handful of incumbent Deputies—both Autonomists and members of the Left faction—were denied renomination by their provincial organizations.<sup>22</sup> But in most instances, the PSI lists included the names of both Leftists and Autonomists. One case in point was the Autonomist stronghold of Milan-Pavia where several incumbents hostile to Nenni's policies were renominated, and two (Basso and Malagugini) were re-elected.<sup>23</sup>

<sup>20</sup> Stampa-Sera, July 20–21, 1957.

<sup>21</sup> Two of the former top leaders of the Popular Unity Party, Codignola and Vittorelli, were among the members of the Nenni faction elected to the Central Committee at the Naples Congress of January, 1959. See Corriere d'Informazione, January 20, 1959.

<sup>22</sup> This was the case with the Autonomist Deputies Sampietro of Vercelli and Lopardi of L'Aquila, dropped from the PSI slates in Torino-Novara-Vercelli and L'Aquila-Pescara-Chieti-Teramo respectively. Similarly, the Forlì Federation refused to approve the renomination of a prominent Leftist Deputy (Lami) in Bologna-Ferrara-Ravenna-Forlì, and the Venice Federation attempted unsuccessfully to remove the name of Tonetti (another Leftist) from the PSI list in Venice-Treviso. See La Nuova Stampa, March 27, April 3, May 18, 1958; Il Messaggero, May 10, 1958; Il Corriere della Sera, May 16, 1958; and Il Resto del Carlino, May 10, 18, 1958.

<sup>23</sup> Albizzati and Malagugini are identified as Leftists by Roberto Serpieri, "Nella misura in cui. . .", Critica Sociale, Vol. 50 (October 5, 1958), <sup>16</sup> See La Nuova Stampa, February 13–15, 1957.

<sup>17</sup> For example, Basso supported Nenni in his refusal to admit the two leaders of the carristi, Lussu and Pertini, to the Directorate. La Nuova Stampa, November 12, 1957.

<sup>18</sup> For example, the PSI withdrew from the organization of Peace Partisans. See La Nuova Stampa, May 24, 1957. And a prominent Nenni lieutenant, Francesco De Martino, withdrew from his hitherto active role in the Communist-sponsored Movement for the Rebirth of the South. See Giovanni Cervigni e Giuseppe Galasso, "Il Mezzogiorno e il Partito Socialista," Nord e Sud, Vol. 4 (May, 1957), pp. 24–25, 37–38.

<sup>19</sup> La Nuova Stampa, October 4, 1957.

The PSI emerged from the 1958 elections in a considerably strengthened posture. It had gained some 750,000 votes since 1953 and risen from 12.7 per cent to 14.2 per cent of the total vote. When all the returns were in, the PSI had increased its number of seats in the Chamber of Deputies from 75 to 84, as compared to a loss of 3 seats for the Communist Party.<sup>24</sup>

In the struggle for preference votes among the various factions, Nenni and his Autonomists had fared quite well. According to one observer—and later evidence tended to confirm this estimate—slightly more than half of the 84 Deputies were Autonomists.<sup>25</sup> While this outcome could hardly be described as a conclusive mandate for Nenni's policies, it represented a moral victory for a leader who had so little control over his own party machinery.

With the elections safely concluded, Nenni opened a major offensive against his opponents in the PSI. This time, the errors committed before the Venice Congress were avoided.<sup>26</sup> At every provincial congress, Nenni's followers presented an unequivocally Autonomist motion, which the Leftist factions could not underwrite without betraying their avowed principles. Consequently, an open pre-congress campaign ensued between three major factions: Nenni and his Autonomists, Basso and his followers, and the Left faction, formed as the result of a merger between carristi and Morandians, and led by Tullio Vecchiotti. For the first time since 1949, the rank and file was presented with clear alternatives embodied in three separate motions and three distinct slates of delegates.

Efforts by the Left and Basso to discredit Nenni by accusing him of opportunism only served to advance the Autonomist cause. In fact, some provincial congresses were aroused against the Left by such personal slurs, for Nenni had been leader of the PSI almost uninterruptedly since the Liberation and to attack him was to attack the party. Seizing the advantage presented him by his opponents, Nenni made his own leadership the central issue. After a contest marked by regrettable but apparently customary non-participation by a majority of dues-paying members,<sup>27</sup> Nenni prevailed at the Congress of Naples in January, 1959. The Autonomist motion received 58.3 per cent of the votes, with 32.6 per cent going to the Left motion, and a mere 8.7 per cent to the Basso motion. The Autonomists won an absolute majority on the Central Committee, and an all-Autonomist Directorate was chosen.<sup>28</sup>

But the Autonomist victory had been slightly diluted in the course of the Naples Congress. In his speech to the delegates, Nenni had ruled out PSI support for a Christian Democratic Cabinet or a Left-Center coalition Cabinet ("the opening to the Left") and had declared that Socialist reunification could only be achieved within the PSI. He had then proceeded to base his autonomist line on "the Socialist alternative": the hope of building a Socialist Party strong enough to take full responsibility for governing Italy, or at any rate strong enough to precipitate a crisis in the ranks of Christian Democracy.<sup>29</sup> By taking this tack, Nenni effectively defended himself against the Leftist charge of opportunism and stole the issues his opponents had raised. The Congress, then, had certain face-saving features for the minority factions, and Nenni's astute tactics may well have prevented a party split.

p. 456. Both were renominated and Malagugini was re-elected. For the election results in Milan-Pavia, and the preference votes pooled by the various candidates, see I Deputati e Senatori del Terzo Parlamento Repubblicano (Roma, La Navicella, 1960), pp. 629-634.

<sup>24</sup> Istituto Centrale di Statistica, op. cit., pp. 50-51. See also I Deputati e Senatori del Terzo Parlamento Repubblicano, op. cit., p. XL for number of seats captured by PSI in 1958, and p. LXVII for comparison with 1953. The PSI Group in the Chamber was, soon after the elections, reinforced by 4 secessionist Deputies from the PSDI and totalled 88 members by 1959.

<sup>25</sup> See Paolo Pavolini, "I sette socialismi," Il Mondo (August 26, 1958), p. 3.

<sup>26</sup> On the pre-Congress campaign of 1958-59, see Glorioso, loc. cit., p. 8.

<sup>27</sup> At the Naples Congress of 1959, Basso charged that there had been widespread absenteeism at pre-Congress sectional assemblies. See Alessandro Pizzorno, "The Italian Socialist Party and Political Participation," Prod., Vol. 3 (December, 1959), pp. 25-31. Pizzorno confirms the validity of this charge as applied to Milan, and ventures the assumption that Basso was substantially correct with regard to other parts of Italy as well. Babbini estimates that attendance at sectional assemblies averaged 30-35 per cent of total membership. See Paolo Babbini, "Anatomia del PSI," Il Mulino, Vol. 10 (March, 1961), p. 128.

<sup>28</sup> For the final results of the Naples Congress, see Partito Socialista Italiano, 33° Congresso Nazionale (Milano-Roma, Edizioni Avanti!, 1959), pp. 422-428.

<sup>29</sup> For Nenni's speeches at the Naples Congress, see Partito Socialista Italiano, ibid., pp. 10-41, and 395-403. His opening speech is commented on in La Stampa, January 16, 1959.

Since the Naples Congress, Nenni has moved more boldly along the road to collaboration with other democratic forces, thus revealing the purely tactical nature of his isolationist stand at Naples. By September, 1959, he had modified his "Socialist alternative" doctrine and had indicated his willingness to support a Left-Center Cabinet on an ad hoc basis (i.e., support for those government measures which would promote social and technical progress and aid the development of a democratic life for the masses).<sup>30</sup> At a Central Committee meeting in May, 1960, he went so far as to declare that the Soviet Union shared the responsibility for the failure of the Summit Conference. More significantly, he announced that the PSI, no longer content with mere autonomy, was about to enter a new phase of open competition with the Communists.<sup>31</sup> Another sharp break with precedent came in August, 1960 on the vote of confidence for the Fanfani Cabinet: the PSI abstained from voting and thus in effect helped Fanfani win his required majority of those voting on the issue of confidence.<sup>32</sup> And finally, in the Spring of 1961, the PSI agreed to participate in Left-Center juntas (composed of Christian Democrats, Republicans, Social Democrats, and Socialists) in numerous communal and provincial governments—Milan, Florence, and Genoa were among the Italian cities which witnessed this re-entry of the PSI into the democratic camp locally.<sup>33</sup> In many other communal and provincial governments, to be sure, the PSI continued to participate in Communist-led juntas.

The PSI had come a long way from the days of the People's Democratic Front, but the internal struggle was by no means over.

<sup>30</sup> La Stampa, September 8, 1959.

<sup>31</sup> La Stampa, May 31, 1960.

<sup>32</sup> Il Corriere della Sera, August 4, 6, 1960. The Communists had voted against Fanfani on this occasion. For the first time in over a decade, the PSI was abandoning its policy of all-out opposition.

<sup>33</sup> The PSI entered Left-Center municipal juntas in the following provincial capitals: Milan, Genoa, Florence, Piacenza, Pavia, La Spezia, Forlì, Rieti. Similar Left-Center experiments were initiated in 25 other communes and in four provinces: Pavia, La Spezia, Avellino, Rieti. See Partito Socialista Italiano, 34° Congresso Nazionale (Milano, Edizioni Avanti!, 1961), p. 34 (Nenni's report). More recently, the PSI has entered the Sicilian regional government in collaboration with the Christian Democrats, and has agreed to support a Left-Center cabinet in the national government.

Defeated at Naples, the PSI Left and the Basso faction still posed an active threat to the aspirations of the PSI's present leaders. Open manifestations of rebellion have not been lacking. After the Central Committee meeting of May, 1960, for instance, 28 PSI Deputies and 16 PSI Senators belonging to the Left faction signed an open letter, printed in the official Communist daily Unità, protesting against the attitude of Nenni and his Directorate in regard to the failure of the Summit Conference.<sup>34</sup> Fifteen Basso Senators and Deputies were reported as sympathizing with the 44 signatories. The second gesture of rebellion took place when the PSI abstained on the vote of confidence in Fanfani. This decision, taken by the PSI Directorate, was so bitterly criticized by so many members of the PSI Parliamentary Group that Nenni refused to call for a vote by the Group on the issue, but simply insisted that the Group must conform to the decisions of the party executive organ.<sup>35</sup> In protest against this decision, which entailed indirect PSI collaboration with the Center parties, 41 PSI Deputies belonging to both the Basso and Left factions signed an open letter to the official party daily Avanti!, indicating their dissent and asserting that they were submitting to the authority of the Directorate only out of regard for party discipline.<sup>36</sup> It was evident, at this time, that Nenni's control over his own Parliamentary Group verged on the precarious.

The clearest and most disturbing evidence of the continued strength of the opposition factions was furnished by the Milan Congress of March, 1961.<sup>37</sup> Despite the fact that Nenni had enjoyed full control of the central party organs since 1959, the followers of Vecchietti and Basso were able to hold their ground, and even gain slightly, at the provincial level. At the Milan Congress, the Autonomists received 55.1 per cent of the total votes (a drop of 3.2 percentage points since 1959), while Basso obtained 6.9 per cent (a drop of 1.8 points), and the Left showed some improvement with 35.1 per cent (a rise of 2.5 points). A minor Leftist motion sponsored by Sandro Pertini received about 1.1 per cent of the votes. Disillusionment over the results of the local and provincial elections of November, 1960, resentment against a

<sup>34</sup> Unità, May 31, 1960.

<sup>35</sup> Il Corriere della Sera, August 3, 1960.

<sup>36</sup> Ibid., August 7, 1960. Their names appear in Avanti!, August 6, 1960.

<sup>37</sup> See Partito Socialista Italiano, 34° Congresso Nazionale, op. cit. Results of the Congress are summarized on pp. 264-270. See also La Nazione, March 21, 1961.

Christian Democratic Party which seemed to be unable to come to a firm decision regarding a future alliance with the PSI, and a deterioration of the international climate since the failure of the Summit Conference—these factors tended to bolster the opposition. The unity of the Autonomists was somewhat weakened (though the unity of the party may have been furthered) by the crystallization of an Autonomist sub-faction headed by Riccardo Lombardi.<sup>38</sup> Lombardi seemed to take a milder, more conciliatory approach to the Leftist opposition and insisted on representation of the minority factions in the Directorate. In the Directorate which emerged from the Milan Congress, all factions were represented. The Autonomists had a majority, but many conservative reporters held that Lombardi's sub-faction (whose objectives and consistency are not quite clear at this point) could, at any time, combine with the Left and Basso to deprive Nenni of his majority.<sup>39</sup> The outcome of the intra-party power struggle in the PSI still remained a bit uncertain.

Finally, it should be observed that the PSI is still associated with the Communist Party in the trade-union movement and in many local and provincial governments. Partly because of the need to prevent a party split, partly because Socialist withdrawal from the CGIL and from Communist-led local juntas would cost the PSI many thousands of jobs and some lucrative sources of financial support, partly because he does not want coalitions with Centrist parties in areas where the Left is traditionally dominant, Nenni has thus far been reluctant to take the final decisive steps toward repudiating all ties with the Communists.

Thus, as we have seen, the march toward autonomy has been a long and difficult one, and has entailed the resurgence of intense factional conflict. The factions which have emerged from this period of strife are organized almost like miniature parties. Each has its own periodical (Mondo Operaio for the Autonomist Directorate, Problemi del Socialismo for the Basso group, and Mondo Nuovo for the Left), and the Left faction has its own press agency in Rome. Whenever a faction does not control the official party organization in a given province, it will often create its own machine, paralleling and—to some degree—competing with the provincial party organs. Also, some provincial federations openly flout national directives; and factions, on their own authority and with the use of their own funds, will sometimes transfer party bureaucrats from one province to another in an effort to promote factional interest.<sup>40</sup> Finally, we should take note of the high degree of cohesion and continuity displayed within PSI factions: in the period from 1959 to 1961, although the Autonomist faction monopolized the national executive organs of the party, the control of only 10 out of 102 federations changed hands.<sup>41</sup>

The preceding account of the PSI's arduous return to an autonomous status reveals the importance of a great national leader, who can personify the movement and appear indispensable to the great mass of party members. Most party members are apathetic, immune to ideological appeals, unable to understand the subtle dialectics of the party congresses. For many of these soldiers in the ranks, the party is little more than a symbol, a traditional object of loyalty. A national party leader who can obtain the affection and reverence of the masses, and who can become, in the public mind, the living embodiment of the party, has an enormous advantage over his less prominent associates, no matter how deeply entrenched the latter may be in the various executive and administrative organs of the party.<sup>42</sup> The threat to resign, mentioned by Michels,<sup>43</sup> is an especially potent weapon when wielded by a venerated leader like Nenni—though it might <sup>38</sup> Many commentators, of diverse political shadings, speculated about the Lombardi sub-group. See La Nazione (an independent conservative paper), March 21, 31, 1961; Il Corriere della Sera (independent conservative), March 19, 1961; Il Paese (independent pro-Communist), March 31, 1961; and Antonio Gambino, "Hanno ricominciato a discutere tra loro," L'Espresso (independent Radical and anti-clerical), March 26, 1961, p. 3.

<sup>39</sup> The Autonomists had 14 seats on the Directorate, while 6 were allotted to the Left and 1 to Basso. But according to La Nazione, March 31, 1961, 6 of the 14 Autonomists are supporters of Lombardi.

<sup>40</sup> See article by Giacomo Mancini in Avanti!, February 12, 1961. See also Babbini, loc. cit., pp. 12-13. These generalizations apply primarily to the two largest factions.

<sup>41</sup> See Partito Socialista Italiano, 33° Congresso Nazionale, op. cit., pp. 542-545, 34° Congresso Nazionale, op. cit., pp. 443-448, for provincial breakdowns of factional strength.

<sup>42</sup> For an account of the influence of the Nenni myth on local discussion and decisions, see the article by Cesare Bassi in Avanti!, January 10, 1959.

<sup>43</sup> See Robert Michels, Political Parties (New York, Dover Publications, 1959), pp. 45-48.

prove quite inadequate in the hands of his successor, who would not personify the heroic period of the anti-Fascist struggle as Nenni does. Possessing an influence which borders on the charismatic, a revered party leader can prevail over a hostile party "apparatus," especially when the "apparatus" cannot remain united. In fact, one might go so far as to suggest that, in a democratic mass party, a party bureaucracy, united only by common function, can never successfully resist the mystical appeal of the recognized party leader who has either founded the party or has led it during one of the crucial periods of its history. As we shall see, a party bureaucracy, under such circumstances, is unlikely to maintain its cohesion.

II. FACTIONS IN THE PSI—SOME BROADER IMPLICATIONS

Closer investigation of the three major PSI factions permits us to formulate certain general statements which may be tested for their relevance in other political environments. We may begin by noting the astounding fluidity of intra-party politics even in a branch-type party like the PSI, where factions possess a relatively high degree of cohesion and continuity and have their own highly articulated organizational structures. For each faction is merely a temporary coalition among various more or less cohesive sub-groups. The Left faction, for instance, included the carristi, open supporters of a permanent alliance with the Communist Party; veteran Maximalists of pre-Fascist vintage, who were animated primarily by the traditional Maximalist fear of the contaminating effects of collaboration with bourgeois parties; the young intellectuals of Mondo Operaio, who professed Leninist ideals but insisted on a thoroughgoing revision of Stalinist doctrines and methods; and the Morandians—young party bureaucrats who had risen to power in the party "apparatus" during the period of close collaboration with the Communist Party and who were seeking to protect their acquired positions in the PSI bureaucracy and their habitual routines of close partnership with their Communist allies. The Autonomist faction presented an even more heterogeneous appearance: former members of the Action Party, including the aforementioned Riccardo Lombardi; ex-Communists, who had seceded from the Communist Party after the Hungarian Revolution; an assortment of young intellectuals of miscellaneous origins, including contributors to Il Ponte and Critica Sociale; a large nucleus of party bureaucrats and former followers of Morandi—men similar in background and function to the Morandians who backed the Left; and a motley collection of local "clientele" leaders (especially numerous in Central and Southern Italy), whose standing in the PSI depended on their vote-getting talents.<sup>44</sup>

Given the heterogeneity of each of the major intra-party factions, victory on the part of a single faction only opens a new phase of the intra-party process—for the component sub-groups are promptly subjected to a powerful centrifugal force: the divisions which decision-making responsibility must inevitably entail. And this same centrifugal force, offset somewhat by the common goal of overthrowing the faction in power, affects the minority factions as well.

Illustrations of this centrifugal tendency come readily to mind. If we go back to the early 20th Century, we may observe how the Reformist faction, victorious in the 1910 Congress by a wide margin, split in 1911 over the issue of the Libyan War, and lost control of the PSI in 1912.<sup>45</sup> And in 1961, the sudden and perhaps short-lived emergence of a new Lombardian sub-group within the Autonomist faction—a sub-group whose goals appeared to be the maintenance of party unity, the conciliation of the Left faction, and the adoption of preventive measures against a possible opportunistic degeneration of the autonomist policy—constituted another example.<sup>46</sup> Behind the relative stability of inter-party power relations in a multi-party system, there exists a more volatile situation of intra-party struggle, in which sub-groups are continuously clustering around parent factions and breaking off to form new factions or to join a new parent body.

We may also observe the limited utility of certain traditional categories in analyzing intra-party factional conflict. The party bureaucracy, the intelligentsia, the trade-union officials, the old guard, the new generation of leaders, are all examples of the type of functional or occupational explanation which can prove particularly beguiling for an observer who is attempting to interpret factional conflicts. Michels' discussion of intra-party politics is a case in point.<sup>47</sup> But if we descend from the lofty vantage point of the national stage and begin to investigate and compare regional and local situations, and to subject our factions to closer scrutiny, we find that it is not quite so easy to force our data into these convenient pigeon-holes. There were, for instance, sizeable nuclei of young intellectuals in each of the three major PSI factions in 1961.<sup>48</sup> And a recent study of Parliamentary personnel reveals that Autonomist PSI Deputies and Left PSI Deputies yielded approximately similar percentages of university graduates. Nor did the two groups of Deputies differ to any very significant degree in the percentage of career party officials they contained: 25.9 per cent of the Left Deputies were classed as political activists as against 19.6 per cent of the Autonomists.<sup>49</sup> Morandian apparatchiks like Dario Valori and Vincenzo Gatto supported the Left faction, but other Morandians like Venerio Cattani and Luciano Paolicchi backed Nenni's Autonomists.<sup>50</sup> Even the party bureaucracy, then, with its alleged esprit de corps, fails us.

<sup>44</sup> On the sub-groups in the PSI, see Pavolini loc. cit., pp. 3-4; Umberto Segre, "Un partito moderno?", Comunità, Vol. 13 (February, 1959), pp. 3-7; and Gambino, loc. cit., p. 3. A forthcoming article by Antonio Landolfi, to be published soon in Tempi Moderni, should provide us with a more extensive treatment of this subject. It should be noted in passing that, since Mondo Operaio is presently controlled by the Autonomist faction, its former collaborators now contribute articles to the Left organ, Mondo Nuovo.

<sup>45</sup> See Pedone, op. cit., pp. 123-214.

<sup>46</sup> On Lombardi and his views, see Segre, "Un partito moderno?", loc. cit., p. 6; Gambino, loc. cit.; and Lombardi's speech at the Milan Congress, Partito Socialista Italiano, 34° Congresso Nazionale, op. cit., pp. 161-168.

It would be interesting to determine what factors were responsible for the varying choices made by provincial party bureaucrats who—in a party characterized by a large measure of provincial autonomy—did not usually need to fear retaliation on the part of the central party leadership. Studies of the attitudes and behavior of local political elites would seem to promise richer harvests than the more familiar voting behavior studies; in this connection, the work of Cervigni and Galasso on the PSI in Southern Italy represents an invaluable pioneering venture which has dispelled many illusions regarding the alleged character of the PSI as a "party of the masses."<sup>51</sup> Unfortunately, their investigation was completed in 1956, when factional conflict in the PSI was just beginning to come into the open.

An investigation of the raison d'être of the three major factions in the PSI reveals a multiplicity of overlapping motivations which serve to promote the division of a national party into warring factions. Shared values (the issue of individual liberty, the old Maximalist-Reformist schism) played a role. And yet, by 1961, there were very few avowed anti-libertarians in the Leftist group. Moreover, all factions appeared to attract men of widely diverse ideological pedigrees, as well as many Southern "clientele" leaders who seemed to be primarily concerned with winning elections.

Strategic considerations also served to differentiate the major factions. Such questions as the alliance with the Communists, the possibility of reunification with the Social Democrats, and the desirability of early collaboration with the Christian Democrats all served to differentiate Nenni on the one hand from Basso and the Left on the other. Basso, who shared the Left's distrust of the Center parties and its nostalgia for the old Communist alliance, seemed to be trying to achieve a synthesis between the two largest contending factions, avoiding the excesses of each (Social Democratic opportunism or slavish pro-Communism), and thus safeguard party unity and mitigate factional strife.<sup>52</sup>

The factor of affinity based on common interests, origins, or functions appears to be rather difficult to isolate. As we have already observed, the "apparatus" did not maintain a united front. Experience in the Resistance was a dominant motif for some sentimental pro-Communist carristi, but many other ex-members of the anti-Fascist underground did not allow sentiment and ancient memories to <sup>47</sup> See Michels, Political Parties, op. cit., especially Part Two, ch. 6, and Part Four, chs. 2-6. Michels was, however, aware of the possibility that conflicts may arise for ideological or personal reasons. See ibid., pp. 167-168.

<sup>48</sup> See Pavolini, loc. cit.

<sup>49</sup> Giovanni Sartori has completed an exhaustive and penetrating comparative survey of Italian Deputies and their educational, social, and professional backgrounds. This analysis has been published in the Winter, 1961, issue of the International Social Science Journal. My computations are based on the raw data which Professor Sartori was kind enough to let me consult.

<sup>50</sup> See Pavolini, loc. cit. On Cattani, see Umberto Segre, "Il duello dei prossimi due anni," L'Illustrazione Italiana, Vol. 86 (February, 1959), p. 19.

<sup>51</sup> See Giovanni Cervigni and Giuseppe Galasso, "Inchiesta sul Partito Socialista Italiano nelle provincie meridionali," Nord e Sud, Vol. 3 (March, 1956); the entire issue is devoted to a study of the PSI.

<sup>52</sup> On positions taken by the various PSI factions, see Partito Socialista Italiano, 34° Congresso Nazionale, op. cit., passim, but especially pp. 32-44, 64-66, 69-73, 107-109, 116-122, 220-221, 244-245. Basso's statement of his purposes is best summarized on pp. 220-221.

affect their vision of the political situation. Former members of the Action Party (which had itself been a rather motley organization with a plethora of internal currents) were active in roughly equal proportions in all factions. But we do note that, among Autonomist Deputies, there was a much higher percentage of former members of other parties (47.8 per cent) than was the case with the Left (32.2 per cent).<sup>53</sup>

Intimate ties with the Communists in Communist-dominated agricultural cooperatives have occasionally been pointed out as constituting a possible explanation for the Leftist tendencies of the PSI in the Emilian provinces of Reggio Emilia and Ravenna.<sup>54</sup> But this hypothesis appears less plausible when we observe the strongly autonomist character of the PSI in the Emilian provinces of Bologna and Ferrara, where Communist-led cooperatives were also numerous and economically potent.<sup>55</sup> Nor did the CGIL as an interest group present a façade of factional unity. Many of its leaders backed Basso in 1957, but some of these (Santi and Brodolini) defected to Nenni at the Naples Congress of 1959, while others (Foà) joined the Left, and still others (Avolio) remained faithful to their leader.<sup>56</sup> It would appear, then, that affinity based on common interests, origins, or functions played a relatively secondary role in determining factional alignments in the PSI; or, in any event, while material and functional motivations undoubtedly existed, they did not crystallize into readily identifiable patterns.

The survival of local cliques in a branch-type party like the PSI was especially marked in the agricultural areas of Central and Southern Italy. The leaders of many of these clientele backed Nenni because his faction seemed likely to prevail and because he enjoyed the support of the party electorate. Such Deputies as Andò, Mayor of Giarre (Catania Province), seemed to be primarily concerned with retaining the support of the town, province, or interest group to whose preference votes they owed their election.<sup>57</sup> And yet some clientele leaders did not run true to form: Deputy Paolucci of Chieti—described by Cervigni and Galasso as being a clientele leader with autonomist leanings—later signed the aforementioned open letter of protest against Nenni's failure to take a clear anti-Western stand with regard to the collapse of the Summit Conference.<sup>58</sup> Here again, the motivation of local elites stands out as a fundamental problem whose exploration might open many doors.

As we can see, then, shared values, shared strategic conceptions, affinity based on common interests or functions, the instinct for survival of purely personal local cliques, and the charismatic appeal of a great national leader were all instrumental in dividing the PSI. But any assignment of relative weight to these various factors would seem to be a virtually hopeless task at the national level. On the regional or local level, on the other hand, a study of factional motivations may yield interesting insights into the effect of environment on the formation of intra-party groupings. In any heterogeneous society, with a variety of political traditions and contexts, an understanding of intra-party politics cannot be achieved except by plunging into the complex diversity of provincial and local political situations.

In an earlier article, we inquired whether any relationship existed between the political coloration, economic character, or social structure of a given area, and the relative strength of different factions within a party in that area.<sup>59</sup> For instance, we asked, does the intransigent (or the moderate) wing of a Socialist party tend to flourish most successfully in a certain specific type of political environment? Empirical research has yielded some suggestive indications of this sort—indications which must be qualified by citing ubiquitous exceptions—but no water-tight conclusions.

It has been noted, for example, that the Autonomists were stronger in the larger, wealthier, more powerful PSI provincial federations boasting the most numerous membership.<sup>60</sup> Thus, the seven biggest federations

<sup>53</sup> Computations are based on raw data collected by Professor Sartori for his article, loc. cit.

<sup>54</sup> See La Nuova Stampa, May 3, 1958, and Il Corriere della Sera, April 29, May 3, 1958. For data on factional coloration of the several provinces, see Partito Socialista Italiano, 34° Congresso Nazionale, op. cit., pp. 443–448.

<sup>55</sup> See Il Messaggero, May 17, 1958, and Il Corriere della Sera, April 29, 1958.

<sup>56</sup> See "Speciale," L'Espresso, January 11, 1959, p. 2.

<sup>57</sup> On Southern and Central Italian clienteles, see Cervigni and Galasso, "Inchiesta sul Partito Socialista Italiano nelle provincie meridionali," loc. cit., passim, but especially pp. 6–12, 33–39, 102, 147–152; and Pera, loc. cit., passim.

<sup>58</sup> See above, note 34, and Cervigni and Galasso, ibid., pp. 26–27.

<sup>59</sup> See Raphael Zariski, "Party Factions and Comparative Politics: Some Preliminary Observations," Midwest Journal of Political Science, Vol. 4 (February 1960), pp. 46–51.

<sup>60</sup> Pavolini, loc. cit. See also Sigfrido Ciccotti, "Nenni's Party at the Crossroads," New Leader, Vol. 41 (December 1, 1958), pp. 9–10.

(Milan, Mantua, Bologna, Ferrara, Florence, Rome, and Naples)—each having over 10,000 PSI members—were all under Autonomist control. One observer has attributed this phenomenon to the alleged fact that small and medium-sized federations were more likely to need outside assistance, in the form of activists and financial subsidies, and were therefore (in 1958–59) more likely to be amenable to guidance on the part of the “apparatus” and of the Communists.<sup>61</sup> This suggestion, which implies a close connection between organizational strength and political moderation in a provincial subdivision of a Socialist party, probably contains a kernel of truth and deserves further exploration. But there is some strong negative evidence which we cannot afford to overlook: the very large number of small Autonomist federations, of which 15 had less than 2500 members.

Some link also appears to exist between the strength of political Catholicism in a given area and the predominance of opposition factions in the PSI. Thus, while the anti-Nenni elements in the PSI controlled only 39 of the 92 provinces of Italy, they held a majority in 10 of the 19 provinces in which the Christian Democrats had succeeded in obtaining an absolute majority of the popular vote in 1958.<sup>62</sup> And if we confine our analysis to Northern and Central Italy, omitting five Southern provinces where DC strength had been swelled by an influx of Rightist votes and where political Catholicism had not made much progress before the advent of Fascism,<sup>63</sup> we are left with 14 provinces of which 8 were governed by opposition factions. These eight provinces were all concentrated in the Veneto and in North Lombardy, the two “white” regions par excellence, whose devout masses had boycotted Italian general elections in the late 19th and early 20th Centuries in obedience to the Papal doctrine of non expedit.<sup>64</sup> Catholicism here tended to be conservative but paternalistic, quick to respond to social grievances but insistent on obedience to clerical directives. The strong vein of popular support for the clergy was further strengthened in the early 20th Century by the creation of a dense network of Catholic unions, peasant leagues, and cooperatives. In this type of environment, the Marxist parties had always been at a disadvantage.<sup>65</sup> Extremism and intransigence in the PSI could well be a reaction against PSI weakness, against the party's inability to challenge clerical hegemony. Another possible explanation, but one which lacks any empirical confirmation, might be the absorption into the “white” organizations of many local cadres who, in a less Catholic context, would have swelled the ranks of the Reformist faction in the PSI.

There appear, then, to be some indications of a connection between intransigence in a working-class movement and electoral weakness vis-à-vis a traditionally dominant Catholic party. Here again we must emphasize the existence of notable exceptions to the tendency we have just described: Bergamo, one of the classic “white” provinces of Northern Italy, is in the Autonomist camp, as is Trento, the home province of the late Alcide DeGasperi. In a situation characterized by a multiplicity of social and economic environments and by sharply divergent historical experiences (the Veneto and Lombardy had once been under Austrian rule), we must learn to live with multiple causality and forgo premature insistence on precise evaluation of the significance of various factors. The common strand which Key was able to employ to unravel the tangled reality of Southern politics eludes us here.

Socialist unwillingness to break away from an alliance with the Communists is sometimes attributed to an inferiority complex resulting from the superior strength of the Communist Party and the consequent Socialist fear of losing contact with the bulk of the working class. Yet when we examine the 30 provinces in which the Communist Party outpolled the PSI by

<sup>61</sup> See Pavolini, ibid.

<sup>62</sup> For voting percentages, province by province, for the 1958 elections, see “Italia. Elezioni 1956–58–60: confronti percentuali per provincie,” Tempi Moderni, Vol. 4 (January–March, 1961), pp. 127–134.

<sup>63</sup> See Francesco Compagna and Vittorio De Caprariis, Studi di geografia elettorale (1946–1958), (Napoli, Centro Studi “Nord e Sud,” 1959), p. 25 and Tables VII and VIII. I am using Braga's sociological classification of Italian provinces. He includes several Central Italian provinces (Lucca, Massa, Ferrara, Parma, Piacenza) in Northwest Italy on socio-economic grounds, and also includes two Southern Italian provinces (Pescara, Teramo) in Central Italy, and three Central Italian provinces (Roma, Latina, Frosinone) in Southern Italy. See Giorgio Braga, Il Comunismo fra gli italiani (Milano, Comunità, 1956), ch. 3.

<sup>64</sup> See Roberto Michels, Il Proletariato e la borghesia nel movimento socialista italiano (Torino, Fratelli Bocca, 1908), pp. 217–218.

<sup>65</sup> See Il Messaggero, May 8, 1958. See also Luigi Preti, Le lotte agrarie nella Valle Padana (Torino, Einaudi, 1955), pp. 92, 120, 141, 223–224, 226–227, 240, 323–324, 356–358.

more than a 2-1 margin, we find that the Left faction controlled the PSI in only 14 of those provinces—46.7% of the 30 provinces, as compared to 42.3% of all Italian provinces in the hands of the Left. And, again, if we observe the 16 provinces in which the PSI outpolled the Communists in 1958, and in which by rearranging our hypothesis we would expect to find a sturdily independent variety of Socialism, we note that 8 of those 16 provinces were also controlled by the Left faction in 1961. To be sure, these eight Left provinces were all located in the "white" regions of the Veneto and North Lombardy, where an outnumbered PSI might regard a still weaker Communist Party not as a dangerous competitor, but as an indispensable ally against a Catholic mass party with deep roots in the countryside.

Thus far, our investigation fails to yield significant results. But if we break up our sample into component regions, discarding the South with its personal clienteles, we are left with 12 provinces in Central Italy—the vast sharecropping region which includes Northern Abruzzi, Northern Latium, Tuscany, Umbria, the Marches, and most of Emilia—in which the Communists outpolled the PSI by a margin of over 2-1.<sup>65</sup> And here we observe that, while the Left faction controlled the PSI in only half of the provinces of Central Italy, it managed to dominate three-fourths of those 12 Central Italian provinces where the power relationship between the Communist Party and the PSI was particularly unbalanced in favor of the former. Also, there were only five provinces (all in Central Italy) in which the Communists polled over 40 per cent of the votes—and the PSI in all but one of these was controlled by the Left faction.

Also in this instance, then, a position of weakness apparently favored the intransigent wing. In Central Italy, where a major proportion of the municipal and provincial governments were run by Communist-Socialist coalitions, support of Nenni's policies in provinces where the PSI was heavily outnumbered might lead to a unilateral rupture of the Communist-Socialist alliance, ouster of the Socialists from the local government, and loss of much patronage. Socialists were perhaps more likely to affect an independent stance in provinces where they commanded more than one-third of the Leftist votes and could regard themselves as equal partners, rather than as tolerated guests, in the local and provincial administrations. In the South, where the Socialists and Communist together were nowhere near an absolute majority of the total vote, the relative strength of the two Leftist parties was less relevant. And even in Central Italy, the tendency we have just traced was by no means universal.

In Southern Italy, where Christian Democracy is prone to ally itself with the extreme Right,<sup>67</sup> there appears to be a significant relationship between the total strength of the Left-of-Center parties in a given province and the ability of the Autonomist faction to dominate the PSI in that province. Thus, in 12 Southern provinces, the four Left-of-Center parties combined (Communists, Socialists, Social Democrats, and Republicans) received less than 35 per cent of the vote in 1958. The PSI in no less than seven of these provinces was dominated by the Left in 1961. In short, Left opposition factions, which controlled the PSI in only about 40 per cent of the provinces in Southern Italy, held the upper hand in nearly 60 per cent of those provinces where the Left-of-Center parties were especially weak. And conversely, of those nine provinces where the Left-of-Center parties had polled over 40 per cent of the votes in 1958, only one had a Left-dominated PSI in 1961. The frustration experienced by Socialists in provinces firmly controlled by clerical and authoritarian clienteles may well have strengthened the forces of intransigence, whereas more moderate elements may have been encouraged by the more competitive situation in another group of Southern provinces.

In Northwest Italy, we may note that the Autonomists tended to prevail in provinces where the Socialist peasant leagues had been particularly strong and well organized before World War I. Of the eight provinces in Northwest Italy where rural Socialism had gained a firm foothold before 1914, by organizing the braccianti (farm laborers hired on a day-by-day basis),<sup>68</sup> all but one were held by the Autonomists in 1961. In Central Italy, the Left faction was more successful in controlling provinces with long Socialist traditions; but here, as we have seen, the predominance of the Communists was especially marked. Where Socialism has been long established, has created a network of economic and social organizations, has not been completely overshadowed by a dominant Communist Party, and has trained a generation of local and provincial cadres accustomed to exercising power at the local level, there is more likelihood that moderation and compromise will prevail in Socialist ranks. Contrariwise, where the Socialist movement has been established relatively recently, and has not yet had the time or the means to permeate the local power structure (as, for example, in Sardinia and parts of the Veneto), intransigence is likely to be the product of impotence and inexperience.

<sup>67</sup> See Giovanni Cervigni, "La frana meridionale," Il Mondo, February 16, 1960, p. 1.

<sup>68</sup> These provinces (Ferrara, Parma, Piacenza, Pavia, Novara, Vercelli, Mantova, Cremona) are referred to by Preti in op. cit., pp. 219-220.

<sup>66</sup> Again, I am using Braga's sociological classification. See note 63 above.

We must not, of course, jump to the conclusion that there is always an unbroken line of continuity between pre-Fascist Reformist Socialism and present-day Autonomism. Provinces like Parma and Ferrara—both Autonomist in 1961—were ruled by the extremist Syndicalist faction before World War I, while the Left won out in 1961 in the province of Reggio Emilia, once the Reformist fief of Camillo Prampolini and his cooperative movement.<sup>69</sup> We are isolating possibly influential factors, not stating invariable relationships.

Metropolitan areas, where the most powerful Socialist federations were often located, also tended to be especially Autonomist in their leanings. Of 12 provinces containing cities with populations in excess of 250,000, the PSI was under Autonomist rule in 10 in 1961—Turin and Palermo being the two exceptions. Thus, moderate Socialism also seemed to flourish in great metropolitan centers where the rising importance of the tertiary (service) sector of the economy tended to blur the distinction between the proletariat and the bourgeoisie, and masses of white-collar workers had to be reckoned with by the various political parties.

Does industrialization have a moderating effect on Socialism, as some Italian observers suggest? It has been asserted, in this connection, that the great industrial centers (with the exception of Turin, where the CGIL has been thrown on the defensive by its own internal divisions and by unusually ruthless discriminatory policies on the part of the FIAT management), were virtually all in Autonomist hands.<sup>70</sup>

<sup>69</sup> Ibid., pp. 136–138, 294–298, 425.

<sup>70</sup> On Turin see "Problemi della Società Italiana—I Socialisti a Torino," Il Mulino, Vol. 8 (August, 1959), pp. 104–107, and Eugenio Scalfari, "La sconfitta degli operai," L'Espresso, July 2, 1961, pp. 8–9. During an interview with a close student of PSI affairs, I was informed that the PSI in Turin had lost contact with the working class, as a result of its refusal to allow PSI union leaders in the FIAT works to secede from the CGIL without facing expulsion from their party.

And in fact, of 9 provinces in Northwest Italy which had over 30 per cent of the labor force employed in manufacturing industries, 7 were under Autonomist control: the other exception, Como, was located in "white" North Lombardy.<sup>71</sup> In the rest of Italy only three provinces had over 30 per cent of their labor force engaged in manufacturing: two (Vicenza and Gorizia) were located in the "white" Venetian zone and were both characterized by Leftist domination of the PSI provincial organization; the other (Florence) was solidly Autonomist. Our evidence is only suggestive, to be sure; but there does appear to be some relationship between degree of industrialization (and, as a corollary, extent of labor organization)<sup>72</sup> and moderation in a Socialist movement.

It should be added, however, as a healthy antidote to the heavy dose of environmental determinism implicit in the analysis thus far, that in many cases the prestige and influence of a provincial or regional leader would set the tone for the federation and would overcome traditional attitudes and other historical or social factors. Although the party "apparatus" was ineffective and incohesive as a national force, its members could be very influential in their respective bailiwicks. For example in Calabria, Cosenza Province had an essentially Maximalist tradition, whereas pre-1922 Socialism in Reggio Calabria Province had been Reformist in orientation. But the unquestioned leader of the PSI in Cosenza after World War II was Giacomo Mancini, whose father had founded the Socialist Party in that province. Mancini, strongly pro-Communist during the immediate postwar period, gradually became converted to an Autonomist viewpoint, and he led his provincial federation into the Nenni fold. On the other hand, Reggio Calabria, despite its Reformist background,

<sup>71</sup> Statistics on percentage of industrial workers were computed from data compiled in Istituto Centrale di Statistica, Annuario di Statistiche Provinciali, 1959 (Roma, Istituto Poligrafico dello Stato, 1959), pp. 24–25, 28–29. The provinces in question were Milan, Turin, Genoa, Como, Varese, Novara, Vercelli, Bergamo, Pavia.

<sup>72</sup> Another interesting datum in this connection is provided by a study of trade-union elections in plants employing over 1,000 workers. Of the 14 provinces in which the CGIL polled its highest percentages, 11 were provinces in which the PSI was autonomist in character. See "Le Commissioni interne in Italia nelle 310 aziende con più di 1,000 dipendenti: risultati elettorali dal 1956 al 1959," Tempi Moderni, Vol. 3 (October–December, 1960), p. 13.

There may be numerous reasons for the prevalence of multifactionalism in the PSI. Italian political attitudes, which view secessionists with indulgence and consequently increase the ever-present danger of a party split, may help to explain the Integralist-Basso phenomenon. Then, too, given the traditional autonomy enjoyed by PSI provincial federations, dissident leaders may fortify themselves at the grass roots without feeling compelled to join forces for mutual self-protection against the majority faction. And finally, the great prevalence of intellectuals and university graduates in the directive organs and party congresses of the PSI tends to encourage continuous differentiation of conceptual schemes and strategic approaches.<sup>80</sup> To be sure, the multi-party system increases the number of alternatives and, by so doing, creates an added potential for multi-factionalism. But it appears to be less the multi-party system itself than the political culture in which that system thrives, which tends to encourage multi-factionalism. For instance, a certain disdain for "vulgar" empiricism is, among many Italian intellectuals, a subconscious by-product of Croceian idealism and may militate against the process of bargaining and mutual accommodation which is indispensable for a reconciliation of conflicting factional stands. In any event, it is fairly obvious that no single factor, such as the triple set of alternatives posed by the question of alliances, should be given undue weight.

The study of the PSI throws some additional light on questions connected with party structure. For instance, it becomes apparent from our examination of intra-party processes that in many parts of Italy the PSI failed to live up to Duverger's model of a branch-type party.<sup>81</sup> It had, to be sure, a highly articulated structure, complete with local sections and shop nuclei, provincial federations, national representative, executive and disciplinary organs, a party bureaucracy, and a party statute which spelled out disciplinary procedures and defined the relationship between the various organs. It had about 500,000 dues-paying members.<sup>82</sup> Moreover, it published two daily newspapers and several periodicals, maintained auxiliary feminine and youth organizations, and purported to require the participation of all members in party affairs.<sup>83</sup> It appeared in these respects, then, to correspond to Duverger's definition of a branch-type party, which seeks not only to win elections but also to attract and educate a mass membership.

But the PSI also possessed some characteristics reminiscent of a caucus-type party. The dominant role played by local notables was quite striking: doctors, lawyers, pharmacists, shopkeepers, and union officials often dominated party affairs at the local level on the basis of personal popularity.<sup>84</sup> Many party functions and organs existed largely on paper. And the party rank-and-file revealed an amazing lack of interest in party affairs. Before the crucial Naples Congress of 1959, at a time when sharp factional conflict added an element of drama to party business, less than 35 per cent of the party membership took part in the election of delegates to the provincial congresses.<sup>85</sup> Nor was this apathy confined to the backward rural South; in the large Milan Federation, only 7,500 out of approximately 30,000 registered members showed any active interest in the most important and hotly contested pre-Congress campaign the PSI had faced in a decade.<sup>86</sup> To be sure, there was a higher degree of participation in the pre-convention campaign which led to the Milan Congress of 1961. But our point is, that classifications based on formal party structure may, in the absence of continual observation and analysis of intra-party processes, produce serious distortions in our view of empirical reality.

The vaunted party "apparatus" is another case in point. The term itself conjures up visions of ruthless monolithic power. Yet, when Italian observers finally subjected the PSI bureaucracy to closer examination, it turned out to be little more than a bare skeleton composed of 500 salaried officials. Many of its

<sup>80</sup> For the pre-1910 period, see Michels, Il Proletariato e la borghesia nel movimento socialista italiano, op. cit., pp. 88-114. My assessment of the current situation is based on Cervigni and Galasso, "Inchiesta sul Partito Socialista Italiano nelle provincie meridionali," loc. cit., pp. 14-17, and on my talks with Antonio Landolfi, whose forthcoming article in Tempi Moderni will presumably touch on this point.

<sup>81</sup> For his discussion of caucus-type and branch-type parties, see Maurice Duverger, Political Parties (New York, 1954), pp. 1-3, 17-27, 120, 152-154.

<sup>82</sup> See Partito Socialista Italiano, 34° Congresso Nazionale, op. cit., p. 264.

<sup>83</sup> The PSI Statute requires active participation in party affairs as a duty of every party member. See Article 2 of the PSI Statute reproduced in Mario D'Antonio and Guglielmo Negri, Raccolta degli Statuti dei partiti politici in Italia (Milano, Giuffrè, 1958), pp. 152-153.

<sup>84</sup> Pavolini, loc. cit., and Pera, loc. cit., passim.

<sup>85</sup> Babbini, loc. cit., p. 128.

<sup>86</sup> See Pizzorno, loc. cit., pp. 25-26.

came under the control of a group of young Leftists after the 1948 electoral defeat of the PSI. The leader of this coterie, a lawyer named Rocco Minasi, was able to oust what remained of the Reformist Old Guard and turn Reggio Calabria into a stronghold of the Leftist faction.<sup>73</sup>

Similar cases occurred elsewhere in Italy. The Naples Federation was strongly Leftist until its leader, Francesco De Martino, was won over to the Autonomist cause by Nenni early in 1957. The same was true of Brindisi and its leader, Marino Guadalupi, whose shift to an Autonomist stand was barely under way in 1956.<sup>74</sup> Nor was this phenomenon of personal initiative limited to Southern Italy, habitat of the local clique. In politically mature Emilia, in North Central Italy, Bologna and Ferrara had been two of the most strongly pro-Communist provinces in the PSI organization during the 1951 Congress and for some years thereafter. Yet when their respective provincial secretaries, Armaroli and Cattani, finally swung their support to Nenni, these two provinces became overwhelmingly Autonomist. And similar examples could be cited in Tuscany.<sup>75</sup>

We might also inquire into the hypothesis, posed in an earlier study, that a multiparty system may per se encourage multifactionalism within a party, since the party is usually faced with three strategic choices: to choose its allies on the Left, or on the Right, or to renounce all alliances.<sup>76</sup> The PSI certainly had to confront these alternatives after World War II; but before the Communist secession of 1921, there was no party to the Left of the PSI on the political spectrum—and yet, at most party congresses, there were at least three PSI factions.<sup>77</sup> Besides, even after World War II, factions in the PSI did not always correspond to these three alternatives. In fact, at both the 1959 and the 1961 party congresses, the Left and Basso factions were in substantial accord on the need for maintaining a permanent system of cooperation with the Communist Party, while Nenni advocated strict neutrality in 1959, and an eventual alliance with Christian Democracy—based on ironclad agreements regarding a reform program—in 1961.

While Italian Socialists have on occasion divided neatly into three factions on the issue of the choice of allies (this was certainly the case in 1921 and in 1948–49), a more typical tri-factional situation has been based on a Maximalist-Reformist split with an intermediate faction attempting to create a synthesis in the name of party unity. In this pattern Nenni's Autonomists would correspond to the Reformists of the pre-Fascist era; the Left faction is a direct descendant of the Syndicalists of 1906 (though many of these later joined the Fascist movement), the Revolutionaries of 1908–1914, and the Maximalists of 1919–1922; and finally, the Basso faction plays the same role as the Integralists of 1906–1908, the Dissident Reformists of 1910, and the Intermediate motion of 1912.<sup>78</sup>

The primary issue in most cases has been between compromise, accommodation, and gradualism on the one hand, and intransigence on the other. The question of alliances, while present at times, has been of secondary importance as compared to the basic cause of Maximalist-Reformist tension. And the intermediate faction, before 1914 and from 1959 to 1961, has attempted to play the role of tertium gaudens, seeking its supporters on the Right at one Congress and on the Left at the next. The major source of Maximalist-Reformist discord, to be sure, could have existed also under a two-party system, where the question of alliances would not arise. And other causes of factional division in the PSI—the Libyan War which split the Reformist faction in 1911, the anti-Mason issue of 1914<sup>79</sup>—have borne little or no relationship to the question of alliances, and have not been peculiar to a multi-party system.

<sup>77</sup> See Pavone, op. cit., and Cannarsa, op. cit., passim.

<sup>78</sup> See Pavone, ibid., pp. 40–249, Cannarsa, ibid., pp. 205–252.

<sup>79</sup> See Pavone, ibid., pp. 169–179, 194–206, 227–234.

<sup>73</sup> See Cervigni and Galasso, "Inchiesta sul Partito Socialista Italiano nelle provincie meridionali," loc. cit., pp. 79–86, 90–95, and Cervigni and Galasso, "Il Mezzogiorno e il Partito Socialista," loc. cit., p. 33. See also Glorioso, loc. cit.

<sup>74</sup> See Cervigni and Galasso, "Inchiesta sul Partito Socialista Italiano nelle provincie meridionali," loc. cit., pp. 42, 68–73, and Cervigni and Galasso, "Il Mezzogiorno e il Partito Socialista," loc. cit., pp. 31–32. See also Glorioso, ibid.

<sup>75</sup> On Emilia, see Segre, "Il duello dei prossimi due anni," loc. cit., pp. 19–20. On Emilia and Tuscany, see Pera, loc. cit.; party officials and students of PSI problems whom I interviewed all concurred in stressing the role of the provincial apparatus in determining the outcome of the intra-party struggle in the various Tuscan provinces.

<sup>76</sup> Zariski, "Party Factions and Comparative Politics: Some Preliminary Observations," loc. cit., pp. 41–43.

alleged functions—international relations, legislative reference, research—were apparently being performed in a remarkably sporadic and haphazard fashion, or in some instances were not being performed at all.<sup>87</sup> The "apparatus" had been able to defeat the Centrists in 1948–49, when local Autonomist forces lacked imaginative leadership at the national level and when the international and domestic situations tended to favor extremist elements. But in 1959, confronted with the personal opposition of the party's traditional leader, heading a coalition of local and provincial notables allied with ex-Action Party intellectuals, the "apparatus" proved incapable of maintaining its own cohesion, let alone blocking Nenni. One wonders whether the party "apparatus" is ever as cohesive a body as the term might imply.

The development of general structural categories for the study of intra-party politics has been an extremely desirable contribution to comparative politics, particularly because it has presented us with suggestive models for the comparison and evaluation of empirical data. But Duverger's categories must be employed as he intended them to be used: as testing devices, not as restrictive channel markers or substitutes for further empirical findings. It would be very unfortunate if reactions against "mere data-gathering" should lead us to remain too close to the summit and to theorize about politics at the national level without giving adequate attention to regional, local, and interest-group situations which may complicate our conceptual schemes. Further progress in the field of comparative politics will depend, in part, on our ability to break down national political systems and national parties into suitable component elements for closer investigation and more meaningful comparison.

We conclude our study with the following hypotheses, which may be applied, modified, or invalidated by further empirical research.

(1) In general, Socialist weakness appears to be associated with Left-wing intransigence within a Socialist party. More specifically, the following factors will encourage, but not necessarily insure, the prevalence of intransigent tendencies within a Socialist Party in a given area:

- (a) The existence, in that area, of a dominant Communist Party, which exceeds the Socialist Party in electoral strength by a margin of over two-to-one.
- (b) The existence, in that area, of a dominant Catholic Party supported by a long Catholic tradition, by a dense network of Catholic social and economic organizations, and by widespread popular acceptance of paternalism and clerical influence.
- (c) The existence, in that area, of a dominant alliance of clerical, conservative, and reactionary parties—an alliance which includes Right-wing extremist parties and which greatly outnumbers the Left-of-Center bloc.

(2) The following factors will encourage, but not necessarily insure, the prevalence of moderate, gradualist tendencies within a Socialist Party in a given area:

- (a) The existence there of a strong party organization, backed by a numerous membership and by sufficient financial resources to obviate the need for outside assistance.
- (b) The existence there of a highly competitive electoral situation between Left-wing and Right-wing parties.
- (c) The existence there of a Socialist tradition of long standing, reinforced by a dense network of Socialist labor organizations and peasant leagues; but this factor can be vitiated if there is a dominant Communist Party in the area in question.
- (d) The existence there of a high degree of industrialization (with over 35 per cent of the labor force engaged in manufacturing) and a strong non-Catholic trade union movement.
- (e) The existence in the area of a great urban center with a population of over 250,000.

(3) Local or provincial party leaders often can play a decisive role in inter-factional struggles, even in a branch-type Socialist Party. This influence frequently appears to outweigh the pressure of the environmental factors cited in (1) and (2).

(4) In a branch-type party, a charismatic leader, who has either founded the party or has led it through a crucial period of its history, will usually prevail in any struggle with the party bureaucracy. In any such conflict, the party bureaucracy will, in all likelihood, be unable to maintain its cohesion: a large proportion of its members will support the charismatic leader.

<sup>87</sup> See Segre, "Un Partito moderno?", loc. cit., p. 5. See also Piero Ardentl, "L'organizzazione del PSI da Napoli ad oggi," Problemi del Socialismo, Vol. 4 (January, 1961), pp. 15–26, but esp. pp. 15–18. Ardentl claims the "apparatus" never formed a united faction, and that the real problem is not to dethrone the "apparatus" but to provide the PSI with a more efficient organization.

(5) Large intra-party factions are usually clusters of various subgroups animated by a variety of motives, and these clusters are subject to powerful centrifugal forces.

(6) In a multi-party system, a multi-factional situation within a given party may be the result of one or more of the following factors:

(a) The existence, for the party in question, of more than two choices regarding the acceptance or rejection of alliances with neighboring parties on the political spectrum.

(b) A historical background of multi-factionalism going back to the formative decades of the party.

(c) A strong intra-party tradition (usually embodied in formal statutory provisions) of autonomy for local and provincial party organizations.

(d) Domination of the party organization, and of all major factions, by intellectuals—trained in a tradition of disputation regarding the logical and philosophical validity of ideal categories—in a non-empirical tradition, that is.

(7) Branch-type political parties often possess many characteristics of caucus-type parties, especially in their formal intra-party processes at the local level.

(8) There is no clear evidence that affinity of function alone (as in the case of the party "apparatus") can ever produce a cohesive party faction with a high degree of continuity.

THE SOURCES OF PROTEST IN JAPAN

HERBERT PASSIN
University of Washington

The massive demonstrations of May and June 1960, which forced the resignation of the Kishi Cabinet and the cancellation of President Eisenhower's trip to Japan, alarmed Americans as much as they elated the Chinese Communists. The complacent American view of Japan as a sturdy conservative force loyally allied to the United States through a wise and benevolent Occupation and generous economic aid was rudely shattered. Coming at a time when student unrest precipitated the overthrow of governments in South Korea and Turkey—also allies—it was natural that many Americans saw communist plots and a Japan in the grip of a "revolutionary situation." But if they were wrong—and it has taken a great deal of soul-searching for informed opinion to understand fully what happened<sup>1</sup>—they were no less wrong than the Chinese Communists, who read the situation in much the same way. After a two-week trip to Japan in August 1960, Liu Ning-i, Chairman of the All-China Federation of Trade Unions, reported jubilantly that the revolutionary situation in Japan was well advanced. "The Japanese people's future is full of brightness and hope," he wrote.

But even if we discount the over-pessimism of naive American opinion and the over-optimism of the Chinese Communists, it is apparent that there are powerful and disturbing forces on the loose in Japan. To say this, however, is far from saying that Japan is on the verge of a revolution. The existence of revolutionary sentiment alone is not sufficient to bring about a revolution. This depends very much on the ability of the sentiment to crystallize itself in appropriate organizational form and around appropriate issues and on the extent to which moderate and conservative forces are able to maintain their own self-confidence and vigor. In Japan, the revolutionary forces are still far from having won over or neutralized the majority of public sentiment, and the conservative forces still show every sign of vitality, ability, determination, and confidence. But the incidents surrounding the May-June events have revealed several important things. First, that disaffection and alienation with the status quo are widespread, particularly among students, the labor movement, and intellectuals. Second, that the fabric of consensus is seriously torn, that politics is sharply polarized. Third, that American policy is deeply implicated in internal political issues, and that this deep involvement intensifies Japan's susceptibility to the polarization of the cold war.

I

The external signs of the "radicalization" of Japan are quite clear. Since the end of the war there has been a steady increase in the "progressive" vote. Moreover, within the "progressive" vote, the balance has shifted steadily towards the left. In 1952 and 1953, the right socialists within the Japan Socialist Party (JSP) were able to command a bare majority of the total socialist vote.<sup>2</sup> But in the elections of autumn 1960, the Japan Socialist Party, which is predominantly "left" today,<sup>3</sup> alone won 27 percent of the national vote, while the right

<sup>2</sup> In 1952, of the total socialist vote, which tallied 21.3 percent of the national vote, the Right accounted for 11.5 percent, and the Left for 9.8 percent; with this proportion, the Right won 57 seats in the Diet to the Left's 54. In 1953, the total socialist vote rose to 26 percent, the Right accounting for about 14 percent and the Left for about 13; however, in 1960 the Left, with a slightly smaller vote, won 72 seats to the Right's 66.

<sup>3</sup> The Party has undergone two major right-left splits since the end of the war. The 1952 split was finally repaired in 1955, in time for the national elections of that year, but another split took place in late 1959. This one, however, has divided the right wing: the Nishio faction left the Party to form the Democratic Socialist Party and the Kawakami faction remained within the Party, with Mr. Kawakami himself, in an evident effort to prevent his followers from joining the Nishio exodus, elected Party Chairman. A good account of these developments will be found in David C. S. Sissons: "Recent Developments in Japan's Socialist Movement," (in two parts), Far Eastern Survey, Vol. 29 (March and June 1960).

<sup>1</sup> See, e.g., E. O. Reischauer: "The Broken Dialogue with Japan," Foreign Affairs, October 1960; Reischauer: "Some Thoughts on Japanese Democracy," Japan Quarterly, January-March 1961; "Japanese Intellectuals Discuss American-Japanese Relations" (Introduction by Robert Scalapino), special issue of Far Eastern Survey, October 1960; "Japan Today" (Introduction by Ivan Morris), New Leader, Section II, November 28, 1960.

socialists, who split from the JSP in late 1959 to form their own Democratic Socialist Party (DSP), received only 8.7 percent.<sup>4</sup> At the present time, the total "progressive" vote (including the communists, socialists, and democratic socialists) tallies about 39 percent.

The composition of the vote seems to point in the same direction. The progressives base themselves primarily on the urban youth, the educated classes, and the organized working class. Public opinion polls and voting surveys show a consistently higher "progressive" vote: in urban areas than in the countryside (and also in the larger cities than in the small cities and towns); in lower age groups than in higher age groups; in higher educational levels than in lower; and among workers than among non-workers (and also among organized workers than among unorganized workers, and among big-city workers than among small city and town workers). The conservative vote is characteristically strongest in the countryside, among older age groups, and among farmers and small business elements.

Many qualifications need to be placed on the significance of this vote. Certainly not all of it, even for the left socialists, is "revolutionary" in character. Much of it is more correctly a "protest" vote that reflects support for the socialists on particular issues—especially of foreign policy—and distrust of the professional conservative politicians. But it certainly shows that the arena of discontent, within which revolutionary ideas have their play, has been growing.

If these trends continue in a straight line for the next decade or so, it is clear that at some point in the foreseeable future, the progressive vote, now almost 40 percent, should pass the 50 percent mark, and so bring the socialists to power. Projections of the inner trends lead to similar conclusions. The rural population is declining rapidly, the urban population rising. The level of education continues to rise year by year. The majority of youth entering the voting ranks for the first time vote left; as they move up the age scale, and as the older age groups retire from the scene, there should be an increasingly "radicalization" of each age group.

The question, then, is whether these trends will in fact continue to their apparent conclusion, or whether there might not be other forces or new developments in the making that would cut them short. It has often happened that a protest movement waxes at the very moment the conditions that brought it into being disappear. This, I suspect, may very well be what is happening in Japan today. In a more general way, the question is: how much revolutionary discontent can a modern industrial society accommodate, under what conditions? In early 1946, a Cabinet Minister, scheduled to be purged within a few days offered me the following prediction: "We will become, I think, a country like France or Italy. Our left will go to one-fourth or even one-third of the population. As long as it remains at that level, I think we shall be able to live with it, just as France and Italy can." "And if it goes beyond?" I asked. "That," he said "is what I don't know." Fifteen years later, Japan has reached the Minister's peril point, the so-called "one-third barrier," as the socialists themselves characterize it. Whether we judge it to have penetrated significantly beyond depends upon how we evaluate the right socialist vote of 13.2 percent, made up of the 8.7 percent who voted for the Democratic Socialist Party as well as the 4.5 percent who voted for the right-wing Kawakami faction of the JSP.<sup>5</sup> The suspicion <sup>4</sup> Since the Kawakami faction of the JSP shares approximately the same ideological position as the newly formed DSP, a more accurate picture of the "right socialist" vote in the country would include the votes cast for the Kawakami faction, which come to approximately 4.5 percent of the national vote (about 17 percent of the JSP vote). This would suggest a little over 13 percent of the electorate voting a right socialist position, and about 22.5 percent voting left socialist (the total JSP vote minus the Kawakami votes).

At the time of the Party split late in 1959 the distribution of Diet seats was as follows: JSP, 128 (of which the Kawakami faction held 35) and DSP, 37. After the 1960 elections the distribution was: JSP, 145 (of which the Kawakami faction held 28) and DSP, 17.

<sup>5</sup> In the 1960 elections, the "progressive vote," which tallies 38.8 percent, was distributed as follows:

Party (and Faction)	% of national vote
Japan Socialist Party	27.2
Left factions*	22.7
Kawakami faction	4.5
Democratic Socialist Party	8.7
Japan Communist Party	2.9
Total	38.8

* Including the Suzuki, Nomizo, Wada, Rono, and Matsumoto factions, plus a small number of uncommitted Diet members.

If the DSP vote is considered firmly part of the progressive vote, then the progressives have in-that the "one-third barrier" may be a natural limit has haunted the socialists for some time, and it underlies the debates between right and left over whether the Party is to be a "class party" or a "mass" or "people's" party, capable of appealing to elements outside the working class. In the perennial debates over this issue, the experiences of European socialist parties, such as the British Labour Party and the German Social-Democratic Party, weigh heavily in the minds of the moderates. The most recent version of this dispute revolves around the concept, most strongly identified with the new General Secretary, Mr. Eda Saburo, the successor to the assassinated Mr. Asanuma, of the "structural revolution." Although the term has been taken from some debates within the Italian Communist Party—which makes it more palatable to the extreme left—it seems to represent a search for a pragmatic, subtle and yet responsible opposition to replace the negative politics of all-out opposition. It is a politics of "continuing the dialogue." The party may not be able to hold to this policy, under pressure from its own left, but it is a significant experiment.

II

Whatever the ultimate fate of this experiment, Japanese politics today remains sharply polarized. The gap between right and left is deep and principled, and the area of consensus is extremely limited. As in any country where politics is so ideological, compromise is difficult, and all issues tend to take on a total character. Unions strike for higher wages with the slogans of "Down With the Government," "Yankees Go Home," "Protect the Constitution," "Recognize Communist China," "Hands Off Cuba," and "Reject the Japanese-American Security Treaty." Whatever the starting point of the protest—higher prices or the encroachment of American bases on farmland or the building of experimental rocket bases—it quickly trips off the same range of issues, as if they formed a seamless web. No issue stands alone, to be dealt with piecemeal and ad hoc, but as part of a matrix of issues, interdependent and mutually reinforcing. Each "struggle," then, as the Japanese progressives term it, quickly becomes generalized into a major confrontation of very much the same elements: intellectuals, students, and unionists on the one side, and whatever combination of status quo forces happens to emerge on the other side. Peasant demonstrations against, say, the extension of American airbase runways or the installation of Japanese rocket testing bases, are often joined by students—not always to the peasants' liking, it may be added. Striking workers find themselves joined by student pickets, or even by other "progressive" elements, such as intellectuals, "defenders of peace," and "defenders of the Constitution," offering physical, financial, and moral support. Similarly, the May-June 1960 demonstrations began with the students, but were soon joined by unionists and intellectuals.

This quality of all-out, uncompromising struggle is the most disturbing feature of the political climate of Japan today. "If you think the dialogue between Japan and America is in danger," one of Japan's leading public figures recently said to me, "let me tell you that the dialogue between left and right here in Japan is in even more danger. It is becoming harder every day to bring them into the same room, much less to have a real discussion." Therefore, although the normal procedures of parliamentary government prevail in the great bulk of ordinary matters, they are increasingly abandoned when the great issues, over which public opinion divides sharply, come up. The tactics of "struggle," of "direct action," and extra-parliamentary pressure begin to replace those of negotiation, compromise, and discussion. Not only is the work of the Diet seriously impeded, but the refusal to accept its authority and the resort to mass pressure and violent parliamentary filibustering bring the institution of parliamentary democracy itself into disrepute.

No doubt many Japanese people, worried by this growing polarization of national politics, would favor a politics of the center. But their continuing failure is itself a mark of the profundity of the polarization. The main attempt, the Socialist-Democratic coalition governments of 1947-48, first under Socialist Katayama and then under conservative Democrat Ashida, collapsed so ignominiously as to bring the very notion of a centralist government into dis-deed gone well beyond one-third. However, if the DSP vote is considered largely a "centrist" vote, then the "progressive" vote falls to 30.1 percent. If, in addition, we consider the 4.5 percent of the votes cast for Kawakami-faction candidates as, by and large, also "centrist," then the hard-core "progressive" votes—of left socialists and communists—falls to 25.6 percent, and the "right socialist" vote (for the DSP and the Kawakami faction) rises to 13.2 percent. This figure shows a remarkable stability for the right socialist sentiment in the country: in 1952, it was about 12 percent; in 1953 and 1955, about 14 percent. The big growth in the socialist vote has been on the left, from 10 percent in 1952 to about 23 percent in 1960.

repute. In the very next elections in 1949, the Communists went from their previous 3 percent to 10 percent of the national vote and 35 seats in the Diet.<sup>6</sup> Since then there has been, particularly on the left, a steady weakening of the moderate forces, if not absolutely then at least relatively. In five years, the organized right socialists have declined from a high point of about 14 percent of the national vote (a slight majority of the combined socialist vote of 27 percent) and 66 members of the Diet in 1955, to under 9 percent of the national vote (as against over 27 percent<sup>7</sup> for the left socialists) and only 17 seats in 1960. On the conservative side, the factions favorable to a politics of the center have so far been constrained by the requirements of party unity.

What we find, therefore, is that the mainstream of Japan is divided sharply into two social-political combinations: the progressives, based largely on organized workers, intellectuals,<sup>8</sup> and students; and the conservatives, based largely on business, the middle classes, and the peasantry.

Many observers would add a third, the ultra-right; but I myself, for the time being, prefer to see it on the periphery, rather than in the center. The traditional sources of right-wing strength—the military and peasant discontent, especially as it was refracted through the Army—no longer exist. And the virulent ultra-nationalism which fed it has been too thoroughly discredited as a comprehensive ideology; the patriotic component, even in its extreme form, has been to a large extent absorbed by the neo-nationalism of the progressives. In the light of Japanese history it would be foolhardy to argue that the ultra-right presents no menace at all, but this is still on the margins of society. The crackpots and toughs of the ultra-right can create trouble through direct action and terrorism, and they can help create a mood of general willingness to resort to violence and extra-parliamentary methods.

<sup>6</sup> But in the following elections in 1952, the Communist vote plummeted once again to 2.7 percent and no seats in the Diet. It is clear that a great part of the left socialist vote, discontented with the politics of coalition, had gone to the Communists in 1949 and returned "home" when the danger of coalition was over.

<sup>7</sup> But see the qualification of this figure, above, note 5.

<sup>8</sup> By this term, I would include—following a recent suggestion by Prof. T. Takahashi of Tokyo University—the "minor intellectuals"—school teachers, higher technicians, higher civil servants, and white-collar workers.

The unleashing of terrorism on the right can also stimulate a reactive terrorism and violence on the left, a cycle already visible during the May-June riots. So far, however, a large moderate public, which remembers the terrorism of the late 1930s all too well, has reacted so strongly against violence, whether of the left or of the right, that this cycle has not yet been able to to run a full course.<sup>9</sup> What is much more serious at this stage is that the presence of an ultra-right, however insignificant, stirs historical memories, still very much alive, which may very well interfere with the normalization of Japanese politics. A left that sees ultra-rightism behind every conservative move is much less inclined to compromise and accept the adjustive mechanisms of parliamentary democracy than one that takes conservative measures at face value and opposes them on their inherent merits. Under certain conditions a genuine revival of an ultra-right, although certainly not of the massive proportions of the prewar period, is no doubt conceivable; but this is not Japan's immediate problem.

The social-political combinations I have suggested also require certain qualifications as well as perhaps a more dynamic estimate of the potential of each group. Not all workers, nor even all organized workers, support the progressive side. Moreover, although the peasantry, transformed by the American land reforms and buoyed up both by a continuing high level of prosperity and a stable improvement of its economic and political position in relation to the urban sector, is certainly in no revolutionary mood, one can conceive of many conditions in which this might change. For the moment, however, the peasantry gives its main support to the conservatives, and the government and the conservatives, in their turn, cultivate it carefully by devoted attention to its problems.

III

The modern forms of protest and alienation in Japan appear to derive from four principal strata of national experience. The first of these is the "reactive nationalism"—to use Rostow's useful term—that lay at the heart of much of the Meiji Restoration movement. The need to "prove" herself to and against the West, the struggle for recognition and equality, the constant tension of tradition and modernity, the search for a stable identity capable of synthesizing the conflicting elements, are problems essentially similar to those of the new states today. The second is the class-conflict stage of modern industrial society, classically described by Engels in his Conditions of the Working Classes in England in 1844. With the maturing industrialization of Japan and the formation of a modern working class, the same kinds of revolutionary protest developed as in Western Europe and the United States, of say, the 1930s. The third element derives from the humiliation of Japan's defeat and the complete destruction of the authority of the old order. The consequence has been a deep secular movement, strongly reminiscent of the tensions of the Meiji Era, to restore national self-respect and the sense of national self-direction—what a colleague and I have elsewhere called “the search for identity.”<sup>10</sup> Therefore, although Japan was herself a powerful and ruthless empire, it has been possible for many Japanese to indulge themselves in an orgy of self-pity as victims of imperialism, as a colonial or “semi-colonial” dependent people struggling for independence and liberation. The fourth layer is the typical modern discontent with the mass society, the protest against aimlessness, rootlessness, vulgarity, commercialism, declining standards, and boredom.

<sup>9</sup> The sharp decline of the communist vote in 1952 resulted, at least in part, from strong public revulsion against the Party's "fire-bottle" tactics in the early part of the year. Since that time the Party has carried on a systematic campaign to transform itself into a "peaceful" and "lovable" Party.

One would expect that such diverse layers would normally have their own different styles and directions. Before the war, for example, the class-struggle sentiment was strongly anti-nationalist, and the nationalist sentiment normally went to the support of the militarists. Today, however, we find all these roots strongly intertwined and reinforcing each other. The postwar socialist movement has fallen heir to a nationalist resurgence with which it cannot always be entirely at ease, particularly in the case of the prewar leaders. The rationalization is offered, to be sure, that nationalism is “progressive” and “revolutionary” in the period of struggle for national independence, but a Suzuki Mosaburo cannot intone the slogans of “racial” or “national” unity with the same conviction as an old-style fire-eating nationalist of prewar days. The intellectual's contempt for the “mambo-boy,” which he may formulate in terms of “American influence” or of “capitalist decadence,” echoes the prewar ultra-nationalist's complaints and the late Meiji “Japanist's” laments that Japan is “losing her soul.” And we can surely detect the echo of the samurai contempt for the merchant classes and private egotism in the intellectual's anti-capitalism and anti-commercialism.

Two things bring the different elements together: first, the complete destruction of the prestige and moral authority of the old order—of the military, the war leaders, the weak and corrupt politicians, the compliant businessmen, the police, and the official ideologists; second, the continuing presence of the United States, which provides a convenient focus for the polarization of all discontent.

The modern protest in Japan consequently has a dual character: in part it is similar to types of protest well known in the Western advanced countries—anti-capitalism, the workers' struggle, anti-traditionalism, liberalism, etc., from an earlier phase, and the tensions of the mass society at a later stage; in part it has the tone of an under-developed country—assertive nationalism and occasionally even racialism, the feeling of a struggle for “true” national independence, and great hyper-sensitivity.

IV

Before we examine the historical stratigraphy of protest in Japan, let us look at the problem from a slightly different angle. Every protest movement, whether it develops into a full revolutionary movement or not, is a protest against a particular status quo. This status quo includes the dominant social consensus, the ruling political coalition, and the dominant ideology. In a country like Japan, we would also have to add: the prevailing balance of modernity and tradition. Each combination—each formula, as it were—includes some forces and excludes others; represents some and excludes others; satisfies some and arouses protest in others. It will be useful to identify in a general way just what combination a particular form of protest, rebelliousness, or revolutionary mood is directed against.

Meiji Japan's first coalition of triumphant junior samurai and court nobles started out in the 1870s and 1880s with several enormous advantages: the élan of revolutionary victory and powerful support of the legitimacy conferred upon it by the Imperial Throne. Yet it quickly evoked a protest from two sides. The conservative samurai protest, symbolized by Saigō Takamori, against over-Westernization and insufficient nationalism, was finally subdued only by large-scale military action. On the other hand, the excluded samurai and the small rural industrialists and landlords, who had no share in the new government, mounted a protest movement around the slogans of "people's rights" (minken) and "representative government" that eventually forced a reluctant regime to adopt a constitution and to establish a representative assembly. It was, to be sure, a strictly controlled system, and the autocratic oligarchy still held the power cards, but it was nevertheless the entering wedge for a line of development not anticipated by the Meiji leaders.

<sup>10</sup> J. W. Bennett, H. Passin, and R. McKnight: In Search of Identity (Minneapolis, University of Minnesota Press, 1958).

The new power balance of the oligarchy, at the center of power, and the military, a potential competitor, in the wings, still gave only minimal concessions to the upper-class rural and urban elements represented by the political parties, and certainly none at all to the mass of the peasantry and to the just-emerging working classes. Yet firm and forehanded as the oligarchy tried to be, it had not fully reckoned with the power of the new forces it had itself created by modernization and education. The new middle class—businessmen, and educated classes brought up in the new schools and exposed to a strong dose of Western ideas—were not content to be permanently excluded from a share in government. Expressing themselves mainly through the political parties, they pushed constantly for an enlargement of the franchise and greater power for the representative as against the autocratic element in the state. Their ultimate goal, if clearly formulated, would have been a fully responsible system of cabinet government, i.e., a cabinet formed by the majority party of the elected assembly and responsible to it. Lower-class protest was, of course, firmly repressed.

The end of the First World War found a vastly changed Japan with a new central coalition. For the first time, business was accepted as a full partner with the political parties and the bureaucracy, the heir of the oligarchy of 40 years before. But enlarged as this coalition was, it still aroused the bitter and violent protest both of the new progressive element—the working class, which was enfranchised only in 1925, the Westernized liberals, the students, and the intellectuals—and of the conservative traditionalists, now represented primarily by the armed forces. In the struggle, which was a bitter one indeed, the party-business-bureaucracy regime was able to restrain the progressive forces; but with the incidents of May 15, 1932 and February 26, 1936, it fell before the forces of militant nationalism. From this time on a new power coalition dominated the Japanese scene, with the military as its center and the support of a fully compliant bureaucracy and a now chastened business class. Only defeat in the war finally destroyed it.

Reactive Nationalism. It is sometimes forgotten, now that Japan is such an old "new state," that she too began her modern career under the strong fear of Western domination. The earliest Western treaties with Japan imposed humiliating conditions, such as extraterritoriality and tariff control, that were completely thrown off only after Japan had proved that she was "worthy" of equal treatment by defeating China and Russia in war. Therefore, although Japan was never a colony, she shared the same feeling of inferiority toward the West as the colonial countries. A sensitive Japanese could not but feel the disparity between Western power and Japanese weakness. However he might regard his own traditional values and institutions as superior, this meant, in an effective sense, inferiority, at least in those matters that enter into the balance-sheet of national strength. What was necessary was to overcome this inferiority as quickly as possible and to draw level with the West.

The leading elements of the anti-Tokugawa coalition, the younger samurai of the western and southern fiefs, were motivated therefore not so much by abstract ideological considerations as by the practical need for Japan to strengthen herself against Western pressure. This entailed above all two things: the creation of a strong, efficient, centralized modern state apparatus, and the building of industrial-military power. All the reforms flowed from these two requirements: the ending of feudalism and its class system, industrialization and modern economic methods, a modern conscript army, and a modern educational system. In developing its new institutions, Japan looked to the West for suitable models. In other words, she had to Westernize herself in order to resist the West.

But this created a dilemma, which still remains to plague the Japanese, perhaps even as much today, now that Japan has gone through another "colonial" period of Occupation by a foreign power, as ever before: how to be Western and yet remain Japanese. The problem was already adumbrated as early as the late 18th and early 19th century by the so-called "Dutch scholars" (the students of Western learning through the medium of the Dutch language). Laboriously piecing out their picture of Western power, they arrived at the formula "Western science, but Eastern morals." With suitable modifications for geography, this formula has continued to echo down through the years as each new nation enters the orbit of modernization—in the form of the Indian spirit, or of pan-Arabism, or of the African personality. The extreme alternatives were: to retain the traditional structure intact, but simply to beef it up with Western arms and power—if it could have been conceived in the late 19th century, perhaps to give every samurai an atom bomb; or to replace the traditional system completely by some version of a generic Western society, even to the replacement of the Japanese language by English and the introduction of Christianity. No conceivable balance therefore was capable of satisfying all internal opinion. Even the minimal adjustments of the central Meiji leadership brought the conservative samurai, as early as the 1870s, into violent protest and finally into the climactic revolt of Saigō Takamori, which required the full military weight of the new regime to put down.

How fragile any consequent balance was may be seen in the rapid alternations of Westernization and reaction. Since 1868, Japan has gone through three such cycles. The early "Western fever" of the 1860s and 1870s was followed by the conservative reaction of the late 1880s which continued right down to the First World War. This period saw the formulation of the Meiji Constitution, the Emperor's Rescript on Education, the development of the Emperor myth, and the rise of "Japanism." The new wave of Westernism and liberalism after the First World War was followed in its turn by the victory of ultra-nationalist militarism. And the latest Western fever, or perhaps more accurately the "American fever," of the early Occupation period has been followed by a strong nationalist reaction, this time under the leadership of the left and the "progressive" forces.

The Working Class<sup>11</sup> and Modern Industrial Society: (1) The Left. The rapid industrialization of Japan created both a working class and its typical discontents. It also created a powerful tradition of working-class alienation from "the system." In spite of certain unique elements arising from special historical conditions and Japan's cultural background, the essential features in the picture are familiar to us from the experience of the working classes in the West. The Japanese working class, torn from the sustaining warmth of the organic peasant communities of the countryside, was severely exploited by a particularly arrogant and narrow-minded management, well aware of the trade advantages of a low-paid labor force in a modern industrial economy. From their very first appearance on the scene, the workers were kept under strict control, either by paternalism or outright repression.

Moreover, the working class was politically disfranchised for the first 60 years of the New Japan. Its acceptance into full citizenship in political society has been a grudging process. The liberal Kato-Shidehara Cabinet enacted full manhood suffrage, free of tax qualifications, in 1925. Characteristically it balanced this liberal measure by immediately passing a strengthened Peace Preservation Law to prevent the "overthrow of the Emperor system" and of the system of private property.

The workers' movements therefore found themselves, from the very start, ranged against the status quo, and anti-status quo ideologies, from anarchism to socialism and even Christian socialism, made their appearance as early as the beginning of the 20th century.<sup>12</sup> When the labor movement began to reveal its modern shape after the First World War, neither of the two central power coalitions of the 1920s and 1930s—neither the businessman-bureaucrat-politician combination of the early period nor the military-bureaucrat combination of the end of the period—could accommodate it. The working-class movement, therefore, particularly after the First World War, could not help but be anti-status quo and revolutionary. The Peace Preservation Law, thought control, and the growing suppression of radicalism, liberalism, and nonconformism drove it further to the left. Although the repression was largely effective while it lasted, and particularly in the late 1930s, once it was lifted after the war by the American Occupation, the power of this tradition became immediately apparent. The postwar leadership and ideologies brought to the fore were those most strongly opposed to the prewar regime—i.e., leftists, socialists, and Marxists. From that time on a vastly expanded labor movement has maintained this strong leftist and class-struggle bias, with its corollary orientation towards political, rather than purely economic, action.

To some extent the rigors of control and repression were moderated by the projection of traditional paternalistic concepts into modern industry.<sup>13</sup> But this has always been a two-edged sword. Insofar as this paternalism gave genuine benefits, particularly to workers of limited horizons fresh from rural backgrounds, working in small enterprises, it did create a version of the happy family working harmoniously for the common interest. But once these three essential conditions no longer obtain, the system of paternalism simply becomes irksome to the workers, a further restraint on their full development. As the benefits, such as sick care, job guarantees, unemployment insurance, pensions, etc., become increasingly available through the impersonal mechanisms of the state, the need for the traditional system declines. The personal relation of employer and worker in a small enterprise is replaced by the impersonal imperatives of modern large-scale enterprise. At the same time, the increase in educational level, growing individuation, and the "demonstration effect" of the way of life of the upper classes, have altered the workers' willingness to continue in the position of a dependent and filial child of a benevolent father-boss.<sup>14</sup>

<sup>11</sup> For a good account of the labor movement see the writings of Solomon Levine, particularly his Industrial Relations in Postwar Japan (Urbana, University of Illinois Press, 1958); of James Abegglen, particularly his The Japanese Factory (Glencoe, 1958); and of Benjamin Martin.

<sup>12</sup> See Cecil Uehara: Leftwing Social Movements in Japan: An Annotated Bibliography (Tokyo, Tuttle, 1959).

The high class-consciousness, which characterizes much of the organized labor movement, is no new thing in Japan. It was, to be sure, stimulated by the course of the struggle and by the ideological outlook of the leadership. But it was already present in ample measure throughout society as a whole. Although Japan had left feudalism behind, it carried over the strong class bias of Tokugawa society, the disposition to see people in terms of class, and the sense of strong hierarchical barriers between superiors and inferiors. This class consciousness, along with the sense of alienation from the status quo, particularly among the leftist-dominated organized workers, has led to what I should like to call the "institutionalization" of the trade-union movement as a part of working class life. The workers have never been particularly responsive to the "proletarian literature" of the 1920s and 1930s, nor to their far less numerous postwar counterparts; but the unions have succeeded since the war in creating, to some extent, an area of "working-class culture." A wide range of social and cultural activities of organized workers are channelled through the union movement, in parallel, as it were, to similar activities in the non-trade-union world. The enormous variety of sports associations, singing clubs, women's auxiliaries, outings, and educational activities can take up much of the worker's leisure time. An interesting example is the Workers' Musical League (Ro-on), which provides music at low cost to workers. Through its large-scale booking of concert halls, musical organizations, and musicians, it has by now become an important factor in concert management and in musical life. The alliance of left intellectuals with organized workers, already in evidence in the 1920s, is similarly strengthened by union educational activities, which provide an outlet—as well as sometimes a source of income—to many professors, writers, and journalists. And, since "power goes with money" even in proletarian organizations, the dependence of the Japan Socialist Party on the financial support of the unions makes it more responsive to political pressures from the leftist unions than vice versa.

Apart from ideology and politics, one structural feature of the labor movement strongly reinforces its political orientation: its large proportion of government workers. The Japan Teachers' Union, with about 600,000 members, is both the largest union in Japan and one of the most political. In Sohyo (General Council of Trade Unions), the largest and most left of Japan's labor bodies (claimed membership about 3,400,000), approximately two-thirds of the members are government workers, either "public employees" or employees of government corporations, such as the national railways and communications. This means that in an important sense their "class enemy" is government itself, rather than private individuals or corporations, so that labor-management issues can only be negotiated with the political authority. Their interest in the composition of government, the orientation of the Cabinet, and the allocation of priorities in the national budget makes them very political.

<sup>13</sup> A good account of the institutions of paternalism may be found in several articles by Iwao Ishino and John Bennett as well as in Levine, op. cit., and Abegglen, op. cit. and particularly in Bennett and Ishino: The Social Anthropology of Paternalism in Japan (forthcoming—Minneapolis, University of Wisconsin Press).

<sup>14</sup> Benjamin Martin, "Japanese Mining Labor: The Miike Strike," Far Eastern Survey, Vol. 30 (February 1961), p. 27, gives an extremely interesting example: "In the years immediately following the war the newly established Miike union was relatively docile and made little trouble for the management. The changing times did not seem to have outwardly affected labor-management relations but the customary arrogance of the mine executives, previously never challenged by the semi-literate miners of the old days, created an increasing sense of irritation among workers who were often as well educated as their superiors."

If I have emphasized the forces making for organized dissent in the working class, I do not wish to leave the impression that this is the whole picture. Certainly the organized working class is largely dominated by a leftist anti-status quo leadership and ideology. But the organized labor movement, numbering some 6.5 to 7 million members, is only about 25 percent of the total non-agricultural labor force of over 26 millions. Moreover, the most leftist of the unions, Sohyo, constitutes slightly less than half of the total union membership, and not all of this can be counted upon as absolutely obedient to the initiatives of the leadership. The leadership of the rival federation, the Zenro, along with the smaller associated Sodomei, is much more moderate.<sup>14a</sup>

(2) The Right. But there was in the interwar years a powerful rightist dissent from the liberal capitalist version of industrial society as well. For the fanatic partisans of the "Showa Restoration," intent on a new version of "Western science and Eastern morals," the balance of tradition and modernity was tilted the wrong way. The true national polity (koku-tai) they wished to see established was not conceivable in the corruption, divisiveness, and egotism of the existing order. Their targets therefore became the corrupt political parties, with their unseemly squabbling, partisan spirit, bribery, and indifference to the national interest; the selfish capitalists, who had already earned their undying hatred by a greater concern for profits and low taxes than for the needs of the military; liberalism; Western influence; and internationalism. The military contempt for capitalism was reinforced by an important structural feature of the Japanese army. The majority of recruits were from the peasantry, and many of the junior officers were themselves of peasant or small landowner stock. The normal conservative peasant distrust of the corrupt Westernized cities was exacerbated by the agrarian depression; and since the peasants had virtually no other channels of protest, it was the junior officers, extremely sensitive to the problems of the countryside and the worries of their troops, who undertook to express them.

Lt. Col. Aizawa Saburo, for example, on trial for the murder in 1935 of Gen. Nagata, Chief of the Military Affairs Bureau, explained his motive as follows: "When I thought of these things [the sad state of the country, the impoverishment of the peasants, the official scandals, and the weakness of foreign policy], I could not merely pass the time giving military training to my regiment." In like manner, the junior officer Goto Akinori explained his part in the May 15, 1932, incident in similar terms:

... The impoverishment of the agricultural villages is the cause of grave concern for thoughtful persons. It is extremely dangerous that while soldiers from the villages expose themselves to death at the front they should have to worry about their starving families. . . . In utter disregard of the poverty-stricken farmers the fabulously rich continue their pursuit of private gain. Meanwhile the children of the farmers are so poor that they must go to school in the morning without breakfast. . . . To let a day go by without doing something is to endanger the army one day longer, was my thought.<sup>15</sup>

Thus, while the working class and liberal protest was coming increasingly under Marxist, socialist, and liberal influence, the rightist anti-capitalist protest was finding its ideologists in Kita Ikki,<sup>16</sup> Gondo Seikyo, and Okawa Shumei with their notions of "socialism under the Emperor," "agrarian socialism," and "revolutionary imperial socialism." It is therefore not surprising that the militarist and ultra-nationalist terrorists of the 1930s invariably numbered the representatives of the "plutocracy" among their victims, along with the politicians and the other "evil advisers" who were "misleading the Emperor."

Defeat and Occupation. Japan's crushing defeat in the war has been as traumatic an experience as the intrusion of the West in the late 19th century, and it has reopened many of the same dilemmas, however modern their dress. The difference is that now the balance of forces has changed. The authority and legitimacy of the old order were destroyed, and the hitherto suppressed progressive forces were released into the mainstream of national life.

The collapse of the old order implicated not only the military and the ultra-nationalists, but everything that appeared to be associated with it: the older generation, the compliant politicians and businessmen, the family system, and "Japanese tradition" itself.<sup>17</sup> The result

<sup>15</sup> Translated from materials made available by Mr. Tokuyama Jiro.

<sup>16</sup> See in particular his Nihon Kaizō Hōan Taikō (Outline Plan for the Reconstruction of Japan), his most important work.

<sup>17</sup> Indicative of this outlook is the title of a study by one of Japan's leading sociologists, was, in the words of Takeyama Michio, that "the Japanese jumped to the conclusion that historic Japan in its entirety was wrong, and there followed a period of bitter self-rejection and self-indictment."<sup>18</sup> Moreover, bad as the old system may have been, it had given meaning and purpose to life, a way of seeing the world, and an opportunity for service and sacrifice to a larger cause. The search for a new ideology and a new synthesis inevitably brought many people to Marxism, which had already been a powerful force among the progressives of the '20s and the '30s, since it was the only fully elaborated system of thought that was both comprehensive and also not discredited by the past. It appealed to the purely intellectual need for systematic understanding, and it appealed to the need for purpose and self-sacrifice. Western liberalism was too tepid, neither comprehensive nor demanding enough; and later, as we shall see, it was compromised by its association with "capitalism" and with the United States. For many people searching for something pure, uncontaminated by the war and the hated past, the communists had a special appeal; as the principal victims and opponents of the militarists, they were virtually the only uncompromised political force, if only for the reason that all of their leaders were either in jail or in exile. Tsurumi Shunsuke, a leading young intellectual, himself American-educated, has explained this very brilliantly in a fascinating account of why he supports the Japan Communist Party even though he is not a Marxist. The recent revival of religious sects, which have mushroomed all over Japan, undoubtedly represents another form of search for synthesis. Significantly the religious resurgence has not gone into the traditional channels of Shintoism, Buddhism, or even Christianity, but into deviant and newly established messianic religions.

<sup>14a</sup> On April 26, 1962, these two unions plus several other independents joined together in a new federation called the General Council of Japan Labor Organizations (Domei Kaigi) with a claimed membership of 1.4 millions.

At the same time that the discredited conservative forces were being held back by purges and the disfavor of the Occupation, the progressive forces were being given their head. A tremendous outburst of "democratic" energies, along with the continuing American reforms, touched almost every sector of Japanese life. In the first period of the Occupation, this force was strongly identified with the United States, and the ensuing Americanization of Japan began to take on epidemic proportions. But the early enthusiasm, particularly of the intellectuals, soon gave way to an inevitable reaction. Unfortunately this wholly expectable nationalist reaction coincided with an apparently new direction in American policy, to some extent a result of the cold war. The liberals felt deeply betrayed; America's reactionary "reverse course," as they termed it, was forcing them to defend the American reforms not only against the conservatives, but against the Americans themselves.

Another important development has been the emergence of a powerful streak of nihilism, particularly among the youth. The rapid changes, the confusions, the "transvaluation of values," and the discrediting of the old authority without its replacement by a new, have created what the Japanese themselves refer to as a "spiritual void." Nor is this entirely new. Nihilism has long had a deep appeal to modern Japanese, as we can see in the undiminished popularity of Dostoevsky,<sup>19</sup> for example, or in such important Japanese novelists as Akutagawa Ryunosuke and Dazai Osamu. Characteristically it has been non-political and anti-traditional, asserting the priority of individual judgment over social convention and judgment. Therefore eroticism, both as pure, primary experience and as a form of Sade's criticism of civil society, plays an important role. The "ero-gro" (erotic and grotesque) literature of the 1920s has been succeeded by the postwar eroticism and hedonism of Tamura Taijiro, whose Nikutai no Mon (The Gates of the Flesh) opened the movement, and Ishihara Shinichiro, its greatest hero. Ishihara's Taiyozoku (Tribe of the Sun), which rapidly became a runaway best-seller, gave the movement its form and even its name. Japan's taiyozoku now take their place as the counterpart of the angry young men, the stilyagi, and the beatniks of other countries.

But although it considers itself non-political, its anti-conventional hedonism cannot fail to be implicitly political. As an all-out rejection of "the system," it implies its own politics of dissent against tradition, custom, authority, political leadership, and the status quo. Nor should this be too surprising when we reflect that England's angry young men are probably well represented in the unilateralist movement and <sup>19</sup> Russian literature has had, in some ways, a greater appeal to modern Japanese intellectuals than that of any other country. Already in the early and middle Meiji period, the great Russians of the 19th century were well known, and the nihilism of Vera Zasulich, Bakunin and Dostoevsky were as popular as the idealistic anarchism of Kropotkin and Tolstoy.

Prof. Kawashima Takeyoshi, The Family System as Ideology.

<sup>18</sup> Takeyama Michio, "Tradition and Japanese Youth," Japan Quarterly, July-September 1960.

that America's beatniks seemed for a while to find in Fidel Castro their own "existentialist hero." The nihilism will therefore lead either to an unresolved despair, which will continuously corrode authority, or to the search for a resolution, which under present conditions is most likely to mean the acceptance of a "revolutionary"—that is, an anti-status quo—authority. This streak is found among the leaders of the student Zengakuren, particularly among those who are so revolutionary that they cannot even accept the authority of the Japanese Communist Party and must regard the Soviet Union and Communist China as already too reactionary for them.<sup>20</sup>

The complicating element in the postwar situation is the position of the United States. The United States has managed, by its massive presence, to become bound up with the profoundest divisions within the country on both internal and external questions. It is identified with the anti-progressive side on virtually all the important and symbolic issues in the country: rearmament, the revival of the power of the military, the restoration of the police power, the revision of the Constitution, the strengthening of the conservative elements, the reversal of the Occupation reforms, and the absence of formal diplomatic relations with Communist China. Its presence is a continuing affront to a reviving nationalist sentiment. If we were to formulate the standard view of the Japanese progressives, it would run somewhat as follows: "fascist and imperialist United States, the home of monopoly capitalism, is supporting Japan's conservatives, backed by Japan's own monopoly capitalists, in power in order to keep the country in a state of economic and political dependence so that she can continue to use the military bases as a springboard for aggression." The maintenance of American bases, the Japanese-American Security Treaty, and continued economic dependence upon the United States reinstate deep memories of the "unequal treaties" of Meiji times. In the words of Asanuma Inejiro, the recently assassinated General Secretary of the Japan Socialist Party:

... we must struggle for peace and independence, and carry on the struggle for the return of Okinawa to Japan, the struggle for restoration of normal relations with Communist China and the struggle against nuclear bombs. We must combine all these struggles into one struggle for revision of the unequal Security Pact and connect this struggle with the struggle for the people's welfare.<sup>21</sup>

The status quo, then, against which Japanese discontent directs itself, is, symbolically, the Japanese-American alliance. This may, I think, explain something about the intensity of the May-June demonstrations against the Security Treaty as well as about the peculiar intensity of Japanese feelings on the recognition of Communist China, now one of the central issues in Japanese politics. For many, China has become the symbol of "true national independence" and of Japan's right to self-direction. Since America has been the principal obstacle to the restoration of normal relations, the assertion of friendship to China offers the added thrill of thumbing one's nose at America. That successive conservative governments, regularly re-elected by almost two-thirds of the voters, continue a policy of non-recognition is put down to mere supine obedience to America. The result is that the "China Boom," which swept the country from 1953 onwards, has taken on the character of an emotional crusade, and Japanese visitors to the mainland now outnumber those of any other nationality. Not all, even among the progressives, would be prepared to agree with the extreme proposition, frequently formulated by Japanese visitors to China in joint statements with their Chinese hosts, that "the United States is the common enemy of the Chinese and the Japanese people," but the logic of it is hard to resist.

In the new version of the old game of "how can I be both Japanese and Western," the cards are cut in a different way. Before the war, to be anti-traditional meant to be somehow "un-Japanese." But today, thanks to the United States and to the contempt for the old order, one can be both anti-traditional and 100-per cent Japanese. It is the conservatives, America's allies, who have to prove that they are not the "catpaw of foreign imperialism"—even if only "objectively." Raymond Aron has somewhere commented on the "Americanized Japanese who detest their American teachers."

The "Mass Society." Let us now return to the question, whether the political trend will continue long enough to bring the progressives into office. Sixteen years after the end of the war, the kind of internal situation assumed by this extrapolation can probably no longer be accepted. Japan's spectacular and sustained rate of economic growth,<sup>22</sup> perhaps the highest in the world, has brought her a long way into the era of mass abundance, mass society, and mass culture. It is true that the Japanese economy still remains extremely vulnerable, but so far the continuing prosperity has brought about far-reaching changes. The standard of living has been rising continuously, the surplus rural population is being absorbed so rapidly that a farm and small-town labor shortage is beginning to make its appearance, agricultural production has been increasing despite the predictions of experts that this was impossible, the wage gap between large and small enterprise has been narrowing, and—mirabile dictu—even mechanization has been growing on the tiny farms the experts adjudged too small for mechanization.<sup>23</sup> The outward consequences of these changes are all too evident. My own personal impression on visiting Japan early in 1960 after an absence of some two-and-a-half years was that everybody I knew had gained one inch in girth. The rate of ownership of the standard attractions of the mass consumption society—television, radio, washing machines, refrigerators, transistor radios, cameras, modern kitchen equipment—now compares favorably with that of Western Europe. Automobile ownership has already reached the middle classes solidly, and there seems no reason to doubt that within a measurable period it will be as common among the working classes as in Western Europe. In short, Japan is now beginning to savor the mixed blessings of advanced industrial society in its high-consumption phase: economic abundance and the insoluble traffic jams of Ginza and Marunouchi; universal literacy along with soap operas and comic books; air-conditioning and suburbia. It is still too early to assess all of the consequences of these structural changes: the embourgeoisement of the working classes, particularly of the organized workers; the growth of the “sarariman” (salaryman), Japan’s version of the middle class salaried and white-collar element; the absolute decline of the labor force in the primary production sectors (farming, fishery, and forestry), along with stability in the secondary sectors (manufacturing) and a vast increase in the tertiary sectors; a general narrowing of the gap in outlook and standards among the classes; the terrible overcrowding of the cities; a growing shift in agriculture to mechanization and capital-intensive production (dairying, poultry, meat, and specialty crops).

<sup>20</sup> See the extremely illuminating article by Lewis Feuer, "A Talk With Zengakuren," The New Leader, May 1, 1961.

<sup>21</sup> Preface to "Decisions at the Regular Convention of the Japan Socialist Party, 1957," quoted in Nakamura Kikuo, "Party Politics," New

There are still other changes in the offing whose effects we are not yet in a position to estimate. Educated unemployment, for example, has been an endemic feature of Japanese life since the 1920s. Although the supply-demand situation has fluctuated, Japanese university graduates retain a sharp memory of the fear of joblessness. The Occupation-sponsored reform of the educational system, which raised the university population almost 10 times to its present high of over 700,000 students, only intensified the insecurity, coming as it did in the midst of the postwar economic confusion. But the last few years have seen a radical change; in some categories, available jobs now far exceed the number of candidates. What will happen to student radicalism after several years without fear of unemployment? And what happens to the radical student, even today, we might ask, once he has found a job with a steady future and with some scope for advancement? In some cases there is a rapid subsidence of radical feelings, perhaps even a growing identification with the “establishment”; in others, a new form of dissatisfaction, not unknown in the West, a groping for meaning, adventure, and purpose. The generation of students educated entirely in the schools reformed by the American Occupation is just beginning to enter the universities. They come with a completely different background and outlook from the “après-guerre” students who have until now dominated the scene. With no personal experience of the war, free of the traditional ethics of subservience and self-effacement, encouraged to express their individuality, they are bound to be different from the embittered, disillusioned postwar students who could still their self-doubts, self-hatred, and insecurity only with radicalism and Marxism. Many of them may still see in Marxism the synthesis of their needs for meaning, purpose, and self-definition; others may start out on new paths in their new, affluent society.

Leader, Section II (Supplement entitled “Japan Today”), November 28, 1960.

<sup>22</sup> Between 1947 and 1952 the average annual GNP growth rate was 11.5 per cent; between 1953 and 1959, 8.3 per cent. From April 1959 to March 1960, the growth rate reached the extraordinary figure of 17 per cent, while mining and manufacturing production increased 29 per cent over fiscal year 1958.

<sup>23</sup> To cite two examples: between 1933 and 1958, the number of hand tractors in use went up from 1,000 to 337,800; threshing machines from 67,000 to 2,343,400. The current figures would undoubtedly show another important increase. See Fukushima Yoichi: “Agricultural Technology,” Japan Quarterly, July–September 1960.

Suffice it to say, in some respects recent Western experience will be a better guide to what is happening than the immediate Japanese past.

The observer cannot fail to be struck by the enormous gap between these new developments—the “objective situation,” as the socialists would call it—and the awareness of it, particularly on the left. The leftist slogans, which seem much more appropriate to the depressed 1930s, or even, in certain ways, to the extreme nationalist phase of some colonial movement, strike one as strangely out of tune with the developing reality. Many leftists have had the greatest difficulty in accepting the evidence of growth before their very eyes. As late as six years ago, a leading academic economist offered the challenging thesis that Japan needed a crash program to achieve a sustained growth of 4 per cent; that very year, the actual growth rate was over 8 per cent. Japan's most distinguished and senior agricultural economist recently acknowledged to me that even in his wildest moments he could not have anticipated the changes. “In fact,” he said, “I can still hardly believe them. If anybody tells you that five years ago he could have predicted this, then he is lying.” The implications of the new situation are just beginning to percolate into the consciousness of Japanese intellectual life. Increasingly we find discussions of the “new middle class,” or even of the “new intellectuals”; and the problem of “rei-ja” (the Japanese pronunciation of the English “leisure”—a new and very popular word in the Japanese vocabulary) has become a major issue in the mass media, eliciting much the same range of comments on mass society and mass culture that we are so familiar with in Europe and America. In a sense, what we are seeing is a race between the trend line, based upon an earlier set of conditions, and the new situation: which will arrive first, the projection of the trend to 50 per cent plus one, or a full awareness of the new situation?

THE LIMITS OF SELF-DETERMINATION: THE CASE OF THE KATANGA SECESSION

RENÉ LEMARCHAND

Université Libre de Bruxelles

Not the least paradoxical aspect of the United Nations mandate in the Congo, as described in the three-power resolution adopted by the Security Council on November 24, 1961, is that it was designed to prevent the exercise of a right which is explicitly recognized by the Charter. In effect, by "completely rejecting the claim of the Katanga as a sovereign independent Nation" and "recognizing the government of the Republic of the Congo as exclusively responsible for the conduct of the external affairs of the Congo," the authors of the resolution clearly denied the provincial authorities of the Katanga the right to self-determination.<sup>1</sup> Similarly, the support given by the United States government to the resolution, reaffirmed in several official statements, seems hardly compatible with our long-standing moral commitment to the Wilsonian principle that "the small states of the world have a right to enjoy the same respect for their sovereignty and territorial integrity that the great and powerful states expect and insist upon."<sup>2</sup> Actually, what may at first sight appear to be a sign of inconsistency is rather a reflection of the fundamental ambiguity in the concept of self-determination.

It is generally admitted that the principle of self-determination refers to the right of a people to determine their own political destiny; but beyond this very broad definition, no legal criteria determine which groups may legitimately claim this right in particular cases. No universally accepted standards mark the measure of freedom a group of people must presumably enjoy before they can exercise it. Nothing approaching a consensus of opinion exists regarding the feasibility of the principle itself. As a concept it cannot be stated in terms applicable to any given context. As a result, it has been both a factor of cohesion and a source of disunity depending on the circumstances in which the question has arisen.<sup>3</sup>

The record of civil wars and partitions that have blocked the formation of larger territories, or caused the collapse of an original consensus, shows how self-determination has frequently been invoked to justify secession. In the second half of the last century, the American Civil War, and the Sonderbund in Switzerland, nearly destroyed two of today's most successful federal experiments. During the post-World War II period, under the pressure of anti-colonial sentiment, and as a result of the polarization of international power politics, the process of territorial fragmentation initiated in the heyday of the Wilsonian era reached its peak. In Germany, Korea and Viet-Nam, fundamental differences of opinion over the way in which self-determination ought to be carried out have divided these states along lines which demarcate the spheres of influence of the two major blocs; in each case ideological and power barriers cut across otherwise homogeneous communities. On the other hand, where one finds plural societies, as in many countries of Asia and Africa, the elimination of colonial rule has decisively encouraged demands for secession on the part of ethnically or religiously distinct communities. In India, for example, the tensions between Moslem and Hindu eventually provoked a three-way split between India proper, West Pakistan, speaking Urdu and Punjabi, and East Pakistan, speaking Bengali. Similarly, in many of the emergent states of Africa, and in the Congo more than in any other territory, the fear of domination of one ethnic or tribal group by another has tended to accelerate the trend toward the "balkanization" of the continent. In practice therefore, and despite the efforts of the participants in the San Francisco Conference to rule out the possibility of secession, self-determination has either legitimized or encouraged territorial divisions.<sup>4</sup>

<sup>1</sup> See UN document S/5002 (S/4985/Rev. 1, as amended); cf. UN Charter, Articles 1 and 55.

<sup>2</sup> Cited by former Deputy Under Secretary of State Robert Murphy in "The Principle of Self-Determination in International Relations," Department of State Bulletin, Vol. 33, No. 857 (November 28, 1955), p. 889. The official viewpoint of the administration on the Katanga secession was clearly stated in the address delivered in Los Angeles on December 19, 1961, by Under Secretary of State George W. Ball, reproduced in Africa Report (January 1962), p. 17.

<sup>3</sup> As one authority remarked, "[self-determination] might mean incorporation into a state, or some measure of autonomy within a state, or a somewhat larger degree of freedom in a federation or commonwealth or union, or it might mean complete independence," Clyde Eagleton, "The Excesses of Self-Determination," Foreign Affairs, Vol. 31, No. 14 (July 1953), p. 594. For an interesting discussion of the problems raised in its application, see Rupert Emerson, From Empire to Nation (Cambridge, Mass., 1960), esp. chs. 16 and 17. See also Alfred Cobban, National Self-Determination (London, New York, Toronto, 1945), and Benjamin Rivlin, Self-Determination and Dependent Areas, International Conciliation, No. 501 (January 1955).

The purpose of this paper is not to present a case "for" or "against" the secession of the Katanga, although the reader will not be left in doubt about the author's stand on this issue. Nor is it to relate in any detailed fashion the sequence of events leading to it. The main concern is to examine the factors underlying the secession of the Katanga as they bear upon the more general problems posed by the "excesses of self-determination." More specifically, the analysis focuses on those factors which seem particularly relevant to an understanding of two central issues raised by partition: when does partition become inevitable? When does it become desirable?

I. PATTERNS OF ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL DEVELOPMENT

Among the background elements of the Katanga secession, special attention must be paid to at least two underlying factors of disunity: (1) regional differences in the scale of economic development, and (2) areal disparities in the numerical importance and economic status of the settler population. These have been the major determinants of the recurrent conflicts between the Katanga provincial authorities and the central government on the one hand, and among the provincial leaders on the other. This section examines the way in which economic factors have influenced the political options of the Katanga leaders.

With a population of 1,709,659—approximately 13 per cent of the total population of the country—the Katanga was in 1960 one of the most sparsely populated of all the Congo provinces. Thanks to the diversity and sheer abundance of its subsoil resources it underwent a rapid and spectacular development in post-war years. Between 1950 and 1957 the total value of its mineral output increased by 57 per cent, jumping from 5,569.3 to 8,764.5 million Belgian francs; this was estimated to be approximately 80 per cent of the total value of the minerals extracted in the Congo in 1957. Its main source of revenue came from the exploitation of its copper deposits, so vast and easy of access that they have been called a "geological scandal." Moreover some 60 per cent of the world's cobalt and an appreciable, though undisclosed, percentage of its uranium came from the Katanga. It also held a virtual monopoly in the Congo's production of tin, silver, platinum, lead, palladium and zinc.<sup>5</sup>

This wealth is sometimes identified with one of the Congo's largest operating companies, the Union Minière du Haut Katanga (UMHK), founded in 1906 to prospect the mineral resources of an area some 20,000 square kilometers in extent.<sup>6</sup> UMHK ranked as one of the free world's first producers of cobalt and uranium, and the world's third producer of copper; this is a rough indicator of its part in developing the economic potential of the province. In 1955 the company had gross profits of 125 million dollars, of which 54 million were distributed in dividends after taxes and other prior changes. Furthermore, it produced for its own consumption or for sale a variety of industrial by-products, and held a substantial share of the Compagnie du Chemin de Fer du Bas Congo au Katanga (Beceka). Ultimate control over the UMHK, however, was exercised by the Société Générale de Belgique, unquestionably the most powerful of the five corporate groups which, until recently, dominated the Congo economy.

This overwhelming concentration of economic resources within the boundaries of the Katanga, and of capital in the hands of a single expatriate enterprise, has obvious political implications. For one thing, the dependence of the Katanga on Belgian technicians and investments tends to suggest that the chances of success of a secession depended, to a considerable extent, on the external support of Belgian interests. But this limitation on its feasibility did not make secession less desirable in the minds of the provincial authorities. In fact, as already noted, the position of the Katanga in relation to the other provinces has always been the source of profound economic grievances on the part of its resident population. Like the Ivory Coast in relation to the other states of French West Africa, the Katanga was viewed in some quarters as "the cow that the other territories never tired of milking." This feeling, however, was not uniformly shared by the African population, nor was it sufficiently strong to supersede all tensions among ethnic groups.

<sup>5</sup> See Bulletin de la Banque Centrale du Congo Belge et du Ruanda-Urundi, No. 12 (December 1958), p. 462 ff.; and La Situation Economique du Congo Belge et du Ruanda-Urundi en 1957, Ministère des Colonies (Bruxelles, 1958), p. 49.

<sup>6</sup> For a global appraisal of the economic activities of the UMHK see Pierre Joye, Les Trusts en Belgique (Bruxelles, 1960), p. 121 ff. and Pierre Joye and Rosine Lewin, Les Trusts au Congo (Bruxelles, 1961). Cf. "The Colonial Big Five," Fortune (November 1952), p. 113 ff.

<sup>4</sup> The delegates to the San Francisco Conference were not unaware of these divisive implications. One Committee Report for example emphasized that "the principle [of self-determination] conformed to the Charter insofar as it implied the right of self-government of peoples and not the right of secession," UN Conference on International Organization (New York, 1945) Vol. 6, p. 226, cited in Benjamin Rivlin, op. cit., p. 198.

The persistence of ethnic particularisms has been reinforced by two salient features of the Katanga. One is the heavy concentration of industrial activities in the southern part of the province—in the Lualaba and Haut Katanga districts, particularly, where the three major mining centers of Elizabethville, Jadotville and Kolwezi are located. This unevenness of industrial development, also reflected in areal differences in the distribution of social overhead capital—commercial centers, communication facilities, schools, hospitals, etc.—has meant in effect that an important segment of the population of the northern region, the Baluba, has remained largely insulated from the unsettling influences generated by the spread of urbanization.

Secondly, given the paucity of the Katangan labor resources and the exigencies of its various industrial activities, the UMHK has tended to recruit a substantial part of its labor force from the populations of the Kasai Province. In 1956, for example, it was estimated that 35 per cent of the population of the centre extra-coutumier of Elizabethville, and 53 per cent of the workers employed by the UMHK at the Lubumbashi mine originated from the Kasai.<sup>7</sup> The presence of "alien" elements whose language, customs and traditions differed considerably from those of the resident tribes has made them all the more conscious of their mutual differences. The Baluba of the Kasai, for example, who constitute the bulk of the workers employed by the UMHK, although ethnically related to the Baluba of the Katanga, nevertheless form a distinct cultural group. Important cultural, linguistic and historical factors have also marked them off from the Lunda, the Bayeke, the Tshokwe and other tribes of the Haut Katanga. Moreover, the fact that they were physically removed from their customary areas and permanently exposed to an industrial environment probably accounts for their greater receptivity to "national" symbols.

Qualifications must therefore be attached to the proposition that the Katanga represents, in terms of its economic development, a distinct geographical entity. In point of fact, the impact of urbanization and industrialization has largely been confined to the southern districts. And insofar as it has affected specific tribes to the exclusion of others, it has not only produced striking contrasts in the ecology of the province but profound social and political tensions among its native populations.

II. ORGANIZATION, GOALS AND TACTICS OF SETTLER INTERESTS

If, as noted earlier, the Katanga is the most thinly populated area of the Congo, with a density of 3.44 per square kilometers, it was nevertheless in 1958 the province where European settlers were the most numerous. With a non-African population of 34,047 the Katanga claimed in 1956 about 31 per cent of the total European population of the Congo and a ratio of Europeans to Africans approximating 20.8 per thousand, as against 10.3 for the Leopoldville Province.<sup>9</sup>

The influx of European elements into the Katanga is a relatively recent phenomenon, motivated by the sudden opening of apparently unlimited economic opportunities. The province counted 4,824 Europeans in 1924 and 11,341 in 1947.<sup>10</sup> By 1958 some 31,847 Europeans lived in the Katanga, yet only 2,310 of these could be regarded as bona fide settlers, the rest consisting of temporarily employed or assigned civil servants, industrialists, technicians and missionaries. Moreover, only 52 per cent of Katangese settlers could claim Belgian nationality. Finally, the occupational distribution of the settler population, though indicating a heavy proportion of merchants and industrialists as well as a generous sprinkling of professional jobs, remained highly diversified.

The absence of a numerous, homogeneous and permanently settled non-African population, which was in a large measure the result of

<sup>7</sup> See Elliot J. Berg, "The Economic Basis of Political Choice in French West Africa," this REVIEW, Vol. 54 (June 1960), pp. 391-405.

<sup>8</sup> See E. Toussaint, "L'Avenir de la Population Bantoue du Haut Katanga Industriel," Congrès Scientifique d'Elizabethville, Vol. 6 (Elizabethville, 1956), p. 45.

<sup>9</sup> La Situation Economique du Congo Belge et du Ruanda-Urundi en 1958, Ministère des Colonies (Bruxelles, 1959), p. 22.

<sup>10</sup> Rapport Annuel sur la Colonie du Congo Belge en 1924, p. 83; ibid, 1947, p. 258.

a conscious attempt on the part of the Belgian government to retain unfettered control over the affairs of its former colony,<sup>11</sup> admittedly weakened the prospects of European dominance in the Katanga. Similarly, the recency of European settlement as well as the lack of a strong cultural cohesion among the colons has probably limited the latter's capacity to identify their future with that of the province. Yet, despite these potential handicaps, the European population of the Katanga has been at the forefront of pro-settler activities.

One of the earliest settler organizations to appear on the Congolese scene was the Union pour la Colonisation (Ucol), founded in May 1944 for the purpose of "deploying all efforts to obtain for the white population of the Congo the liberties granted by the Belgian Constitution to its nationals, and to promote by all available means the growth of European colonization."<sup>12</sup> The organization had representatives in each of the provinces and in Ruanda-Urundi, but its seat was in Elizabethville and most of its 400 dues-paying members registered in 1947 were drawn from the Katanga. An effort was made to reach a measure of social cohesion through periodic meetings and the diffusion of an official organ, the monthly Ucol, but there was in fact little or no coordination among its several branches.

The awareness of increasing threats to their respective interests induced the colons to close their ranks behind a new organization, the Fédération des Associations de Colons du Congo Congo et du Ruandu-Urundi, in short the Fedacol. This roof-organization, set up in 1950, constituted the settlers' response to the introduction of a draft-decree on the "assimilation and immatriculation of civilized natives," on the floor of the Conseil de Gouvernement.<sup>13</sup> Its explicit aims were "the defense of the colonat and colonization" and "a rapid and harmonious development of European settlement in the Congo."<sup>14</sup> While the chairmanship of the organization was assigned, on a rotating basis, to a different provincial delegate every year, the organizational structure of the Fedacol made allowance for a Permanent Executive Committee and a delegate in Brussels. The appointment of representatives to metropolitan agencies, such as the Société du Crédit au Colonat et à l'Industrie, and the organization of lobbying activities designed to enlist the support of Belgian deputies, contributed to transform the colonat into a powerful pressure group.<sup>15</sup> Its spokesmen also availed themselves of the communications net offered by the colonial press to make their voices heard. Moreover, its representatives in the Conseil de Gouvernement were fully conscious of their "pressure-group" functions, as evidenced by the number of settler-sponsored vœux introduced at its yearly sessions.

Yet, for all its efforts to achieve some measure of solidarity among the colons, the Fedacol only earned the effective support of a small fraction of the settler population of the Congo. The figures in Table I indicate that only one-fourth of the bona fide settler population of the colony belonged to the Fedacol in 1959. But the <sup>11</sup> Drawing a distinction between the colonie de peuplement where "immigrants bring along with themselves their own laws and institutions, exercise political rights and control over the local institutions," and the colonie d'encadrement "where the metropole has established its sovereignty over a numerous native population and [where] local government merely exercises delegated powers," the late Professor Marzorati unambiguously identified the former Belgian Congo with the latter type of dependency. See M. A. Marzorati, "L'Evolution Constitutionnelle du Congo," Compte Rendu des Journées Universitaires d'Etudes Coloniales (Bruxelles, 1952), p. 8.

This distinction reinforced the Belgian government's determination to withhold political rights from both Africans and Europeans. It also provided a rationale for allowing admission into the colony only to those elements that seemed sufficiently capable or resourceful not to become "public burdens" or embittered agitators.

<sup>12</sup> Article 2 of the statutes of the Ucol; Ucol (Elizabethville), February 1947.

<sup>13</sup> Their reaction was expressed by the Chairman of the Fedacol in the following terms: "The European community is too much aware of the excellency of Western civilization to let it run the slightest risk of being submerged under the flood of a hybrid combination of civilization and barbarity," L'Opinion Publique devant l'Assimilation des Indigènes (Bruxelles, 1951), p. 3.

<sup>14</sup> See "La Fédération des Classes Moyennes," CRISP, Courrier Africain, No. 25 (July 1959), p. 19 ff.

<sup>15</sup> The record suggests that the Belgian Liberal Party (PLB) displayed the most emphatic support for the views and aspirations of the colonat. See in particular the declarations made before the Chamber of Representatives by the Liberal deputy Lahaye, Annales Parlementaires, Chambre des Représentants, April 21, 1959, p. 13 ff. Similarly, the conservative daily La Libre Belgique, whose views tend to reflect the opinions of the Social Christian Party (PSC), has at times expressed an overt sympathy towards settler interests.

TABLE I. PROVINCIAL DISTRIBUTION OF THE FEDACOL MEMBERSHIP, 1959

Province	Non-African Population	Settler Population	Membership Fedacol
			Affiliated Members	Per Cent of Settler Pop.
Leopoldville	32,143	1,966	148	7.5
Equateur	6,501	599	110	18.3
Orientale	15,473	1,850	607	32.8
Kivu	12,788	1,397	470	29.4
Katanga	33,918	3,065	975	31.8
Kasai	8,634	544	174	31.9
Total	109,457	9,621	2,484	25.8

Source: "La Fédération des Classes Moyennes," CRISP, Courrier Africain, No. 25 (July 1959), p. 3.

Katanga, significantly enough, made the heaviest contribution. Furthermore, and this is symptomatic of regional disparities in settler solidarity, only 7.5 per cent of the total settler population of the Leopoldville Province was affiliated to the Fedacol, as against 31.8 per cent in the Katanga.

In their quest for a modus vivendi the colons relentlessly emphasized their wish to obtain a meaningful share of authority in the conduct of colonial affairs. This aim, viewed as a corollary of the social and economic transformation of the colony, and as a prerequisite for the establishment of mutually satisfactory relations between the African and the European communities, had already found expression in the statutes of the Ucol. It was upheld in several statements made by the spokesmen of the colonat before the Commission du Colonat and the Conseil Colonial National, as well as in a number of motions presented to the advisory organs of the colony.<sup>16</sup> In fact, it had earlier

<sup>16</sup> As early as 1925 the Association des Colons Belges introduced a motion to the Comité Régional du Katanga in which they urged the "competent authorities" "to examine the way in which they could facilitate the exercise of their political rights"; Comité Régional, Katanga, 1926, p. 159. In 1946, speaking on behalf of the Ucol before the Commission du Colonat, a prominent spokesman of the colonat stated: "The Belgian colon does not want to be regarded as a foreigner in a country which is now his. The Congo must therefore remain a Belgian entity, perhaps in the form of a British dominion"; Commission du Colonat, Procès Verbaux (Bruxelles, 1946), p. 30. And in 1953, the delegate of the Ucol to the Conseil Colonial National declared that "the establishment of legislative, executive and judicial author-

provided a basis for the draft proposal of administrative reorganization presented to the Belgian government in 1920 on behalf of the European population of the Katanga by Monseigneur de Hemptinne, former bishop of the Katanga, M. de Meulemeester, president of the Court of Appeals of Elizabethville, General Wangermée, former Vice Governor General of the Katanga who was at the time representing the UMHK, and several other prominent personalities.<sup>17</sup>

By 1956 it had become obvious to all but the settlers that the Durham formula did not hold much attraction for the Belgian government as a solution to the dilemmas posed by the first manifestations of nationalist assertions. Indeed, in the Katanga and elsewhere in the colony it appeared unlikely that the establishment of settler-controlled institutions would ever become a reality. Yet, in spite of the seemingly indifferent attitude of metropolitan authorities, the colons of the Katanga became increasingly committed to the idea of dominion status for the Province. Thus, in an article entitled "Pour un Statut de Dominion au Katanga," an anonymous defender of settler interests wrote in the issue of October 26, 1956 of L'Essor du Congo:

The Katanga should form immediately a distinct political entity administered by a Vice Governor General appointed by the King and assisted in his functions by a council whose members would be chosen among the personalities proposed by the various economic corporations which partake in the economic activities of the country.

This, however, was envisaged as the first step towards "the accession of the Katanga to dominion status."

Far from reflecting an isolated or eccentric viewpoint, this conception of the future character of the Katangese polity was typical of the opinions shared by the vast majority of settlers. The propinquity of the Rhodesias and South Africa has of course helped to accelerate to movement for dominion status under white domination in the years preceding independence.<sup>18</sup> But there are also important historical ities in the the Congo" was "the immediate objective of the settler population"; Congrès Colonial National, 9ème session (Bruxelles, 1953), p. 140.

<sup>17</sup> See Le Gouvernement du Congo Belge: Projet de Réorganisation Administrative (Elizabethville, 1920); cf. Jean Sépulchre, Propos sur le Congo Politique de Demain: Autonomie et Fédéralisme (Elizabethville, 1958), p. 48.

<sup>18</sup> The influence exerted by the Union of South reasons for this parochial outlook.

It must be remembered, first of all, that settlement processes in the Katanga were initiated and carried out under the auspices of a quasi-independent agency, the Comité Spécial du Katanga (CSK). It was responsible not only for the granting of freehold property and mining concessions but also for the administration of a Colonization Department whose principal function was to promote, in every possible way, the development of an agricultural colonat. To serve this purpose, a Syndicat Foncier du Katanga had been set up in 1920, thanks to the financial backing of the UMHK, the Compagnie du Congo pour le Commerce et l'Industrie (CCCI) and several other large-scale capitalist enterprises. It proved to be a valuable source of financial assistance for prospective settlers, and performed as well an important aggregative function insofar as it served as a connecting link between industrial and agricultural settler interests.<sup>19</sup>

Secondly, one must bear in mind that from 1910 to 1933 the province enjoyed a special administrative status. Partly because of the lack of adequate communications between the capital (then in Boma) and the interior of the colony, and also because the industrial development of the province necessitated a large measure of decentralization,<sup>20</sup> the administration of the Katanga was entrusted during that period to a Vice Governor General who enjoyed full executive powers. A decree of July 1914 extended this organization to each of the four provinces then in existence. But in 1933, under the governorship of General Tilkens, a new administrative set-up was introduced which eliminated the posts of Vice Governors and transferred their prerogatives to the Governor General. In spite of vehement protests by the European population of the Katanga against this measure, the administrative structure established in 1933 remained basically unchanged in subsequent years.<sup>21</sup>

Thirdly, the desire of the settlers to retain a separate and autonomous status was also prompted by the feelings of hostility they consistently harbored towards Leopoldville. This hostility became more intense with the economic growth of the province and stemmed from the fact that the proportion of public expenditures devoted to the Katanga appeared minute when compared with the over-all contribution of its taxpayers to colonial revenues. As a result they felt that they alone supported the debt charges of the other Provinces as well as the operating costs of the colonial bureaucracy of Kalina. These complaints deserve consideration not only because they have been a source of solidarity among settlers, but also because they throw a revealing light on the subsequent political options of organized settler interests.

Africa on the settler community of the Katanga is evidenced by the following statement, which appeared in the issue of November 17, 1911, of the Etoile du Congo, one of the first newspapers to be published in Elizabethville: "If Katanga is to become a credit to South Africa a very different state of affairs than at present exists must be inaugurated in the country. . . . If our new Governor is to be a success he will not consult any man holding an official position; he must put aside officialdom altogether and must call together real businessmen who understand the true inwardness of affairs." It is also reflected in the suggestion made by the Comité Régional du Katanga in 1924 that a system of native reserves, "similar to that which prevails in South Africa," be adopted in order to satisfy the demands of the colons; Comité Régional, Katanga, 1925, p. 15.

<sup>19</sup> See Le Comité Spécial du Katanga, 1900-1925 (Bruxelles, 1927), esp. Annexe III, pp. 119-120.

<sup>20</sup> As M. Renkin, then Minister of Colonies, declared before the Chambers: "La mesure la plus importante prise au cours de l'exercice 1910 est la création du Vice Gouvernement Général du Katanga. C'est une mesure essentiellement décentralisatrice, dont le but est de favoriser le développement de la région en lui assurant le plus d'autonomie possible. Y aura-t-il d'autres Vice Gouvernements Généraux comme celui du Katanga? C'est peu probable; l'organisation d'une administration autonome se justifiait au Katanga, district minier où l'industrie s'implanterait facilement. Elle ne se justifierait pas ailleurs pour le moment." Annales Parlementaires, 1 Feb. 1911, p. 9.

<sup>21</sup> The resentment caused by the administrative reorganization of 1933 found a graphic expression in an article entitled "Entreprise de Démolition," which appeared in L'Essor du Congo, July 3, 1933. Referring to "le dictateur Tilkens," the author of the article stated: "Le grand destructeur de Kalina, qui n'a lui à son actif qu'une incompétence notoire et une incompréhensible suffisance, n'a pas hésité à sacrifier ces remarquables serviteurs de l'oeuvre coloniale pour le seul motif que leur valeur le gênait. Un homme de petite taille n'aime pas s'entourer d'athlètes. Lorsqu'on examine ces fameuses mesures de réorganisation, l'on s'aperçoit en effet que le seul, le vrai but de ce renversement n'a été que d'écarter de l'entourage du Gouverneur Général les hommes de valeur qui le surplombaient"; cited in Jean Sépulchre, op. cit., p. 38.

III. POLITICAL PRESSURES AND CLEAVAGES

The catalytic agent behind the emergence of political parties in the Katanga, as elsewhere in the Congo, was the constitutional reform introduced in 1957 by the so-called statut des villes.<sup>22</sup> The communal elections of December 1957 brought to light and reinforced the solidarity of distinctive tribal groupings. In Elizabethville, for example, three bourgmestre posts out of four fell into the hands of Baluba from the Kasai. Electoral processes, on the other hand, stimulated the growth of competing parties also organized on the basis of ethnic or regional criteria.

As noted earlier, this tendency to identify ethnic loyalties with political choices is due in part to the inter-group tensions generated by the uneven impact of economic and social forces. It was also aggravated by two characteristic features of the Katangese scene: (1) the presence of a politically conscious settler community, and (2) the relatively high concentration of Kasaiian immigrants in the industrial areas of the Katanga. Quite obviously, these communities affected the balance of political forces in different ways and through different means. But their respective roles cannot be fully understood independently of each other, for the presence of "alien" tribes provided the raison d'être of the alliance of European vested interests with those natives of the Katanga who claimed to be "genuine" Katangese.

In late 1957, shortly before the polling date, a Belgian lawyer, Antoine Rubbens, had taken the initiative in organizing the Union Congolaise, a party in which, according to its progenitor's own terms, "Congolese nationalism and Christian Social doctrines were intermingled with Socialist ideas."<sup>23</sup> But this program, despite or because of its novelty, held little attraction for the native tribes of the Katanga; their efforts were primarily aimed at checking the control of Kasaiian immigrants over the municipal institutions of Elizabethville. So, in order to resist the inroads of "alien" tribes, the leaders of several tribal associations of the Katanga decided in November 1958 to form a coalition behind the Confédération des Associations Tribales du Katanga, better known as the Conakat.<sup>24</sup> It included in its membership a host of minor tribal groupings, but derived most of its active support from the principal ethnic group of the Haut Katanga, the Lunda. In September of the same year, the Baluba of the Kasai who were previously affiliated to the Fédération des Baluba Centraux du Katanga (Fegebaceka) founded, under the leadership of Isaac Kalondji, the Fédération Kasaienne (Fedeka).

<sup>22</sup> The decree of March 23, 1957, provided for the election of municipal councillors in the European and African communes of those urban centers which had been officially recognized as villes, namely Leopoldville, Elizabethville and Jadotville. Similar elections were held in December 1958 in Stanleyville, Bukavu, Coquilhatville and Luluabourg. The text of the decree will be found in P. Piron and J. Devos, Codes et Lois du Congo Belge, Tome D, 1957 (Bruxelles, 1958), pp. 39-53.

<sup>23</sup> "Political Awakening in the Belgian Congo," Civilisations, Vol. X, No. 1 (1960), p. 66.

In the meantime, a group of white settlers had set up the Union Katangaise, a multi-racial party which, as the name suggests, aimed at the construction of a "genuine Katangese community."<sup>25</sup> It was in fact the political expression of the Katangese section of the Fedacol, the Ucol-Katanga. It will be recalled at this point that the Belgian government's declaration of January 1959 had made it quite plain that Belgium recognized the claims of the Congo to self-government. Equally plain was the assumption that the entire Congo was destined to remain a distinct geographical and political unit. Thus, promptly realizing the potential advantage that would result from an alliance with "genuine" Katangese, the Union Katangaise decided in the early part of 1959 to join forces with the Conakat.

<sup>24</sup> The Conakat incorporated in its membership the Groupe des Associations Mutuelles de l'Empire Lunda, the Association des Baluba du Katanga, the Fédération des Tribus du Haut Katanga, the Association des Basonge, the Association des Bena Marunga, the Association des Ressortissants Bahemba, the Association des Minungu, and several other tribal associations. The most important of these numerically was the Association des Baluba, founded in 1957 by Jason Sendwe for the avowed purpose of "promoting the unity of the Baluba." It agreed to join the Conakat on February 5, 1959, on the condition that it would retain a large measure of autonomy. As specified by Sendwe in a letter sent to the Conakat leaders, "la Balubakat se réserve formellement le droit de garder son autonomie de direction et de gestion." The writer wishes to acknowledge his debt to the Department of Political Affairs of the Ministry of Interior of the Katanga for permission to consult some of its files.

<sup>25</sup> The program of the Union Katangaise will be found in L'Essor du Congo, May 28, 1958; cf. Ucol: Doctrine Politique (Elizabethville, n.d.). mimeographed document.

This move added to the ambitions and gave increased confidence to the aspirations of its leaders. In February 1959, Mr. Godefroid Munongo, then President of the Conakat, openly criticized the provincial Governor for allowing the Kasaian tribes to reside in the Katanga.<sup>26</sup> In May of the same year the leaders of the Conakat publicly announced the need to transform the Katanga into "an autonomous and federated state" with political control vested in the hands of "authentic Katangese."<sup>27</sup> Shortly thereafter, Moïse Tshombe expressed his commitment to "a federal system uniting the Congolese Provinces and Belgium in the framework of a Belgo-Congolese Community with each of the constituent units preserving its internal autonomy."<sup>28</sup> Finally, on the inauguration of a Conakat section in Kolwezi, an eminent personality of the party, after paying lip service to the "legitimate rights of the inhabitants of this Province" went on to declare that all non-Katangese would be automatically excluded from the political and administrative posts of the province.<sup>29</sup> In fact, the parochial outlook of the Conakat developed into an increasingly xenophobic attitude.<sup>30</sup>

Partly as a result of the inflammatory state-

<sup>26</sup> On February 13, 1959, Mr. Munongo wrote a letter to the provincial Governor which stated, among other things: "Les Katangais d'origine se demandent avec raison si les autorités ne font pas exprès en accordant le séjour définitif aux gens du Kasai dans nos centres pour que les ressortissants de cette Province puissent, grâce à leur nombre toujours croissant, écraser ceux du pays. Ce fait pourrait faire déclencher dans un avenir plus ou moins proche des bagarres entre les habitants des deux Provinces. . . . Nous nous permettons de porter à votre connaissance que très nombreux sont les Katangais d'origine qui aimeraient travailler dans les grands centres de leur Province; impitoyablement on leur répond qu'il y a un arrêté interdisant l'accès vers ces centres. Et pourtant ce sont eux qui devraient avoir priorité."

<sup>27</sup> L'Essor du Congo, May 26, 1959.

<sup>28</sup> L'Essor du Congo, July 29, 1959.

<sup>29</sup> Le Phare du Katanga, June 3, 1959.

<sup>30</sup> As one competent observer noted: "Immigrants and their descendants would be thrown out of the Katanga; jobs made scarce by the recession would be left to the natives of the Province; in any case, the foreign labor which the industries might need would not be part of the community and would not participate in polls—these would be reserved exclusively to genuine Katangese and their civilizers"; A. Rubbens, op. cit., p. 68.

ments made by party propagandists, and partly because of external pressures, the Conakat underwent serious internal stresses when, in November 1959, one of its most important constituent units, the Association des Baluba du Katanga (Balubakat), decided to bolt the party. The secession carried with it important consequences, for the Balubakat, led by Jason Sendwe, attracted the overwhelming support of the Baluba of the Katanga. Sendwe's move was of course symptomatic of personal rivalries in the leadership of the Conakat. But it is also indicative of the ethnic solidarity prevailing among the Baluba: if, as noted earlier, substantial cultural differences exist between the Kasaian tribes and those of the Katanga, they are at any rate not so fundamental as to leave each indifferent to the other's fate.<sup>31</sup> Another contributory factor lies in the alliance of settler interests with the Conakat.<sup>32</sup> In any event, the formation of the Cartel Katangais—which included, besides the Fedeka and the Balubakat, the Association des Tshokwe du Congo, de l'Angola et de la Rhodesie (Atcar)—drastically altered the previous lines of cleavage. No longer were divisions drawn between "genuine" Katangese and "immigrants," but between Baluba and Tshokwe on the one hand, and the remaining tribes on the other.

In assessing the relationships between European interests and political groups, one should stress at the outset that Europeans did not stand as a monolithic or undifferentiated bloc. In fact, the fusion of the short-lived Union Katangaise with the Conakat provoked the emergence of new identifications between metropolitan or colonial interest groups and parties. While close organic ties existed between the Conakat and the white settlers through the Ucol-Katanga, the connections between the Balubakat and Belgian liberals—often associated with the Belgian Socialist Party—were initially due to the presence of isolated personalities upon whom the party had devolved advisory functions. Some were drawn from the provincial cadres of the colonial administration; others from the administrative personnel of the Université Officielle of Elizabethville; most of them, however, had been appointed to official positions under the Liberal Ministry of Auguste Buisseret, who held office from 1954 to 1958.

<sup>31</sup> The alliance concluded by the Balubakat and the Fedeka on the eve of the Brussels Round Table Conference, in late 1959, also tends to confirm this fact. For further evidence see Mabika Kalanda, Baluba et Lulua: Une Ethnie à la Recherche d'un Nouvel Equilibre (Bruxelles, 1959); J. Vansina, "Migrations dans la Province du Kasai; Une Hypothèse," Zaire (January 1956), pp. 69–85; E. Verhulpen, Baluba et Balubaisés du Katanga (Antwerp, 1936).

<sup>32</sup> In a letter to Mr. Munongo, dated June 8, 1959, a group of Katangese commerçants of various tribal origins declared: "Votre position vous a été dictée par l'Union Katangaise de colons pour nous imposer le fédéralisme qui sera après considéré comme l'apartheid et l'autonomie. . . . Nous vous demandons Munongo de rentrer à l'Uganda dont vous êtes ressortissant, et laissez-nous Congolais seuls à réclamer notre droit à l'indépendance immédiate. . . . Nous sommes tous Kinois, Bukaviens, Kasaiens, Katangais, en un mot Congolais et Bantous."

Secondly, the means of pressure available to the Conakat were far more effective than those at the disposal of its rivals. They could count on the active support of several local pressure groups, such as the Ucol-Katanga, the daily newspaper L'Essor du Congo and the Zionist Association of Elizabethville, as well as on the financial backing of powerful corporate interests, including the UMHK. As one might expect in view of the magnitude of the stake held by the Société Générale in the mineral resources of the Katanga, it was to the utmost advantage of Belgian banking interests that the Conakat should score a decisive victory at the polls. This point, however, needs qualification.<sup>33</sup>

In the first place, the Board of Directors of the Société Générale held different opinions concerning both the degree to which they should intervene in local politics, and the manner in which any intervention should be carried out. Even sharper differences of opinion divided the colonial personnel of the Société Générale from its metropolitan executives, the former being far more outspoken in their preference for a separate political status for the Katanga. Secondly, at least until the convening of the Brussels Round Table the contributions of campaign funds made by the Société Générale were mainly channelled through semi-independent agents, a fact which contributed in no small way to increase the fragmentation of the Congolese political scene.<sup>34</sup> Finally, when it appeared that the balance of power was almost evenly shared between the Conakat and the Balubakat, the Société Générale, out of sheer opportunism, decided to dispense its financial aid to both of the two contenders, thus cancelling the potential advantage which it might have derived from a more discriminating disposition of its resources.

The net result of the involvement of European metropolitan interests in the politics of the Katanga is admittedly difficult to ascertain. But most informed observers would agree that the competition among parties served as an outlet for the expression of personal and ideological antagonisms between conservatives and liberals, or clericals and anticlericals. As a result, Katangese leaders have been led to adopt far more intransigent stands on concrete issues than might otherwise have been the case. One may also wonder if the secessionist efforts of the Katanga leaders could have succeeded unless they had been sustained, morally and financially, by Belgian interests.

IV. THE POLITICS OF SECESSION

The chain of events which led to the secession comprised two distinct major phases. One, which immediately followed the general elections of May 1960, ended with the neutralization of the forces opposed to the ambitions of Tshombe and the Conakat. The other, triggered off by the mutiny of the Force Publique in the early days of July 1960, relates more specifically to the circumstances which brought about the erection of an independent state in the Katanga.

It will be recalled that the Loi Fondamentale, enacted by the Belgian Parliament in March 1960, stipulated that the legislative powers of the province would be exercised by a single chamber composed of sixty elected members. Nine additional members were to be subsequently coopted by the provincial deputies from a list of "customary chiefs and notables." A provincial executive would then be elected by an absolute majority of at least two-thirds of the membership of the provincial assembly.<sup>35</sup>

The electoral campaign which began in April 1960 accelerated competition among groups and led to bloodshed on numerous occasions. But the battle for ballots was espe-

<sup>33</sup> The views contained in this paragraph and the next are based on oral and documentary evidence furnished by European and African personalities whose identity can not be disclosed.

<sup>34</sup> Commenting upon the financial aid extended to Katangese parties by Belgian "institutions with important moral and material stakes in the Katanga," Jules-Gérard Libois notes that "the paradox lies in the fact that the Belgian source remained the same" and that "only the channels were different"; Etudes Congolaises, No. 1 (March 1961), p. 38.

<sup>35</sup> The text of the Loi Fondamentale will be found in Documents Parlementaires, Chambre des Représentants, No. 489, pp. 1-44.

TABLE II. PARTY STRENGTHS IN THE KATANGAN PROVINCIAL ASSEMBLY

Districts	Cona- kat	Baluba- kat	Cartel Baluba- kat- MNCL	Atcar	MNCL	MNCK	Union Congo- laise	Local In- terests	Total
Elizabethville	3	2				1			6
Jadotville	1		2						3
Tanganika	3	6	1		1		1	4	16
Lualaba	6	1		2				3	12
Haut-Lomami	3	9						1	13
Haut-Katanga	9							1	10
Total	25	18	3	2	1	1	1	9	60

Source: Congo 1960, Centre de Recherche et d'Information Socio-Politiques (Bruxelles, 1961), Vol. 1, p. 243.

cially tight between the Conakat and the Balubakat, the two principal dramatis personae: of the 160 lists which competed for seats in either the provincial or the federal assemblies, 24 had been introduced by the Conakat and 16 by the Balubakat.<sup>36</sup> In the end, however, neither of the two major contestants could claim a decisive victory over its opponent. As shown by the figures in Table II, the Provincial Assembly was almost evenly split between the Conakat and the Balubakat, with the former controlling 25 seats out of a total of 60. Thanks to its alliance with the Mouvement National Congolais of Lumumba and the Atcar, the Balubakat could presumably count on 23 seats in the assembly.

This precarious equilibrium was eventually upset to the advantage of the Conakat by two unforeseen developments. On May 27, the dissident wing of the Mouvement National Congolais, led by Albert Kalondji, drew away the support of two Baluba elected on a Cartel ticket.<sup>37</sup> Almost simultaneously, several deputies who had been elected on lists of "local interests" joined the Conakat. Thus, on June 1st, when the assembly held its inaugural session, the Conakat controlled 32 seats and the Cartel 22.

The electoral procedure adopted by the Belgian government also had important consequences on the outcome of the party struggle. As stipulated by the loi electorale, the elections to the provincial and federal assemblies were held concurrently; but the candidates were selected from different lists and in different constituencies.<sup>38</sup> Consequently, those parties which favored a unitary formula, such as the Balubakat and its coalition partners, tended to reserve their "safest" candidates for federal offices, while separatist parties, on the contrary, tended to orient their strategy along the opposite lines. This, in turn, considerably enhanced the position of the Conakat in the Provincial Assembly. Secondly, the odd results produced by the scrutin de liste à un tour, directly borrowed from the Belgian electoral system, led the members of the opposition to believe that the elections had been systematically "rigged" by the administration.<sup>39</sup> Whether cial guarantees. See Congo 1960, op. cit., p. 244.

<sup>38</sup> See "Loi relative aux elections legislatives," Moniteur Congolais, No. 13, March 28, 1960, p. 863 ff.

<sup>39</sup> In the Elizabethville constituency for example, where the Conakat polled 8,617 votes—exactly 7 more than the Balubakat—3 seats went to the Conakat, 2 to the Balubakat and one to the MNC-Kalondji. In Dilolo the Balubakat received only as many seats as the Conakat, in spite of the fact that it obtained 2,947 more votes than its opponent; see Congo 1960, op. cit., p. 243.

<sup>36</sup> See Congo 1960, Centre de Recherche et d'Information Socio-Politiques, (Bruxelles, 1961), Vol. 1, p. 240. This work contains the most abundant source of documentation available to this date on the recent political evolution of the Congo.

<sup>37</sup> Gérard-Libois reports that this sudden defection was in part the result of a quid pro quo between Tshombe and Kalondji. The latter, anxious to obtain the support of the federal deputies of the Conakat for his candidacy for the post of federal Prime Minister, had apparently promised the leader of the Conakat to lend him the support of his own party in the provincial assembly on the condition that the Kasaiian minority be given spe-there was any conclusive evidence of this is difficult to say. The crucial point here is that the members of the opposition were unanimously convinced that they were the victims of electoral fraud. Although 21 complaints seeking the quashing of the elections had been introduced by the Cartel in the period following the publication of the electoral returns, none were acknowledged. Thus on June 1 as a sign of protest against "the way in which electoral processes had been conducted," the members of the Cartel walked out of the Provincial Assembly.

Realizing that a prolonged boycott of the Assembly would prevent the formation of a provisional government unless the two-thirds quorum prescribed by the Loi Fondamentale was reduced to a simple majority, the Provincial Governor, Mr. A. Schoeller, appealed to the Minister of the Congo in Brussels and urged him to promulgate an amendment to that effect.<sup>40</sup> At the same time Schoeller informed the leaders of the Balubakat that the amendment of the Loi Fondamentale would still allow them to get an "equitable share" of ministerial posts. Indifferent to the Governor's placatory statements, the leader of the Balubakat, Jason Sendwe, immediately cabled the Governor General and the King and prophetically warned them against the "promulgation of a law [which] would inevitably lead to civil war after June 30."<sup>41</sup> On June 15 the Belgian Chamber of Representatives, by a vote of 98 to 5, with 66 abstentions, and the Senate, by 66 votes with 33 abstentions, enacted the amendment; and the following day the provincial assembly elected a government in which all ministerial chairs but one were occupied by members of the Conakat.<sup>42</sup>

In yielding to the joint pressures of the colonat and "genuine" Katangese, the Belgian government had not only relieved the Conakat from the compromises on offices that would have been necessary if the two-thirds requirement had been retained; it had in effect deliberately played into the hands of the "separatists." If indeed ruthless repression was the only means available to the Conakat leaders to come to terms with the demands of the Cartel once the latter walked out of the parliamentary arena, secession became their only solution to escape the control of the central government.

On June 23, barely a week before independence and after a series of protracted negotiations, the Congolese Chambers had finally given their reluctant approval to Lumumba's cabinet. As could be expected, Tshombe received the news with a mixture of astonishment and indignation. In a statement to the Belga news agency, the President of the provincial government of the Katanga gave the following hint of his ultimate intentions:

It is with astonishment that I have heard on the radio the final composition of the central government. I note that the Ministry of National Defense has been attributed to Mr. Lumumba and the Interior to a member of the MNC, although it had been decided that National Defense, in order to . . . avoid the control of a single party, would be administered by a college of all the ministers, with the Secretaryship of National Defense to a member of the Conakat. It had also been agreed that another key ministry, Interior, would be assigned to the Abako which shares the federalist ideas of the Katangese. The post of Head of the State had been formally promised to Mr. Kasa-Vubu, and the Vice Presidency to Mr. Bolikango. It is only on these conditions that the Conakat accepted to lend its support to the government formed by Mr. Lumumba.<sup>43</sup>

That Tshombe intended to proclaim the independence of the Katanga on June 26, or shortly thereafter, is now a well established fact.<sup>44</sup> But the Belgian government was by this time too much aware of its responsibilities toward the central government, and of the consequences that would have resulted from its failure to meet them, to allow the secession to occur at this particular juncture. Belgian financial interests, moreover, were not unreservedly committed to Tshombe's views. Indeed, a Belgian writer who cannot be suspected of sympathies towards Belgian capitalist enterprises recognized that the UMHK favored other methods than secession. This possibility, according to him, was viewed rather as "a means of blackmail" or "an alternative linked to an eventual catastrophe."<sup>45</sup>

<sup>43</sup> Ibid., p. 305.

<sup>44</sup> On June 25 Tshombe and Munongo secretly appointed a former Belgian functionary, Franz Scheerlinck, to the rank of "special ambassador" and provided him with all necessary credentials, including an airplane ticket for New York, via Brussels. But the news leaked and the authorities of Leopoldville euchred Tshombe out of his "coup" by arresting his "special ambassador" before he had any chance to acquit himself of his mission. Ibid., pp. 254-256.

<sup>45</sup> Ernest Glinne, "Le Pourquoi de l'Affaire Katangaise," Presence Africaine (June-September 1960), p. 56 ff.

<sup>40</sup> An instructive account of this intervention will be found in Jules Chome, La Crise Congolaise (Bruxelles, 1960).

<sup>41</sup> Ibid., p. 48.

<sup>42</sup> Congo 1960, op. cit., p. 253.

The catastrophe occurred on July 5 with the mutiny of the Congolese National Army. Difficult though it may be, even at this time, to separate fact from rumor in recording the developments and implications of the mutiny, it is nevertheless beyond question that the revolt which exploded at the Camp Massart on July 9, threatened the entire province with violence and confusion. Order was finally restored after the intervention of the Belgian paratroopers stationed in Kamina and on July 11 the President of the provincial government officially proclaimed the independence of the Katanga. Shortly thereafter, the Belgian government, now regarding itself as freed of its obligations toward the central government of the Republic of the Congo, delegated d'Aspremont Lynden to the Katanga as "Chief of the Belgian Technical Mission." While the Belgian government refused to extend official recognition to the newly born Katangese Republic, it nevertheless "acknowledged" the independence of the province and the King paid a public homage to the "tribes which have conserved their amity with Belgium and ask her to help them remain independent."<sup>46</sup>

V. CONCLUSION

As the foregoing discussion tends to suggest, the secession of the Katanga was not made inevitable, although it may have been precipitated, by any single set of factors. The fact that Belgium shares a heavy responsibility in the secession does not make her alone responsible for it. Indeed, one could possibly argue that the reason why it did not take place before June 30, 1960 was precisely because the Belgian government was willing to recognize and honor its legal obligations toward the central government. On the other hand, it could also be argued that the amendment to the Loi Fondamentale, which made it legally possible for the leaders of the Conakat to set up a government unhampered by the forces of the opposition, and their conviction that Belgian interests would then support their claims, did encourage the Katanga authorities to proclaim the independence of the province after June 30. But neither of these factors is sufficient to explain the existence of strong separatist sentiments in the Katanga. Nor do they provide a basis for predicting the occurrence of similar situations in a colonial context.

Among the several factors which predisposed the Katanga leaders to claim self-determination, at least three deserve emphasis. One is the sense of economic grievance which permeates the attitude of the so-called "genuine" Katangese towards the inhabitants of the other provinces. As already noted, regional differences in the distribution of economic resources operated to aggravate latent tensions among ethnic groups, so that economic stratification tended to coincide with tribal divisions. In a sense, therefore, tribal antagonisms must be viewed as symptoms of economic grievances. The fact that the Conakat succeeded in rallying the support of otherwise unrelated tribal entities (Bayeke, Lunda, Batabwa, etc.) suggests indeed that these grievances were an important source of solidarity among its members. A second determinative factor was the part played by the white settlers in making the idea of secession both economically attractive and politically meaningful. The alliance between settler interests and "genuine" Katangese, prompted by the decision of the Belgian government to grant the Congo its independence, did not imply a fundamental change in their objectives. On the contrary, the tactics employed by the colonat consisted in communicating its political conceptions to the Conakat without in any way attempting to exercise a rigorous control over the activities of the party. By a process like osmosis the Conakat identified itself with the ideas and attitudes which gave the settler community of the Katanga its distinctive outlook. A third explanatory factor lies in the outside support accorded by Belgian metropolitan interests to the advocates of the secession. This by itself did not provoke the emergence of separatist claims. But it provided the external stimulus which made the prospects of a secession increasingly attractive. And in the event, this is what made it feasible.

Conceding that the combination of these factors rendered the secession of the Katanga virtually inevitable at a certain point, it does not necessarily follow that it was desirable.

Before a claim to self-determination can be recognized as legitimate, let alone desirable, certain minimum requirements must be met. Among those, "the freedom of the people of the territory to choose the form of government which they desire," and "freedom from interference by another government as to internal affairs" are essential.<sup>47</sup> Quite obviously, the Katanga authorities fail to measure up to either one of these standards. The minimum degree of internal freedom which would entitle them to speak for the whole province is completely lacking. As the United States Representative to the United Nations declared before the Security Council on November 16, 1961, "the Katanga Parliament is a rump organization formed of not more than 25 of the 60 legal members of the original assembly, and the ethnic groupings which support the present regime constitute . . . less than half of the province's inhabitants."<sup>48</sup> There is on the other hand sufficient evidence to substantiate the charges brought by the "Casablanca Powers" against the "clientele-sovereignty" of Tshombe's regime. The relation of dependence which, these "radicals" assert has been established by the metropolitan power "with the concealed intention of making the liberated country a client state and controlling it effectively by means other than political,"<sup>49</sup> has been clearly evidenced in the more recent history of the Katanga.

<sup>47</sup> These requirements were specifically mentioned, among several others, by the Committee on Factors established by the General Assembly in 1952 to report on the qualifications for self-government; see Clyde Eagleton, op. cit., p. 599.

<sup>46</sup> Ibid., p. 58.

The next question arising at this point is—even if we assume that the Katanga authorities could legitimize their claims to speak for the entire province—would this justify the United Nations in recognizing its independence? In this connection, two other factors deserve consideration. One relates to the general welfare of the community from which the group claiming self-determination seeks to secede. When the economic deprivations entailed by the secession become so harsh that they threaten the very survival of this community, there is clearly no justification for such claims. Or else the practical implications of a secession might well force upon the United Nations a financial burden out of all proportion to its own available resources.

The second factor concerns the political consequences which may result from a full-scale application of the right of a people to self-determination. In this case the threat to international peace represented by the possible intervention of third parties largely accounts for the decision of the United Nations to condemn the secession. From the standpoint of the internal political situation in the Congo, the secession would have played directly into the hands of the Gizengists and perhaps have invited a much firmer "commitment" on their part than presently exists, thereby making the prospects of national unification all the more distant. For this reason it also ran counter to the long-range objectives of the United States in Africa. As Adlai Stevenson declared before the Security Council: "If Tshombe's unwillingness thus far to meet with the central government authorities has prevented the achievement of political unity, how much more dangerous are the defiant actions and declarations of the authorities of the Orientale Province."<sup>50</sup> True, in the minds of African "radicals" the danger of Soviet penetration was virtually nonexistent as long as the Congo remained partially controlled by "neo-colonialist" forces. The secession of the Katanga was viewed, rather, as the ultimate phase of the struggle of nationalist forces against the remnants of colonial rule. The crucial point here, however, is that in each case the decision to prevent the exercise of self-determination was based on political considerations. That there are important economic and political limitations to the right of self-determination, and that these will necessarily depend on the context and circumstances in which the question arises, is perhaps the most significant lesson to be learned from the secession of the Katanga.

<sup>48</sup> Department of State Bulletin, Vol. 45, No. 1174 (December 25, 1961), p. 1062.

<sup>49</sup> The words are those of Ghana's President, Kwame Nkrumah; see Robert C. Good, "Four African Views of the Congo Crisis," Africa Report (June 1961), p. 3.

<sup>50</sup> Department of State Bulletin, op. cit., p. 1063.

POLITICAL SCIENCE AS A DISCIPLINE

A STATEMENT BY THE COMMITTEE ON STANDARDS OF INSTRUCTION OF THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE ASSOCIATION

Political science is a basic discipline in the social sciences. Although it must necessarily maintain close scholarly association with the disciplines of history, economics, sociology, anthropology, geography, and social psychology, political science cannot be considered a part of any of these other social sciences. Political science has its own area of human experience to analyze, its own body of descriptive and factual data to gather, its own conceptual schemes to formulate and test for truth.

I

For many years in many American colleges and universities history and political science were united as disciplines. In an earlier time there may have been some justification for this relationship. Today, this particular combination of scholarship serves no useful academic purpose.

When history meant primarily political history, and when political science relied heavily upon historical analysis, the two disciplines might well be linked for reasons of administrative convenience and scholarly association. In the present time when historiography embraces economic, social, cultural, scientific, and technological events as well as the political concerns of man, history no longer can be properly so tied to political science. And on the other hand, with history as an important but no longer the exclusive analytical technique of political inquiry, political science cannot properly be subsumed under the discipline of history.

Indeed, political science at the present time has developed its own internal specializations, even as most other disciplines. Less and less is a political scientist today a generalist in politics. He should have a broad background, it is true, in the general understanding of political power as a phenomenon of society, as a social institution, and as a structural and behavioral process. Yet the political scientist increasingly finds the body of political knowledge so great, and the tools of study so exacting, that he must specialize if he is to master and to communicate his subject matter.

In general, political science as a discipline is ordinarily divided into four broad areas of study. These are political theory, American political institutions and processes, comparative political institutions and processes, and international relations, organization and law.

In practice, these four major subdivisions of attention constitute great categories of political knowledge. Within each subdivision there are further specializations. The scholar in political theory may specialize in the thought of particular historical periods: ancient, medieval, renaissance, contemporary; or he may specialize in types of political doctrine such as aristocratic, democratic, totalitarian, or Marxian. The scholar of American government may specialize in constitutional law, political institutions including public administration, or political structure and behavior. The scholar in comparative government may concentrate upon the political systems of certain areas of the world: Western Europe, Latin America, the Far East, Africa, the Communist bloc; or he may of necessity devote his attention to specific nations: the United Kingdom and the British Commonwealth, France, Germany, Russia, Japan, French Equatorial Africa. The scholar of international relations and law may give primary attention to diplomatic or legal relations among nations, to the relations among two or more particular nations, or to particular subjects of international negotiation such as the promotion of trade, the pursuit of collective security, the control of arms.

Some universities have on occasion sought other arrangements than the one just outlined in the development of specialized categories of political knowledge. One system of specialization as against another is not our concern here. The fact of specialization within the body of knowledge labelled political science is of primary importance. There is also a growing specialization of methodology. In this respect the history of our discipline is similar to that of other disciplines.

Only in a large and wealthy university can a department of political science hope to bring together a company of scholars conversant with all or even most of these fields of specialized knowledge. Within many of our graduate schools there is a tendency to develop particular specialties, leaving other specialties to political science departments in other universities. For the most part agreements among political science departments to cooperate in the distribution of specializations are informal. Foundations by their grant programs have done much to encourage a distribution of specialization. There is a need for exploration of further desirable forms of inter-university cooperation in developing specialized fields of political science. As in many other areas of scholarship and human endeavor, however, political science must be aware of a tendency toward monopoly.

Today, as never before, a knowledge of political science is an essential part of the intellectual equipment of every educated person. At the same time, specialized competence in political science is indispensable for the further intellectual growth of man, and for the guidance of decision-making in a beleaguered world.

II

We are very much concerned about the implications of a recent survey of political science departments in four-year colleges and universities. This survey was undertaken by the headquarters staff of the American Political Science Association. The results of the survey give us reason for grave disquiet about the quality of the study of political science in American higher education today.

We appreciate the fact that our colleges and universities in the United States are proud of their variety and diversity. We realize that these institutions have somewhat different educational objectives, may serve somewhat different student interests and abilities, and may adopt somewhat different instructional procedures. We cannot accept the proposition, however, that political science as a discipline can be offered as a course of study in accredited colleges and universities without a definite concern for the quality and scope of such instruction.

In some circumstances the size of enrollment may be a restricting factor in curriculum offerings and instructional staffing. We are aware that some 615 private liberal arts colleges in the United States and some 67 state colleges had each an enrollment of under 1,000 students in 1960. In these circumstances we believe that political science should not be provided as a discipline unless the college has the resources to meet minimum acceptable standards of quality.

In our survey of degree granting colleges and universities, we have found 786 institutions offering courses under the heading of political science. We have found that only 466 of these institutions had a separate department of political science. In 162 instances political science was part of a joint department with history. In 129 instances political science was part of a department of social studies. In another 29 cases political science was joined with some other discipline, such as economics or sociology.

Of these 786 colleges and universities, we have found that in 564 instances, or 72 per cent of the total, political science was being offered by three or fewer persons. Indeed, we have found 15 departments offering the master's degree with only two or three instructors, and have even found two departments offering the Ph.D. degree, one with two instructors and the other with three instructors!

With staff resources of this limited number, we are appalled to discover that these departments are offering up to as many as 30 different courses. The average number of political science courses offered by a one-man department is 11, the average for a two-man department is 13, and the average for a three-man department is 15. Here is fragmentation run riot without adequate staff resources for such specialization. We have even found one instance where one man taught 20 different courses, five each semester over a four-semester cycle.

The data on educational preparation for instruction in political science are also not reassuring. In the 297 separate departments of political science having three or fewer instructors, the total number of persons teaching is 412. Of these, 236 held the Ph.D. degree and 138 held the master's degree. The proportion of individuals with the doctorate was 57 per cent. Quite a large number of persons are teaching political science who have not had any educational preparation in political science. Their background has been in law, history, economics, sociology, and philosophy.

In general, teaching loads appear to be quite heavy, especially in these small departments. We have found instances of individuals who teach as many as 21 to 25 hours a week; 18 hours is not uncommon. It must be remembered that all of the institutions we have referred to are four-year, degree granting colleges and universities, and all are regionally accredited.

We believe the small college has an educational contribution to make in our society, although this contribution in our judgment is often exaggerated. The small college is misguided in its efforts when it seeks to imitate a university in the scope and number of its course offerings.

We think that a wide variety and a large number of courses offered by a one- or two-man political science department endanger a desirable quality of instruction. We think that ordinarily a college providing a major in political science with fewer than three competent instructors is risking poor quality of instruction. We think that a college with a large department in one of the social science disciplines which adds on one or two political scientists for "balance" has not carefully con-considered the standards of instruction it desires to achieve. The variety of special instruction now required in political science of the scholarly political scientist must be properly prepared for his profession, or instruction in those areas of his individual competence, and must have time and opportunity for continued professional development and association.

We think these factors must be continually examined in every college and university providing instruction in political science.

III

Quality of instruction in political science in terms of organizational arrangements, load, educational preparation, scope of offerings, and scholarly association are not our only concerns. Adequate library materials are of equal importance.

It is hardly necessary to argue that library resources have a vital role in the teaching of political science. In a small college in particular, books can supplement limited resources in teachers. Yet the political scientist who is a specialist in American political institutions may often find himself at a loss to determine the most desirable library holdings in comparative government or international relations and law. Such a specialist in American political institutions may feel even more incompetent in deciding the desirable acquisitions in various sub-specialties, such as Russian government, arms control, or Sino-American relations.

We are confident that a minimum working undergraduate library in political science would involve at least 2,500 to 3,000 different volumes. We believe it would be desirable for the American Political Science Association to arrange the preparation of a list of volumes which would constitute such a minimum working undergraduate library.

IV

It seems unlikely that political scientists would necessarily agree that there is one best possible kind of undergraduate curriculum for the study of political science. We believe there would be a high degree of consensus, however, about the basic construction of such a curriculum.

First of all, there must be a general introductory course. For many students in a college or university this will be their only exposure to political science as a discipline. This course will usually satisfy such general education requirements in government or the social sciences as a college or university may prescribe. At the same time, this course must satisfy the need for a foundation to later and further study of political science by students with a particular interest in the field.

The introductory course may approach the study of political science in terms of political theory, of comparative government, or of American political institutions. Some admixture of all three may well be undertaken, as well as a consideration of American foreign policy.

It seems particularly desirable that the introductory course should avoid a mere repetition of descriptive and factual data about American government which the college student should have acquired in high school.

Secondly, beyond the introductory course there should be a desirable array of core courses in political science. Ordinarily, there should be at least four of these: one each in American political institutions, comparative government, international relations, and political theory. Such core courses must be carefully articulated with the introductory course to avoid repetition of content.

In the third place, there will be some specialized course offerings within the framework of the core courses. In general, we believe that such specialized courses should be kept within reasonable limits at the undergraduate level, and that the undergraduate major should be encouraged instead to study comparable core areas in related social science disciplines such as history, economics, and sociology.

There is a good deal of discussion about the extent of concentration to be required of the undergraduate political science major. This can only be resolved in terms of the undergraduate educational goals and procedures of an individual college or university as a whole. Education in depth and breadth are the equal objectives of undergraduate instruction in the United States.

V

We are also concerned about graduate instruction in political science. According to Berelson's recent study, about half of the political scientists on graduate faculties in American universities are dissatisfied with the state of graduate education in our discipline. This may reflect no more than a continuing restless discontent, a healthy state of affairs for our profession.

Many issues are involved. Perhaps they can all be summarized in the language of a colleague who remarked several years ago that we seek a concept of the doctorate which will provide a "valid indication of technical competence." Should research training or teaching ability be the primary goal of graduate education? Is breadth of knowledge about political science or a high degree of specialization desirable? What kinds of educational endeavor and experience will best realize our goals? How long a period of time should graduate education require?

These are all familiar issues, and they are not peculiar to political science. All of these problems require continuing attention.

The curriculum for graduate education will necessarily reflect the instructional philosophy of a graduate department of political science. At a minimum a graduate department will desire to carry the specialization of undergraduate study to a more intensive level of competence. We recognize that undergraduate and graduate education tend to overlap, but some arrangements should be possible to avoid duplicating course requirements for the individual student.

We believe it is necessary for all graduate students to have some specialized study in the field of political theory. If the graduate student has not had some introduction to the other major areas of political science, this also seems necessary. Beyond this, we think that the graduate student should be expected to develop a particular competence within one general area and within some subdivision of another general area.

When should a university contemplate offering a Ph.D. in political science? The answer must be general but emphatic. The department must have the necessary resources in number and quality of personnel, in library and research materials, and in instructional and research facilities to offer courses and student supervision in at least three of the broad areas of political science and in considerable depth of specialization within each of these areas.

Good graduate education requires good students as well. Standards of admission determine in large part the standards of graduate instruction. Moreover, the graduate student should be expected to have acquired a general background in political science and the liberal arts as an undergraduate student.

The extent to which the graduate student should be expected to master foreign languages, statistical techniques, or other special research methodology may perhaps be best resolved in each particular subject-matter area. Certainly some understanding of research methodology in general should be an integral part of all graduate instruction in political science.

In recent years there has been some discussion of requirements for higher education as something about the acquire some experience teaching. We believe that this to discuss without formal course work, but we learn all graduate departments of political science give some attention to this matter.

There is no doubt in our minds about the need for a major piece of research as the capstone of the doctorate. A dissertation, however, need not be regarded in the strictest possible sense as a contribution to knowledge. Perhaps the best standard would be to insist that the dissertation evidence a capacity to do original, if not creative, work.

The future of political science instruction in the United States will depend in large measure upon the future graduate preparation of instructors in our discipline.

VI

In political science, as in other scholarly disciplines, there is tension between undergraduate and graduate instruction in our large universities. Prestige, status, and salary remuneration tend to be greater for the graduate professor than for the undergraduate teacher. The scholar at the graduate level is expected to be engaged actively in research, and hence is often given a reduced teaching load in comparison with his undergraduate colleagues.

Some scholars may prefer graduate instruction to undergraduate teaching because the quality and interest of their students are superior. Perhaps it is fair to say that graduate teaching may even be easier, since less effort may be expended in arousing the latent interest of students and in stimulating them to their own education. Moreover, the graduate teacher is often able to confine instruction to his own special interest; he may not conduct classes in the broader areas of knowledge about government.

In some of the larger universities it is said that lower division classes fall entirely into the hands of graduate assistants. We do not see this practice as necessarily unfortunate. The assistant nearing completion of his doctorate work will often bring a freshness of point of view and an enthusiasm to his instructional duties which others may lack. In some instances leading scholars of a political science department may lecture to large sections of undergraduate students. Here again there is nothing to criticize in this arrangement as such. Everything depends upon how well the lecturing is done, and upon the supplementary opportunities for discussion.

Universities have tried many organizational arrangements in order to lessen conflict between undergraduate and graduate instruction. Sometimes two separate departments have been created. Sometimes separate standards for academic rank have been established. Sometimes special efforts to increase the remuneration of those primarily engaged in undergraduate instruction have been made. In general, we feel that to divide a department of political science into exclusively graduate or exclusively undergraduate parts is unfortunate. While some faculty members should not teach graduate work, there should not be any faculty members who teach nothing else but graduate work. Both levels of effort present challenges to effective instruction which demand careful consideration by all members of a department.

There are also certain complexities in developing working relations between the discipline of political science and such professional fields of instruction as law, business administration, public administration, school administration, social work, and foreign affairs. The desirable relationship between the discipline and related professional fields deserves continuing attention. The discipline of political science has a major contribution to make in many different fields of professional education, and individuals with recognized scholarship in the discipline should be encouraged to participate in professional education.

VII

We have given some thought to establishing a procedure for the accreditation of departments of political science along the lines of that established by the American Chemical Society for departments of chemistry. After considerable discussion we are agreed that this type of action at this time would be premature.

The accreditation function for American colleges and universities is performed in general by six regional accrediting associations, supplemented by national accrediting agencies in fields of study preparing for different professions. Substantial effort is being expended to reduce rather than further to proliferate specialized accrediting bodies. This goal is certainly worthwhile. But it is acceptable only if regional accrediting associations perform their function with greater care and with more attention to the interests of various scholarly disciplines than has often been evidenced in the past.

We believe that needed standards of instruction will not be obtained just by a simple declaration of desirable principles. Some definite additional steps are required.

First, some effort at cooperation with the regional accrediting associations should be made to help ensure appropriate consideration of the factor of competence in political science. Copies of this statement should be provided the officers and members of the commissions responsible for accreditation of colleges and universities in each regional association. Our own regional political science groups should take action to make assistance available to accrediting bodies in evaluating present instructional resources and practice in political science at colleges and universities.

Secondly, the regional accrediting associations should be urged to establish review procedures which make full use of the disciplines. A committee of political scientists should be established in each accrediting region to participate in visits to colleges and universities offering instruction in political science. We believe that review and inspection groups of regional accrediting associations might include a member of such a committee.

Thirdly, the regional seminars sponsored by the American Political Science Association should give attention to this report and should consider additional desirable steps to advance the quality of instruction in political science.

In the fourth place, in those states where a state agency is authorized by law to evaluate instructional quality of colleges and universities, and where such authority is exercised in practice, we believe that these agencies should have the assistance of political scientists in performing their task. The political science departments in our leading universities might well offer their services in this activity.

Finally, we believe it is desirable for the American Political Science Association periodically to review the problems outlined herein, and in particular to re-examine such action as may have been taken by regional accrediting associations and others. If there is not some evidence of definite improvement in the next three or four years, additional steps must be given consideration.

GABRIEL A. ALMOND

Yale University

ERIC C. BELLQUIST

University of California (Berkeley)

JOSEPH M. RAY

Texas Western College

JOHN P. ROCHE

Brandeis University

IRVIN STEWART

West Virginia University

RICHARD W. VAN WAGENEN

The American University

JOHN D. MILLETT Chairman

Miami University

September, 1961

COMMUNICATIONS

ERRATA

TO THE EDITOR:

Through the advice of a friend who had read a mimeographed draft of the article, I have discovered computational errors involving two of the three rank correlation coefficients reported in Table VI of my article on the 1960 Term of the Supreme Court, in the March issue of this REVIEW. These errors do not affect the substantive findings or interpretation or analysis, but they are wrong, and I shall be very grateful for their correction, as follows:

- p. 105, Table VI: tau for E should be .817, and  $p < .0012$ ; and tau for F should be .783, and  $p < .0029$
- p. 105, col. 2, 2nd para., line 3: tau should be .78
- p. 106, col. 1, 2nd para., lines 15-16 should read:  $< .0^94$ , or less than one chance in a hundred million.

GLENDON SCHUBERT

TO THE EDITOR:

My contributors and I are compelled to respond briefly to Alan Altshuler's review of our Cases in State and Local Government, in the March issue, p. 178. The book is a supplementary text, only a text, and nothing but a text.

The flyer from the publisher says that the book "can help you, the professor, by supplementing your standard class text." It was conceived and produced with this limited need in mind. We felt that rather short, straight-forward descriptions of illustrative situations in the state and local area would be useful to teachers in that field. Those with even a few years experience in the state and local field have usually felt that the sector could use a little humanizing, and that the long and complicated cases found as small parts of other volumes were not always an answer to our troubles.

We certainly wished that each case could meet every professional standard by being "accurate, applicable, profound, perceptive, significant, vivid, colorful, persuasive, provocative, etc.," the criteria which appear in the review. Altshuler is right when he notes that "space limitation has precluded the development of relationships in detail." But long cases, wonderfully accomplished, such as Ylvisaker's "Battle of Blue Earth County" or Kaufman's "Gotham in the Air Age," both in the Stein case-book, do not have exactly the same teaching goals that most of ours do. We think that the specific, worthwhile need we had in mind was met better than the reviewer allowed.

RICHARD T. FROST

Reed College

BOOK REVIEWS, NOTES AND BIBLIOGRAPHY

REVIEWS OF BOOKS

Biderman and Zimmer, Ed. , The Manipulation of Human Behavior. ARNOLD A. ROGOW .....	424
Bechhoefer , Postwar Negotiations for Arms Control; Bull , The Control of the Arms Race; Warburg , Disarmament: The Challenge of the Nineteen Sixties. JOHN GANGE .....	425
Kurland, Ed. , The Supreme Court Review. HAROLD W. CHASE .....	427
Blau and Scott , Formal Organizations: A Comparative Approach. HAROLD GUETZKOW .....	428
Wallerstein , Africa: the Politics of Independence. WILLIAM HANNA .....	429
Rosenau, Ed. , International Politics and Foreign Policy. E. RAYMOND PLATIG ...	431
Syrett, Ed. and Cooke, Assoc. Ed. , The Papers of Alexander Hamilton. Vol. I, 1768- 1778. Vol. II, 1779-1781. PATRICIA BARRETT .....	432
Humes and Martin , The Structure of Local Government Throughout the World. FRED G. BURKE .....	434
Fleming , The Cold War and Its Origins. THEODORE P. WRIGHT, JR. ....	435

BOOK NOTES AND BIBLIOGRAPHY

POLITICAL THEORY, HISTORY OF POLITICAL THOUGHT, AND METHODOLOGY .....	438
AMERICAN GOVERNMENT AND POLITICS .....	459
FOREIGN AND COMPARATIVE GOVERNMENT .....	479
INTERNATIONAL POLITICS, LAW AND ORGANIZATION .....	496
OTHER BOOKS RECEIVED .....	514

BOOK REVIEWS

The Manipulation of Human Behavior. EDITED BY ALBERT D. BIDERMAN AND HERBERT ZIMMER. (New York: John Wiley & Sons, Inc., 1961. Pp. 323. $7.95.)

When the first reports reached the United States of gross misconduct among American prisoners-of-war in Korea, they occasioned a good deal of shock and indignation in both civilian and military circles. The reports indicated that of the 7,190 American soldiers captured by the Communists, only a mere handful, or approximately 5 per cent, consistently refused to cooperate with the Chinese. Some 15 per cent collaborated extensively with the enemy, while 80 per cent, according to an authoritative report on the subject, "collaborated occasionally and mildly and can be thought of as having maintained an essentially neutral position."<sup>1</sup> It also appeared that of the 3,000 soldiers who died or were murdered in the POW camps, a significant number perished as the direct result of the low morale prevailing in the ranks of the officers and enlisted men. In a large number of cases, of course, deaths could be attributed to starvation, extreme cold, and illness. But in other cases—no one will ever know exactly how many—the cause of death was referred to by repatriated POWs as "give-up-itis," or, in more formal terms, the loss of the will to live. "Give-up-itis," one returned prisoner later reported, often took the initial form of not caring about one's physical well-being: "Some men got so lazy and so negligent . . . that they wouldn't even kill their own lice. There were men with dysentery who, when they soiled their own clothes . . . they wouldn't even clean their own clothes out. They would just sit in their own waste."<sup>2</sup> In the final stages, a man suffering from "give-up-itis" would stop eating, but not all at once. "His appetite lagged, he began to give portions of his food away, within the next few days he became more and more withdrawn, would speak to his friends less, within the next day or so he would have his blanket or coat or whatever was available for his covering pulled up over his head, and would then sort of go into a cocoon and assume the foetal position, and in another twenty-four hours he'd be dead. This whole period of time was predictable—it took about ten days."<sup>2</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Edgar H. Schein (Massachusetts Institute of Technology), "Social Disorganization, Belief Change, and Collaboration." Professor Schein's report was based on research sponsored by the Army and undertaken by him when he was a Captain on the staff of Walter Reed Hospital.

In the years since the end of the Korean War the behavior of our soldiers in the prison camp has been systematically investigated by a number of public and private agencies. Unfortunately, these explorations, while they have resulted in or inspired a considerable literature, have raised many more questions than answers, and the answers that have been suggested reflect a wide range of opinion. On one point, however, all of the investigators appear to be in agreement: the Communists did not produce collaborators and informers by the technique popularly known as "brain-washing." Instead, they used a variety of methods other than forced indoctrination, all of which had as their purpose the destruction of group cohesion and the undermining of individual morale. Natural leaders among the prisoners for example, were isolated or otherwise cut off from the rank-and-file. No organized activity which the Chinese did not sponsor was permitted. Informers and active collaborators were rewarded with extra rations, cigarettes, and warm clothing—rewards of no little significance for survival in the starved and frozen atmosphere of the camps. Leading atomized existences, broken in body and frequently in mind as well, many of the POWs were inclined to take, in the context of the situation, one or more of the easier ways out: for some, death via "give-up-itis"; for others, collaboration for most, a passive and docile attitude toward their captors, and willing attendance at the propaganda lectures that were a regular feature of camp life.

The book under review does not deal directly with the Korean War POW experience, but it is doubtful that it would have been written had that experience not shocked the sensibilities of professional and lay publics in the United States. Indeed, in their introduction the editors refer to the broader questions posed by the Korean affair, and the essays that follow are addressed to these questions. In essence, the editors insist, the "central question of fact" raised by Korea, apart from moral, philosophical, and I should add, political and cultural issues, is:

whether all individuals, regardless of how strongly motivated to resist, could be made to comply with demands for information, "confessions," or other collaboration by methods employed by the Communists, provided that the intensity, duration, and quality of the pressures were sufficiently great.

<sup>2</sup> Quoted from interviews with repatriated POW's broadcast over the CBS Radio Network, June 9, 1958. The program, "P.O.W.—A Study in Survival," was narrated by Edward R. Murrow.

Or in other words, ask the editors, is it true that "every man has his breaking point"? Noting that this proposition has served as a premise in policy formulation, the editors query whether any situation encountered by American POWs in Korea "approached those extremes of 'stress' that no individual could be expected to resist."

Since I am reviewing a 'what-dunnit' rather than a 'who-dunnit,' I don't think it is unfair to the editors and contributors to reveal that their book does not provide, and was not intended to provide, a reliable answer to this question—and perhaps none can be provided except by those who were themselves POWs in Korea. What we do learn from the seven essays that constitute the book is the extent to which human behavior can be changed, altered, or radically transformed by a variety of techniques including drugs, hypnosis, reduced environmental stimulation, and the manipulation of interpersonal relations. As may be expected, the essays draw much of their evidence from controlled experiments carried on under laboratory conditions. But that does not make their conclusions, in my view, any less impressive, or any less relevant to the everyday world. To be sure, the data cited frequently point in opposite directions; it is sometimes a case of 'on the one hand, this, and on the other hand, that.' Nevertheless, the book is an invaluable—I am tempted to say indispensable—summary of what is definitely or approximately known about the control of human behavior.

I want to emphasize, however, that neither the editors nor the contributors are particularly concerned with the moral and ethical questions involved in the experimental findings they report. Although most of the essays deal in part with techniques of counter-manipulation, only one, concerned with malingering, has counter-manipulation as its primary subject. None of the essays discusses the extent to which political, social, and cultural behavior in the United States is increasingly subject to manipulation.

These remarks are not intended as criticism of the book but as a pointer to areas of research that are going begging, so far as political science is concerned. Let me be bold, brash, and vulgar: I suggest that we either confer a Ph.D. degree on Vance Packard or do a better job than he is doing. And unless we do a better job than he has done the day is not far off when none of us will know, with or without a Ph.D., who is manipulating whom, how, and for what. The book I have been reviewing reveals that the manipulation of behavior is gradually moving from art to science, and from uncertainty to certainty. It seems reasonable to suggest that until research begins to focus on the moral and ethical problems involved, and devise counter-offensive strategies and techniques, those of us who are optimists, democrats, and believers in free will, must resign ourselves to whistling in the dark.

ARNOLD A. ROGOW

Stanford University

Postwar Negotiations for Arms Control. BY BERNHARD G. BECHHOEFER. (Washington, D.C.: The Brookings Institution, 1961. Pp. xiv, 641. $8.75.)

The Control of the Arms Race. BY HEDLEY BULL. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger, 1961. Pp. xiv, 215. $3.95.)

Disarmament: The Challenge of the Nineteen Sixties. BY JAMES P. WARBURG. (Garden City: Doubleday & Co., 1961. Pp. 288, $4.50.)

When Dean Rusk was president of the Rockefeller Foundation, he once referred to his earlier days in the Department of State as being "a part of a rather artificial and sometimes dangerous game being played on the roof of a mansion in which the people of the world were very busy getting the job of the human race done." Perhaps no other segment of our post-war diplomatic history reads so much like an "artificial and sometimes dangerous game" as does the story of the hide-and-seek on international disarmament and arms control.

The story of efforts to find, or to block, a viable road to effective disarmament and arms control is well reviewed in each of these three books although the approach differs in each. Many children's games come to mind as one re-observes the primary participants in this perpetually improvised minuet of changing poses and positions called disarmament conferences and negotiations. Viewed from the perspective of some other planet this dreary story of the past sixteen years would perhaps seem comical, but for us who are still bound to this planet it is far from funny.

Mr. Warburg devotes about one hundred pages of his book to the review of post-war arguments over disarmament and some other relevant international issues which strongly influenced the arms talks. He includes, in seventeen appendices, a well-chosen assortment of documents on the arms controversy for the period from May 1956 to October 1960. These documents tend to repeat his earlier resume of arms negotiations but they are useful for their official quality. There is no bibliography (nor many footnote references), and there is no index.

Warburg ranges rather widely at times in his discussion, including the final chapter of the book in which he argues the imperative need for multinational aid to the disadvantaged peoples of the world. He believes that the United States should henceforth follow the path of multilateral foreign aid with new boldness and new generosity. This discussion on aid concludes a three-chapter analysis of the abatement of tensions, the economic feasibility of disarmament for America, and the "creation of conditions of life that the majority of mankind will find tolerable and reasonably just." Perhaps it is the ever-widening scope of Warburg's book which leaves a reader at the end feeling titillated with many problems and ideas but unsatisfied as to the evidence, logic, or persuasion of the author's answers to the "imperatives" he postulates.

Mr. Bechhoefer has drawn upon twelve years of responsible participation in armaments control negotiations in making his review of our peregrinations on what he calls the "highway without signs" in search of agreement on arms control. Bechhoefer devotes 550 pages of his book to a review of the important international disarmament discussions from 1943 (with some references to even earlier periods) to the breakup of the Ten-Power Conference at Geneva in the early summer of 1960. His review is quite detailed, and heavily documented with references to official sources. He makes many effective references to over-all U. S. foreign policy and also to the general international context of the arms negotiations.

Bechhoefer is often candid and blunt in his criticisms of United States policy and action in disarmament issues. He is most critical of those instances when U. S. policy failed to be militarily and technically sound and also politically attractive. He also makes some fully justified criticisms of the frequent United States practice of changing our official negotiator and policy formulators only a few months before major, and often crucial, international meetings.

In a concluding lengthy "appraisal" Bechhoefer gives considerable attention to the critical question of acceptable "first-stage" measures for any comprehensive disarmament and arms control program. He suggests five areas where negotiations for an acceptable first-stage plan might be achieved. All of these are certain to be discussed in the March 1962 conference and in subsequent meetings. His long historical review, therefore, ends on a note of preview of the continuing agenda for arms control.

Despite the lack of tangible success in arms control, Bechhoefer believes that the arms control negotiations may have been—and may continue to be—"a road toward peace and security." Twelves years of frustration seem not to have dimmed Bechhoefer's basic optimism that "arms control negotiations may be one of the roads, or even the main road, leading to East-West accords."

The book includes a useful ten-page bibliographical guide and a very good index.

The shortest of the three books here reviewed seemed to this reviewer the most satisfying treatment of the arms race. Mr. Bull had the cooperation and assistance of a very distinguished group of specialists meeting with him at Oxford. The Institute for Strategic Studies sponsored the book and also organized the study group. Two members of the study group, Mr. Richard Goold-Adams (chairman) and the Right Honorable John Strachey, M.P., take directly opposed views regarding Bull's book, Mr. Strachey's disagreement with many of Bull's observations being included as the last three pages of the book, offsetting Goold-Adams' warm endorsement of Bull's study.

Bull's approach to the long record of disarmament discussions is more by categories of problems than as a single chronological narrative. This approach involves some repetition of key meetings but it has the great advantage of concentrating successively on the major issues one at a time. Bull divides his analysis into four parts: "The Objectives and Conditions of Arms Control," "Arms Control Through Disarmament," "Arms Control Without Disarmament," and "The Problem of Continuous Innovation."

In the course of his very lucid, and unemotional review of the many problems and proposed solutions for international arms control, Bull does not seek ideal solutions but rather the more realistic measures which might provide some stability in an extremely dynamic and fluid arena of international politics and technology. He also gives more attention than Warburg and Bechhoefer to developments in the field of chemical, biological and radiological warfare.

Mr. Bull concludes his book with a stimulating and provocative chapter on "the problem of continuous innovation"; a problem which repeatedly undermines the shaky foundations of international arms control accords. As he puts it: "The uncertainty [especially technologically] of the future is a factor which strongly influences the present." He sees little prospect of an end being put upon military innovation and in this position he has most of human history on his side. He does see another alternative, however, in "basing arms control systems themselves on an innovating technology," and he argues persuasively that "arms control starts on the drawing boards" of new weapons.

Mr. Bull concludes his book with a plea for the serious study of modern military technology and arms control. Our hope for the future he believes lies in "the constant application of palliatives" rather than the "taking of a single dramatic step of sweeping present difficulties aside" by trying to create a whole new international political structure and order.

The leap-frog game of innovation and counter-innovation, controls and evasion of controls, is as predictable a course for the human future now as in the days when Ecclesiastes declaimed the theme of "a time for war, and a time for peace." It is equally predictable and politically necessary that the issue of disarmament will continue to be a major feature of international politics. As Secretary Rusk said in a radio interview on January 7, 1962, "... we must keep gnawing at it [the issue of disarmament], working at it, trying our best to find a practical and safe means [to] . . . reduced arms and to some limitation on the arms race."

The student who wants to join in the "gnawing at" and "working at" this problem will find a good ground for practice in any of these three books, especially the Bechhoefer and Bull studies.

JOHN GANGE

University of Oregon

The Supreme Court Review. EDITED BY PHILIP B. KURLAND. (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1961. Pp. 332. $6.50.)

This book is not as one might suspect from the title and the publisher's advertising a panoramic view of the Supreme Court's work in the 1960-61 Term. It is not in the genre of the annual survey featured in some of the law journals and so ably done for the Review by David Fellman. Rather, it is a collection of eight superb essays, six of which deal with selected important cases decided in the Term. The other two essays provide a delicious frosting to a cake which in and of itself would tickle the palates of even the gourmets in the Public Law and American Government fields. So much for generalities.

In the first of the essays, Professor Francis A. Allen deals with Mapp v. Ohio, the case in which the Court held that evidence obtained by state officers through an unreasonable search and seizure was inadmissible in state courts. Allen furnishes a succinct and lively account of previous pertinent decisions and an interesting discussion of the pros and cons of the exclusionary rule as well as an analysis of the issues and decision in Mapp. While doing so, Allen develops the interesting theme that the decision was a surprise. Some of his conclusions are especially provocative, consequently well worth scrutiny. He suggests, for example, that the Mapp decision: (1) leaves important questions unresolved; (2) "intrudes farther into areas of local policy and self-determination than earlier decisions of the Court affecting state criminal procedures"; (3) may not in the last analysis afford much protection to individual rights.

Against the backdrop of Machinists v. Street, the case in which the Supreme Court decided that the union shop provision of the Railway Labor Act denies a union the power to use funds exacted from an employee to support political causes which he opposes and where he objects, Professor Harry H. Wellington treats with great skill and insight the arguments for and against the avoidance of constitutional issues by the Supreme Court. Later, with forceful argument and language, Wellington castigates the Court for avoiding the constitutional issue in this particular case. He concludes that "the Court had no legitimate alternative to constitutional decision," that a proper decision would have rejected "the contention that the validity of a union shop contract is to be tested by the requirements of the First Amendment" and that such a decision "would have spared us a slick but shallow performance in the delicate art of avoiding questions through statutory interpretation." Even those who, like the reviewer, disagree with these conclusions, will profit from and enjoy this hard-hitting essay.

Using as a jumping off point the covey of cases which bore heavily on the subject, David Fellman with characteristic thoroughness and skill explores the important aspects of the constitutional rights of association. He concludes that the "importance of the rights of association demands that the law should regard with great suspicions any attempt to denigrate them" that "doubts should be resolved in their favor, never against them." He goes on to add, however, that "there are vital public interests in the maintenance of law and order and in restraining criminal conspiracies, and where such interests exist the rights of association must yield." He then commiserates with the Court which in our system must draw the line, by writing that the Court "has a job of obviously formidable proportions on their hands." Those of us who look to guidance from Professor Fellman can only wish that he had spelled out precisely what his conclusions mean in terms of the cases dealing with Communists. On which side of the ledger do the Supreme Court decisions upholding the constitutionality of the Subversive Activities Control Act and the membership clause of the Smith Act go, David?

The fact that only brief mention is made of the other three essays dealing with specific cases is due to lack of space rather than any lack of merit. For law professors, Jo Lucas, Walter Blum and Derek Bok provide first-rate analyses of and interesting insights on the issues in Gomillion v. Lightfoot, Knetsch v. United States, and Tampa Electric Company v. Nashville Coal Co. respectively.

The frosting on the cake alluded to at the beginning of this review is the splendid pair of essays by Walter Murphy and Alexander Meiklejohn. Murphy describes how William Howard Taft as Chief Justice attempted with some success to influence the choice of appointments to the Supreme Court. His findings suggest that sitting justices of the Supreme Court may have had more to do with appointments to the bench than has previously been suspected.

One might well wonder what Alexander Meiklejohn can write about First Amendment freedoms which he had not written before. But even those familiar with his previous explications will find much worthwhile in his essay. Particularly interesting are his observations on Professor Leonard Levy's authoritative study which presented strong evidence that the Framers of the Constitution were not as absolute about protecting First Amendment freedoms as their language suggests.

In conclusion, kudos must go to the editor, Professor Philip B. Kurland. Surely, the high quality of scholarship and the literary craftsmanship manifested in the book reflect, at the very least, unusual skill in recruiting and marshalling extraordinary talent.

HAROLD W. CHASE

University of Minnesota

Formal Organizations: A Comparative Approach. BY PETER M. BLAU AND RICHARD W. SCOTT. (San Francisco: Chandler Publishing Co., 1962. Pp. x, 312. $5.25.)

Blau and Scott make a remarkable integration of the literature of organizational behavior, in its informal as well as its formal aspects. Working as sociologists, they have developed a vivid array of partial theories about stable collective social entities which have been "deliberately established for specific ends." Their nine orderly chapters present typologies and propositions about the entire gamut of such organizations, from "business concerns" and "service organizations" (as hospitals and social-work agencies) to "mutual-benefit organizations" (as political parties and professional associations) and "commonweal organizations" through which local, state, and national governments function. The book makes careful articulation of the organization per se with its internal structure, as such exists in its informal work groups and its supervisory and managerial practices, and with its external social context, as the organization relates to its publics and to other organizations in its environment.

Students of bureaucracy will be aided by the careful conceptual development which Blau and Scott make of the nature of authority, with their clear delineation of the way in which informal processes reinforce the legitimacy of compliance stemming from cultural roots. The authors have significantly extended and clarified Weber's pioneering over-simplifications. Scholars also will appreciate their theoretical contribution in constructing a partial theory of organizational development, viewing tendencies toward bureaucratization and debureaucratization as processes of change and conflict. In this work they have gone beyond the original but loose formulations of Eisenstadt.

Students of public administration will be helped by the insightful ways in which Blau and Scott have transformed traditional problems of the executive branch, such as specialization and coordination, into quite fruitful inquiries about processes of communication and planning, especially those involving "impersonal control" mechanisms. Scholars will value their clarification of how an organization's formal structure is influenced by the characteristics of its leadership and informal group processes, and vice versa. Their most ground-breaking work is their delineation of how competing and cooperating counterpart organizations influence an organization's internal functioning.

Those who desire that our study of politics become more rigorous will admire the modesty and soundness with which Blau and Scott apply the scientific method. They use negative instances and contrasting findings to serve as springboards in the development of theories more closely related to empirical realities. These scholarly skills are exhibited well in their brilliant chapter on "Processes of Communication," in which they mesh the findings of experimental and field work into a theory of how formal hierarchical characteristics of an organization interact with informal social support processes in the facilitation and hindrance of problem-solving and coordination outputs of the organization.

In this reviewer's opinion, the clarity of the book as an amalgam of empirical studies completed through 1960 is blurred by the inclusion of overly detailed expositions of two unpublished studies of a city and a county welfare agency conducted by the two authors. Some readers may find in these interruptions refreshing contacts with raw data, which are difficult to maintain in a book primarily constructed from the findings of others. When dealing with their own more recent findings, however, the authors lose the cautious perspective which they demonstrated in handling the research findings of the field as a whole. Their own more recent data entice them into unwarranted speculation.

Now teachers of public administration have a pair of complementary books for the renovation of their teaching of advanced courses on organizational behavior. In March and Simon's Organizations, directors of seminars have a book which exhibits the structure of propositions about social psychological processes involved in decision-making in government. In Blau and Scott's Formal Organizations, they have a book of equal quality and creative penetration into group processes involved in the functioning of governmental units. Because both are based on extant empirical researches, master and doctoral candidates may become inspired to abandon the descriptive, single case and proceed without further delay to the building of a social science of administration. In the five years ahead, the findings displayed so advantageously in the Blau and Scott volume should have much impact on the revision and development of our many undergraduate texts in public administration.

At times the conceptual and resource difficulties that scholars face in developing politics as a social science rather than as polemic seem overwhelming. But this work by Blau and Scott will embolden all of us. Just as important strides have been taken in developing empirically grounded theory for party politics and voting behavior, so now we have significant achievement in our comprehension of organizational and executive activity. Within the next decade or so, our understanding of the legislative and judicial aspects of government may be underpinned more adequately with data. More and more tightly constructed political theories may result. Then finally we can bid farewell to the contentious autism which has been our heritage. Blau and Scott speed us on our way.

HAROLD GUETZKOW

Northwestern University

Africa: The Politics of Independence. By IMMANUEL WALLERSTEIN. (New York: Vintage Books, 1961. Pp. vi, 174. $1.25.)

Most intellectually stimulating studies of African politics are limited in scope to a small number of geographical areas, e.g., Apter's The Political Kingdom in Uganda, or to a small number of analytical dimensions, e.g., Hodgkin's Nationalism in Colonial Africa. The few with broad scope have usually appeared in forms not suitable for mass distribution either among the laity or among students as a classroom text, e.g., Coleman's section in The Politics of the Developing Areas. The book under review is intellectually stimulating, has broad scope, and is available in paperback. It therefore fills an important gap in the literature.

That broad scope is the aim, the author makes clear on the first page of his introduction. He describes the book as "an interpretative essay that seeks to place within an overall perspective the whole range of modern political developments on the African continent." The geographical and analytical scope of a prospective study is a problem which must be confronted by all comparative social analysts. Should we focus upon the political system or a part of it? Should we limit ourselves to peoples who have had relatively similar experiences or expand to include peoples with relatively dissimilar experiences? In what ways should our data collection, analysis, and presentation vary with scope?

The geographical scope decision most Africanists have made is to focus either upon North or sub-Saharan Africa (at most), on the grounds that within each of these areas the indigenous cultures, external contacts, and contemporary developments have been relatively similar and therefore amenable to generalization at lower levels of abstraction.

The continent of Africa as a whole contains considerably more variety in culture, contact, and development, necessitating higher levels of abstraction, more elaboration, or generalizations where deviant cases are often not considered. Wallerstein writes that many of the statements in his book are "generalizations, true of the large majority [of African territories]. Where there are important exceptions to the rule, they are usually indicated." He is reasonably successful at indicating "important" exceptions, but the task of covering African politics at a lower level of abstraction in less than two hundred small pages is enormous.

A new era of African history began when Europeans—motivated by “the lure of adventure, the search for personal freedom, the sense of mission . . . greed and vanity and lust for power”—imposed their rule upon the continent. The era is, in Wallerstein’s well chosen words, “a story of how Africans reacted to their conquest by seeking to learn the secret of their weaknesses in order to reestablish the autonomous control of their own destiny.”

This story can be viewed as two social processes, and these are the two main foci of the book: (1) the ways in which colonial administrations “generate within themselves social conflict, and under what conditions this social conflict results in a revolution which overthrows [the administrations],” and (2) the ways in which independent African states “hold themselves together, acquire the loyalty of their subjects in a complex economy where the interests of the citizens vary widely.”

The social changes which led to revolution were, according to the author, largely by-products of European acts of self-interest. Order assured Europeans freedom of action, but it also provided the African with safe travel and the African deviant with an escape. “The dissenter, the misfit, the rebel could now defy the chief simply by moving out from under his control.” Education supplied trained workers for the Europeans, but it also socialized Africans to western perspectives. Transportation and communication facilitated European administrative and economic goals, but it also increased the diversity of African contacts. Commercialization contributed to European wealth, but because of the need for African manpower, cash crops, and a money economy, it also interrupted traditional patterns. Urbanization created centers for the new infrastructure, but it also was the agent of modernity. Bureaucratization of traditional authorities facilitated European administration, but it also weakened the position of these authorities in the traditional society.

The most consequential effect of social change was the emergence of westernized Africans as a potential counter-elite. As vehicles to power they first organized voluntary associations and later mass nationalist movements. Finally, power in the form of territorial independence was gained.

Before turning to the independence period, I shall offer a proposition suggested by Wallerstein’s materials. Many of the Europeans who came to Africa were deviants in the metropole society seeking deference. Similarly, many of the Africans who came into contact with the Europeans were deviants in the traditional society seeking deference. I believe that the selective recruitment of these two groups heightened the intensity of conflict between them.

The second focus of Wallerstein’s book is the development of stability and integration in the new African states. Instability often, and disintegration sometimes, accompanies the transfer of power because of underdeveloped civility and frail authority. African political elites use a variety of strategies in order to develop the needed stability and integration. Among those mentioned by Wallerstein are (1) legitimation of the state through revival and glorification of the indigenous culture, (2) development of intra-territorial functional interdependence, (3) creation and dissemination of the national image, (4) emphasis upon the supportive “we” rather than the oppositional “they,” (5) socialization to the new political symbols, and (6) creation of new political goals, e.g., African unity and eradication of neo-colonialism to replace the goal of independence.

The two major instruments for attaining stability and integration, according to Wallerstein, are the nationalist party and the national hero. The party “is the emanation of the people . . . holds their loyalty and ties them to the state.” The hero “legitimizes the state by ordaining obedience to its norms out of loyalty to his person.” Thus “there is a correlation between the strength of party and hero and the degree of national integration and stability.”

Wallerstein implies that the correlation bespeaks a causal relationship, i.e., that stronger parties and heroes develop greater national integration and stability. Alternative possibilities should at least be considered, viz., (1) greater national integration and stability develop stronger parties and heroes, and (2) other factors, e.g., indigenous culture, are causal conditions for both parties-heroes and integration-stability.

The modal African political system, in the author’s view, contains many non-democratic and democratic elements. Among the former are the single party, the national hero, party-dominated voluntary associations, manipulative electoral laws, preventive detention acts, and the non-independent judiciary. In general, several forms of opposition are not tolerated out of fear that the state is in jeopardy, a fear “not wholly without foundation.”

The modal system also contains democratic elements. The single party is a broad coalition with mass membership in which interests are constantly being negotiated. The national hero is rigidly constrained by the party. Political participation and debate are encouraged so long as they are "kept within the framework of the party structure." Perhaps of greatest importance, a democratic atmosphere is supported by many of the indigenous political systems and by "the continued turmoil and movement of the African political scene." In sum, the modal political system represents a workable solution given the character of contemporary African society; the widespread civility and firm authority necessary for a mature democracy have not yet evolved.

In a chapter entitled "Africa and the World" Wallerstein adds to the domestic problems of the new African states those of the international arena. "Having emerged from colonial rule," he writes, "Africa is determined to be subject to no one but itself." This calls for a policy of neutralism, defined as "the determination to judge other countries by how they help solve African problems, the determination to be tied too closely to no one, and somewhat to everyone."

Domestic problems and international problems—but with determination, outside help, and a little bit of luck, Africa will succeed. "Africa has greatness in her past as well as her present. And probably her future too."

WILLIAM HANNA

Michigan State University

International Politics and Foreign Policy: A Reader in Research and Theory. EDITED BY JAMES N. ROSENAU. (New York: The Free Press of Glencoe, Inc., 1961. Pp. xiv, 511. $8.50.)

The editor of this volume has brought together 55 readings (7 not previously published), under 5 headings, and has contributed about 14 pages of introductory and connecting comment. The editor's central thesis is that there is "a large and persistent gap" between the research "frontiersman" and the "classroom practitioner." The frontier is "alive with activity" that challenges the "traditional concepts" of the classroom. The primary purpose of his book is to "narrow" this gap.

There are indications that Mr. Rosenau is concerned primarily, though not exclusively, with the undergraduate "college classroom." It is unlikely that many undergraduates will be attracted to a book that crams about 1,200 words on each double-column page. It will be an even more rare undergraduate student who stays with the book any length of time, for the editor's avowed "eclecticism" results not in a dialogue between frontiersmen and classroom practitioners but rather in a cacophony on the frontier.

The fact that many of his "research frontiersmen" are also classroom teachers has implications for the "gap" which Mr. Rosenau seems to overlook. One wonders too whether it is good pedagogy to try to narrow the remaining gap in any other than the advanced graduate seminar room. The function of the undergraduate and beginning graduate classroom is to provide the student with a "map" of the terrain to help him find his way in the real political world as it manifests itself in history and current affairs. Once the student masters the map symbols and then seeks to find his way in the analysis of the real world, he will become acutely aware of the deficiencies of the map. It is then that he may profit from a knowledge that there are other symbols and other maps. But to immerse him initially in a mass of undifferentiated symbols, maps, and map fragments is to invite him to flee in utter confusion, especially if author and teacher refuse to share their own judgments as to which are most useful. Yet this is precisely what Mr. Rosenau does, claiming that since "present knowledge of international politics and foreign policy is too scanty to permit reliable estimates of the potential usefulness of any of the theories which have been developed," the student should "choose for himself the approach (or approaches) that seems most suitable."

Leaving aside matters of pedagogy, what does the book tell us about the state of theory and research in International Relations and Foreign Policy? For one thing it demonstrates quite adequately that there has been a lot of writing done. But there are strange gaps in the coverage provided by the volume. It offers no treatment of diplomacy, propaganda, alliances, subversion, economic or military action. The editor labels these "forms of state action" and eliminates them on the grounds that they "do not pose major theoretical or methodological problems." Both the label and the reasoning seem questionable. In the light of the great emphasis that the volume places upon the difference and the "linkage" (read "nexus") between international politics and foreign policy, it would appear to be a theoretical problem of some significance to consider whether diplomacy, alliances, war, etc., are better treated as modes or patterns of state interaction rather than as forms of state action. Certainly there is theoretically rich and methodologically suggestive recent literature dealing with typologies of alliances and of foreign aid, to say nothing of the conceptual gems that might be sifted out of the theoretical dust kicked up by the arms controllers.

There is another major omission that is related to a general fault that can be found with many of the readings in this volume. The general fault is a tendency to attack old concepts or embrace new ones without demonstrating either the inadequacy of the old or the superiority of the new. (It is impossible in this connection to avoid calling attention to Urban Whitaker's "Coarse-Screen Macro-Theory," which phrase, it turns out, can be freely but accurately translated as a general theory with large holes in it.) One suspects that newness is valued either for its own sake or, worse, because it confers upon its author a mark which identifies him as a pioneer. Thus supposedly responsible scholars construct straw men by distorting the concepts and formulations of their colleagues and then seek to build a reputation by tearing down the results of their own misinterpretation.

This general fault manifests itself in an interesting way in the eagerness with which the editor embraces the concept of system: "Of all the advances that have occurred in the study of international phenomena, perhaps none is more important than the ever-growing tendency to regard the world as the international system." He goes on to extol the "systems perspective" since "a system is considered to exist in an environment and to be composed of parts which through interaction are in relation to each other." What he fails to acknowledge is that one of the "traditional concepts" of international relations is "the modern state system." Indeed, it is a concept used in the article by John Herz which follows immediately on the heels of the editor's remarks. Furthermore, the editor never makes clear whether by international system he refers (broadly) to the international social system, or (narrowly) to the international political system. If the former, one would expect some consideration of international law, ethics, organization, and economics as component systems, along with international politics, of the international system. If the latter, one would expect those matters to be treated as important parts of the "environment" of the international (political) system. But the book offers neither a specific treatment of these matters nor an explanation of their omission. If these concepts are so traditional as to be pronounced dead they ought at least to have a decent burial.

This is not to say that the collection is without value: there are occasional flashes of insight, imaginative constructs, and feats of logical analysis. But in this reviewer's opinion the most valuable readings are those that set themselves the modest task of refining and building upon the "traditional concepts" rather than those that seek to wipe the slate clean and start anew. On the whole, one comes away from this volume somewhat dismayed by the state of theory and research, hopeful that it is in better shape than here demonstrated, and fearful that he has been more victimized by scholarly pretensions than enlightened by scholarly discourse.

E. RAYMOND PLATIG

Carnegie Endowment for International Peace

The Papers of Alexander Hamilton. Vol. I., 1768-1778. Vol. II., 1779-1781. EDITED BY HAROLD C. SYRETT; JACOB E. COOKE, Associate Editor. (New York: Columbia University Press, 1961. Pp. 1337. Single vols. $12.50.)

Whether by chance or by contrivance, Alexander Hamilton managed to be present at the center of events which launched the American republic into the orbit of history. With the lengthening shadow of experience hard upon us, we have recently been spurred to explore more thoroughly the dimensions of world history and to probe more deeply the reaches of our own tradition for the relevance it may bear to contemporary issues. In an age of revolutionary upheaval which has spawned new nations at an unprecedented rate, it is sobering and instructive to review the searing adventures and sage observations of this neophyte statesman-in-the-making. What kind of a man was Hamilton? How did he come by the ideas that he expressed so incisively and the arguments he marshalled so persuasively in support of sundry causes? What native qualities of mind and heart did he bring to the demanding tasks which confronted him at one of the turning points of time? Answers to such questions begin to take shape as one ponders the fascinating account from Hamilton's own pen so attractively presented in this impressive product of American scholarship at its best.

The present two volumes are the first fruits of an imaginative project of collecting, editing and publishing the papers of Alexander Hamilton which may number as many as twenty volumes when completed. Grateful tribute should be paid to the vision and industry of Dr. John A. Krout, Vice President of Columbia University, Mr. Charles G. Proffitt, Director of the Columbia University Press and editors Harold C. Syrett and Jacob

E. Cooke and their associates. The documents include: 1) letters written by Hamilton or to him as well as those he wrote for someone else, notably George Washington; 2) certain published articles such as "The Continentalist," and the "Publius Letters;" 3) a number of poems; 4) financial and legal records. The notes and editorial comments are skillfully arranged and extremely helpful to the amateur reader and professional scholar.

The figure that emerges from these pages is a remarkably talented and many-sided young man, especially when one remembers that the record stops at his twenty-sixth year, in 1781. Intense, restless, ambitious, with a genius for the existential, Hamilton was never content to wait for the event to know what measure to take, but devised the requisite measures to produce the event. The basic pattern of his political thought was set early, in the familiar tradition of the eighteenth century which, in turn, grew out of the ancient heritage of Greece, Rome and the Middle Ages. Thus he espoused a natural rights philosophy, the free contract origin of the state, the dependence of civil enactment on the God-ordained natural law. He accepted the constitutional theory of the American revolution, alleging that "the pretensions of Parliament are contradictory to the law of nature, subversive of the British constitution, and destructive of the faith of the most solemn compacts."<sup>1</sup> To justify this opinion as prompted by sober reason and not prejudice, he admitted having once defended the opposite side, but insisted that his change of sentiment "proceeded from the superior force of the arguments, in favour of the American claims."<sup>2</sup>

His views on government were expressed cautiously in a pair of letters to Gouverneur Morris in 1777, with a comment on the New York State Constitution, which he found lacking in a vigorous executive. He pursued the same thing with a keen, incisive analysis of the shortcomings of the Confederation in a letter to James Duane, a New York member of Congress, written from Liberty Pole, New Jersey, in September, 1780.<sup>3</sup> The major defects, he pointed out, sprang from a want of power in Congress, and this for three reasons: "an excess of the spirit of liberty" which made the states jealous of their own power; "a want of sufficient means" at the disposal of Congress to answer the public exigencies, and "of vigor to draw forth those means;" an over-dependence on the states to fulfil their military commitments. The only feasible and adequate remedy, as he saw it, would be to summon a convention of the states with the aim of establishing "a solid, coercive union." Congress should have "complete sovereignty in all that relates to war, peace, trade, finance, and to the management of foreign affairs." There should be an integrated administrative structure for the whole country, a permanent army, a rational financial system pivoted on a national bank, and a measure of central economic planning.

Essentially the same charges and recommendations appeared again during July and August, 1781 and April and July, 1782 after Hamilton's departure from Washington's official family. This time, his ideas were disseminated in a series of papers entitled, "The Continentalist," and published in The New York Packet and the American Advertiser. Characteristically, he pushed hard for effective power in the central organs of government, which he considered indispensable to the maintenance of independence in the face of fragmenting tendencies from within the nation and threatening force from without. The natural reluctance to bestow power, attendant upon popular revolutions, must yield, he contended, to the exigencies of political stability and economic viability.

It is interesting to speculate where Hamilton would stand if he could look in on the eighty-seventh Congress as it debates controversial questions of increased governmental influence in economic, educational and social welfare fields. The tenor of his thought contained in the writings herein presented, suggests that he would probably go along with the prevailing trend to center more responsibility in the federal government. A protagonist of order and authority, though never a foe of freedom, he did not find in the philosophy of laissez-faire an adequate safeguard for their proper exercise. It is not likely that he would feel at home with the modern conservative, least of all with the radical fringe.

In a letter to Elizabeth Schuyler, who was soon to become his wife, Hamilton described himself as a "philosopher and a soldier."<sup>4</sup> It is precisely the virile, decisive qualities of

<sup>1</sup> "A Full Vindication of the Measures of the Congress, from the Calumnies of their Enemies," etc., New York, Dec. 15, 1774, Vol. I, p. 47.

<sup>2</sup> "The Farmer Refuted, etc.," New York, Feb. 23, 1775, Vol. I, p. 82.

<sup>3</sup> "To James Duane," Liberty Pole, New Jersey, Sept. 3, 1780, Vol. II, pp. 400-418.

<sup>4</sup> "To Elizabeth Schuyler," Preakness, New Jersey, Oct. 13, 1780, Vol. II, p. 474.

the military man, complementing those of the intellectual, which give further testimony to the extraordinary range of his talents.

The letters penned during the bleak and depressing months at Valley Forge and afterward, reveal the writer as a man of courage, ambition and vigor, a keen judge of character, a realist in appraising the strength and weakness of the British enemy as well as the French ally. Two circumstances indicate the strange combination of relentless persistence, on the one hand, and sensitive impetuosity, on the other, which seriously undermined Hamilton's powers of perseverance and sustained fidelity. The first is evident in the protracted correspondence which he carried on with Colonel John Brooke, Francis Dana and Reverend William Gordon. At issue was a statement falsely attributed to Hamilton, in which he was supposed to have urged "the people to rise, join General Washington, and turn Congress out of doors."<sup>5</sup> So disturbed was Hamilton at this odious charge, that he spared no effort to uncover the culprit and bring him to a reckoning on the field of honor. The tone of these letters inclines one to endorse the writer's own assessment of the affair which was contained in a final word to Washington: "I hope Your Excellency will excuse the asperity of my expressions, which my respect for you would induce me to suppress, did I not owe it to my sensibility, wounded by the most barbarous attack upon my reputation and principles, to speak without reserve."<sup>6</sup>

Paradoxically, this same hyper-sensitivity sometimes precipitated Hamilton into modes of conduct which betrayed an emotional immaturity and want of self-discipline. Examples are the impulsive break with the Commander-in-Chief in 1781, over a trivial incident, and the acknowledged lapses from marital fidelity later on.

The ensemble of material in these volumes enhances the biographical work of Louis M. Hacker, Broadus Mitchell, Nathan Schachner and others who have labored to promote a better understanding and greater appreciation of the whole Hamilton. Perhaps the main thing that stands out in retrospect is the amazing diversity of the gifts, intellectual, practical, diplomatic, literary, which he devoted with rare skill to the master purpose of his short life—the building of a politically stable, economically prosperous and industrially strong United States of America.

PATRICIA BARRETT

Maryville College

The Structure of Local Government Throughout the World. BY SAMUEL HUMES AND EILEEN M. MARTIN. (The Hague: Martinus Nijhoff, 1961. Pp. 449. Guilders 36.)

Local government as an academic discipline has had a unique history. Unlike other fields of political science, it has failed, at least in recent decades, to develop a corresponding methodology and theory. The bulk of the journal articles—in fact the journals themselves—that treat the subject of local government are predominantly written or edited by practitioners, administrators, or professional research associates and staff members. This is not to say that the contributions of local government associations and practitioners have not been of value, for they certainly have added considerably to the empirical documentation of an area of study that understandably resembles its subject matter in variation, complexity and immensity.

Much is said today of the analytical utility of a multidisciplinary approach to the subject matter of the social sciences. Seldom-read articles of the 1930s and 1940s in journals of anthropology, sociology, and psychology are being combed and recombined by the current generation of political scientists as they seek decision-making or functional insights into international politics, comparative government, voting behavior, etc. Despite the work done in the other disciplines in the area of small group behavior, community analysis and locality culture, the political scientist has consistently shied away from a "multi-disciplinary," "cross-cultural" approach to the ancient and honorable field of local government. Is it any wonder that the latter has tended to become preempted by municipal research bureaus and local government associations?

Two somewhat contradictory major trends in the style of human political organization apparent in our time would seem to encourage a more academic and theoretical concern with local governance than has in fact occurred. On the one hand the realm of the supranational and regional association is growing. On the other hand, the attention of political scientists, as never before, is being drawn to those regions of the world (e.g., Southeast Asia, Africa, Oceania), where the significance of non-nation-state political forms has long been apparent to the anthropologist if not to the political scientist.

<sup>5</sup> "From Lieutenant Colonel John Brooks," West Point, July 4, 1779, Vol. II, p. 91.

<sup>6</sup> "To George Washington," Morris Town, New Jersey, May 2, 1780, Vol. II, p. 316.

Possibly the renaissance of local government, with its supporting column of theoretical and methodological sophistication, and hopefully also a revival of its contribution to the general realm of political philosophy and theory, must await the development of the field of comparative local government. This may be more than idle speculation, for not only will the relative importance of locality and local political organization in the newly developing states of Asia and Africa attract the systematic attention of more political science scholarship, but the internationalization of all political science in recent years is bringing to American scholars an awareness of the relative importance of the study of local government in the more developed states as well.

Therefore, the contribution of the International Union of Local Authorities generally, and of Samuel Humes and Eileen Martin specifically, is of particular import in this critical juncture in the study of local government. The Structure of Local Government Throughout the World is the culmination of a massive data collection effort undertaken by the IULA at the request of UNESCO. Detailed questionnaires, seeking legal and structural data of a descriptive nature, were obtained from forty-two of the seventy-four countries approached.

In the first half of the volume, Samuel Humes has sought to examine the data from the contributing countries and systematically to contrast the more important structural features. The comparative method employed contributes little to raising the low level of generalization that has so long characterized this subject area. However, this is in part attributable, as Humes himself notes, to the manner in which the data were gathered.

Although Humes, in contrast to Montague Harris (Local Governments Around the World) has developed a typology of local government structures, the presentation and comparative scheme is noticeably lacking in precision and rigorous definition.

In a world in which local governments are being created and designed to contribute to modernization and nation building, the orthodox statements of local government ventured by the John Stuart Mill school nearly a century ago are hardly appropriate. The most fascinating area of local government development and experimentation today is not in the Western nations, (whose structural descriptions make up the greater part of this work), but in the new countries of Asia and Africa. There John Stuart Mill is being stood on his head and local governments are deliberately being created to lessen local separatism and to further national development and conformity. The new purposes to which local government and other local political institutions are being put in the nation building process, in much of Africa and Asia, provide the most exciting field for a sophisticated scholarly study of this subject area that in turn might offer theoretical insights dealing with the general functions of local political organizations in addition to static descriptions of statutory local government institutions. The trouble with the legalistic, descriptive approach which characterizes this work, is that it approaches local government from the direction of the nation-state and thereby precludes a return to the richness of local politics and governance as an area of observation and analysis that can contribute in its own right to more general political understanding and theory.

Miss Martin has contributed a straightforward country-by-country description of local government as contrasted to Humes' presentation of comparative structures. The forty-two countries surveyed are treated in nine geographical groups. The nine area categories selected reflect the predominantly traditional and Western focus of not only the survey material, but of the nature of the analysis as well. Six of the nine geographical areas, for example, refer to one part or another of Europe or of the Anglo-Saxon countries.

Having said this, however, it must be added that this volume not only brings together for us much previously scattered data, but also contains a vast amount of empirical data invaluable to those who would pursue further the study of local government as either the "most local" aspect of the nation-state or as the "most fundamental" aspect of human political behavior and organization.

FRED G. BURKE

Syracuse University

The Cold War and Its Origins: The Eloquent and Indelible Record of The Great Conflict of Our Time. BY D. F. FLEMING. (Garden City: Doubleday & Company, 1961. Two volumes. Pp. xx, 540, Vol. I. Pp. 615, Vol. II. $15.00.)

At last someone has attempted a comprehensive survey of the Cold War. The two weighty volumes under review are not properly a work of political science. As the subtitle implies, Professor Fleming has devoted himself to piecing together the chronological narrative of Soviet-Western relations since 1917 in order to demonstrate causal relationships. Like the revisionist historians of World War I, he proposes to assign responsibility for war by establishing who took the initiative in the diplomatic exchanges which led to hostilities. By showing that we of the West are as much to blame as the Soviets, if not more so, he hopes to halt the vicious spiral of recriminations and the arms race which point to a third World War.

His choice of an essentially historical approach lays him open to the historians' disdainful charge that political science is a mere journalistic recital of current events pending their own more scholarly, balanced judgment when the complete sources become available. Both Fleming and the historians are vulnerable to the criticism that their searches for first causes lead to an infinite regression.

The nearest the author comes to employing methods of analysis now associated with political science is a summary list of events, from which one might get a better sense of the interplay of policies than from the massively detailed text if the list were organized into synchronous columns, Soviet and Western. The rest of the work is at the historians' usual low level of generalization interspersed with apocalyptic moral judgments. There is no attempt to tie this potentially valuable mine of material in to a more general body of theory about international relations.

More controversial than Fleming's methods are his main themes: "The Cold War arose because the leaders of American public opinion could not accept the chief consequences of World War II . . . Communist control of East Europe and China." Most impartial scholars would probably now agree that Hitler could not have been stopped after Munich without Soviet military participation, the price for which was a Soviet sphere of influence in those areas she conquered from Germany. He is also undoubtedly correct that the American goal of free elections in Eastern Europe was incompatible with the legitimate Soviet demand for friendly governments in the power vacuum between Russia and Germany. It is harder for some people to accept after fifteen years of Cold War that the price was worth it because Nazism was intrinsically worse than Communism.

Most debatable of all is Fleming's further thesis that "the Russians' . . . first driving and continuing motive was, and is, security." Unlike Hitler, Stalin and his successors are pictured as cautious, conservative defenders of the status quo, interested only in recovering the lost border territories of the Czars as buffers against future German aggression plus the perennial Russian objective of warm water ports through the Straits, the Persian Gulf and Manchuria. These goals, Fleming asserts, did not arise out of Marxian dogma which he largely discounts as a determinant of day-to-day Soviet foreign policy.

From these postulates flow his policy conclusions: that American "containment" and "encircling" bases are wrong because provocative; that the support of unpopular governments just because they are anti-Communist is unnecessary; and that we should have shared our atomic secrets with the Russians from the beginning and should accept their conditions for disarmament now and take up their challenge to "peaceful coexistence," a race for improving living conditions everywhere.

Before we can endorse Fleming's postulates and conclusions, we must examine his evidence. Real Soviet motives are difficult to ascertain because of the secrecy and concentration of decision-making in totalitarian government and because of the self-admitted gap between the shifting, expedient public propaganda "line" and the actual intentions of the party leadership in the Communist system. Fleming shows no awareness of these problems but takes all Soviet public statements at face value. For instance, his principal source for Soviet policy in the 1934-38 period is Litvinov's speeches before the League of Nations. Throughout the two volumes he limits himself largely to Western sources and practically ignores the whole body of literature which has appeared in the last fifteen years which essays an analysis of Soviet motives and operating rules with the help of refugees, defectors and ex-Communists, interviews, captured Soviet documents and Lenin's and Stalin's own writings. For instance, the author cites Nathan Leites' pathbreaking Study of Bolshevism only to confirm the principle of caution in Soviet behavior. Nowhere does he refer to the works of Raymond Garthoff on Soviet military strategy. No doubt he would argue that the output of our Soviet area experts is itself a part of the Cold War, biased by the disillusioning experiences, prejudices and present employments of the writers, but that does not relieve him of the obligation to refute their hypotheses and prove his own with comparable inside evidence. Instead, he resorts frequently to authors whose prejudices in the opposite direction are at least equally notorious: Zilliacus, Coates, Rosinger, Snow, Strong, Smedley, Jaffe, Stone, Panikkar, Wechsler and Williams. In addition the author cites some of our more sensational columnists—Drew Pearson and the Alsops—without sufficient assessment of the reliability of their reporting. His method of quoting newspaper editorials about each development in the Cold War lengthens the narrative unnecessarily.

Fleming's own biases are strong and much in evidence. His personal heroes are Woodrow Wilson and Franklin Roosevelt; he views the political influence of the Catholic church and its laymen with much suspicion, and the "feudal, reactionary, fascist, militarist, collaborationist landlords" of every country with undisguised hatred which may reflect a nineteenth century American agrarian radicalism more than any Socialist leanings. Governments on our side in the Cold War are invariably "corrupt, repressive and inefficient." The supreme sin of appeasement is always committed by the West and its allies, never by the U.S.S.R. as in 1939-41. On the positive side, Fleming has a romantic predilection for social revolution as both inevitable and just. One wonders if the beneficiaries of the status quo have no human rights and if the bloodshed and destruction involved in dispossessing them always produce greater net wealth, happiness and justice. Land reform is his panacea for the backward agrarian countries and it is always associated with Communist rule, but he glosses over the subsequent collectivization of agriculture which in effect deprives the peasant of his newly acquired acres.

The foregoing criticisms to the contrary notwithstanding, this is a book that needed to be written. Professor Fleming is to be congratulated for his courage in going against the tide and for his years of patient research. So much of journalism, popular writing and even scholarly research on American foreign policy is in justification of or pursuit of the Cold War that a certain amount of exaggeration, indignation and selectivity are pardonable and possibly necessary to put across the unpopular viewpoint. It is salutary to be reminded of analogies between the significance of the Straits, Suez and Panama to Russia, Britain and the United States respectively; to be confronted with the contradiction between the American revolutionary tradition and the Truman Doctrine; to recognize that we earned and enjoyed no more influence in the occupation of Eastern Europe than the Russians did in Japan; to perceive the logical inconsistency of defending South Korea and then invading North Korea; to admit that if Red China can't "shoot her way into the United Nations" then none of the original members are entitled to membership; and to smile at the reversal from American defense of neutral rights before World War I to Dulles' condemnation of neutrality as immoral. All these insights Professor Fleming offers the reader who is prepared to detach himself for awhile from the heat of battle.

THEODORE P. WRIGHT, JR.

Bates College

BOOK NOTES AND BIBLIOGRAPHY

POLITICAL THEORY, HISTORY OF POLITICAL THOUGHT, AND METHODOLOGY

Justice and Social Policy. EDITED BY FREDERICK A. OLAFSON, (Englewood Cliffs: Prentice-Hall, Inc., 1961, Pp. viii, 150. $1.95, paper.)

Dean Pound was perhaps right when he said that the mansion of legal philosophy is a large one with room enough for all. The winds that have swept in and out of political science have not excluded jurisprudence. The contributions of legal realism and sociological jurisprudence are but two parts of a movement—perhaps a “revolution” in thought—that has swept through the entire mansion of legal thought. The rejection—at times total—of “metaphysical” conceptions of law, of broad formal conceptual schemes, has now begun to come full circle, and Professor Olafson’s very useful volume is one index of a growing return to the discussion of legal ideals, including natural law.

This compact volume should not be confused with the veritable spate of readings books that cross a professor’s desk nearly every week. It is in no sense a collection of amorphous materials, but is a calculated attempt to carefully and critically examine the concept of justice through the use of two portions of a book published by Henry Sidgwick (The Methods of Ethics, 1893 ed.) and five recent essays that Olafson regards as “fairly typical of the state of philosophical opinion at the present time.” While this might sound rather vague and much too large a subject for critical analysis, the starting point is the utilitarian theory of justice, represented by Sidgwick’s work. Sidgwick was chosen, rather than Bentham, because he seemed closer to current philosophical inquiry, particularly his respect for other points of view. Essays by J. D. Mabbott, Jonathan Harrison, and John Rawls are rather distinctive attempts at reformulation of the utilitarian thesis, although it might be questioned how much of the utilitarian thesis they still retain. Mabbott’s essay on “Punishment” is a particularized attempt to isolate a part of the general problem of justice for microscopic scrutiny, a type of analysis that is all too rare and none too easy. It is obvious from the Mabbott essay, as well as the other two, that the rather sharp epistemological quarrels within contemporary jurisprudence over the meaning of words, the kinds of questions that can be raised, and the methods of inquiry that are germane to these questions, have borne fruit. Once again, philosophical speculation in the area of legal ideas is “respectable,” and while we may still throw brickbats at the protagonists, at least the enterprise is very much alive again.

The final two essays by Richard Wollheim and Sir Isaiah Berlin on the concept of equality at first glance seem to be out of place, but they serve to emphasize the very important relation between justice and other social ideals. This collection of well written essays will offer a rich source of discussion in a variety of academic situations, including courses in modern political thought, jurisprudence, problems of democracy, and even in those philosophically-oriented areas of public administration.

The deaths of Morris R. Cohen and Felix S. Cohen left an enormous gap in American jurisprudence, but men on both sides of the Atlantic still maintain a lively interest in the history of legal ideas and the critical assessment of these ideas. The veritable axe of American legal realism has been tempered, and even natural law theory now merits a journal of its own (the Natural Law Forum), and writers like Hart, Wollheim, Williams, and Lloyd in England and Cahn, Bodenheimer, Cowan, Hall, Fuller and others in America are giving new life to the study of legal philosophy. The realist stress on facts and the sociological school’s stress on process were certainly necessary in their own right. Perhaps Buckland was right in saying that Austin (and the command theory) could be regarded as a disease, in much the same sense that legal realism and sociological jurisprudence have been viewed by their opponents. But Pound’s admonition was cogent. There is plenty of room for combat, and plenty of time for redefinition and reformulation. The empirical, pragmatic winds are still blowing strong—and their contributions legion—but we have learned the lesson that in order to have a legal system function within what A. D. Lindsay called “operative ideals,” we must be able to define with some degree of precision and clarity the ideas that undergird that system. Facts and values may be miles apart, and a love tryst out of the question, but at least the effort can be made.

—JULIUS PAUL, Wayne State University.

Political Justice: The Use of Legal Procedure for Political Ends. BY OTTO KIRCHHEIMER. (Princeton, N. J.: Princeton University Press. 1961. Pp. xiv, 452. $8.50.)

This is an impressive work, almost encyclopedic in analytical framework, yet rich with illustration and judgment concerning the problems and effectiveness involved in the use of the agencies of criminal and civil justice for political ends. Nevertheless, Professor Kirchheimer’s opening judgment is moot in view of the substance of his effort. In his preface he questions whether the application of the term "Political Justice" by European writers "to the most dubious segment of the administration of justice, that segment which uses the devices of justice to bolster or create new power positions" is "gross linguistic abuse and utter cynicism" in view of its usual sense, the Greek idea of a "search for an ideal order in which all members will communicate and interact with the body politic to assure its highest perfection." He answers "no," arguing that, "The Greek ideal grows sharper in profile precisely because justice in political matters is more tenuous than in any other field of jurisprudence, because it can so easily become a mere farce."

This answer is curious, since although he may have intended that his impartial language and power approach should indicate how farcical political justice is in view of the Greek ideal, they do not themselves explicate or defend the latter; a reader must already understand and accept the Greek view to see the farce.

True, at the end of the work he concludes that the process of political justice therein described is grotesque and not even very effective relative to its own ends except for creating an image, but he also thinks it is necessary and beneficial in making the power struggle less disorderly and tenacious. Such conclusions add little to the classical concept, nor do they further its acceptance, and the author ignores the argument that it is dubious and unverified that political order ever rests on the mental states of individuals, an assumption implied in the kind of political justice he describes.

Perhaps it is not without significance, therefore, that although Professor Kirchheimer appears generally to assume the positivist definition of law and remains faithful to his descriptive approach, delineating the material in terms of the assumptions, motives, techniques, and actions of practitioners of power, he now and then expresses judgments in "ideal" terms. For example, in discussing "The Sanction of the Legal Order," as a plea which defendants such as those in the Nuremberg trials used, he states, "Not every piece of legislation enacted by a government in conformity with its own rules acquires, by the mere fact of enactment, the quality of binding the lower echelons," e.g., an enactment which "shows on its face the character of inhumanity, as did the decree concerning the administration of penal justice against Poles and Jews in the incorporated Eastern territories, . . ." Here, "the value of legal certainty is not strong enough against the principle that intentional violation of minimum standards deprives an enactment of the claim to legal validity." These are strange judgments for positivism to make. Who except the community elite, the power-holders of the state, may so conclude—assuming one adheres faithfully to this position? Is it not accepting "ideal" criteria to say (and this reviewer approves) that a state rule like the above "is the negation of the purpose of law, which even in the form of the shoddiest enactment must still offer a password: the ordering of human relations?"

However, such seeming contradictions do not significantly detract from this real contribution to jurisprudence. Thus, in Part One, Kirchheimer calls attention to changes in the practice of using legal technique for political ends from the Roman period to the present. Our era, he thinks, is a strange one of "transition as difficult for those in search of new durable attachments as for those charged with upholding fading traditional ones." Nevertheless, he concludes, "Whatever the state's pattern, its protective armor thickens and stiffens," and this he demonstrates during an incisive discussion of the political trial as differentiated from the purely criminal procedure, with illustrations drawn from homicide trials, trials for treason, and the show trials beyond usual constitutional protection. It is also indicated as he discusses the legal repression of political organizations and the forms of treatment applied by an established regime to hostile groups, such as repression by minority fiat in South Africa, or repression by majority rule in West Germany and the United States, in which case he analyzes the criteria used: the anticipation of remote consequences, the weight of specific acts, etc., concluding with a discussion of variation in attitudes toward an opposition of principle.

Part Two is a close analytical study of the work and effect of the judge, the defendant, and the latter's lawyer, under western constitutional regimes and also in East Germany or previously under the Nazis. This part likewise includes an excellent analysis of the trial by fiat of a successor regime, giving extensive attention to the Nuremberg trials.

The final part of the book, "Political Justice Modified," discusses asylum and clemency. The extensive footnotes not only enrich the book but indicate the wealth of materials used, many not available in English.—JOHN PAUL DUNCAN, University of Oklahoma.

Radicalism and the Revolt against Reason: The Social Theories of Georges Sorel; with a translation of his essay on The Decomposition of Marxism. By IRVING LOUIS HOROWITZ. (New York: The Humanities Press, 1961. Pp. viii, 264. $6.00.)

Georges Sorel, treated in this book as the symbol of pragmatic (irrational) socialism in "fin de siècle France," has not customarily been regarded by English-writing students of political philosophy as a thinker of the first or even second rank. Whether or not this assessment of Sorel has been accurate is, of course, a moot point, and may undergo revision as time carries researchers and analysts further from 1922, the year of the Frenchman's death. At any rate, Professor Horowitz, who is Chairman of the Department of Anthropology and Sociology of Hobart and William Smith Colleges, apparently thinks that it is time to take another look at Sorel.

In taking his psycho-sociological (or socio-psychological) glance into the past, Horowitz sees, and relates, the roles played by many men who affected the Sorelian perspective: Charles Péguy, Fernand Pelloutier, Gustave Le Bon, Henri Bergson, William James, and numerous others. Early in the book it becomes, and, throughout, remains obvious that myriad names can, in some fashion, be referred to Sorel's thought. On substantive grounds, the reader may object that the profusion of names often dims and sometimes eclipses the light which the author is trying to shed on an already obscure subject. A similar result occasionally is produced by faulty organization and presentation of the material, and by vague or ineffective terminology. In view of the undoubtedly great effort which Horowitz put into researching his subject, it is unfortunate that seemingly unnecessary obstacles to clear communication exist.

At his best when criticizing the illogical position of Sorel, Horowitz strikes several telling blows, one example being sufficient here. Having noted Sorel's vacillation concerning whether violent action or anarchistic socialism were the prime value, the author shows that Sorel could not have it both ways: "... If action were central, then the goals achieved by socialism were necessarily transitory and of secondary value. If socialism were the focal point, then action was simply an instrument for reaching the goal, intrinsically no more valuable than other means..." and more perilous than other techniques.

On the other hand, there are a few instances, usually relating to the concept of democracy, where Horowitz's arguments may leave the political philosopher unsatisfied. For example, there will be difficulty in agreeing that "the principles of economic and political democracy" must receive constant redefinition or die, unless one adopts the attitude of pragmatism and is prepared to have "democracy" mean anything which anyone desires, thereby depriving the term of communicative worth. Furthermore, the value of a concept which has general application may be lost because of provincialism: "Judicial review, constitutional amendment, parliamentary statute, executive veto and the like, are... activities of democracy...". In this case, a partial list of standards, which are empirically verifiable, is indicated, but the roster seems to have been constructed almost exclusively from the American political experience, thus giving rise to the peril of a parochial definition—an outcome which Horowitz would probably want to avoid. Moreover, the chore of classifying states with respect to democracy remains about as difficult as it had been.

Sorel's lack of precision, his pragmatic irresolution, and mystical attitude in general have probably caused much of the criticism which his intellectual posture properly deserves. Political and other philosophers who criticize Sorel on these grounds would do well to remember that the same criteria may be used to judge their works.

This reviewer would be remiss in his responsibility if he did not call attention to the existence of many grammatical and related errors in the book. Some, perhaps many, of the mistakes may be typographical (spelling, the absence of quotation marks, missing apostrophes, etc.), but there are, unfortunately, errors in agreement between subject and verb and in sentence structure. Before an instructor puts this book in the hands of his students, if he does, he would doubtless want to be aware of the presence of such errors.—WILLIAM D. S. WITTE, Bradley University.

Political Decision-makers: Recruitment and Performance. EDITED BY DWAIN MARVICK. (New York: The Free Press of Glencoe, 1961. Pp. 347. $7.50.)

This volume is the second of the International Yearbooks of Political Behavior Research put out by the Free Press. Such volumes serve a useful purpose in bringing together representative current writings in significant fields of political behavior. The first volume was on community political systems, and we are told that others are to follow on civil-military relations, comparative party systems, and political ideologies.

In the present volume, edited by Dwaine Marvick, the papers, including two review articles, are of generally high interest and quality. Read together, they illustrate the richness and diversity of the possible approaches to the study of political elites—and political behavior in general.

There is, in the first place, a great variety in the methods used. Two of the studies—that by Marvick and Nixon on campaign workers in Los Angeles and that by Eulau and his associates on state legislators in four states—utilize systematic surveys. But these surveys differ from each other, and in turn both differ from most surveys, in the population studied. Neither study uses a cross-section sample. The Eulau study is of almost all (91% to 100%) of the members of the four state legislatures, while Marvick and Nixon interviewed a sample of campaign activists weighted so as to secure a larger representation of those at the center of campaign activities. Such studies of significant political sub-groups represent an important application of the survey technique. Dogan, in his study of French deputies from 1870 to 1958, uses standard biographical data for an ingenious statistical analysis of the social origins and career patterns of the French legislative elite, while Guttsman bases his first-rate study of changes in British Labour Party leadership on similar material supplemented by memoir literature and Labour Party documents. Renate Mayntz spent eight months of intensive participant observation in a local district CDU organization in Berlin, observing the decisional process, repeatedly interviewing key participants, and studying the records of the organization. In addition a questionnaire was circulated to all members of the largest local of the district. And Edward Shils bases his essay on Indian intellectuals on long field experience in India and a large number of intensive discussions with Indian elites, as well as deep knowledge of the literature by and about Indians.

This catalogue of methods is presented here because it illustrates quite clearly how many approaches to political behavior are open to the scholar. The methods differ, but each has advantages and each appears quite appropriate for the particular subject matter. The statistical analysis of biographical data by Dogan and Guttsman tell us little directly of the attitudes and opinions of the political elites compared with the studies based on interviews. Yet unlike the survey studies by Eulau and his associates and by Marvick and Nixon that are conducted at one point of time, the use of biographical data allows the analysis of changes and trends. On the other hand, the use of standardized statistical techniques with either biographical or interview material would not have allowed the analysis Shils presents of the complex and rich intellectual tradition in India and its impact on political life. Nor does it seem likely that the decision-making process in an organization can be understood without some participant observation of the sort carried on by Mayntz in the CDU local district. Anyone who believes that the systematic study of political behavior involves a commitment to a particular method or technique will be disabused and enlightened by this volume. Such systematic study does, however, involve commitment to more general standards of evidence, inference, and analysis. Such standards are exhibited in this volume.

The substance of the volume is as diversified as the techniques of study and more difficult to summarize. The subjects include the social origins of decision-makers, their career perspectives, changes in outlook and style of political decision-makers, the effects of organizational structure on political careers, and the motivations of campaign activists. The subjects range from an analysis of the complex, deeply felt, and highly articulate belief systems of the intellectuals in the new states to the non-ideological, relatively professional career perspectives of American states legislators. Such diversity in subject-matter—the tendency to study one problem in one context and another problem in another—is perhaps not as fortunate as the diversity in method. It makes graphic the need for explicitly comparative studies in different political contexts. There are no such studies in this volume, but the book serves a purpose along these lines in bringing together in one place studies from a variety of political systems and allowing at least implicit comparisons. That one deals with ideologies when one studies Indian political elites and with career perspectives when one studies American legislative elites suggests a point of great comparative importance. Furthermore, the essay by Lasswell on an "Agenda for the Study of Political Elites" provides a number of perspectives from which such comparative study might begin.—SIDNEY VERBA, Princeton University.

Public Opinion and Foreign Policy. BY JAMES N. ROSENDAU. (New York: Random House, 1961. Pp. 118. Paper-bound, $1.35.)

This study by Professor Rosenau of Rutgers is a useful and well-written one, even though the title is much too broad. A more exact title would be: The Opinion-Transmission Network of the Present-Day U.S.A. Convinced by his reading of recent literature that it is scientifically "premature to chart the flow of influence in behavioral terms" without first re-conceptualizing the opinion process as a whole, Rosenau proposes to deal in this book with a small and relatively manageable part of this process. He charts, in effect, the circulating system within which transmission of opinions (including non-influential as well as influential opinions) takes place.

The better to focus upon the succession of steps in the circulation of opinions from given participants in the polity to other participants, he has deliberately excluded all statements about the motivational systems of the individual and collective actors who use the system, as well as about the symbolic or ideological or value contents of their communications. To use a bit of the more or less standard jargon of communication analysts (a language that Dr. Rosenau appears to avoid for some reason), what he presents is essentially a classification of components of the network of "channels," "gatekeepers," and "relay points" through which communicators occupying various roles transmit opinions to various "audiences" (publics) in the present-day United States.

He considers the United States as if it existed in a vacuum. The impacts of communications to the United States from other countries, the effects of the existence of other sorts of circulating systems abroad, and the varying "states of the world opinion-field" in which American opinion plays itself out—all these essential components of a generalized explanatory or predictive theory are left out of the discussion.

Such an analytic procedure is like making an anatomist's diagram of a cardiovascular system per se. The arteries and arterioles, veins and ventricles are named and their respective locations are shown, but we are told nothing about the effects of the system's contents (blood, drugs, toxins), or the effects of impinging systems, upon the organism's functioning.

Within this delimited area, Rosenau's line of argument is marshalled extremely well. When he must introduce new terminology, he makes a knowing case for it, and uses common sense and plain words. Thus, the generalized roles of participants in his system are those of "opinion-holders" (nearly all of us); "opinion-makers" (those who introduce opinions into the relatively "impersonal" communication channels); "local opinion leaders" (here he follows the usage of Lazarsfeld and Katz: these are persons who transmit opinions locally in face-to-face situations); and "opinion-submitters" (those who convey opinions to "decision-makers"). Each of these rôle-concepts is defined and sub-classified in precise and orderly terms. As he points out, each rôle-incumbent, of course, may be on occasion either a communicator or a communicatee or both. The media, likewise, are catalogued exhaustively.

Here, tantalizingly, the book ends. Just what has all this definition-chopping accomplished? I think Rosenau has added a number of useful specifications and caveats for the benefit of users of the communication models set up by Almond (The American People and Foreign Policy), Lazarsfeld and Katz (Personal Influence) and related writers who furnished Rosenau's points of take-off. We can see the rôles of the specified participants, and their points of interaction, more clearly now. But we are still left with the important theoretical problem of how to classify the communicators' values and motives and the contents of their transmitted opinions, and how to demonstrate the effects of the latter. The reviewer hopes that Professor Rosenau will next apply his passion and real talent for conceptualizing to some of these more elusive variables in the communication process.

As the behavioral sciences become more rigorous in dealing explicitly with such abstractions as "systems," "models" and "processes," it becomes increasingly useful to have these constructs lucidly diagrammed—as the physical sciences have already shown. In step with the times, Dr. Rosenau undertakes to draw a flow-chart of "the opinion-policy relation." The intent is commendable and the associated text reads well. At first glance, the diagram itself bears a reassuring resemblance to the economist's familiar charts of "flow of money in an economy." However, on second glance it seems to bear a stronger resemblance to a drunken driver's apperception of a cloverleaf intersection on an eight-lane highway. Perhaps this is proof of the model's "empirical fit" to the facts of the American Way of arriving at opinions on foreign policy. However, it is just possible that the cartographer could benefit by taking one more lesson from such a master diagrammer as Kurt Lewin.—BRUCE LANNES SMITH, Michigan State University.

Philosophy and Myth in Karl Marx. By ROBERT C. TUCKER. (New York: Cambridge University Press, 1961. Pp. 263. Cloth $5.50. Paper $1.75.)

A spectre is haunting Marxist scholarship—the spectre of Alienation. Some scholars, notably those of an existentialist or religious persuasion, have tried to show that a notion of "self-alienation" is pervasive and abiding in Marx's thought throughout; others, like Sidney Hook, have sought to exorcise the spectre by arguing that the notion of human alienation is actually foreign to Marx's conception of man. Professor Tucker's book is an important contribution to the literature which stems especially from the comparatively recent publication of the Economic and Philosophic Manuscripts of 1844. It is meant, in his own words, "to carry forward the still unfinished work of reinterpretation and basic critical analysis of the thought of Karl Marx." There need be no quarrel with many features of his interpretation, but his central thesis is open to challenge.

Tucker distinguishes the "original Marxism" of the 1844 manuscripts from "mature Marxism" as found in all the works after 1845. The "Philosophy" in what purported to be positive social science was chiefly Hegel's, but Tucker enriches this familiar insight by tracing carefully Marx's philosophical transposition of Hegelian terms into economics. In 1844, he argues, Marx suddenly had a colossal insight: Hegelianism is fundamentally about economics. Whereas Feuerbach had taken Hegelianism to be esoteric anthropology, Marx treated it as esoteric economics. The "Myth" in Marxism is, according to Tucker, Marx's vision of an inner moral drama of the self as something taking place in the outer world. The controlling concern of his thought was the structure of selfhood, and this applies not merely to the early writings which are explicitly dominated by the notion of "alienation," but also to the seemingly sociological thought of "mature Marxism." "Marx was not a social scientist whose theory was rendered obsolete by the further march of history, but a philosopher become myth-maker, who, having inverted Hegel, represented a subjective process as the social universe."

One could agree with Tucker that Marx was moralistic, utopian, and quasi-religious (as Max Eastman contended long ago), in the mature as well as in the early writings. One might wish to insist upon ambivalent tendencies in Marx. Moralism is mixed up with anti-moralistic doctrine. Marx's view of the communist future contains utopian elements but this is not to gainsay the force of his own critique of utopianism. And it is not really sound to talk of the religious "essence" of Marxism, as Tucker does. It is true that Marxism exhibits aspects of a secular religion which are superficially obscured by Marx's rejection of the traditional religions, but one might reject the notion of "essences" here as elsewhere: Marxism is not "essentially" a religion even though it has affinities with religious movements. Nevertheless, despite differences on matters of emphasis, one could accept many of Tucker's general arguments and specific points of detail as acute and illuminating.

A really questionable argument is Tucker's main thesis, expressed in a number of different ways, of which the following passage is a sample: "A system concerned with the generic human self in its hostile relations with itself turns into one that seems to have nothing to do with a dualized self and everything to do with a dualized society" (p. 176). Tucker's view about the nature of the shift between early and mature Marxism is thus opposed to all those interpretations which see a change from a psychological to a predominantly sociological position. Like any "interpretation," Tucker's reinterpretation involves an attempt to say what Marx "really" meant. As against G. D. H. Cole, for instance, Tucker says "it is not that Marx views social classes rather than individuals as possessing ultimate reality, but that his image of society is an image of a collective dual personality." This compels Tucker to lay a good deal of weight on such purely literary devices in Capital as "My Lord Capital" and the "Collective Worker." And it forces him to lay too little weight on the Communist Manifesto's attack on the German "true socialists." In a passage which Tucker quotes, Marx explicitly scoffs at the way in which these "true" socialists think not in terms of the interests of a social class, the proletariat, but "the interests of human nature, of man in general, who belongs to no class, has no reality, and subsists only in the misty realms of philosophical fantasy." It is true that Marx approached the subject of social class as a metaphysician and not as an empirical sociologist, and it seems clear that no coherent theory of social class can be extracted from Marx's writings. But the concept of social class has at least potential objectivity and empirical reference in a way that such obscure subjective categories as "the structure of selfhood" or "an image of a collective dual personality" do not have.

Tucker makes out an exceedingly plausible case by using the distinction between manifest and latent functions. In the structural history of Marx's ideas, the notion of the "division of labour" came to play a role that "self-alienation" had played in the early work. Obviously a man may think he has escaped early assumptions (as Marx thought himself more emancipated from Hegel than he "really" was), and yet they may continue to play a role in later work. But Tucker shows no more than that Marx's earlier concern with "the structure of selfhood" plays an occasional underlying role in later writings, as a "lapse" into earlier psychological modes of thought. He does not show that conceptions like "self" and "alienation" play a systematic role in mature Marxism. In any case these indefinite notions refer chiefly to the future communist society as a new "state of self" rather than to the attempted historical and sociological discussion of the capitalist present. The myth and melodrama in Marxism derive from the dialectical mumbo-jumbo rather than from a thoroughly spectral notion like the "self."

Professor Tucker's book is nonetheless a most valuable contribution to scholarly analysis and criticism of Marxism.—DOUGLAS MCCALLUM, University of Sydney.

Alexander Herzen and the Birth of Russian Socialism, 1812-1855. BY MARTIN MALIA. (Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1961. pp. 486. $10.00.)

Marxism, Lenin once said, has three components: German philosophy, French socialism, and English political economy. It is notable that the first two of these ingredients had been mixed into the Russian radical mind long before the advent of Marxism. The resultant blend—inspired by a conviction that Russia followed her own laws of development and could by-pass the capitalist stage of history—was Populism, narodnichestvo or Russian socialism, which dominated the scene in Russia before the appearance of Marxism in the mid-1880s. Populism was the work of many minds, but no thinker contributed more than Alexander Herzen (1812-1870); and Professor Malia has performed a considerable service for the historian of political philosophy in this masterful account of the younger Herzen and his thought.

The dates in the title are misleading, for the book is concerned principally with the period from 1832 or 1833, when Herzen first became acquainted with Saint-Simon, to 1847, when he left Russia never to return. Most previous studies of Herzen have attached great importance to his first shocked reaction to Europe in 1847 and 1848, and to his bitter disillusionment with the failure of the February revolution. But if Malia's conclusion is correct—and he has gathered impressive evidence to support it—the main outline of Herzen's thought had already taken shape before he left Russia. This is true even of Herzen's characteristic "rejection of the West," which was really a rejection of bourgeois Europe, and his conviction (an article of faith with the later Populists) that the younger and more vigorous Russia was destined to lead the way to socialism. The one new element in Herzen's writings after 1847, his faith in the Russian peasant commune as the embryo of a socialist society, was not of course an original idea but borrowed much from the thinking of the Slavophiles.

Thus the main contribution of the book is to explain why the young Herzen became a socialist, and perhaps more important, to examine what "socialism" must have meant to a Russian radical of the 1840s. Certainly for Herzen socialism did not mean reconstruction of the economic system, but rather total negation of the existing order in the name of a higher ideal of justice—without any specific reference to economic goals. Malia argues that socialism began not as a protest against industrial capitalism but as a protest against the old regime and a demand for political democracy against authoritarian government; Herzen's "socialism" was simply the most extreme and uncompromising form of a movement of protest which had seized the intelligentsia of the Forties. On this point Malia is profoundly right just as in his own way Stalin was right when he formulated the theory of the "weakest link": socialism is a phenomenon of under-development, a protest movement driven to revolutionary extremism by the failure of democratic (or "bourgeois") reform.

But although Malia has provided us with a penetrating account of Herzen's own thought, to which no brief review can do justice, he has been less successful in describing this general political movement of the Forties. He has tried to analyze the politics of the period exclusively according to the western spectrum of political ideas. The major tendencies of the time, Official Nationalism, Slavophilism, and Westernism are graded in the over-simplified and misleading terminology of "left" and "right." This is particularly unfortunate for the Slavophiles, who become the Right Center, "something like a Russian version of enlightened Tories" and "a rather typical aristocratic opposition to absolutism." The Slavophiles are hard to classify on any political scale, for the essence of their teaching was a flight from politics, a total rejection of government, and an insistence, to quote Konstantin Aksakov, that "the state, as a state, is a lie." Yet the Slavophiles were not anarchists, for they were willing to leave the evil and corrupting power of the state in the hands of the tsar-autocrat so long as he, in turn, left substantial autonomy to the nation. But if Russia did develop a typical aristocratic opposition to absolutism, then this designation belongs to the Westerners, and especially to such intellectuals from the lower nobility as Konstantin Kavelin and Timofei Granovskii, who were not as "rootless" as Malia suggests.

This criticism should not, however, detract from the overall value of the book, which is certain to be a standard work in the library of every student of the history of socialist thought.—DARRELL P. HAMMER, Indiana University.

Politics of Cultural Despair. By FRITZ STERN. (Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1961. Pp. 367. $8.00.)

This book invokes the memory of three German ideologists who, from the days of the Wilhelminian Empire to the germinal period of Nazism, could boast of a strategic influence over the minds of considerable segments of the German middle class, including the members of the academic community. None of the "Germanic Ideologists" as the author of this absorbing and painstaking study has dubbed Paul de Lagarde, Julius Langbehn and Moeller van den Bruck (respectively authors of Deutsche Schriften, Rembrandt als Erzieher and Das Dritte Reich) had the power of analysis and the breadth of vision of the intellectual titan of their period, Friedrich Nietzsche. They stood out in their times because they articulated most penetratingly a mood of "cultural despair." Reacting as they did against the environment of their days they cried out their hatred of the combined features of authoritarianism, liberalism and materialism. They came to reject modernism, the sum total of Western values, in favor of the reestablishment of a spiritually united community of the German people. The detailed inquiry of the author brings out quite clearly the share which a warped personality structure had in the anti-modernist reaction by all three of them—the first, a philologist of repute, the second, an eternal bohemian, and only the third a direct participant in the rightist opinion-forming process of the early nineteen twenties. In theory, at least, their program was tied to the revitalization of a truly conservative heritage. But where would this projection of a conservatism which was a construct of their crisis-ridden minds rather than the evocation of a living past, lead them to?

Though belonging to different generations and concentrating on different, if overlapping, facets of communal deficiencies—Lagarde as critic of the staleness of 19th century Christianity and herald of a new national religion, Langbehn as rhapsodist of an irrationalism recreating true artistic feeling, and Moeller smashing outdated modes of political thinking and manufacturing a universally binding, community centered political style—they all were partners in an ambiguity which vitiated their thought processes: the failure to elucidate the relations between symbols and reality. To what extent does the ambivalence between symbols for a more meaningful life pattern and ever present concern for extremist political action only connote an expression of incapacity to arrive at a more all-embracing societal analysis and to what extent does it contain also an attempt at conscious manipulation? With all due safeguards against historical simplifications and post hoc, ergo propter hoc constructs, there are the syndrome of cultural antisemitism (in two of the three authors), the ostentatious lack of interest in analyzing the social basis of the society in which they were living, the facile effacement of class distinctions in the urge for national unity, the thoroughly imperialist program of expansionist action.

The significance of the men studied here, as intellectual progenitors of National Socialism, emerges clearly. Nazi ideology was not an ad hoc invention of Hitler, Rosenberg and their cohorts. Almost every specific Nazi tenet was circulated widely decades before Versailles. One of the merits of this book is that it demonstrates this fact exhaustively. Many National Socialist notions, concepts and slogans were part of that "pervasive mood" created by Lagarde, Langbehn and Moeller among the German educated and middle classes. This ideology "was one of the traditions that the German elite and the National Socialists shared." "Without this pervasive mood [they] would not have been able to succeed," for they would have lacked that rapport with the middle and upper echelons of German society which to a considerable degree explains the National Socialist victory. What the latter contributed was to transform the Germanic ideology and its mood of cultural despair into a dynamic political force. In this, to be sure, they were aided by economic and political conditions different from those in which the two older men, Lagarde and Langbehn, lived. Nevertheless, because the "Germanic ideologists" transmitted both their rejections and their vistas to broad strata—noticeably, as the author justifiably remarks, to the world of the teachers—their predictions, though they rested on an "intellectually threadbare analysis," acquired many of the elements of a self-fulfilling prophesy.—OTTO KIRCHHEIMER, Columbia University.

Montesquieu: a Critical Biography. By ROBERT SHACKLETON. (London: Oxford University Press, 1961. Pp. xv, 432. 45/-.)

Montesquieu has been undeservedly neglected by biographers and we are indebted to Mr. Shackleton, who had complete access to all the relevant manuscripts and family archives, for having filled this gap. He has produced a careful, balanced, and highly informative biography, based upon thorough research. With Montesquieu, the reader shuttles back and forth between Paris and his home territory of Guyenne, catching glimpses of him, too, on his travels in Italy and England. One gets enough of the flavor and texture of life in Paris and in the environs of Bordeaux to understand the milieu in which Montesquieu moved. The picture that emerges from these pages is that of a man who played a rather prominent role in the life of the Academy of Bordeaux and, for some years, as a "President" judge of the local Parlement, who was elected to the French Academy at the age of thirty-eight, who was intimate with Parisian society at various extended periods of his life, who was welcomed into and delighted by the Parisian intellectual salons from 1733 to the time of his death, and yet who remained intellectually somewhat aloof. Few people were aware of the fact that he was writing The Persian Letters until they were published; and the composition of The Spirit of the Laws, to which he devoted nearly twenty years, was surrounded by almost equal secrecy.

In Shackleton's pages, we follow Montesquieu's intellectual growth and changing ideas throughout all his writings, published and unpublished. We note the development of his regard for liberty, for which in his early years he had a rather low opinion. We can even trace, step by step, the changes in his essay on the English constitution, between the time when he wrote it, in 1733 after his return from England, and the date of its eventual publication, fifteen years later, as chapter 6 of Book XI of The Spirit of the Laws.

The account of Montesquieu's method of working on his magnum opus is interesting and impressive. The notion that he was an elegant dil-letante gains no support here. From the start he envisaged the project as one that would require him to put aside preconceptions and search for the broadest possible factual basis regarding all aspects of every known civilization. Beginning at the ripe age of forty-five, he labored assiduously for sixteen years, reading widely and prodigiously, and making careful abstracts of the books he read. Throughout his adult life he kept journals in which he noted and developed his ideas, sometimes elaborating them at considerable length. From these sourcebooks, as well as from the abstracts, he drew heavily in composing The Spirit of the Laws. If, by modern standards of scholarship, his evidence appears inadequate and even capriciously selected, one must remember the character of the available materials—often such unreliable sources as letters of missionaries and accounts of returned travellers.

On the actual composition he exerted the greatest care. The finished product, says Shackleton, "was the result of continued and deliberate transference of sentences from one place to another, of intentional polishing, of conscious pursuit of the epigram and the paradox, of the constant suppression of the redundant and of the intermediate link between two ideas, of the rearranging of a sequence of ideas so that the consequence precedes the cause."

A large part of the book is devoted to chapters on various aspects of his published works, especially The Spirit of the Laws. They deal, for instance, with "Montesquieu's Conception of Law," "The Theory of Governments," "The System of Liberty," "Climate and Causes," and "The History of Laws." The critical exposition set forth in these chapters is generally sound, although there are points to which one may take exception. Montesquieu's theory of natural law is made to seem less torn between rationalism and empiricism than in fact it is. Contrary to Shackleton's implication, Montesquieu was not the first to link a doctrine of the separation of powers with the theory of liberty, nor was Locke. Hence the evidence that Montesquieu had developed his theory before he had read Locke with care does not necessarily support the author's conclusion that Montesquieu's theory was based on his own observation.

The author concludes his study with the final sentence of Lord Chesterfield's published comment at the time of Montesquieu's death: "His work will illustrate his name, and survive him as long as right reason, moral obligation, and the true spirit of laws, shall be understood, respected and maintained." This reviewer puts down the volume with a feeling of greatly increased appreciation for the validity of Chester-field's appraisal.—J. ROLAND PENNOCK, Swarthmore College.

Sociology: The Progress of a Decade. BY SEYMOUR MARTIN LIPSET AND NEIL J. SMELSER. (Englewood Cliffs, N. J.: Prentice-Hall, Inc., 1961. Pp xi, 635. $7.50.)

This is a collection of articles from the pages of the learned journals in the field of sociology, reflecting what the authors consider to be major trends in the literature during the decade of the 1950s. As such, it contains some that will be of little interest to many political scientists. But there are some sections that should prove to be valuable and enlightening to those who are attempting to relate political science to the other social sciences.

The first section, which deals with the discipline of sociology itself, provides a means for comparison between the two fields. A number of the problems are identical, a few are analogous and perhaps none completely irrelevant. The authors have not tried to comment on the major works in this area except as such works have become the basis for discussion in the journals. So those unfamiliar with such major contributions as those of Parsons and Shils, for example, may sometimes wonder what all the to-do is about. But if he reads the whole section, he may get some insights about these major works that will give him light on their shortcomings or induce him to read and see whether or not he agrees with the critics. What he will discover in any case is that there is emerging some systematic theory in sociology which is directly apropos to the findings of political scientists and may, in fact, serve well to throw light on some of their empirical findings. Gouldner's article on the Theory of Bureaucracy is a particular case in point.

The methods employed by sociologists and political scientists are at some points identical and at others it looks as if criticisms of research in one field are equally applicable to the other. At any event, it may be easier to see the validity of criticism when it is directed at workers in another field than one's own, and so, by reference, discover something of one's shortcomings.

Those political scientists who are concerned with the ecological and demographic aspects of political phenomena will find much of immediate interest in the section dealing with physical and biological boundaries of systems. The complaint that these factors have been neglected by the behaviorists is aired and rebutted, and some contributions to an understanding of political phenomena that might be made, using knowledge about these parameters, is indicated.

In another section dealing with the production and allocation of wealth, power, and prestige, the fields of sociology and political science are pretty well merged. It is interesting to note that two of the articles cited here are by authors primarily identified as political scientists. The articles by David Easton and Robert Dahl show something of what can be done when social phenomena and political phenomena are considered as one.

Of growing significance in political science, is knowledge about the class and status system of a state. The articles on these subjects deal with the primary controversies among students concentrating in this area. Some of the methods are such as might be directly used in political science, and the findings contribute to the substantive knowledge required for political analysis.

The sections on social change and social control will be of more peripheral interest but those interested particularly in urban government may find that the pathology of the city, as revealed by sociological analysis is the source of most of the political problems confronted by local governments.

The quality of the articles is, as is always the case in a collection, varied, but, in general, they represent a pretty good cross section of the work that was done in the '50s, and this volume provides the political scientist with an easy access to a field in which there is increasing interest.—FRED COTTRELL, Miami University.

Free Minds: A Venture in the Philosophy of Democracy. BY RALPH W. NELSON. (Washington: Public Affairs Press, 1961. Pp. xv, 291. $4.50.)

In this impressively entitled book, Dr. Ralph Waldo Nelson exhorts his fellow "grass-blade home folks" of the world to unite with him in rescuing democracy from the clutches of autocratic politicians, priests and professors "who have traditionally smothered the freedom of our minds by their paternalistic eagerness to do our thinking for us." To succeed in this venture the plain people need only to begin to think for themselves, seriously, deeply and hard. Then, freed by this "headwork" from the dictatorship of capitol, cathedral and campus, the home folks can proceed to apply to the solution of world problems that pragmatic philosophy of life they already employ for solving their personal problems. The author, a philosopher, credits John Dewey with formulating this method which operates, briefly, in the following manner: The ordinary citizen solves a small scale problem by (1) sensing it accurately, (2) locating and defining it clearly, (3) creatively seeking a possible solution, (4) reasoning soundly "as to what results or fruits to expect in the laboratory of life—when (5) he dares freely to seek truth in laboratory application of the best wisdom of his day to the continuing tasks of citizenship in the kingdom of God." The author's pioneering achievement, he frequently reminds the reader, is his discovery that this method, "already rooted and strongly growing in the sturdy hearts and clear heads of our plainest people," holds the key to the world's salvation.

Several times in what he calls his "adventurous book," Nelson criticizes the methods of social and political scientists. He advises them to abandon their outmoded approaches to their subject matter and adopt instead his "conception of human life as itself our scientific laboratory of supreme value [that] will provide philosophical ground essential to the techniques that will ultimately lift their sciences from the status of 'descriptive' to that of true laboratory sciences." The author's analysis of how he thinks the Founding Fathers solved their political problem by writing the Constitution illustrates both how Americans executed step four of the problem-solving process (the United States has been engaged in step five since 1787), and the marvelous insights to be gained by adopting his suggested technique.

"What happened at Philadelphia . . . was that each individual thinker received stimuli from his fellows to which he responded as an individual thinker; and when he expressed his responding idea in language, this idea served as a further stimulus to all his fellows who understood it. So on, back and forth and round about, each response stimulating other responses until the gradually ripening reactions of individuals evolved into the united and composite, formulated response of the whole convention . . . the Constitution."

This passage illustrates not a new methodology for the social sciences but rather an unintended parody on a behavioral study of groups. It springs from the author's total unfamiliarity with the goals and methods of social scientists.

Not only does Nelson reveal no understanding of our methodology, but he fails to develop one of his own and apply it to this book. The result is a work that rambles in a pseudo-scholarly manner through "historical evidence" selected to buttress what are no more than the author's personal predilections. He constantly reasserts his primary proposition without demonstrating how that pioneering discovery can be put into action. In short, he never brings off steps one through four himself.—F. DONALD ZUCKER, Ursinus College.

Principles of Government and Politics in the Middle Ages. BY WALTER ULLMANN. (New York: Barnes and Noble. 1961. Pp. 320. $6.00.)

Dr. Ullmann has written a very important book in the tradition of Gierke and McIlwain, one in spirit closer to the former. For this very definitely is a work of concepts and principles; italicized nouns and phrases such as gratia, publica utilitas, ordo rationis, and principatus abound, and in effect the volume represents an attempt to order the political thought of some 1500 years in the light of several great themes. The non-specialist reader will be overwhelmed by an elaborate scheme which, in terms of beautifully clear and precise statements of the relationship of law and institutions to Christian theology or Aristotelian philosophy, explains why men of politics thought and acted the way they did before the Reformation. Beyond this, the specialist—and here one must include not only the historian of political ideas but also historians of the church and the several national monarchies—will find Ullmann's views on a multitude of issues over which there is learned debate. For example, he adds to the literature on Magna Carta, the English coronation oath of 1308, and the prohibition of Roman Law study in France. Nor is any authority safe: Stephan Kuttner's views on this last issue are characterized as "naive."

The book is divided into three sections, The Pope, The King, and The People, the three being preceded by an introduction which describes the ascending and descending themes of government that contested throughout the period, and that constitute the basic analytical conception of the study. In the descending conception of government and law, authority flows from God "in the shape of a pyramid," while in the opposing theory "law-creating power may be ascribed to the community or the populus." Those familiar with the author's two books on the medieval papacy will find here another brilliant statement of the development of the papal institution. The Bible, writings of the early popes, vocabulary and theories borrowed from the majesty of Roman Law, all these had contributed to the papal doctrine of the principatus by the fifth century. The pope, a fundamental distinction being made between the office and the person, was to direct all Christians in the affairs of this world. Within the Church, broadly conceived as the community of all Christians, ruled the temporal power. Given the theory of descending government, secular authority was transmitted by the pope to the ruler as an act of grace, gratia. Characteristically Dr. Ullmann here gives both a religious and juristic interpretation of the foundation of secular rule.

Having examined the dependent relationship between monarchy and the papal office, the author analyzes monarchy. Initially the theocratic kingship stood exalted: "there was no juristic line of communication running from the people to the king." Now the king too had gratia; like the pope he was an estate apart. But, if the theocratic king was above man's law he remained under God's law, and therefore under the interpreter of that law, the pope. At this point in his argument the author investigates the restraints that legal and institutional feudalism placed upon the theocratic king. He discusses both English and French constitutional history and shows how the king who stood unchallenged as theocratic monarch could be challenged as feudal lord. He emphasizes that responsibility to feudal law and custom was already a step in the direction of popular control. Finally we are treated to a discussion of medieval populism conceived in the broadest theoretical and institutional sense. Dr. Ullmann ranges from guilds and heretical groups as expressions of popular needs or discontents to careful analysis of Aristotelian naturalistic politics. He analyzes Marsilius of Padua and Bartolus' theory of popular sovereignty. Thus, having begun with the early papacy, he ends with the Renaissance. Having begun with God as the source of all authority, he ends with a theory of popular sovereignty worked out by theorists and legists in relation to the functioning institutions of their own day.

This brief summary omits the passion, scholarship, ingenuity, and vision that pervade Dr. Ullmann's book. One may argue against many of the author's strongly held views, or one may wish that he had not strained a given point of interpretation—and many will do both. But no one will close the book feeling uninformed or unchallenged.—PETER RIESENBERG, Washington University (St. Louis).

SELECTED ARTICLES AND DOCUMENTS ON POLITICAL THEORY

CECELIA M. KENYON
Smith College

Adorno, Theodor W. Meinung Whan Gesellschaft. Der Monat. December 1961.

Agazzi, Emilio. Il marxismo di Antonio Labriola. Il Pensiero Critico. April–September, 1961.

Alexander, Robert J. Nationalism, Latin America's Predominant Ideology. Journal of International Affairs. 2/XV/1961.

Amann, Peter. Revolution: A Redefinition. Political Science Quarterly. March, 1962.

Apter, D. E. Some Reflections on the Role of a Political Opposition in New Nations. Comparative Studies in Society and History. January, 1962.

Aranda, Luis Rodriguez. El racionalismo en el pensamiento político español. Revista de Estudios Políticos. September-October, 1961.

Bestor, Arthur. State Sovereignty and Slavery—a Reinterpretation of Proslavery Constitutional Doctrine, 1846-1860. Journal of the Illinois State Historical Society. Summer, 1961.

Bluhm, William T. Causal Theory in Thucydides' Peloponnesian War. Political Studies. February, 1962.

Bomholt, Julius. Dichtung und Gemeinschaft. Schweizer Monatshefte. February, 1962.

Casaubon, Juan A. Los orígenes hegelianos y la esencia del marxismo. Sapientia. April-June, 1961, and July-September, 1961.

Clarac, Pierre. La politique dans l'oeuvre de Chateaubriand. Revue politique et Parlementaire. March, 1962.

Debré, Michel. La teoría y la práctica de la política. Revista de Estudios Políticos. November-December, 1961.

Debré, Michel. Science politique et action politique. Revue Française de Science Politique. December, 1961.

Dunne, Gerald T. Joseph Story: The Germinal Years. Harvard Law Review. February, 1962.

Fay, Charles. Human Evolution: A Challenge to Thomistic Ethics. International Philosophical Quarterly. February, 1962.

Fernani, Franco. Il "brifrontismo" di Hegel e la sinistra hegeliana. Il Pensiero Critico. April-September, 1961.

Furtado, João Rodrigo Narciso. Contribuição para o estudo do pensamento político de Álvaro Pais. Filosofia. 4/VIII/1961.

Gabel, Joseph. The Idea of Alienation and the Sociology of Mannheim. The Review. 1/IV/1962.

Gaeta, Sergio Bertelli-Franco. Noterelle Machiavelliane. Revista Storica Italiana. III/LXXIII/1961.

Golding, M. P. Causation in the Law. The Journal of Philosophy. February 15, 1962.

Goldstein, Leon J. The Meaning of 'State' in Hegel's Philosophy of History. The Philosophical Quarterly. January, 1962.

Goodman, Elliot R. Die apokalyptische Vision des staatenlosen Weltkommunismus. Ost Europa. November-December, 1961.

Goodman, Elliot. East vs. West in Communist Ideology. Journal of International Affairs. 2/XV/1961.

Hamburger, Joseph. James Mill on Universal Suffrage and the Middle Class. Journal of Politics. February, 1962.

Hanak, Tibor. Kommunistische Diskussionen um Georg Lukács. Ost Europa. July-August, 1961.

Haykal, Mouhammad Hassanein. Le communisme et nous. Orient. 3/V/1961.

Ibrahim, Zakariya. Le communisme et l'avenir. Orient. 3/V/1961.

Kenyon, Cecelia M. Republicanism and Radicalism in the American Revolution: An Old-Fashioned Interpretation. William and Mary Quarterly. April, 1962.

Kirchheimer, Otto. Gnade in der politischen Strafverfolgung. Politische Vierteljahresschrift. December, 1961.

Knox, George. Apocalypse and Sour Utopias. Western Humanities Review. Winter, 1962.

Laeuen, Harold. Polens Verhältnis zur Ideologie. Ost Europa. July-August, 1961.

Le Lannou, Maurice. La géographie est-elle une science politique? Revue Française de Science Politique. December, 1961.

Lübbe, Hermann. Verteidigung Der Freiheit Als Kampf gegen Den Liberalismus. Zeitschrift für Politik. 4/8/1961.

Ludz, Peter Christian. Offene Fragen in der Totalitarismus-Forschung. Politische Vierteljahresschrift. December, 1961.

Maravall, J. A. The Origins of the Modern State. Journal of World History. 4/VI/1961.

Naville, Pierre. Alienation and the Analysis of the Modern World. The Review. 1/IV/1962.

Neal, Fred Warner. Titoist Theory and Titoist Practice. Journal of International Affairs. 2/XV/1961.

Newmyer, R. Kent. A Note on the Whig Politics of Justice Joseph Story. Mississippi Valley Historical Review. December, 1961.

Nulle, Stebelton H. The Anomaly of Revolution. Western Humanities Review. Winter, 1961.

Orfei, R. Un confronto tra Gramsci e Marx: il nesso teoria-pratica. Revista di Filosofia Neo-Scolastica. November-December, 1961.

Paechter, Heinz. Radikalismus in den U.S.A. Der Monat. February, 1962.

Peck, Arthur L. Plato versus Parmenides. The Philosophical Review. April, 1962.

Peperzak, A. De jonge Hegel en de oorsprong van het denken. Tijdschrift voor Philosophie. December, 1961.

Powell, J. H. John Dickinson as President of Pennsylvania. Pennsylvania History. July, 1961.

Prata, Francisco X. Pina Martins. O nível de radicalidade da Filosofia de Jose Ortega y Gasset. Filosofia. 4/VIII/1961.

Prawer, J. Etude sur le droit des Assises de Jérusalem: Droit de confiscation et droit d'exhérédation. Revue Historique de Droit Français et Étranger. October-December, 1961.

Prybyla, Jan S. Das Eigentum in der kommunistischen Gesellschaftsordnung. Ost Europa. November-December, 1961.

Romero, Francisco. La historia de la filosofía según Hegel, N. Hartmann y G. Kafka. Cuadernos Americanos. March-April, 1962.

Ruiz-Gimenez, Joaquín. Balmes y el sentido de la libertad. Revista de Estudios Políticos. November-December, 1961.

Rupprecht, F. Über den Charakter der Kommunistischen Ideale. Deutsche Zeitschrift für Philosophie. 11/IX/1961.

Scheler, H. Das Problem der nationalen Souveränität in der modernen imperialistischen Kriegsideologie. Deutsche Zeitschrift für Philosophie. 11/IX/1961.

Schmidt, F. Hegels Philosophie der Sprache. Deutsche Zeitschrift für Philosophie.

Shaltout, Mahmoud. Le Socialisme et L'Islam. Orient. 4/V/1961.

al-Sib'í, Mustafa. A propos du socialisme de l'Islam. Orient. 4/V/1961.

Stoljarow, V. Kommunismus und Wissenschaft. Deutsche Zeitschrift für Philosophie. 12/IX/1961.

Streisand, Joachim. Progressive Traditionen und reaktionäre Anachronismen in der deutschen Geschichtswissenschaft. Zeitschrift für Geschichtswissenschaft. 8/IX/1961.

Tindemans, L. C. Formation et diffusion de la Propriété dans une perspective sociale chrétienne. La Revue Politique. December, 1961.

de la Torre, Angel Sanchez. La Socialización en la Doctrina Social Católica. Revista de Política Social. October-December, 1961.

Uscatescu, George. Tres Meditaciones Sobre el Comunismo. Revista de Estudios Políticos. September-October, 1961.

Klaus, G., und Wittich, D. Zu einigen Fragen des Verhältnisses von Praxis und Erkenntnis. Deutsche Zeitschrift für Philosophie. 11/IX/1961.

SELECTED ARTICLES AND DOCUMENTS ON

METHODOLOGY AND RESEARCH IN THE SOCIAL SCIENCES

JULIAN FELDMAN

University of California, Berkeley

Philosophy of Social Science

Meltzer, L. The need for a dual orientation in social psychology. Journal of Social Psychology, 1961, 55, 43, October.

Swanson, G. E. Mead and Freud: their relevance for social psychology. Sociometry, 1961, 24, 319, December.

Tisdale, J. R. Psychological value theory and research: 1930-1960. Dissertation Abstracts, 1961, 22, October.

Research Methods

Ancombe, F. J. Estimating a mixed-exponential response law. Journal of the American Statistical Association, 1961, 56, 493, September.

Bechtoldt, H. P. An empirical study of the factor analysis stability hypothesis. Psychometrika, 1961, 26, 405, December.

Berger, A. On comparing intensities of association between two binary characteristics in two different populations. Journal of the American Statistical Association, 1961, 56, 889, December.

Blalock, H. M., Jr. Evaluating the relative importance of variables. American Sociological Review, 1961, 26, 866, December.

Blankenship, A. B. Creativity in consumer research. Journal of Marketing, 1961, 25, 34, October.

Borgatta, E. F. Toward a methodological codification: the shotgun and the saltshaker. Sociometry, 1961, 24, 432, December.

Capon, J. A note on the asymptotic normality of the Mann-Whitney-Wilcoxon statistic. Journal of the American Statistical Association, 1961, 56, 687, September.

Carroll, J. B. The nature of the data, or how to choose a correlation coefficient. Psychometrika, 1961, 26, 347, December.

Davies, M. Multiple linear regression analysis with adjustment for class differences. Journal of the American Statistical Association, 1961, 56, 729, September.

de Groot, A. D. Via clinical to statistical prediction. Acta Psychologica, 1961, 18, 274.

Deutsch, K. W., and Isard, W. A note on a generalized concept of effective distance. Behavioral Science, 1961, 6, 308, October.

Dill, W. R. What management games do best. Business Horizons, 1961, 4, 55, Fall.

Edgington, E. S. A statistical test of cyclical trends, with application to Weber's law. American Journal of Psychology, 1961, 74, 630, December.

El-badry, M. A. Failure of enumerators to make entries of zero: errors in-recording childless cases in population censuses. Journal of the American Statistical Association, 1961, 56, 909, December.

Feldt, L. S. The use of extreme groups to test for the presence of a relationship. Psychometrika, 1961, 26, 307, September.

- Fruchter, B., and Anderson, H. E., Jr. Geometrical representation of two methods of linear least squares multiple correlation. Psychometrika, 1961, 26, 433, December.
- Goldberger, A. S. Stepwise least squares: residual analysis and specification error. Journal of the American Statistical Association, 1961, 56, 998, December.
- Gross, C. F. Intrajudge consistency in ratings of heterogeneous persons. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology, 1961, 62, 605, May.
- Halperin, M. Fitting of straight lines and prediction when both variables are subject to error. Journal of the American Statistical Association, 1961, 56, 657, September.
- Hart, H. Laboratory sociology as a social innovation. American Sociological Review, 1961, 26, 781, October.
- Hennessy, B. C., and Hennessy, E. R. The prediction of close elections: comments on some 1960 polls. Public Opinion Quarterly, 1961, 25, 405, Fall.
- Herbst, P. G. A theory of simple behaviour systems. I. Human Relations, 1961, 14, 71, February.
- Herbst, P. G. A theory of simple behaviour systems. II. Human Relations, 1961, 14, 193, August.
- Hirshleifer, J. The Bayesian approach to statistical decision: an exposition. Journal of Business, 1961, 34, 471, October.
- Hogg, R. V. On the resolution of statistical hypotheses. Journal of the American Statistical Association, 1961, 56, 978, December.
- Kimball, A. E. Increasing the rate of return in mail surveys. Journal of Marketing, 1961, 25, 63, October.
- Lachman, S. J. Level of aspiration: a classroom demonstration of phenomena and principles. Journal of General Psychology, 1961, 65, 357, October.
- Lees, R. W., and Lord, F. M. A nomograph for computing partial correlation coefficients. Journal of the American Statistical Association, 1961, 56, 995, December.
- Lubin, A. The interpretation of significant interaction. Educational and Psychological Measurement, 1961, 21, 807, Winter.
